INTRODUCTION

The significance of the NICAP story is subjective. Like many historical sagas, it depends on who you ask as to what it meant, and, in some cases, what even happened. Select events can be established from records and archives, and we will certainly examine them, but the fact remains people have differing ideas about what was most important and most interesting about the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena.

It is notable that the NICAP saga may be viewed in at least two contexts. One, which is my interest, is the organization's intersection with the intelligence community. A second, and more commonly viewed context, is NICAP UFO investigation. People interested in UFOs understandably want to know if the group learned anything important. The investigators of NICAP sure thought so, but dissecting the situation leads us to the paradox of the matter. The story of NICAP, and what is most significant about it, is not so easily discerned.

Did NICAP do some good work? Yes, it did. Were NICAP investigators credulous? Yes, that's true too, depending on specific circumstances considered. Was NICAP a CIA front? That might be accurate as well, short lived and/or intermittent as it may have been. Did NICAP rattle swords with the CIA and Air Force about a UFO cover-up? Yep, it certainly did. Was the CIA monitoring NICAP? It sure appears so, to more and less extents and depending on the particular circumstances. Did the CIA dismantle NICAP? Maybe so, or, at the least, it is true that CIA associates did basic managerial work for NICAP throughout its lifespan and stages of decline. Did NICAP run itself in the ground through financial mismanagement? Yes, to an extent it did indeed, which also means the CIA was not fully responsible for its demise, at least not necessarily. Much like the parable of the blind men and the elephant, many perspectives are correct to some extent, depending on how one comes at it.

Many feel NICAP was derailed by the Central Intelligence Agency. Perceived motives often include thwarting UFO investigation and destabilizing the group's effort to challenge the Condon Report, which was an Air Force-sponsored assessment that minimized the saucer situation. The presence of CIA associates in the saga is clear enough, but motives are much less so. We will consider the circumstances along with the perspectives of those familiar with the events.

I actually came to strongly suspect the CIA was substantially involved in the incorporation and initial operation of NICAP. We will explore this in detail on the coming pages.

Ironically, I am not convinced the situation significantly impaired or even particularly affected the way Maj. Donald Keyhoe would run the outfit for the next 13 years. During his tenure there was some overt CIA interest in NICAP activities, as well as some possible not so overt interest. The activities of CIA psychological warfare specialist and NICAP Board of Governors member Col. Joseph Bryan III will be explored, as will profiles of his intelligence colleagues from the Office of Policy Coordination. We will examine those situations along with some surrounding spectacles that found their ways into a NICAP orbit.

A focus of this book is NICAP's relation to the intelligence community, particularly the CIA and FBI. We will draw upon documents obtained through the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), newspaper clippings, and many more cited sources.

Much of the material referenced was obtained from records published on the websites of intelligence agencies or by submitting my own requests under the FOIA. As of this writing, several FOIA requests remain open. I will post the material at my blog, The UFO Trail, as it is received.

Another primary source for information covered in this book was NICAP files provided by researcher and archivist Barry Greenwood. I am tremendously grateful to him for supplying the material.

A 69 MB folder provided by Mr. Greenwood consists of 42 pdfs containing NICAP records. It may be accessed in whole on Google Drive or as individual files I will reference and link, as will be the case with many additional sources.

I apologize in advance for the errors which will inevitably inhabit this offering. I hope we find them few, far between, and of minimal consequence.

I am thankful to all who helpfully fielded my questions, provided material, and assisted me in reaching people of interest. I also thank all the researchers whose work and materials are cited. Select archives played key roles as well, and I am grateful to their administrators for their valuable assistance.

Thanks to those who maintain intelligence agency online reading rooms. I am grateful to the FBI, NARA, CIA, NSA, USAF, and the many FOIA officers at several agencies who filled my requests, informed me when no material was available, conducted correspondence, and continue to process records pertaining to this saga. Their work is important and appreciated.

I am grateful to the friends, loved ones, and acquaintances who supported this effort. Your messages, encouragement and phone calls are important to me. Thank you.

I am grateful to you for joining me on an exploration of events beginning some 70 years ago. Thanks for coming along. In doing so, we will hopefully catch a meaningful glimpse or three of what took place. I trust you will share the interest I developed, and find that circumstances from years gone by tend to shed light on more recent events.

Chapter 1

Oh, Disclosure, I Hear You Calling

The 1940's rang in the modern UFO era. Many researchers went on to sincerely believe they had legitimate shots at pulling the UFO sword from the stone.

“The greatest story involving Earth and Space may soon be told,” proclaimed an October 1, 1954, newsletter distributed by CRIFO. That organization was “Civilian Research, Interplanetary Flying Objects,” directed by Leonard Stringfield.

The assertion was based on an interview Stringfield conducted with Lt. Col. John O'Mara, described as a “Deputy Commander, Intelligence,” in the United States Air Force. The colonel apparently kindly “confirmed the existence of 'flying saucers,'” leading Stringfield to declare the “truth may be bared soon.”

Spoiler: It wasn't.

Stringfield further reported the Air Force planned to cooperate with the public about saucers, and that the public would be taken into confidence. This was believed to be “stimulated by recent events.” Ain't it always?

Stringfield continued, “Flying saucers 'do exist' the Colonel told me, and he added, in effect, past contradictions were unfortunate.”

Stringfield described Col. O'Mara as “wonderfully cooperative,” and the officer even gave a thumbs up to the CRIFO newsletter. Asked about the publication, the colonel indicated it was slanted in the right direction.

The CRIFO newsletter was shared with me in an email from writer and researcher James Carrion. He found the comparisons interesting to much more recent drums of Disclosure, as beaten by such outlets as the New York Times. I indeed share the perspective, as we can note many similarities to the ongoing story of the Advanced Aerospace Threat Identification Program (AATIP) and those promoting the narrative. Comparisons include: recent events were supposedly a tipping point; in-the-know intelligence community insiders were believed to be aiding the process; the government acknowledged the existence of UFOs; praise was bestowed upon the writer embracing the narrative; and, of course, the ultimate confirmation was to come any day.

Members of the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena, or NICAP, once believed they, too, were on the verge of something big. In approximately 1958 literature from the young organization was distributed with a message from its director, Maj. Donald E. Keyhoe.

“Because of new developments, we expect a break in official [UFO] secrecy in 1959,” it was explained.[1] The general story line came to be a recurring theme for NICAP and its investigators, many of whom worked diligently in their attempts to facilitate Disclosure. It was believed an ample amount of public pressure strategically applied to the right agencies and offices would cause a bean spill. The struggle, progress and setbacks of Disclosure were often publicly reported by the group. As a matter of fact, a tug of war with Uncle Sam pretty much came to define NICAP.

In 1961 hopes remained high. A NICAP investigator mailed a letter to a potential UFO witness, enclosing a questionnaire and requesting they fill it out and return it along with details of the sighting. Such was relatively standard operating procedure.

“The information that you give may be the link in solving the great UFO mystery,” the investigator wrote.

The NICAP researcher further explained, “I might also add that your sighting of this UFO may prove a point which could affect not only our present generation, but also the generations to come.”[2]

The letter comes to us from files compiled by the FBI on NICAP. The recipient apparently forwarded it along with the questionnaire to FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover. That was not a particularly unusual thing to do in those days, as Bureau files contain several letters from citizens expressing concern about the NICAP agenda. Letter writers would request Hoover's guidance on their suspicions the UFO group may have had a Communist allegiance. This was not exclusive to NICAP by any means, as a variety of factors led the American public to suspect Communist sympathies ran rampant in the United States.

Hoover's policy towards NICAP was to maintain a neutral public stance, as his response indicates. He or his secretary would typically thank letter writers for their concerns, craft a cordial enough “no comment” on NICAP, and provide further reading on such topics as how to spot Soviet propaganda.

Hoover's response in this particular instance included explaining he would like to be of service, but information contained in FBI files must be maintained as confidential due to regulations of the Department of Justice. Hoover wrote he regretted being unable to answer the inquiry, and hoped it would not be interpreted to infer the Bureau either did or did not have the data requested.

“We're close to it,” Maj. Keyhoe declared in 1966 about discovering what flying saucers were. He made the statement towards the end of his appearance on the then-popular nationally televised show, To Tell the Truth.[3]

In 1978, optimism among UFO investigators persisted. Phoenix-based Ground Saucer Watch (GSW) Director William H. Spaulding suggested during a funding appeal published in the organization's April bulletin that UFO answers were obtainable.

He wrote, “Now is the time all of us must ask ourselves if we really want to solve the UFO mystery. If you answer yes, then we must ask every member to donate five, ten, twenty dollars to help defer the expensive legal fees.”

Spaulding was alluding to legal action directed at targets such as the CIA to obtain what were believed to be revealing UFO documents. In that same bulletin, GSW Director of Research W. Todd Zechel expressed his confidence in cracking the case.

Zechel told readers, “In order to continue this fight and put enough pressure on government agencies to force them to start telling the truth regarding UFOs, we need substantial donations from each and every member. Moreover, we need help from the general public. After all, these efforts will benefit all of mankind, in that the evidence we obtain will once and for all allow us to determine the origin and nature of UFOs. I'll get you the truth: you get me the funds.”

In Spaulding and Zechel's defense, they and their colleagues actually did, in fact, successfully obtain a substantial amount of government documents pertaining to UFOs. The material just never conclusively established their ultimate suspicions and beliefs about Uncle Sam and saucers.

Too bad for Ground Saucer Watch they didn't think of raising funds by throwing a hat in the public securities ring. That's what happened in 2017 at To The Stars Academy of Arts and Science (TTSA).

Coinciding with a company launch and call for investors, TTSA front man Tom DeLonge took up the 'breakthroughs are imminent' torch, stating, “We believe there are discoveries within our reach that will revolutionize the human experience, but they can only be accomplished through the unrestricted support of breakthrough research and innovation.”

“Imagine having 25th century technology this century,” added longtime ufology staple and TTSA co-founder Dr. Hal Puthoff. He explained that a team of passionately curious minds was assembled to reveal and decode “information that can challenge the limits of traditional theory” pertaining to studying Unidentified Aerial Phenomena. Puthoff further asserted they were bringing transformative science and engineering out of the shadows.

Those 2017 remarks by DeLonge and Puthoff do not appear to be aging too awfully much better than those from their overly optimistic and perhaps at times self-important 20th century predecessors, but maybe I don't know revolutionized human experience and transformative science when I see it. I do, however, still have my money in my pocket. As of this writing, it appears much of that team of passionately curious minds sought greener pastures and the future of TTSA is very much in doubt.

Prior to the TTSA creative fundraising, the Mutual UFO Network (MUFON) cut right to the chase and seemed to accept funds provided to Robert Bigelow by the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA). The controversial philanthropist and UFO World main character facilitated the arrangement as part of apparent Pentagon UFO programs. I say “apparent” because a great deal of the projects remain unconfirmed for the time being. Key MUFON personnel typically claim no knowledge of the source of the funds or involvement with what we now know to have been the agency originally managing the reported UFO projects, the DIA. It is also unclear if the DIA fully endorsed enrolling the services of MUFON, particularly if the feds were already in possession of so much information ripe for Disclosure, but we'll just keep moving.

Writers like Leslie Kean and George Knapp managed to position themselves in the midst of the Disclosure dust devil on several occasions, even if their coverage may be disingenuous, in error, or more than a little responsible for perpetuating the whirlwind itself. The two, along with numerous Disclosure beat reporters who followed suit, tend to promote rather credulous stories and flawed lines of reasoning in the form of what some came to consider access journalism. Such examples include Knapp's devotion to the Bob Lazar story, unquestioning portrayal of Skinwalker Ranch, and uncritical acceptance of TTSA statements and narratives while consistently showcasing the personalities involved.

Knapp's defense of the dubious Lazar case is particularly vulnerable to criticism, considering the duo's claim they were each aware of a location where Lazar stashed some purportedly alien-engineered Element 115, yet they steadfastly refused to produce it. Researchers aptly noted the irony of supposed Disclosure activists who, we are to believe, choose not to grace the world with the very smoking gun they demand from the powers that be.

Kean's objectivity and apparent confirmation bias were called into question when she perpetuated claims of a government cover-up of the JAL 1628 UFO case. The claims were directly contradicted by testimonies of two firsthand witnesses to the alleged cover-up. They attended a meeting in which the purported cover-up directive was allegedly issued, yet they said no such statements were made. Moreover, the two indicated info was actually distributed for analysis. Kean omitted the circumstances from her account of the case - even after researchers brought them to her attention - while reportedly simultaneously obstructing communication between the researchers and her contact who claimed the cover-up was in place.

Kean also made yet to be verified assertions about the AATIP, as well as fantastic claims about Chilean alleged UFOs that proved unsupported. The work of such writers as Kean and Knapp is held in high regard by many UFO enthusiasts, while others seriously question their chronic uncritical and incomplete reporting that often omits rather obvious discrepancies. Criticism may be most justified in the way the two present themselves as journalists, while titles such as UFO promoters seem much more accurate.

Yet another noteworthy UFO Disclosure activist, or at least he seems to like to think so, is Dr. Steven Greer. The former medical doctor undertook rather extreme theatrics and questionable lines of research, ostensibly designed to facilitate wider knowledge of UFOs and their occupants. Greer's activities reportedly include bringing an entourage of armed bodyguards to a scheduled speaking engagement at the 2013 Contact in the Desert event in Joshua Tree, California. He is also known for exaggerating the significance of his interactions with public officials and charging substantial fees for workshops purported to facilitate contact with extraterrestrials, among other eyebrow-raising activities.

Greer's general shtick is that the visiting ETs are friendly, but Uncle Sam wants to paint them as hostile and keep a lid on it because ET has a source of free energy. Letting the free energy cat out of the bag would loosen the government stranglehold on many industries, Greer suggests. His outspoken activism on UFO truth, he would lead us to believe, resulted in several thwarted attempts on his life by the powers that be, thus the dramatic scene at Joshua Tree.

Greer may be most infamous for his extraordinary claims which proved incorrect surrounding the Atacama skeleton, and the ethical issues which arose with his and Dr. Garry Nolan's handling of the specimen. Nolan, an honored Stanford professor and researcher who obtained degrees in genetics, had a brief affiliation with To The Stars. He was also widely and confidently suspected to be a not so anonymously portrayed, starry eyed character in a Dr. Diana Walsh Pasulka nonfiction (sort of) book, American Cosmic.

The situation was questioned by your author, as was Nolan and Walsh Pasulka's lack of willingness to directly address their alleged involvement in reports of “security personnel” monitoring and editing her statements made on podcasts. Suffice it to say neither of the two had much to say about any of it, but I guess that's Disclosure for you. Transparency often seems to only be a good thing if it's applied to the actions of others. The sincerity of Walsh Pasulka's seemingly halfhearted effort to conceal the identities of primary characters in American Cosmic was questioned throughout segments of the UFO genre, as were the underlying motives.

Back to Greer. He shoveled the coal pretty hard on the Atacama skeleton story, which he sold as pertaining to extraterrestrials. This was depicted in his 2013 crowdsource-funded film, Sirius, which was billed as blowing the lid off the UFO mystery. Cash contributors voiced disappointment when they had to pay to view the movie and indicated they felt double-billed. Some then found the contents of the movie lacking and falling well short of its advertised lid-blowing significance. The disappointment didn't get any less bitter when Greer announced yet another film which needed funding and would, once and for all, reveal the shocking truth. It of course didn't, then he did it again. Some might think tax forms show the purpose of his persistence in the face of chronic futility.

In 2014 I reviewed tax information submitted to the Internal Revenue Service by the Greer-operated nonprofit corporation, Center for the Study of Extraterrestrial Intelligence (CSETI), which seemed to serve as the hub for his ventures. I discovered Greer reported taking no salary from CSETI, but during the 2012 tax year, CSETI reported paying some $177,000 for consultation fees to the Greer-owned Crossing Point Inc.

The amount CSETI paid the prior year, 2011, to Crossing Point was $180,360. In 2010 over $214,000 was paid from CSETI to Crossing Point. During the three-year period reviewed, Greer's Crossing Point was paid nearly 70% of the $833,083 combined CSETI reported total income, according to 990 forms filed to the IRS.

The 2012 CSETI Form 990EZ indicated the organization surrendered its nonprofit status effective January 1, 2013. The move may have been related to bringing in so much more unrelated business income than public support that its nonprofit charity status was possibly jeopardized as defined by IRS. Surrendering the nonprofit status would then be an advisable move on Dr. Greer's part, and not bad work if you can get it.

Stephen Bassett crashed the Disclosure party and formed the Paradigm Research Group, a lobbying initiative, or something to that effect, to end the “truth embargo.” To the best of my knowledge, the Group officially and functionally consists of no one other than himself. His efforts include such projects as the 2008 Million Fax on Washington, in which he attempted to inspire followers to inundate the incoming Obama administration with faxes, emails, and phone calls demanding the release of UFO files.

Bassett probably made his loudest noise with the 2013 Citizen Hearing on Disclosure. Six former members of Congress were paid $20,000 apiece to sit in a mock hearing in which they spent a few days listening to dozens of people of varying levels of credibility, notoriety, and infamy provide testimony on UFOs. The above mentioned Steven Greer was among the presenters, and evening activities included a screening of his film, Sirius.

Richard Dolan was also among the presenters at the Citizen Hearing and is known for what his followers seem to believe is his fight to pry the UFO truth from the government. At the Hearing he rather shamelessly trotted out a filmed interview of an aged man, referred to as “Anonymous.” The man allegedly worked for the CIA and observed many astounding ET-related sights during his employment at Area 51. The statements, dubbed a deathbed testimony, were heavily implied to be motivated by the man's desire to tell the world what he knew and avoid taking the stories to his looming grave.

Trouble was, as I covered in 2013, Linda Moulton Howe had long since interviewed “Anonymous.” His completely unverified story was no less than 15 years old at the time it was implied to be urgent and showcased by Dolan and Bassett at the Citizen Hearing on Disclosure. In preparation for my above referenced 2013 article on the situation, I offered both Dolan and Bassett an opportunity to comment and explain what they would say to people who might question the tactic. Neither responded.

Doubt was further cast on Dolan's judgment and motives when he participated in the Roswell Slides fiasco, a chain of events involving slides which depicted what was actually a mummified Native American child but were promoted as images of an ET. Dolan spoke at the dubious beWITNESS event, a public rollout of the slides sponsored by Jaime Maussan, at which time Dolan called the slides “compelling.” He also vouched for the research skills of the questionable crew promoting the story, who at absolute best utterly failed to pursue the most profoundly obvious of explanations. Many wondered how Dolan, who claims to be qualified to penetrate and analyze complex issues related to UFOs and national security, could sincerely be so inept.

Shortly after the beWITNESS purported big reveal of the slides, the truth came shining through and the story was completely dismantled due to the quality work of the Roswell Slides Research Group. Within hours of the event, a team of volunteer researchers was well on its way to competently analyzing the slides, high resolution images of which the promoters had previously withheld and supposedly been unable to accurately interpret for years. As stated, the slides were conclusively shown to depict a deceased Native American child. Dolan's stock continued to dip with other instances of seemingly unquestioning acceptance of fantastic stories that should test the patience of even the most credulous UFO fan.

He more recently vigorously fanned the flames of an ill conceived tale with extremely loose connections between dots, all ultimately designed to prove what, in UFO circles, is known as the Core Story (saucer crashes, alien bodies and all that). A word to the wise: if an argument relies heavily on speculation, it doesn't prove a point.

The incarnation in question of this version of the Core Story involves hearsay and alleged statements attributed to the purportedly in-the-know Adm. Thomas R. Wilson, and was referred to by Dolan as the “UFO leak of the century.” The story was of course amplified by George Knapp, since it included reference to Eric Davis and others of Skinwalker and TTSA notoriety. For those particularly interested, writer Billy Cox reported how Wilson repeatedly denied any validity to the rumors, among other problematic aspects of this shaggy dog story.

It is rather fascinating how the UFO Disclosure concept stays propped up so sturdily. Back on January 8, 1999, Art Bell hosted “UFO Disclosure '99” on Coast to Coast AM. Stephen Bassett was an integral part of the show, and other guests included Steven Greer, Richard Hoagland, and Joe Firmage.

It should be noted that so many of these UFO activists somehow manage to endlessly sell urgency. Many have been personally ringing an alarm of imminent Disclosure for decades.

The highest hurdle for Bassett to clear indeed became the fact the deadlines of his recurring insinuations and outright predictions came and went, unfulfilled. And he made a lot of insinuations and predictions.

Similar can be said of history's many UFO personalities who donned the Disclosure cape to promise all-telling government revelations to an eagerly awaiting UFO World. It may get tough to perpetually conjure Disclosure urgency, but it is obviously quite possible. New generations and followers continue to find it an irresistible draw while taking roles as both movement leaders and supporters. For some there may be a lack of awareness of the history of futility, while the dedication of others may be grounded in stubbornness, wishful thinking, questionable motives, or any number of such circumstances. The UFO-intoxicated masses just keep coming, and there is always a supplier to meet the demand, if not create it.

Let's dial the clock back from the current head-spinning pace and return to the early days of the modern UFO steeplechase. Though absent internet and podcasts, the pioneers were not without urgency and drama. Far from it.

Our group of focus formed in Washington, D.C. in the 1950's. Mystery and curiosity surrounded the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena from its very inception. Many challenges would plague the organization, but public interest in its affairs was usually not among them. This was apparently due in part to the public's fascination with flying saucers, an occurrence which was driven by several factors, most certainly including media attention.

After considerable investigation I have become thoroughly convinced many NICAP members were sincere and effective researchers, even if unaware of their biases at times. Whatever games may have been afoot, there were indeed people in NICAP genuinely interested in a UFO mystery, for better or worse. They believed their work was important and they considered themselves to be pioneers of a sort. In some manners of speaking, perhaps they were. In other instances, motives are more in question, as is research accuracy at times.

NICAP experienced highs, lows, success and failure, reportedly amassing some 14,000 members at one point. For some context, the Mutual UFO Network currently claims on its website to have about 4,000 worldwide members.

Among the most notable aspects of the NICAP legacy is The UFO Evidence, brought to life by editor Richard Hall. The 1964 report consists of some 200,000 words of UFO investigations. It embodies what NICAP felt was its 750 most compelling cases from the more than 5,000 contained in its files. The UFO Evidence was provided to Congress and more than 10,000 copies were disseminated to scientific research organizations, government agencies, universities, military installations, and libraries.[4] While the relevance of the material could certainly be debated, the report offered a tangible starting point for discussions and a realized achievement for investigators of its day.

So what happened between NICAP's inception, a 1960's hay day of public interest, soaring membership, reports of CIA infiltration, the org's decline, and its eventual 1980's demise? To better understand the rise and fall of NICAP, and events of cultural and social significance along the way, let's start by exploring the beginnings. That takes us to the U.S. capital. The year was 1956.

LAUNCH

If you strolled the sidewalks of D.C. in 1956, there's a good chance you'd hear an Elvis song drifting out of a nearby bar or from the radio of a passing motorist. Presley's “Heartbreak Hotel” and “Don't Be Cruel” were the year's number one and two selling record singles.

That passing motorist might be cruising in a Chevy Corvette with a convertible top down. The now iconic 'Vette was the best selling car of '56.

The ladies in the District might be clad in skirts and knit sweaters. Another popular look was fur, used to make dresses, coats, and even tailored suits. Accessories included the headscarf and cat-eye glasses.

While Elvis forged a legend, President Eisenhower conducted a successful campaign for reelection with a vice president named Richard M. Nixon, and Americans became increasingly aware of a nation called Vietnam, an eclectic group of men and women began meeting around Washington. At least some of them were interested in flying saucers.

The initial gathering took place in 1956 of what would become the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena. The planning session was likely attended by T. Townsend Brown, Morris K. Jessup, Clara L. John, Maj. Donald E. Keyhoe, Arnold and Margaret Kruckman, and possibly a few other local UFO investigators and interested parties.

Women played significant roles in NICAP, although some of their saucer-related beliefs would later be justifiably criticized by men in positions of leadership. To be fair, in the grand scheme of things their notions often don't seem to have been any more far fetched than those of their male counterparts. One way or the other, it is clear that women were instrumental in forming and operating the organization.

Archived letters written by Margaret Kruckman show how she voiced her opinions to the male NICAP leadership on such issues as potential board members. Other times, Arnold Kruckman would act as somewhat of a liaison, explaining his wife's thoughts to NICAP leaders.

As I read through the many NICAP files graciously provided to me by Barry Greenwood, I felt I developed somewhat of a sense of the social climate. Regardless, the fact often remains that necessity is the mother of invention, and produces mutually beneficial relationships. Women of NICAP worked as both volunteer and paid employees, and some contributed financially, even if their appointments to positions of authority were simply never going to happen.

Clara John, aka Mrs. Walton Colcord John, is largely credited with paving the way for NICAP. She was a widow who apparently shared an interest in esoteric subject matter with her late husband. Most notably, Clara was the original ghostwriter for the well known and controversial contactee, George Adamski.

She resided on a Maryland farm where she hosted a flying saucer discussion group. The group would also reportedly meet at a local YWCA. Clara regularly published a related newsletter, The Little Listening Post, which would later serve as a supportive voice for NICAP news.

Morris Jessup was apparently acquainted with Clara John and her circles. Along those lines, a NICAP letter dated October 23, 1956, was sent to an individual in response to their questions about the forming of the young outfit.

“The idea for the national organization was presented at a meeting of a local saucer group here in Washington by Mr. Morris K. Jessup and Mrs. Walton Colcord John concurrently,” the letter reads. “Most of the initial encouragement came from Mrs. John. The writer became interested and agreed to donate his time in the organizational stages in order to get something started immediately.”[5]

It should be noted, however, there are variations of the story of who first conceived or initiated formalizing NICAP. There are probably several reasons, ranging from matters of convenience to being polite, and perhaps even some intentional misleading.

The inventor T. Townsend Brown became involved with Clara's saucer group and took a specific interest. The group would prove to serve as the inspiration and framework for NICAP. Collections were taken up to help with costs. As a matter of fact, it is noted on the Thomas Townsend Brown Family Website that NICAP was founded from Clara's “Little Listening Post,” and it is suggested the term “Committee” was run up the flagpole while sitting around the Brown kitchen table.

The life stories of each of these original NICAP organizers could easily in themselves be the primary subjects of entire books, and most were. Their activities made their ways into many a widely read work, UFO-related and otherwise. The lives and stories of NICAPers mingled, forming a collective saga, for better or worse.

NICAP was officially incorporated Oct. 24, 1956, according to a copy of a certificate archived in the NICAP files. T. Townsend Brown was the inaugural NICAP executive vice chairman, or basically director, though his stint would be short lived.

From a young age, Brown showed an interest in physics and was particularly intrigued by possible antigravity forces. In 1923 he attended the California Institute of Technology and tried to demonstrate his perceived discoveries. However, physicists were not impressed and disagreed with his interpretations of his experiments. This would become a recurring and decades-long theme. Although his work continues today to inspire scattered interest, Brown's efforts to document antigravity forces related to electric charges are largely considered to have simply been wrong and explainable as misidentified occurrences of physics. His persistence may well have been partially fueled, however, by the very resistance to his ideas.

Brown first began working on a proposal for what he called Project Winterhaven in 1951, according to the Brown Family Website. Winterhaven manifested in a 66-page project proposal Brown reportedly shopped to the Department of Defense. The ambitious and large scale operation would have involved multiple organizations with the stated purpose of confirming “a fundamental interlocking relationship exists between the electrodynamic field and the gravitational field.” The relationship was proposed to be harnessed and applied to fields such as weapons research and communications. The Winterhaven proposal included photos of experiments undertaken with flying saucer-like objects and related concepts. Brown's work continued in one form or another for many years.

His interest in harnessing antigravity certainly played a role in his visit to Clara John's saucer club, and Brown would eventually model some of his experiments after UFOs as described by George Adamski. Somewhat curiously, Adamski's craft were perceived to resemble a flying saucer in a dream experienced by Brown's daughter. Adamski himself toured the North Carolina lab in which those experiments took place, although Brown was no longer working there by the time of Adamski's visit in 1960.

Reviewing materials on Mr. Brown might lead one to suspect his persistence about physics experiments was more motivated by personal longings than solid research and educated opinions. Some would argue such emotionally driven confirmation bias might also be an accurate portrayal of what came to power NICAP itself, even if from a bit different point of view.

Adamski and NICAP were not the only connections between Brown and the UFO scene, whether those connections were organic or manufactured. Writer/researchers William L. “Bill” Moore and Charles Berlitz built a heavy claim out of the Brown legacy in their 1979 book, The Philadelphia Experiment. The duo asserted Brown and his work were involved in a now famous yet unsubstantiated cluster of events which cascaded out of an alleged 1943 government project. The purported events were unanticipated byproducts of an experiment and were said to include profound distortions of space and time, or at least I guess that's how we'd describe the alleged spontaneous long distance transfer of a Navy battleship that supposedly left crewmen stuck in the walls.

Some readers will recognize writer Morris Jessup for his relation to the saga of the Philadelphia Experiment. Long before Moore and Berlitz, he launched the story.

Jessup authored four books on UFOs, all between 1955 and 1957, what we might consider some of the formative NICAP years. The first of the four books, The Case for the UFO, contained information about the alleged experiment. Jessup then soon began receiving letters from someone claiming to have direct knowledge of the purported extraordinary incidents in Philadelphia.

The book itself became a significant piece of UFO lore when, in 1957, Jessup was reportedly contacted by the Office of Naval Research (ONR) and informed it had been mailed a copy of the book. The copy was annotated throughout with bizarre references to aliens, the alleged experiment in Philly, and other sundry fringe topics. The notes were made to imply they were part of an ongoing conversation volleyed between three different people – or aliens – but the entire chain of events is obviously quite dubious and many theories surround the circumstances.

To make a strange story even stranger, the ONR opted to print a small run of 100 copies of the annotated book. It became quite a collector's item in certain circles and is understandably considered to represent one of the more intriguing chains of events in the entire UFO shooting match. Over 60 years since it happened we still don't know for sure what the hell was going on, but Jessup and Brown, who apparently converged upon Clara John's saucer club and subsequently NICAP, were certainly in its orbit.

Enter Arnold Kruckman. Mr. Kruckman would be considered a fascinating, Dos Equis 'most interesting man in the world' kind of guy without ever getting mixed up in the flying saucer and NICAP plot lines. As Kruckman informed Adm. Delmer Fahrney in a letter he penned in 1957, “Who's Who in America has carried me for the last forty years.”[6]

Kruckman's story includes being a visionary in the media industry with ties to the Hearst family of newspaper dynasty fame. The Kruckman News Service of Washington, D.C. was part of his influence on public opinion and news cycles.

Kruckman was a successful lobbyist with connections and he produced results. He influenced legislation, was an official in the Aeronautical Society of America, organized details for several aeronautical firsts (including the initial around the world flight), hung with the Wright brothers in Kitty Hawk, and was acquainted with Nikola Tesla. I read he was even made an honorary member of the Hopi tribe. The man got around.

It is reasonable to suspect mutually shared interests may have created a familiarity between Kruckman and Maj. Keyhoe, a former Marine Corps pilot and author who managed promotional tours for aviation pioneers. Keyhoe wrote many articles and books, several about aviation or flying saucers, expressing a belief UFOs represented extraterrestrial spacecraft.

One of Kruckman's widely known success stories happened when he got immersed in an early 20th century high profile case of land and water management. Kruckman organized the formidable League of the Southwest to lobby for its desired land development.

Just days before a much anticipated public hearing was slated to occur, Kruckman scheduled his own meeting. Opponents criticized the move as a grandstanding propaganda ploy, as public officials and opponents of the League were not obligated in any way to consider the agenda of Kruckman's meeting or even so much as attend. However, they seemed to be in the unenviable position of appearing unconcerned if they ignored Kruckman and his group, yet would devalue the state-sanctioned proceedings if they marched to the beat of Kruckman's drum. They would also be unable to promote their views at Kruckman's event if they did not attend, and the public might further form its expectations of rulings without them by the time the official meeting took place a few days later. The bottom line is Kruckman's strategies proved successful. The position of the League of the Southwest prevailed and eventually led to the 1922 Colorado River Compact and the Boulder Dam.

Letters exchanged in 1956 between Kruckman and Brown show Kruckman's moral support of NICAP, as well as Kruckman's endorsement for Brown as its leader. Both Arnold Kruckman and his wife, Margaret, also expressed written support for Morris Jessup, Maj. Donald Keyhoe, and Clara John, among others, to be key members of NICAP. The Kruckmans suggested they believed those people to be knowledgeable about UFOs. Some of the couple's suggestions materialized and some did not. Jessup, for instance, was never actually on the Board of Governors. Keyhoe was destined to become the face of NICAP, while Clara John never had any direct long term involvement.

The Kruckmans, Clara John, and their circles gave the claims of George Adamski and the contactee movement more credibility than some of the NICAPers, including Keyhoe, were willing to extend. This would become a sticking point throughout the ranks and years of NICAP, and largely throughout the UFO genre itself. NICAP leadership wanted the support - morally, financially, and in labor - of what we might call the fringe element, but did not want the baggage that came with it. NICAP wanted to embrace stances that might draw the interest of serious scientists and reputable figures. UFO researchers and organizations continue today to struggle with alternately promoting and rejecting content that may alienate the followings they seek to build. You can't please all the saucer buffs all the time, and the publicly perceived line separating open-mindedness and foolishness is subject to ebb and flow.

Kruckman's willingness to entertain the incredible and unsubstantiated can be found within his archived letters. In a September 1956 letter to Kansas Representative Wint Smith, Kruckman referenced Adamski while voicing concerns thousands of extraterrestrials might be roaming freely within the United States.

“What I have in mind,” Kruckman explained, “is that if it is true there are such numbers of persons, from the planets in space, here in the United States it should be mandatory that they register in an appropriate way. Obviously we should know what they are here for and we should have access to them in order that we may get a better understanding of the aerial phenomena represented by 'flying saucers', etc.”[7]

Margaret Kruckman donated to become a founding member of NICAP, while Arnold Kruckman kept a bit more distance, in spite of his involvement in the planning stages. Kruckman, experienced at influencing and sailing those ebbing tides of public opinion, described his admitted financial interest in the flying saucer topic in 1956 letters to Brown.

The Kruckmans were undertaking an entrepreneurial venture directed at youth.[8] Kruckman was “working on the juvenile periodical SPACE ADVENTURE,” a magazine of which he would sell subscriptions, he reiterated to Brown in a letter dated Aug. 25, 1956.

“Aside from its very specific objective of appealing to the imagination of the juniors,” Kruckman wrote, “it is my intent that it shall be a vehicle to stir in their minds and in the souls of the more adult the spirit of patriotism that I discussed in this letter. I am explaining this so that you may understand that SPACE ADVENTURE not only will try to arouse the imaginary concepts of the young in those things for which your Committee stands, but that also it will be devoted to the purpose of arousing the utmost patriotism in the sense expressed by Mr. Hoover.”

I interpret the “Mr. Hoover” referenced was Herbert, not J. Edgar of the FBI, as Kruckman described his strong support for former President Herbert Hoover on a previous page of the four-page letter. He stated that Herbert made a notable address at the then-recent Republican Convention.

Kruckman explained to Brown his plans to market an emblem to be used as costume jewelry and a lapel pin. Initial goals for NICAP membership drives apparently targeted some half a million members, and this did not escape Kruckman's notice. It apparently did not escape CIA notice, either, if not an idea attributable to Agency assets themselves, as we will explore in the coming pages.

“When it is time we should like to discuss this emblem matter with you, or with the proper Committee in order that the idea be made a part of the initial drive,” Kruckman wrote Brown. “From my past experience in similar matters I know that the emblem will be of extreme usefulness to those who conduct your drive for the 500,000 membership. The more people who are seen with the emblems on their coats or on their dresses, the greater will be the interest in the drive itself.”

This Is The Emblem!

Worn by men and women interested in the many phases of space activities, such as space-ships ("flying saucers"), explorations, studies, lectures, organizations, correspondence, etc. Worn by women as some form of costume piece, and by men as lapel-buttons, pins, etc. It is inscribed "Interplanetary Fellowship": measures ¾ inch in diameter, with safety-lock pins on ladies' costume pieces, and screw posts on men's lapel emblems, tie pins, etc.

Kruckman further expressed his vision by way of Clara John's The Little Listening Post.[9] A 1956 press release coordinated with the newsletter reflected how Kruckman likened what he termed the "interplanetary space problems" to the pioneer phases of aviation. He explained saucer groups would fuel public interest, as had been the case when aeronautics clubs assisted with sustaining the popularity of airplane flight. Kruckman assured saucer enthusiasts they were an integral part of an important big picture process.

“Organizations like yours maintain the interest that assembles the invaluable observations and data which will enable the scientist and others to make the essential studies that will supply the scientific answers to the problems that confront us today,” Kruckman wrote.

Trouble was, Mr. Kruckman didn't know what he was talking about, at least not when it came to the convergence of UFO groups and scientific answers. An interesting question is whether he cared.

The final paragraph of the press release read, “Mr. Kruckman will shortly produce a new monthly periodical to be known as SPACE ADVENTURE. It is addressed to the Junior group. It will provide the stimulation to imagination which will divert many youngsters from the search for adventure which today leads them into collision with the law. The first issue, eagerly awaited by many, will appear around Nov. 1, 1956.”

In a letter dated Sep. 9, 1956, Kruckman expressed appreciation to Brown for extending an invitation to join the NICAP Board of Governors.[10] Kruckman also expressed concern, however, that if he accepted the invitation, people might interpret his connection to NICAP as purely for profit, given what Kruckman described as his “commercial interest in some phases of the aerial phenomena.”

“I think that,” Kruckman continued, “like Caesar's wife, anything connected with the Committee – and any person – should be sure to leave the Committee above suspicion.”

Kruckman then empowered Brown with the ultimate decision as to whether Kruckman's identification with the Committee might do damage. Kruckman never joined the Board, for what were probably a variety of reasons.

It would prove interesting that Brown was warned by Kruckman about the dangers of financial conflicts of interest. Accusations spread that Brown used NICAP funds to further his personal research, or, at best, mismanaged the till. Such personal research was almost certainly related to Brown's vision for the previously mentioned Project Winterhaven.

At the Jan. 15, 1957, first annual meeting of NICAP members and the Board of Governors, at which time Board members were to be formally elected, the inaugural front man was ousted. Brown subsequently submitted his resignation as requested, and so goes the tumultuous story of the founding of the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena.[11]

The Brown family soon left the DC area and moved to Umatilla, Florida, a small town about an hour north of Orlando. Umatilla would still today be considered quite a ways off the beaten path, on the border of the Ocala National Forest and consisting of two traffic lights. When the Browns arrived, the town was little more than a country road running among lakes, woods, and orange groves.

According to the family website, after moving to Florida in early 1957, Brown divided his time between "intelligence work" and pursuing Winterhaven. By fall, Brown was traveling back and forth between Umatilla and the Agnew Bahnson, Jr. lab of Winston Salem, North Carolina. That is where the work took place on the seemingly Adamski-inspired concepts.

Brown never established his antigravity-related notions. He died in 1985 in Avalon, California.

The FBI replied to my FOIA request that it was unable to locate responsive records on Thomas Townsend Brown. Somewhat interestingly, the Bureau added in its 2020 letter that records potentially responsive were destroyed.

The FBI further stated potentially responsive records were identified during a search but were not in their expected locations. An additional search, the Bureau advised, was also unable to locate the records.

It does not appear Arnold Kruckman's vision materialized for the "Space Adventure" periodical and an international emblem, at least not to the extent he seemingly hoped. Truth be told, however, I confidently suspect a man who successfully executed as many high profile projects as was the case with Kruckman left a number of unrealized ideas in his wake. Mr. Kruckman passed away – about three years after the incorporation of NICAP – on June 30, 1959, at the age of 79. The FBI replied to my FOIA request in 2020 that it identified no records responsive to Arnold Kruckman.

Just two months prior to Mr. Kruckman's death, on April 30, 1959, Morris Jessup took his own life. He was 59 years old.

Jessup was reportedly found dead in a car near Miami with a hose running from the exhaust pipe into the vehicle. Conspiracies circulated, but the death was ruled a suicide.

A 2020 FOIA response from the FBI indicated some records on Jessup may have been destroyed. The Bureau also advised that file 31-HQ-93324 was potentially responsive and had been transferred to the National Archives and Records Administration, or NARA.

After submitting a request to NARA, it replied in a Sep. 25, 2020, email that an initial assessment revealed the subject of the file to be Morris Jessup, Dr.

Rulen Alred, Alex Joseph, John Ray, and Shirley Joseph Baker. “Dr. Rulen Alred” may possibly be a reference to Rulon Allred, a chiropractor who led a fundamentalist sect and was assassinated in 1977.

NARA stated the file was created between June 1973 and October 1974, and consists of approximately 100 pages. The records must be reviewed for information protected from release under the FOIA, NARA explained, and estimated it will take 39 months to complete processing. That might put our eyes on the file, or what parts of it may be released, around December 2023.

The profile today of Mr. Jessup, depending on who you ask, might describe a man who became disillusioned with a UFO mystery that refused to bear answers. Though he earned a Masters in Science, Jessup spent much of his life as an auto parts salesman and writing about UFOs. His marriage dissolved in 1958. The Philadelphia Experiment likely took an emotional toll, and that might particularly be the case pertaining to his interactions with the characters of the saga and the people who filled the pages of his books.

THE NICAP STORY

Turning our attention to early 1957, Donald Keyhoe would soon land in the NICAP director's chair, beginning his 13-year tenure. Keyhoe was effective at some of his chosen priorities, but recurring money woes would disrupt the organization for the duration of his reign and the existence of NICAP.

The resume of Maj. Keyhoe (1897-1988) indicates the Iowa native was a graduate of the Naval Academy and a Marine Corps pilot of aircraft and balloons.[12] Following a night crash at Guam, Keyhoe was retired and became editor of Coast and Geodetic Survey. He then had a stint with the Department of Commerce as Chief of Information Civil Aeronautics. Keyhoe's public relations career included managing tours for Adm. Richard E. Byrd and Col. Charles A. Lindbergh. Keyhoe lectured and wrote extensively, publishing many magazine articles and several books.

Professional office space was previously leased under T. Townsend Brown's direction and continued to be rented for Keyhoe's personnel. During Keyhoe's time at the helm he secured the employment of Richard Hall and later Gordon Lore. Hall and Lore each served as assistant directors and pretty much ran the NICAP office and network of investigators. They were aided by Isabel Davis and others.

The Keyhoe-led NICAP operation continues to this day to receive respect from certain circles while simultaneously drawing criticism from others. Both perspectives are reasonably warranted, depending on the specific circumstances considered.

Compared to later years of UFO investigation, NICAP was rather impressively proactive and well coordinated in certain respects. The strategy was quite functional, all things considered and given the dynamics of the era. At least in theory, the NICAP model was an intriguing idea and effectively executed in some ways.

The basic NICAP operating model consisted of a DC-based committee which oversaw multiple subcommittees and affiliates. The subcommittees might work on specific projects, while affiliates represented geographic areas and, in effect, became NICAP chapters. Brooklyn, for instance, was the home of the first chapter outside Washington.[13]

Each chapter would utilize volunteer investigators who preferably possessed applicable skill sets and experience. Some of the staff at NICAP headquarters in Washington drew salaries if and when funds were available, and volunteers were also a key part of the DC operation during the Keyhoe years.

Police departments were contacted, as well as military bases. Local chapters would encourage them to share UFO reports received. Investigators offered to collaborate and then disseminate analysis to the media as appropriate. Working relationships were built between UFO investigators, law enforcement officers, and newspaper reporters, among others.

Existing saucer groups, often isolated and geographically scattered, were solicited for interest. They were offered all the standard NICAP benefits plus certain privileges to join forces.

Membership levels were sold. Subscribers were entitled to various amounts of NICAP-produced magazines and newsletters, as well as votes on issues put to the members. The higher your membership level, the more votes you could cast and the more material you would receive by mail, or at least that was the plan. Nonvoting memberships initially went for $7.50 and received basic mailings, while fees ranged up to $1,000 for a “founder's endowment” that entitled its owner to the full compliment of reading material and 100 votes on any given issue.[14]

While office staff turned the NICAP gears, Keyhoe worked primarily off site, speaking publicly and promoting the organization. Keyhoe secured major media appearances and NICAP leadership consistently rubbed elbows with significant public figures. Keyhoe, however, became increasingly occupied with a campaign to penetrate government UFO secrecy.

By the second half of the 1960's members were beginning to feel NICAP put too much emphasis on the cover-up angle. While some were convinced exposing a cover-up was surely on the path to liberating secret government UFO files, others grew weary of the plot line, and not just those sympathetic to the military and intelligence agencies sustaining the bulk of the criticism. In an April 10, 1969, letter to NICAP members, Keyhoe explained he had become aware that “most members” were apparently tired of reading about the Committee's fight against UFO secrecy.[15]

The NICAP newsletters and journals were supposed to inform members about breaking UFO cases and what the growing network of investigators was doing, but NICAP was afflicted with trying to accomplish too many things at once. The org was perpetually late mailing its printed material, often having not met its publishing commitments before membership dues were scheduled to be paid again.

As then-NICAP President Alan Hall explained about the monthly journals in a late-1970's message to members, “The June and July issues came out in September. In October you will have the August and September issues. The issues for October and November will come out in November. And by December we will be up to date!”[16]

This was a chronic shortcoming, happening pretty much from the outset. It was particularly problematic because the print material was the lifeline of NICAP. It was the benefit of being a subscriber and apparently a primary revenue source. Newsletters and similar literature were how NICAP briefed its following on the perceived escalating flying saucer mystery and any progress it believed it was making toward solving it.

Veteran researcher Barry Greenwood got involved with NICAP in what would turn out to be the organization's latter stages. He suggested in a 2020 email to me that he thought NICAP did not do a good job of delegating, which resulted in personnel ineffectively trying to handle too many responsibilities.

“Research and administration should be entirely separate in an organization,” Greenwood wrote. “Researchers shouldn't be handling funds and keeping track of membership matters. This takes time away from research. And administrators shouldn't be doing research while managing the business at the same time. Due diligence isn't being done for research while one is being distracted by business issues.”

Financial shortcomings and related challenges aside, among the most justifiable criticism of NICAP was the group expressed a commitment to objectively follow evidence, yet was unable to consistently and uniformly keep that commitment. Keyhoe and NICAP portrayed a scientific approach yet were prone to subscribing to premature conclusions.

Proclamations of using serious research protocols, while accurate at times, in other instances seemed to be somewhat of a public relations facade. Intentionally or not, the stance served to garner credibility while shielding NICAP from accountability for its bias. NICAP leaders and members often seemed completely convinced their beliefs would prove correct if they could only persuade certain agencies to release their files. Unfortunately, we may sometimes be wrong that our beliefs are necessarily facts under such conditions.

A big part of the NICAP effort involved coaxing scientists, military officers, pilots and similar figures to get on the bandwagon. NICAP enjoyed success at attracting respected professionals, but an abundance of such support could ultimately not overcompensate for the fact the endorsements in many instances represented an ever growing collection of stated opinions, suspicions, and beliefs, not established facts.

In their defense, NICAP and its supporters did not have the luxury of hindsight that researchers enjoy today. Even still, many of the lessons of the previous 70 years remain widely ignored and only selectively cited in today's body of UFO research.

The praise many feel NICAP deserves, in addition to its general operating model and, ironically, just like the criticism often aimed at the organization, is also due to the activities of the Keyhoe crew. They collectively ran the group from 1957 through 1969. It was during those years that NICAP expanded its membership to 14,000; The UFO Evidence was compiled and published; and the infamous Michigan flap and “swamp gas” story unfolded and was investigated, among other events of interest.

It was also under Keyhoe's direction NICAP was credited with contributing to motivating the Air Force to fund the University of Colorado UFO project, a 1966-1968 official study of the saucer situation. However, the study became known as the infamous Condon Report, containing a damaging assessment for UFO enthusiasts due to its minimization of reported UFO activity. The motives behind the project and the validity of its resulting report were adamantly challenged by NICAP. The Keyhoe crew was essentially disbanded within a year of the Condon Report.

What remained of the Committee by the 1980's, which pretty much amounted to little more than its files and mailing list, was absorbed into J. Allen Hynek's Center for UFO Studies (CUFOS). Much of the NICAP previous personnel and investigative networks were long gone. The group's 1960's state of field investigations, public appearances, and formidable reputation, at least among saucer enthusiasts, were mere memories.

Accusations of CIA infiltration were widespread. Many believed NICAP was sabotaged by the intelligence community, an intentional derailment in order to cease its investigations and halt its campaign to expose a UFO cover-up perpetrated by the CIA and Air Force.

The late researcher and FOIA activist Todd Zechel was among the more adamant accusers. He expressed his perspectives widely, including in an article he penned for the previously referenced 1978 bulletin published by Ground Saucer Watch (GSW). The article provides a working summary of what many feared and believed took place, and serves as a basic model of what much of the UFO genre generally thinks happened to NICAP.

Zechel wrote how NICAP drew the attention of the CIA from the very beginning. He asserted that Bernard J.O. Carvalho and Nicholas de Rochefort, men on the inaugural 1956 NICAP team formed by T. Townsend Brown, were CIA assets.

That may very well be correct, although their intentions are not nearly as clear as Zechel seemed to suppose. Carvalho's history is much less substantiated than Rochefort's, the latter of which was a psychological warfare expert at his day job and almost certainly a CIA man.

Zechel, who according to the Washington Post was a former NSA employee himself, suggested the CIA was interested in keeping tabs on NICAP and gaining access to its unpublished files. Essentially, Zechel asserted the Agency wanted access to unpublished UFO reports and identifying information therein about “leakers” who approached Keyhoe and his staff in confidence. The CIA could presumably then advise the Air Force of the situations and any leakers in its midst. The Air Force, Zechel continued in the GSW bulletin, could respond by transferring its personnel who were secretly providing information to NICAP, disrupt lines of communication, and similar actions in order to render NICAP ineffective.

Townsend Brown was quickly relieved of his leadership position due to his “inability to make NICAP solvent,” Zechel wrote. Before long Keyhoe got the nod, and Carvalho and Rochefort were soon gone due to what Zechel termed Keyhoe cleaning house. This may be true enough, but is not easily verified, although we do know that, for whatever reasons, Carvalho and Rochefort in fact did not stick around after Brown's departure.

Former Director of Central Intelligence Adm. Roscoe H. Hillenkoetter quite curiously served on the NICAP Board of Governors. This is widely accepted to have resulted from a preexisting relationship with Maj. Keyhoe. They were reportedly classmates at the Naval Academy.

Hillenkoetter was the first director of the CIA, holding the position from 1947 to 1950. He sat on the NICAP Board from 1957 to 1962. As suggested earlier, a number of prestigious and well-respected intelligence officers lent their names to NICAP, accepted advisory positions, and supplied the group with supportive statements. Their remarks were widely published in efforts to further legitimize both the organization and the UFO topic.

The most effective means employed by the CIA to infiltrate, exploit, and ultimately sabotage NICAP, Zechel alleged, came in the form of Col. Joseph Bryan III. Whether or not Zechel was entirely correct about the objectives of the colonel and the Agency, Bryan is considered by many to weigh heavily in the NICAP story and was indeed a Company Man.

He headed a psychological warfare division within the Office of Policy Coordination, a substantial CIA front (Please make a mental note of the Office of Policy Coordination, as we will be exploring it much further). Numerous men of diverse talents and skills were employed in Bryan's division, including

E. Howard Hunt of future Watergate infamy. Bryan reportedly worked with the CIA from approximately 1947 to 1953. He sat on the NICAP Board of Governors for substantial lengths of time both during and following the Keyhoe years of 1957 to 1969.

Zechel asserts that Bryan repeatedly tried to persuade Keyhoe to reveal his most confidential reports and documents. Keyhoe suspected ulterior motives, but Bryan provided a personal letter, denouncing Air Force policies of UFO secrecy, along with permission to quote him. This, according to Zechel, won Keyhoe's confidence and resulted in extending an invitation to Bryan to join the Board.

It should be noted there was apparently not a great deal known among UFO enthusiasts in the 1950's and 1960's about the likely CIA affiliations of Bryan, Rochefort and Carvalho. We're still extracting that through the FOIA process, all of which might give us food for thought about when the public might realistically expect resolution to questions surrounding more recent intelligence professionals-turned-ufologists.

It is also noteworthy that it was not unusual in my research to discover situations in which NICAP members and UFO researchers seemed to think motives could be discerned from the degree of belief or skepticism a person expressed about flying saucers. This became somewhat of a cultural staple in the genre. In essence, you were labeled a white hat if you were a believer and a disinformation agent if you voiced disbelief or even reasonable skepticism. It seemed to escape many that their beliefs had not yet been established as facts and very well should be challenged, not to mention motives and objectives might be more complex than those that hinged upon stated opinions about UFO riddles.

Zechel asserted that Bryan betrayed Keyhoe, penetrating NICAP for “covert and subversive purposes.” This purportedly put the Agency in a position to effectively combat security leaks and block NICAP efforts in the process. Documents leaked to Keyhoe by military officers sympathetic to the cause were allegedly discovered by Bryan and therefore compromised.

“In other words,” Zechel wrote in the 1978 Ground Saucer Watch bulletin, “NICAP had no secrets.”

Mr. Zechel seems to have not found it important to note that, even if he were indeed correct the CIA had designs on covertly monitoring NICAP channels and learning its secrets, the effort may have had nothing whatsoever to do with concerns about extraterrestrial space travelers and the cover-up thereof. Suffice it to say there are additional reasons intelligence agencies might take interest in military officers influenced to be sympathetic of an organization denouncing Air Force procedures to the point of leaking documents to its director. I'd venture to say those reasons make for much more likely scenarios of attracting official interest, particularly in this circumstance.

Those scenarios do not, however, offer researchers the intoxicating satisfaction that comes with believing if they and their colleagues become subjects of interest to intelligence operatives, then they must be getting too close to the proverbial truth. In reality, it of course doesn't necessarily mean their assumptions about UFOs are correct at all. It might just indicate they have some misunderstandings about national security concerns they frame in support of their confirmation bias. That stated, I fully concede this is a complex chain of events spanning years and should not be oversimplified as a matter of convenience.

I have become rather convinced, however, several possibilities seem more likely than Zechel's interpretation of the situation. The intelligence community indeed had interests in saucer groups, researchers, and NICAP, I just doubt it was for the reasons typically suspected.

It bears reiterating Zechel's version of the dissolution of NICAP provides a basic account of what many feel happened to the group. I am not citing it for the purpose of particularly supporting or challenging his personal assertions, but to offer as a written summary the views of those who indeed feel the organization was dismantled by the CIA.

The deepest betrayal, Zechel continued, took place when Bryan led a successful charge to remove Keyhoe from his position as director. In the wake of the hotly contested Condon Report, released in January 1969, the other shoe seemed to drop on Dec. 3, 1969, when Keyhoe was reduced to occupying a seat on the Board of Governors. He was accused of organizational mismanagement, particularly concerning perpetual NICAP financial problems. Zechel rejected the explanations offered, asserting Keyhoe was actually removed as a means to pull his speaker platform out from under him. Zechel suggested this was done to destabilize NICAP and minimize Keyhoe's ability to challenge the Condon Report.

Keyhoe's removal coincided with the discharge of Assistant Director Gordon Lore. He was “cashiered,” notified by telegram of his dismissal and locked out of his office with no notice or advance discussion, according to the late NICAP researcher Richard Hall.

Keyhoe was soon replaced at director by Stuart Nixon, a NICAP staffer. John L. Acuff was elected president and this began what is often referred to as the Acuff-Nixon era of NICAP.

It would prove to be the beginning of the end, as the 1970's became a decade marred with dwindling public support and decreasing frequency of NICAP UFO investigations. More men associated with the CIA would become significantly involved in NICAP operations during this time period, notably including Harry C. Cooper, appointed to the Board of Governors in 1971; Alan Hall, who took over as president in 1978; and Charles Lombard, seated on the Board when Alan Hall was elected president.

Richard Hall wrote that NICAP organizers Carvalho and Rochefort each had "past CIA connections." He asserted this in a 1994 paper posted on the NICAP website and titled, The Quest For The Truth About UFOs: A Personal Perspective On The Role Of NICAP, in which Hall expressed several views about NICAP, its activities, and the intelligence community.

Incidentally, in 2020, UFO Classified podcast host Erica Lukes aired clips of a recording she obtained of an interview longtime NICAP investigator Ann Druffel conducted with Richard Hall. During the interview, Hall suggested he addressed the issue of the intelligence community meddling with NICAP in a paper he wrote and recommended Druffel review. I confidently believe that paper to be the above referenced The Quest For The Truth About UFOs.

Hall wrote in the paper that in 1971, with Bryan still on the Board of Governors, Harry Cooper was added to the Board. Cooper, Hall asserted, "had served in the CIA from its inception in 1947 until retirement in 1966, including service in the Operations Branch. He became Special Assistant to the Deputy Director for Intelligence."

Hall described Charles Lombard as "an acknowledged former CIA employee and aide to Senator Barry Goldwater." When Lombard arrived on the scene in October 1978 as a new Board member, he was appointed along with John Fisher, the head of the American Security Council and Communication Corporation of America, a conservative fundraising group. Lombard was eventually involved in negotiations resulting in the CUFOS acquisition of NICAP.

Goldwater, by the way, numbered among the high profile NICAP supporters and even became a Board member in the 1970's. The Arizona Senator, who secured the 1964 Republican presidential nomination before losing the election to incumbent President Lyndon B. Johnson, went on to chair the Senate Intelligence Committee in the early 1980's. He was also credited with writing a letter on behalf of NICAP to encourage membership.

"I and my colleagues on the Board of NICAP think it is high time more independent research on UFO's was undertaken," the four-plus page Goldwater letter reads.[17] The document is not dated but was probably composed in the mid 1970's.

“In December 1978, Alan N. Hall, a retired CIA employee, became President [of NICAP],” Richard Hall wrote further. “Hall (no relation) allegedly took the position as a post-retirement hobby, and he operated out of his home without access to the files, answering the phone and occasionally writing a letter. As of then NICAP was all but dead, a hollow shell of its former self.”

Much of the generalities of the NICAP story are verifiable, much more is likely to be reasonably accurate, and even more is rather widely accepted, whatever it may all specifically indicate. An excerpt from The UFO Cover-Up by Lawrence Fawcett and Barry J. Greenwood, and posted in 1997 at UFO UpDates List:

“Further evidence of CIA influence in NICAP developed during the period immediately before NICAP's decline. On December 3, 1969, Donald Keyhoe was ousted as NICAP's Director during a Board meeting. Who led the effort to remove Keyhoe? The Chairman of the Board, Col. Joseph Bryan, former Chief of the CIA's Psychological Warfare Staff (1947-1953). And who replaced Keyhoe? John Acuff, who was the head of the Society of Photographic Scientists and Engineers (SPSE), a frequent target of Russian spying attempts and a group that had many members involved in Defense Department intelligence units, including the CIA. His management of NICAP was financially 'tight' (in the cheap sense) and totally inept in a research sense. Criticism of government UFO policy was gone, and NICAP merely served as a sighting collection center. Acuff's management drove loyal NICAP Board members away and ultimately led to Acuff's downfall in 1978.

”And who replaced Acuff? None other than Alan Hall, a retired CIA employee, who accepted the position after a number of other CIA employees were offered the job. Support for Hall from the NICAP Board came from Charles Lombard, an aide to Senator Goldwater and former CIA covert employee.”

Fawcett and Greenwood wrote further:

“There certainly seems to be a pattern behind NICAP's destruction. Is it a coincidence that so many ex-CIA people became deeply involved in the operation of NICAP? It is possible that the CIA wanted to influence NICAP activities for several reasons:

“1) To gather intelligence through NICAP's investigators network.

“2) To identify and plug leaks from government sources (NICAP was renowned for receiving military-oriented reports).

“3) To monitor other hostile intelligence agencies (NICAP received several overtures from the Soviet KGB).”

There are a lot of differing ideas about all of this, even among those who were there and/or studied it closely. Richard Hall wrote it was tempting for him to suspect the gradual dismantling of NICAP was a deliberate master plan. “However,” he continued, “I cannot prove this and can only speculate on it.”

“There were a number of ex-CIA in the hierarchy of NICAP,” Barry Greenwood explained by email. “The question has always been did they exert an undue influence on the end of it as a group. On thinking back, the golden opportunity to finish NICAP was after the Condon Report, which preceded a precipitous decline in public interest for several years. NICAP finances were never that good but this was exacerbated by Keyhoe's money management which was awful. Aside from the membership income, there was constant pleading for money. The NICAP board could have said the Condon Report poisoned the UFO topic and they couldn't continue the battle against secrecy with such a poor business climate. But they continued on for another ten years and there was sometimes good case reporting in that time. The hierarchy was more concerned about administration than networking with members, especially the subcommittees which was the bread and butter of case work. I do remember the members feeling alienated in the early '70's by this less-than-friendly attitude. The subcommittees folded and swarmed to burgeoning groups like the Midwest UFO Network, further aggravating NICAP finances. Was this a deliberate action? Maybe, but one can't document that with an order from the CIA to mismanage NICAP into oblivion. It is as Dick Hall said.”

Jan Aldrich, an early NICAP supporter and longtime archivist of UFO history, provided comments by email. He suggested UFO researchers often try to mold the NICAP story into what they want it to be to fit their agendas.

“Hillenkoetter,” Aldrich added, “to the best of my knowledge never visited. The CIA officially visited NICAP once. They had Hall fill out a security clearance which was never granted. [Don] Berliner said two characters which he thought were CIA visited NICAP and purchased copies of The UFO Evidence and bombarded him with questions.”

Aldrich suggested most UFO researchers overlook nuance. Keyhoe, for instance, had medical issues, including military service-related. His family suffered from significant medical problems as well. This added to the reasons Keyhoe worked remotely.

The NICAP office, Aldrich explained, consisted of minimal staff prior to the mid 1960's, at which time more paid employees were brought aboard. Up until that time, a couple staffers got paid first, then Keyhoe and his assistant took what was left for expenses.

“This is it for staff,” Aldrich wrote. “NICAP was not CIA North with a big detachment of spies and Hillenkoetter running the place secretly.”

Aldrich continued, “Hall got out The UFO Evidence with the help of a volunteer college student and donations from a couple in Maryland or Delaware. He actually started getting the affiliates and subcommittees started. Keyhoe may have helped with ideas, but most of this was Hall's work...

“Some time around '63-'64 interest started to pick up, and they began to increase staff and equipment.

“Keyhoe always had contacts within the government so he got info others could not.”

It is widely accepted, and certainly seems to be correct, that a study of NICAP can be broken into three general timeframes. I would suggest the study of NICAP involvement with the intelligence community would be categorized in much the same way. First would be the forming of the organization during 1956, and the presence of Nicholas de Rochefort and company (pardon the pun). Then we have the Keyhoe years, 1957 to late 1969, with the ongoing presence of Board member Col. Joseph Bryan III. This period included a lot of military brass in NICAP circles, which was rather inherent due to the nature of the manner community leaders and intelligence officers were solicited for support. Lastly, we have the post-Keyhoe era, from 1970 to the CUFOS acquisition in the early 1980's. It was during this time Stuart Nixon and John Acuff initially had responsibility for the org, and Harry Cooper, Alan Hall and Charles Lombard became influential.

“Col. J. Bryan,” Aldrich wrote further, “did not have almost magical powers because he had been in charge of CIA psyops. He had been in the Pentagon a pro-UFO voice. His family confirms he was very interested in UFOs. The attempt to blame Bryan and the CIA for NICAP woes is trying to cover-up the silly financial situation started in 1957 and continued up to the mid-1960's.”

Keyhoe operated freely, Aldrich suggested, with the board acting as no more than “a rubber stamp entity.” About 1967 or so, some concerned employees tried to get the checkbook and finances away from Keyhoe, informing the Board of lax financial controls and how it could be held accountable.

“NICAP was already reduced in size because of lost revenue,” Aldrich asserted. “The board met and demanded further controls. That didn't happen. When they met again they kicked Keyhoe upstairs to the board and put Gordon [Lore] on leave. [Stuart] Nixon was like the only one left. He became NICAP.”

Former NICAP Assistant Director Gordon Lore had somewhat of a different take, expressing concern about CIA malevolent intentions. He referred me to his book, Flying Saucers From Beyond the Earth: A UFO Researcher's Odyssey. Chapter 19, titled “The CIA Connection,” particularly addresses the issue. Lore expressed his suspicions in the chapter that Keyhoe replacement Stuart Nixon, among others, may have been acting on behalf of the CIA.

“It didn't take me long to wonder if Nixon may have been sent there to recruit me for a possible C.I.A. takeover of NICAP,” Lore wrote in his book. “I had heard from Dick Hall that two of the agency's operatives had visited the NICAP office before I came on board and spent several hours scrutinizing the sighting reports. I soon realized that Don Keyhoe himself may have opened the door for that eventuality by appointing Admiral Roscoe Hillenkoetter, the first Director of the C.I.A., Chairman of the NICAP Board of Governors. The Admiral and Keyhoe had been friends since their days long ago as cadets at the U.S. Naval Academy in Annapolis, Maryland.

“Other board members – including Colonel Joseph Bryan and Dewey Fournet – had also been C.I.A. operatives. They were among the many contacts Keyhoe had established in the military, the Pentagon and the intelligence agencies. They would serve him well in obtaining UFO reports he could use in his books and at NICAP. I was also beginning to realize that this infiltration would serve them well if they really had the goal of taking over control of the world's largest UFO organization.”

You may be wondering at this point how many people in NICAP were not spooks. The Agency was indeed adequately represented in leadership positions.

You may also be wondering how directly all these alleged operatives can conclusively be linked to the Agency. We will explore that more in depth as we proceed, but the short answer is pretty conclusively, at least for the most part. The positioning of the chess pieces and general points contained in the NICAP stories as expressed by Hall and others are reasonably accurate. The intentions behind the actions, or what the CIA was doing, are most at issue and subject to interpretation, as suggested by the wide range of perspectives held.

Richard Hall provides us with yet more thoughts to ponder. He occasionally suggested, such as during the previously mentioned interview conducted by Ann Druffel, that it didn't really matter to him what the CIA was up to because it did not substantially change his research focus or activities. He suggested there was nothing to hide, so he did not find attention from the intelligence community to be overly significant. Others expressed similar points of view, such as Jan Aldrich when he inferred the CIA had no involvement in day-to-day activities under Keyhoe's NICAP. Such a lack of involvement would of course minimize CIA influence on research published by the group.

That often seems most relevant to those who feel the primary subject of the NICAP story is UFOs. To many that seemed the logical thing to surmise, while others see a fascinating saga in which passionately held beliefs collide with a public, media, and intelligence community harboring multiple layers of agendas. The Committee's intersection with the CIA is certainly among the prominent points to ponder.

We need look no further than the CIA itself to find confirmation of the Agency's official interest in NICAP. As Aldrich and Lore each suggested, inquisitive CIA officers indeed paid a visit to NICAP and Richard Hall. It occurred in 1965, as demonstrated in a two-page CIA memo carrying a NICAP subject line.

Now seems as good a time as any to mention the CIA is of course not a hive-mind operation. Everyone who works there is not all on the same page with the same access to a full compliment of information, anymore than is the case in any organization. Officers dispatched to question Richard Hall did not necessarily know, for instance, that Board member Col. Bryan was an Agency asset, or any number of similar such circumstances that might have been more heavily guarded.

Part of the complexity of our story certainly involves the likelihood intelligence professionals entered the NICAP orbit for a variety of different reasons. Those reasons possibly include a personal interest in UFOs, doing a favor for a friend or professional associate, or acting in an official capacity, among others. What's more, CIA officers possibly dispatched on official assignments were not necessarily all working on the same operation.

We might also consider that CIA objectives varied from one director and decade to the next. There are lots of possibilities, as the NICAP story spans some 25 years and multiple CIA divisions. Now that we're gaining a bit deeper acquaintance with some of these people, let's take even closer looks at them.

COUNT DE ROCHEFORT

Nicholas de Rochefort was reportedly born May 1, 1902, in St. Petersburg, Russia. He was the son of a Russian woman and a Frenchman who was in the country to represent French financial interests. The Rocheforts are one of France's oldest families, members of which fought in the Crusades.

Nicholas graduated from a French military academy and the School of Law of the University of Paris. He also earned a doctorate from a higher education science institution in France.

During World War II he served as a captain in the French Army and was captured by German troops. Rochefort subsequently faked an illness and remarkably tricked his captors into releasing him from a prisoner of war camp. This may have been among the first successful acts of psychological warfare undertaken by a man destined to be recognized as an expert in the field. When the Allies later launched an invasion, Rochefort was among them in the First French Armored Division.

He spoke five languages and wrote numerous articles for political-science journals. Count de Rochefort came to the United States in 1949 on a lecture tour. In 1954 he renounced his French citizenship and title to become an American citizen. He went on to be a professor at American University and live in Georgetown, where he resided when he passed away due to cancer in 1964.

Rochefort wrote and spoke for Voice of America, a state-controlled international television and radio network founded in 1942 and funded by the U.S. federal tax budget. The World War II POW drew global attention in 1954 when he helped lead Freedom Day, a celebration held in Berlin, New Hampshire, which honored East German resistance to Communism. Rochefort's heavily attended speech was broadcast internationally in three languages by Voice of America.

Remarks by Wisconsin Representative Charles Kersten about Rochefort and his Freedom Day co-organizer Dr. Charles Lowry were entered into the 1954 Congressional Record. Kersten emphasized the advantageous impact abroad of the event and stated to Congress on July 29, 1954:

“A lesson can be drawn from this experience.

“Two men of small financial means, but armed with imagination, perseverance, and knowledge of methods and techniques of psychological warfare were able to plan and carry out an operation of this nature, in finding assistance and aid from the part of the American people.

“Such projects as this, staged in America, implemented by American citizens and groups of citizens, can better be worked out, prepared and initiated by private initiative than by the Government.

“It would therefore be desirable to create a private organization for this very purpose, the members of which could devote all their time and their skill to devising actions of unconventional psychological warfare, inspire and coordinate them. It would not require millions of dollars; relatively modest sums would suffice.”

Rochefort and his associates were way ahead of Rep. Kersten. In 1953 Nicholas de Rochefort was credited with founding The Committee of One Million Against the Admission of Red China to the United Nations. The DC-based lobbying group was known as “The Committee,” just as the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena would later be called at times and which Rochefort helped organize in 1956. As the 1953 Committee full name implies, it opposed the domestic and international acceptance of Communist China.

The “China lobby,” as activists rejecting Red China and often supporting the nation's former regime were known, raised big bucks and was accused of employing vast amounts of propaganda to influence policy and opinion. Some felt the lobby disingenuously characterized the Chinese government's predecessor favorably while ignoring its corruption. All of which, it was argued, left citizens with the short end of the economic stick while bureaucrats, politicians, and war mongers got fat.

The China lobby of the late 1940's to early 1960's was so influential in America, wrote investigative journalist Robert Sherrill in the New York Times, “that normal relations with mainland China were delayed at least a generation while we continued to support the burdensome and corrupt Chiang Kai-shek's Government in retreat; also, the China lobby infected our foreign policy with such fear of 'Red hordes' as to contribute to our panicky commitment in Vietnam.” Sherrill's 1977 Times article, Buying American foreign policy, cited the work of some of his fellow investigative reporters, who asserted no foreign lobby in Washington had ever been as rich or powerful, or interfered so insidiously in the American governmental process.

The most well known part of that rich and powerful China lobby, Sherrill reported, was The Committee of One Million. That's quite a CV being compiled by Rochefort. Among the work cited in Sherrill's piece was that of Stanley D. Bachrack, author of the 1976 nonfiction book, The Committee of One Million.

“Who dreamed up The Committee?” Sherrill continued. “Bachrack suspects that one of The Committee's founders, Nicholas de Rochefort, a former French military man (expert in psychological warfare), was working for the Central Intelligence Agency and that The Committee may have been the C.I.A.'s idea. But so far Bachrack's efforts to open the C.I.A.'s files have been frustrated in court.

“Another founder, and perhaps The Committee's most ardent executive, was Congressman Walter Judd, a former medical missionary who sincerely viewed the Democratic Party of F.D.R.-Truman as a Satanic host. Bachrack suspects that Judd may have secretly used a House subcommittee in a dubious, if not illegal, way to launch the lobby. But again, his efforts to get at the subcommittee's secret records have been frustrated by Federal rules.”

Please allow me to emphasize characters found in the overlapping of UFOs and the intelligence community often have significant roles in political circles. This is repeatedly the case, and I would include more current day circumstances in that assessment as well. I do not find this coincidental or inconsequential. I'm of the opinion the official involvement of intelligence professionals, members of Congress, and similar figures in the UFO subculture is rarely, if ever, primarily fueled by their interest in UFOs. That just might falsely appear to be the case to those who themselves are passionate about UFOs and may view the circumstances with a bit of UFO tunnel vision. Moreover, NICAP became further entrenched in politics as our story unfolds.

The trail of Stanley Bachrack's effort to gain access to CIA records takes us to the U.S. District Court for the Central District of California. It was with that court in 1975 that Stanley D. Bachrack v. CIA, William Colby was filed. The lawsuit sought all information on then-deceased Nicholas de Rochefort relations with the CIA and its predecessor organizations. Judge William P. Gray presided over and subsequently dismissed the case.

Judge Gray explained in his 1976 ruling, as documented in a CIA study on security classification released to the public in 2012, “While there is a strong public interest in the public disclosure of the functions of government agencies, there is also a strong public interest in the effective functioning of an intelligence service, which could be greatly impaired by irresponsible disclosure."[18]

The 188-page (including notes) CIA study observed specifically about Bachrack's effort to obtain records potentially pertaining to Rochefort, “Through the decisions of these district courts a series of precedents is emerging which have already greatly enhanced the legal stature of sources and methods as an independent means of protecting intelligence information - at least in the context of FOIA requests for information."

I tried unsuccessfully to obtain the Bachrack vs. CIA case file. The California District Court informed me by email in 2020 that searches were conducted in response to my inquiry but the case "was probably destroyed or not recorded."

During correspondence with the Court it referred me to the National Archives at Riverside, which located and provided a small docket file. The gist of the file is contained in the image below, which suggests dismissal of the case.

In March 2021, the CIA responded to my 2020 FOIA request on material pertaining to Nicholas de Rochefort. It stated, in short, a search indicated no records responsive that would reveal a publicly acknowledged affiliation between the CIA and the subject. The Agency would neither confirm nor deny any records might exist that would reveal a classified association, as such records would be exempt from disclosure under the FOIA.

I thought the request was worth a try, in the event files surrounding the Bachrack lawsuit had found their way into the light of day by this point in time. They had not.

So our profile of Nicholas de Rochefort thus far suggests he was an honorable World War II veteran. Educated and politically active, Mr. Rochefort assisted Voice of America and became recognized as an expert in psychological warfare. While heavily involved in such activities he sought American citizenship in 1954. Rochefort held influence within the China lobby at the time, a demographic credited as among the wealthiest and most powerful lobbies in Washington. He numbered among the founders of The Committee of One Million, a suspected brainchild of the CIA and considered the most high profile aspect of that China lobby. To learn more about this man, who curiously became an organizer of NICAP in 1956 and briefly instrumental in its early operation, we turn to the FBI.

In 2020 the Bureau responded to my FOIA request on Nicholas de Rochefort with a 29-page file. It consists of several 1956 and 1957 documents pertaining to investigations of Rochefort.

Some of the investigations were conducted under the Foreign Agents Registration Act. As explained at the website of the National Archives and Records Administration, the Act required "foreign propagandists" or "agents of a foreign principal" engaged in distributing propaganda to register with the State Department. The Bureau conducted related investigations.

I think it is an extremely reasonable suspicion Rochefort's request for American citizenship in 1954 was related to his line of work, whatever, exactly, that line of work may have been. FBI concerns reflected in the 29-page file include if Rochefort was employed by “Nationalist China.” The Bureau eventually seemed to have established to its satisfaction that was not the case, and noted those familiar with Rochefort often considered his anti-Communist proclamations to be sincere. That was of course important to J. Edgar Hoover's agents.

Perhaps most curious to our exploration of the mysterious Count de Rochefort is the timing of memos written by Director Hoover and reports composed by FBI Special Agents during their investigations. The file contains reports composed on the bullseye of the timeline in which we're most interested, late 1956 and early 1957, when NICAP was incorporated and launched.

The Bureau seems to have been conducting an “SGE,” or special government employee, investigation, running concurrently with the Registration Act matter. An August 1956 Airtel from Hoover to the FBI Washington Field Office:

Hoover's message seems to suggest the Registration Act investigation was conducted for the State Department, as we might expect. The “SGE case” may have been related to Rochefort's employment with the Department of Commerce, as perhaps inferred by the term, “Commerce, SGE.” Subsequent FBI reports would also indicate Rochefort was periodically employed by the State Department.

An August 1956 FBI report was written by Special Agent Duncan MacRae of the Washington Field Office. Quite notably, MacRae cited a file on Rochefort at the State Department that indicated Rochefort was employed by the U.S. government in Washington, D.C. The employment took place from October 1, 1952 to May 31, 1954. That would have been before Rochefort was granted American citizenship, and during the time he was suspected of working on behalf of the CIA on The Committee of One Million as suggested by Stanley Bachrack. The top of the first page of MacRae's report, referencing Rochefort's work with the U.S. government, The Committee of One Million, and a group known as The Advertising Council:

SYNOPSIS: Subject's file at Office of Security, U. S. Department of State, reflects NICOLAS de ROCHEFORT born 5/1/02, at St. Petersburg, Russia, employed by U. S. Government in WDC 10/1/52, to 5/31/54; as a Consultant for Committee for One Million, New York City, from November, 1953, to January, 1954; Consultant for Advertising Council, Inc., WDC, from

I submitted a FOIA request to the State Department for the above referenced file on Rochefort. It suggested I seek the file from the National Archives and Records Administration. In 2020 NARA responded that a search of records spanning from 1945-1959 located a single document, a 1951 letter. There was no explanation offered as to whether the requested State Department file cited in the FBI report above may have been lost, destroyed, or perhaps some other circumstance.

The document provided was a letter from the office of House Majority Leader Congressman John W. McCormack of Massachusetts. It was written by an aide, apparently to a State Department official, endorsing the “services” of Nicholas de Rochefort and suggesting an existing professional relationship of some capacity with the Congressman. From the 1951 letter:

Dear Howland:

I received your letter of August 24th with great pleasure and so glad to read its contents. You remember when we sent Gene Gregory to you we told you that he would be a credit to the Department. The Congressman and I are so glad that he has worked out so well.

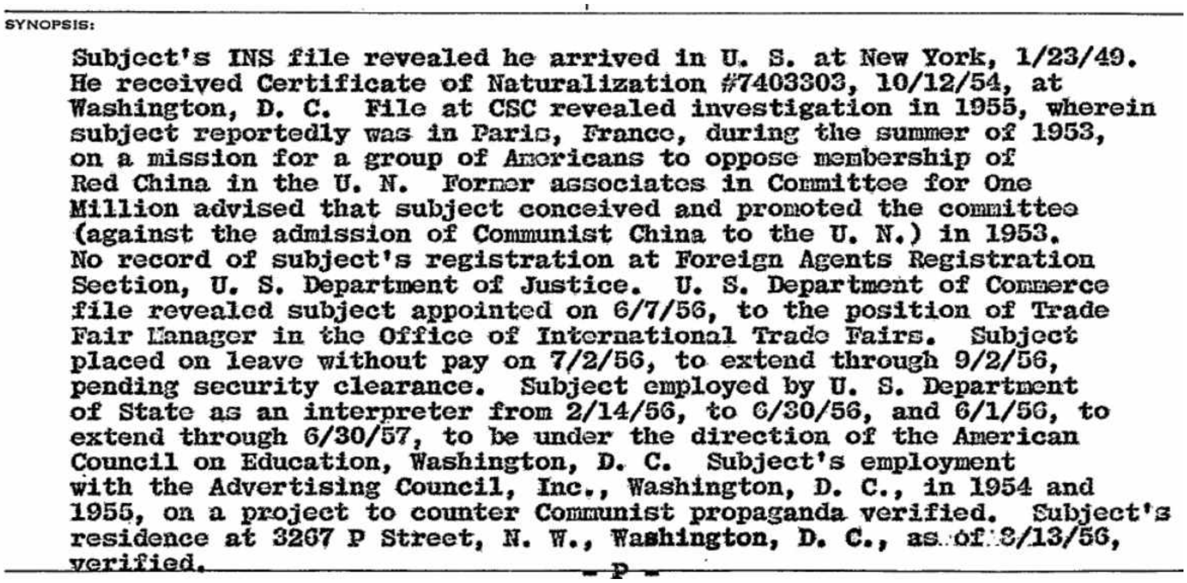
Also, I am very grateful to you for your interest in Mr. Nicolas de Rochefort. I am sure that if you find it possible to utilize his services, that you will find him to be a fine employee and of real service to the Department.

Turning our attention back to the August 1956 FBI report, the investigation reflected statements of the president of The Advertising Council. He described Rochefort as “a good propagandist, particularly valuable in projects designed to counter Communist propaganda.”

Rochefort's employment activities are described in another report by Special Agent MacRae, dated November 27, 1956. The investigation period covered dates between mid-September and mid-November. NICAP was incorporated October 24, 1956, after some preparation. A synopsis of the FBI report, which credits Rochefort with conception and promotion of The Committee of One Million, is pictured below.



SYNOPSIS:

Subject's INS file revealed he arrived in U. S. at New York, 1/23/49. He received Certificate of Naturalization #7403303, 10/12/54, at Washington, D. C. File at CSC revealed investigation in 1955, wherein subject reportedly was in Paris, France, during the summer of 1953, on a mission for a group of Americans to oppose membership of Red China in the U. N. Former associates in Committee for One Million advised that subject conceived and promoted the committee (against the admission of Communist China to the U. N.) in 1953. No record of subject's registration at Foreign Agents Registration Section, U. S. Department of Justice. U. S. Department of Commerce file revealed subject appointed on 6/7/56, to the position of Trade Fair Manager in the Office of International Trade Fairs. Subject placed on leave without pay on 7/2/56, to extend through 9/2/56, pending security clearance. Subject employed by U. S. Department of State as an interpreter from 2/14/56, to 6/30/56, and 6/1/56, to extend through 6/30/57, to be under the direction of the American Council on Education, Washington, D. C. Subject's employment with the Advertising Council, Inc., Washington, D. C., in 1954 and 1955, on a project to counter Communist propaganda verified. Subject's residence at 3267 P Street, N. W., Washington, D. C., as of 8/13/56, verified.

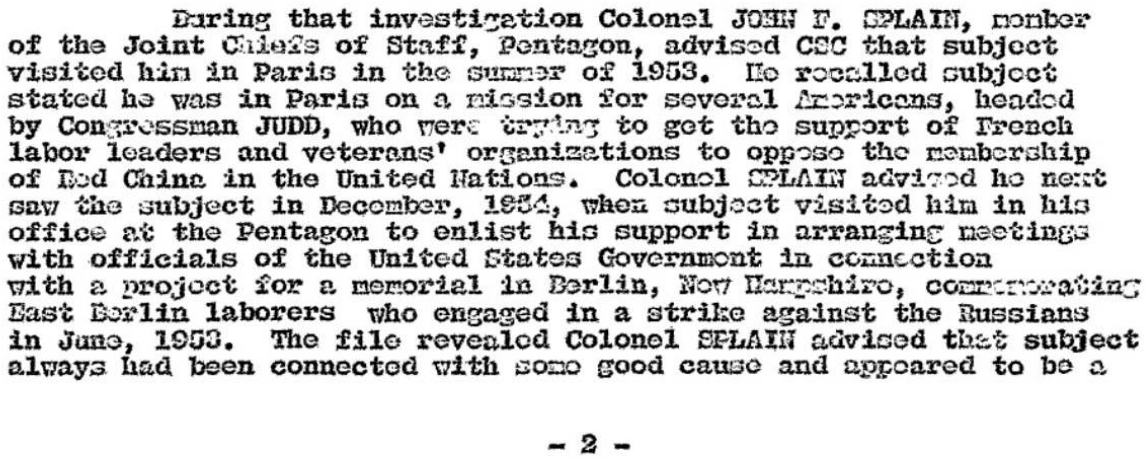
Sources cited in MacRae's report include an "INS" file, which is Immigration and Naturalization Service, and a 1955 investigation conducted by the "CSC," or Civil Service Commission. Also described in the synopsis is Rochefort's June 7, 1956, appointment to the Department of Commerce and subsequent July to September leave, pending security clearance. Note Rochefort's employment, as well, with the State Department during what would have been his involvement with NICAP. The FBI notably verified Rochefort's previous employment at the Advertising Council "on a project to counter Communist propaganda."

MacRae's report goes on to site the CSC as establishing Rochefort's interactions and apparent good standing with Col. John Splain of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Rochefort reportedly met with such officials in the Pentagon and abroad on behalf of those backing The Committee of One Million, including the previously referenced Congressman Judd. Topics of discussion included Freedom Day in Berlin, New Hampshire:



During that investigation Colonel JOHN F. SPLAIN, member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Pentagon, advised CSC that subject visited him in Paris in the summer of 1953. He recalled subject stated he was in Paris on a mission for several Americans, headed by Congressman JUDD, who were trying to get the support of French labor leaders and veterans' organizations to oppose the membership of Red China in the United Nations. Colonel SPLAIN advised he next saw the subject in December, 1954, when subject visited him in his office at the Pentagon to enlist his support in arranging meetings with officials of the United States Government in connection with a project for a memorial in Berlin, New Hampshire, commemorating East Berlin laborers who engaged in a strike against the Russians in June, 1953. The file revealed Colonel SPLAIN advised that subject always had been connected with some good cause and appeared to be a force for good in his own way. Colonel SPLAIN stated that subject had impressed him as being definitely anti-communist and quite sincere in trying to combat the inroads Communism had made in France.

The next page of MacRae's November report is below, which references Rochefort's substantial responsibility in the development of The Committee. Leadership of the lobby group described Rochefort as a highly convincing speaker and credited him with writing a petition which received nearly a million signatures.

The executive director of The Committee was also tapped by investigators. He stated that he worked closely with Rochefort, who he described as doing an outstanding job at bringing the issue before the American people about Red China's admission to the United Nations. He explained the entire idea of the petition originated with Rochefort – or, we might wonder, with the CIA, as Stanley Bachrack strongly suspected.

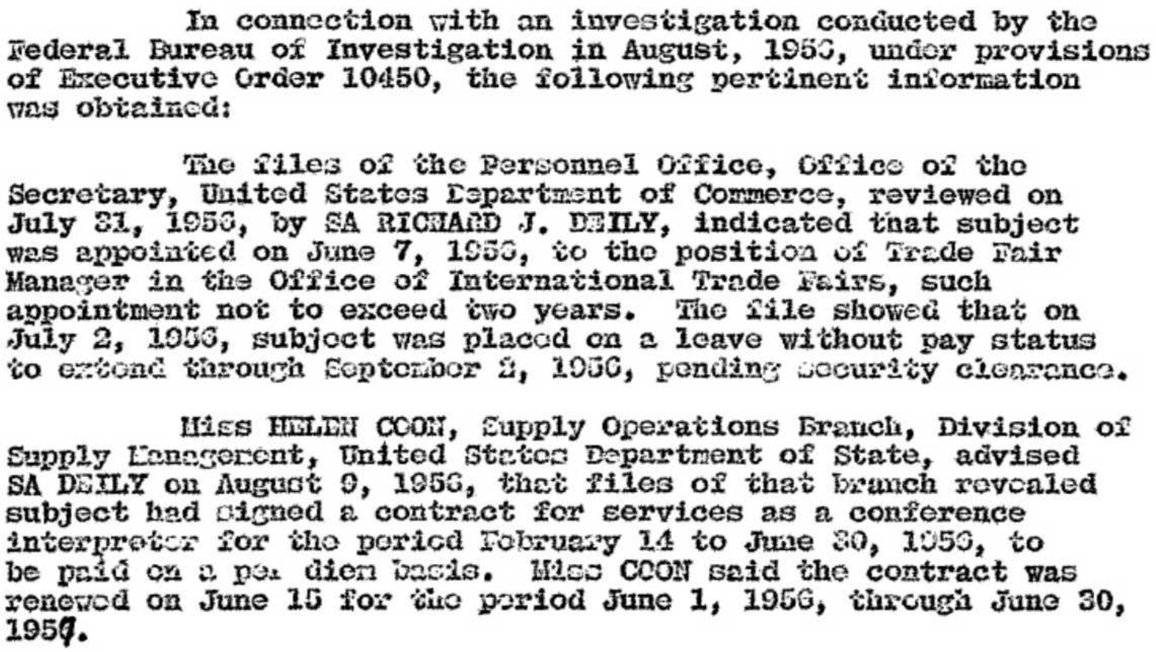
The CSC file showed that during the investigation HAROLD ORAN, President, Harold Oran, Incorporated, (Public Relations,) 8 West 40 Street, New York City, New York, advised that he was the former Fund Raising Consultant to the Committee For One Million. He said the committee headquarters was located at 33 West 44th Street, New York, New York. Subject also was engaged by the committee as a consultant. Mr. ORAN advised that record information pertaining to the subject's work was no longer accessible, since activities of the committee were discontinued in April, 1954, and the office closed.

Mr. ORAN advised, according to the CSC file, that he had been acquainted with subject since 1953. He related it was subject who conceived the idea of a petition to be widely distributed against the admission of Communist China to the United Nations. Mr. ORAN recalled this idea was endorsed enthusiastically by others at a meeting held in Washington, D. C., during the summer of 1953. He recalled the Committee For One Million (against the admission of Communist China to the United Nations) emerged from this meeting.

Mr. ORAN told CSC that subject's first efforts for the committee were concerned with the writing of the petition. Thereafter, according to Mr. ORAN, subject traveled widely to various conventions, urging those present to adopt the resolutions in the petition. Mr. ORAN recalled that subject proved to be a highly convincing speaker, and when the committee terminated its campaign in April, 1954, it had secured almost one million signatures of supporters.

SA MacRae's November 1956 report referenced the August FBI investigation pertaining to background checks for government employees. The investigation established Rochefort was projected to be employed, ostensibly or otherwise, at the Department of Commerce as a Trade Fair Manager, and by the State Department as an interpreter, during the time we now know he helped organize and launch NICAP, between approximately October 1956 and January 1957:



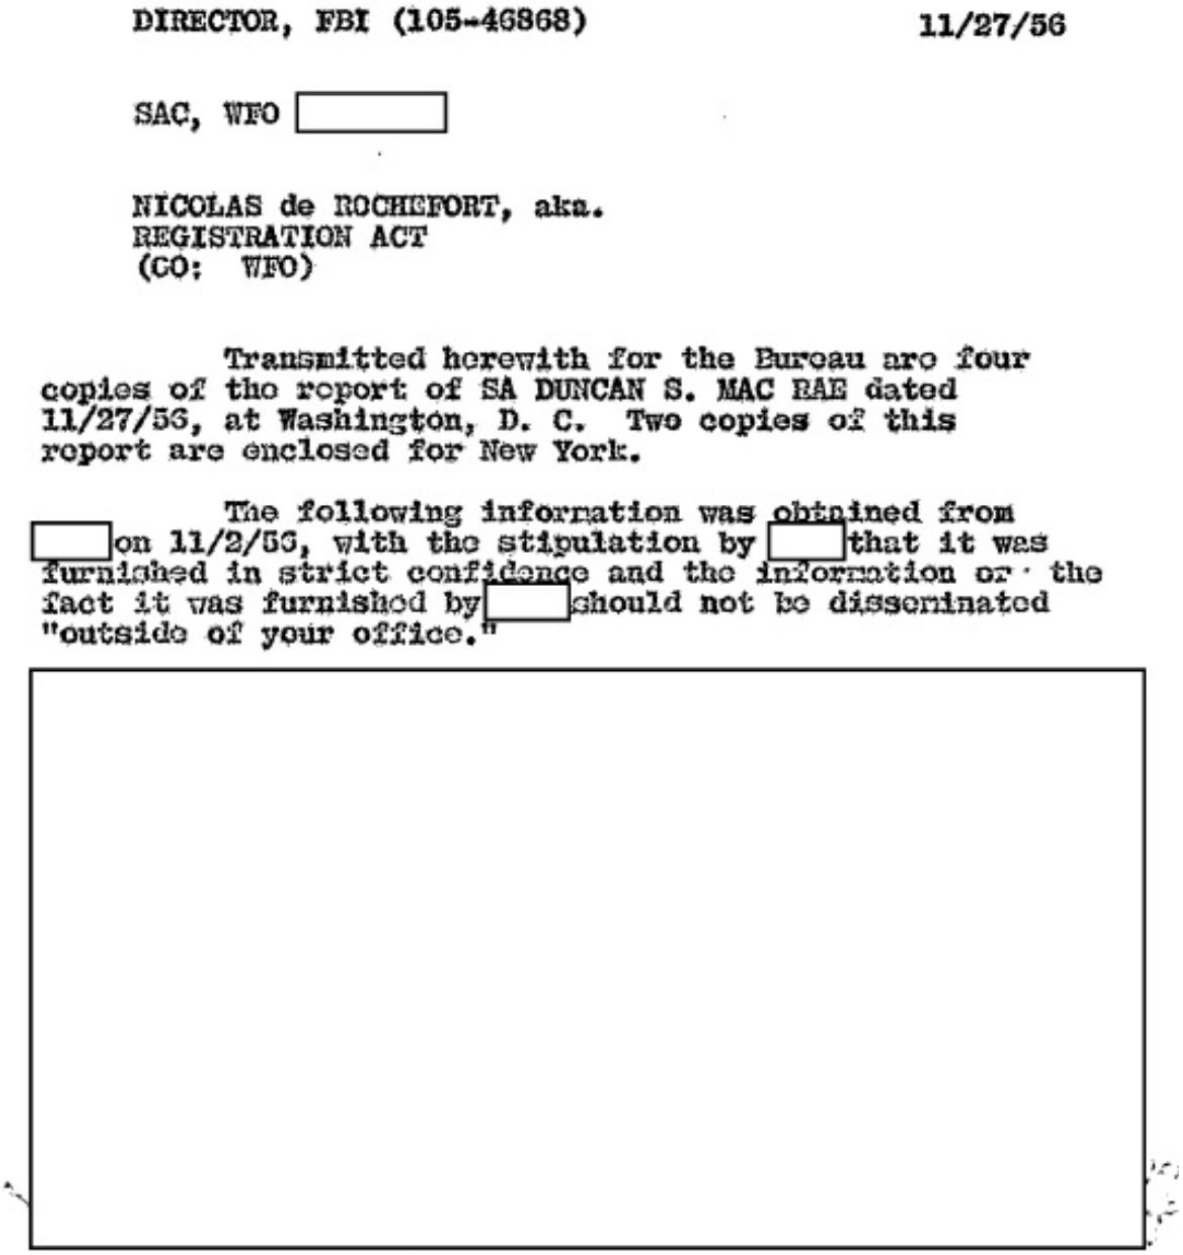
In connection with an investigation conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in August, 1956, under provisions of Executive Order 10450, the following pertinent information was obtained:

The files of the Personnel Office, Office of the Secretary, United States Department of Commerce, reviewed on July 31, 1956, by SA RICHARD J. DEILY, indicated that subject was appointed on June 7, 1956, to the position of Trade Fair Manager in the Office of International Trade Fairs, such appointment not to exceed two years. The file showed that on July 2, 1956, subject was placed on a leave without pay status to extend through September 2, 1956, pending security clearance.

Miss HELEN COON, Supply Operations Branch, Division of Supply Management, United States Department of State, advised SA DEILY on August 9, 1956, that files of that branch revealed subject had signed a contract for services as a conference interpreter for the period February 14 to June 30, 1956, to be paid on a per diem basis. Miss COON said the contract was renewed on June 15 for the period June 1, 1956, through June 30, 1957.

When Director Hoover was provided copies of SA MacRae's November 27 report on Rochefort, he was additionally given the memo shown below, not included in the copies designated for other cleared recipients. The memo, exclusively for Hoover, contains information that is fully redacted, as is the source. The information was apparently obtained on November 2, 1956, just days after the formal incorporation of NICAP, under the stipulations it was furnished in strict confidence and not to be disseminated outside the director's office.

Efforts were unsuccessful to get further declassification of the memo, curiously exclusively for Hoover. In 2021 the Bureau conducted a Mandatory Declassification Review as requested, but declined to further declassify any of the document, citing exemption from the FOIA. For the time being we are left to wonder the identity of the informant, the nature of the information the source wanted withheld from FBI field offices and other agencies, and if it had anything to do with Rochefort's involvement with NICAP.



DIRECTOR, FBI (105-46868) 11/27/56

SAC, WFO [redacted]

NICOLAS de ROCHEFORT, aka.
REGISTRATION ACT
(CO: WFO)

Transmitted herewith for the Bureau are four copies of the report of SA DUNCAN S. MAC RAE dated 11/27/56, at Washington, D. C. Two copies of this report are enclosed for New York.

The following information was obtained from [redacted] on 11/2/56, with the stipulation by [redacted] that it was furnished in strict confidence and the information or the fact it was furnished by [redacted] should not be disseminated "outside of your office."

SA Thomas Alt investigated Rochefort between late November 1956 and early January 1957. He touched base with Col. Splain of the Joint Chiefs, confirming previous investigation reports continued to accurately reflect the officer's high regard for Rochefort. SA Alt also spoke with confidential informants in Washington familiar with Chinese affairs who advised they had no knowledge of Rochefort, thus the Frenchman was not suspected to be employed by Nationalist China. Coincidentally or otherwise, Alt's report was dated January 11, 1957, just days before the first annual NICAP meeting of members and the Board of Governors in which T. Townsend Brown was formally ousted.

I continue to seek material on Nicholas de Rochefort through the FOIA from intelligence agencies and archives. My efforts include requesting an FBI file from the National Archives and Records Administration after the FBI advised me of its existence. NARA responded by email that a preliminary review indicated Rochefort is indeed the subject of the file, which consists of some 200 pages. It was compiled as the result of an internal security investigation conducted between 1955 and 1964. NARA further stated the file must be processed for public release. The completion date was estimated to be September 2022.

During FOIA correspondence with the FBI, it indicated additional records potentially responsive to Nicholas de Rochefort were destroyed. It stated that was the case in a 2020 FOIA response.

There is much less information available on Rochefort's partner in, well, whatever they were partners in, Bernard J.O. Carvalho. You will recall Mr. Carvalho joined Rochefort and Brown as an early NICAP organizer and was accused of being a CIA man by people ranging from Richard Hall to Todd Zechel and many in between and since.

Among the few things I located was an old story in which Carvalho is a supporting character and was described as “a director of publications and former reporter who was helping Ivy Duce publicize God Speaks.” There's a lot to unpack in that sentence, but here we go: Ivy Oneita Duce was a female Murshida, or spiritual guide, of Sufism Reoriented, which was an American school of spiritualist training. Sufism Reoriented was started by Meher Baba, considered by some a spiritual master, and the author of the book, God Speaks.

The story comes to us from July 1956 and concerns a publicity tour for Meher Baba. He was being filmed conducting his activities and departing from New York. The entourage was destined for Myrtle Beach, SC, where Meher Baba was scheduled to participate in dedication ceremonies for the Meher Spiritual Center.

There was apparently pre-flight engine trouble and a storm, but Carvalho must have been pretty hellbent on getting the master and some television cameramen to that gig in Myrtle Beach. It would seem securing and flying airplanes on short notice numbered among Carvalho's abilities and talents, assuming this is the Bernard Carvalho in question, which I obviously suspect to be the case.

“NBC-TV cameramen were to come from New York and film the proceedings for the nationally televised 'Dave Garroway Show,'” a blogger recounted, “but their flight was canceled due to engine trouble. However, Bernard Carvalho found a small private plane and flew them through a storm to Myrtle Beach.”

“After a long search,” according to one of the blogger's cited sources, “Bernard Carvalho finally found a small private plane and flew them, himself, through a storm to Myrtle Beach.”

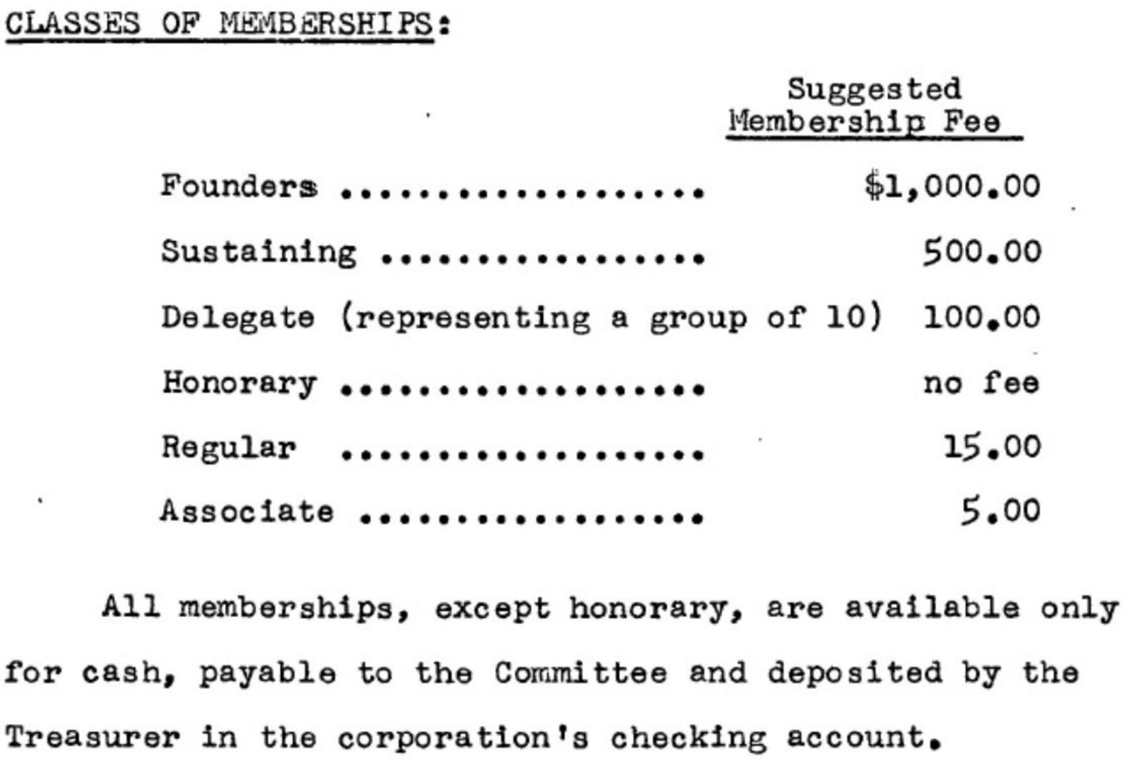
Carvalho was apparently not a big fan of layovers, at least not in this particular instance. Barry Greenwood gave me a heads up by email there is “almost nothing” available on Carvalho in the NICAP files and material.

“With very fragmentary information,” Greenwood added, “I gathered that de Rochefort and Carvalho were brought on by Townsend Brown to fund raise, but due to questionable financial activities they appear to have been gone by the time Keyhoe took hold. There is no evidence either were into UFOs otherwise.”

Indeed there is not. There is no reason to think either of the two had any existing interest in UFOs when they got on board with NICAP. It is time to follow the money.

CHAPTER 5

EARLY FINANCES



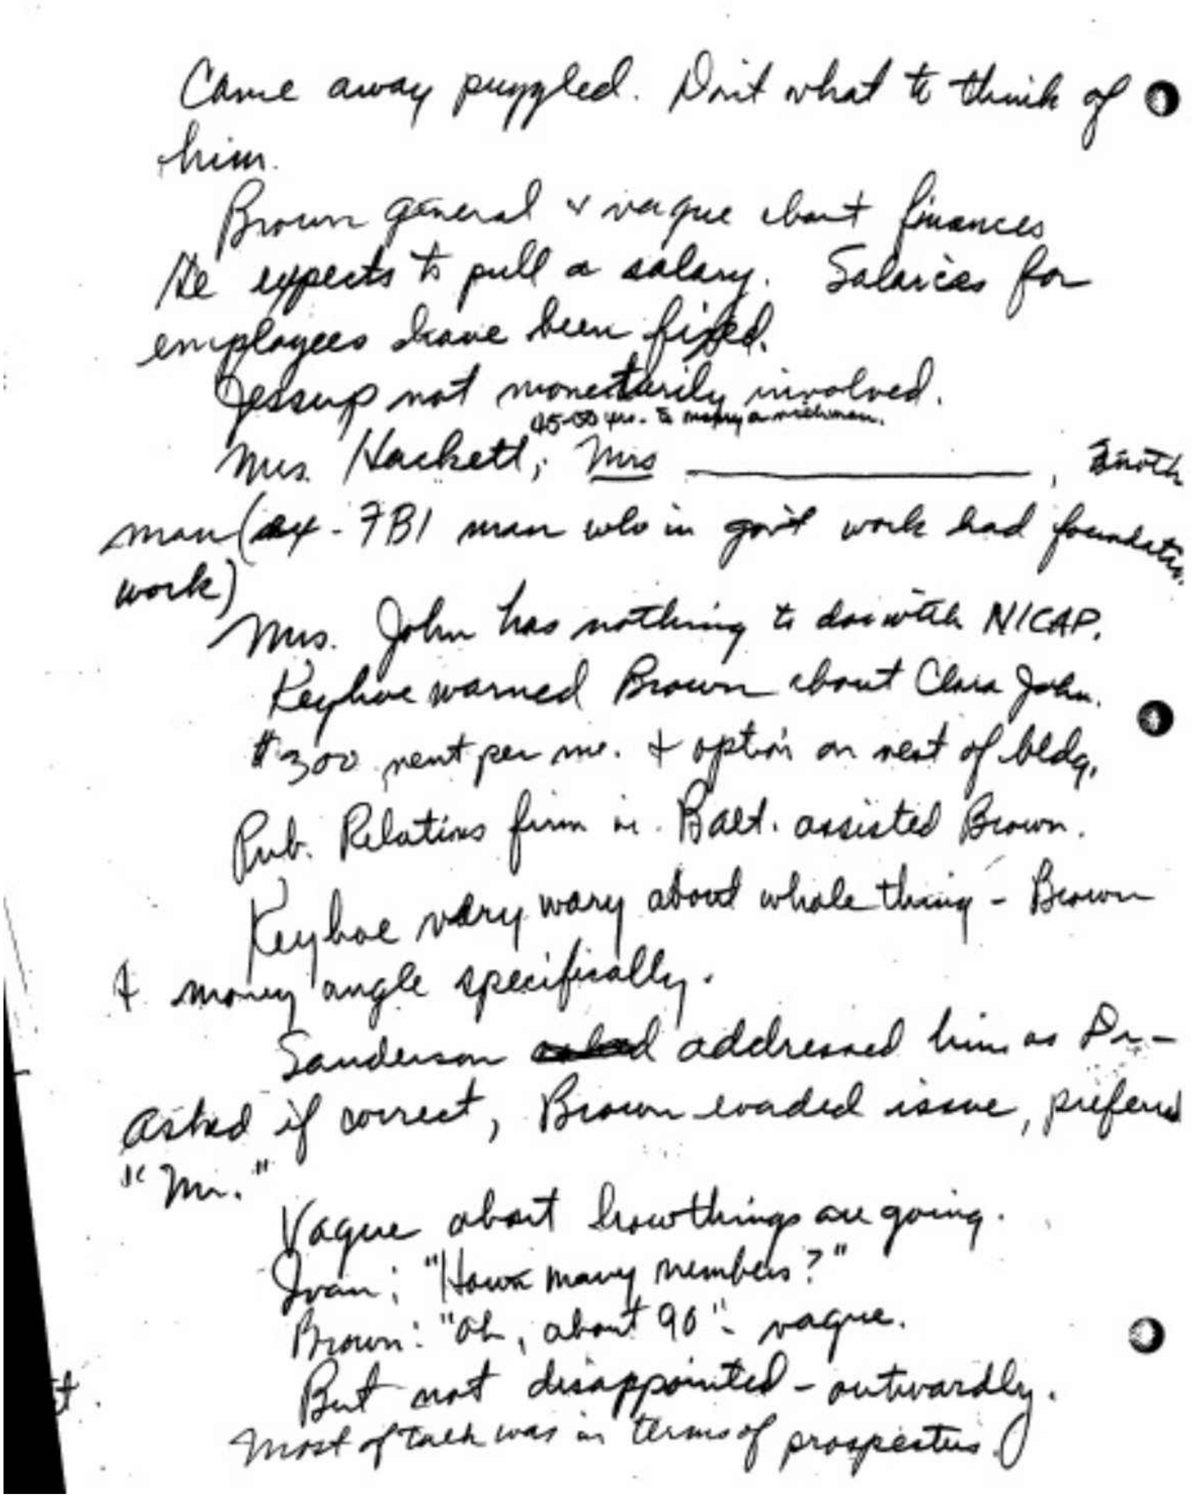
CLASSES OF MEMBERSHIPS:

	Suggested Membership Fee
Founders	$1,000.00
Sustaining	500.00
Delegate (representing a group of 10)	100.00
Honorary	no fee
Regular	15.00
Associate	5.00

All memberships, except honorary, are available only for cash, payable to the Committee and deposited by the Treasurer in the corporation's checking account.

The above image is from an early NICAP prospectus.[19] The inflation increase from 1957 to 2021 is over 9.5 times; $15 = 143.70, 1,000 = 9,579.89.

Early on there were suspicions among NICAP organizers about the motives of Townsend Brown and his associates. Within the many NICAP files provided by Barry Greenwood is a series of handwritten notes. The notes are not signed by their author, but the three pages offer us apparent insights into circumstances surrounding what seems to be a 1956 meeting. Below is one of the pages.[20]



Came away puzzled. Don't know what to think of him.

Brown general & vague about finances. He expects to pull a salary. Salaries for employees have been fixed.

Jessup not monetarily involved.

45-50 yrs. to marry a rich man.

Mrs. Hackett; Mrs ______________, another man (ex-FBI man who in gov't work had foundation work)

Mrs. John has nothing to do with NICAP.

Keyhoe warned Brown about Clara John.

$300 rent per mo. & option on rest of bldg.

Pub. Relations firm in Balt. assisted Brown.

Keyhoe very wary about whole thing - Brown & money angle specifically.

Sanderson ~~asked~~ addressed him as Dr.—asked if correct, Brown evaded issue, preferred "Mr."

Vague about how things are going.

Ivan: "How many members?"

Brown: "Oh, about 90" - vague.

But not disappointed - outwardly.

Most of talk was in terms of prospectus.

The above page suggests Townsend Brown spoke only vaguely about finances. It is also suggested Morris K. Jessup was not monetarily involved with NICAP.

There is reference to Mrs. Rose Hackett, the office manager. She was one of four who made “Founder Membership” donations of $1,000 during the first year of operations, according to a 1959 report to the Board of Governors authored by Maj. Donald Keyhoe.[21] Mrs. Hackett was a widow and was soon to marry D. Cameron Campbell, who briefly worked for NICAP as a treasurer.

The curious presence of “another man” is noted, described as an “ex-FBI man who in government work had foundation work.” His name is not documented.

It is noted Mrs. Clara John had nothing to do with NICAP, and that Keyhoe warned Brown about her. I confidently suspect such warnings pertained to Mrs. John's liberal views of UFOs, contactees, and esoteric subject matter, as compared to those of Keyhoe, who considered himself more UFO conservative.

Rent is listed as $300 per month with an option for the rest of the building. Calculating for inflation, that's over $2,800 a month by standards as of this writing. Perhaps they either expected saucer hunting to be more lucrative than it turned out or they initially had wealthier underwriters than most UFO researchers who followed in their footsteps, or both.

Please take particular note of the line indicating a public relations firm in Baltimore assisted Brown. Similar was suggested in a letter from Arnold Kruckman to Kansas Representative Wint Smith.

After Brown and two associates formally filed for NICAP incorporation in August 1956, Kruckman wrote to Rep. Smith in September, “The Committee has just been incorporated and it has employed a fund-gathering organization which will operate in all parts of the United States. I understand the fund-gathering organization has made a preliminary investigation for its own business purposes, and has come to the conclusion that it will be able to undertake this operation successfully. If I recall my facts, correctly, it expects to raise its funds from some 500,000 persons. In addition there are tens of thousands [in] local clubs or organizations in every part of the United States devoted to 'sightings' and other forms of studies and recordings connected with aerial phenomena and 'flying saucers.'”[22]

It indeed appears likely Nicholas de Rochefort and Bernard J.O. Carvalho acted as consultants with fundraising organizations or public relations firms, as Barry Greenwood suggested by email. Perhaps the two were even presented as part of the Baltimore firm. You will recall Rochefort's employment history as an influential lobbyist and propagandist, and Carvalho's apparent assistance promoting Meher Baba and his book.

Further documented in the above handwritten note was Maj. Keyhoe's doubts about proposed financial strategies. As a matter of fact, the line immediately following mention of the public relations firm states, “Keyhoe very wary about whole thing – Brown & money angle specifically.”

The handwritten page goes on to reference UFO writer and researcher Ivan Sanderson. He and his associates apparently and understandably took interest in the buzz generated by NICAP. One such associate was Robert Serling, older brother of famed Twilight Zone creator, Rod Serling.

Robert Serling was an avid writer, credited with at least eight novels and 16 nonfiction books. During World War II he served in the Army Air Forces and subsequently had a particular interest in covering aviation. Robert joined United Press International after the war and became its aviation editor in 1960.

A few years before that, Robert apparently composed a memo to Ivan Sanderson about NICAP. He described general operations and a visit he made to NICAP headquarters, almost certainly in 1956.

“They say vigorously it is an independent organization with NO connection with the government,” Robert Serling wrote to Sanderson.[23]

His memo goes on to briefly describe the activities of Townsend Brown and Morris Jessup, the latter of which was observed to be “connected with the outfit in some capacity.” Their personal positions on flying saucers were noted: Brown considered himself a shade right of center, Jessup to the left.

Robert Serling's memo concludes with the following description of events during his visit, “A rather distinguished-looking woman pleasantly asked me if she could help me. Her face froze about 40 degrees when I said I was a reporter. She stiffly asked for identification. Brown, Jessup, and frozen face [were] the only three in the office at the time. Brown made a call to someone and asked if someone would like to speak to him, but someone said no.”

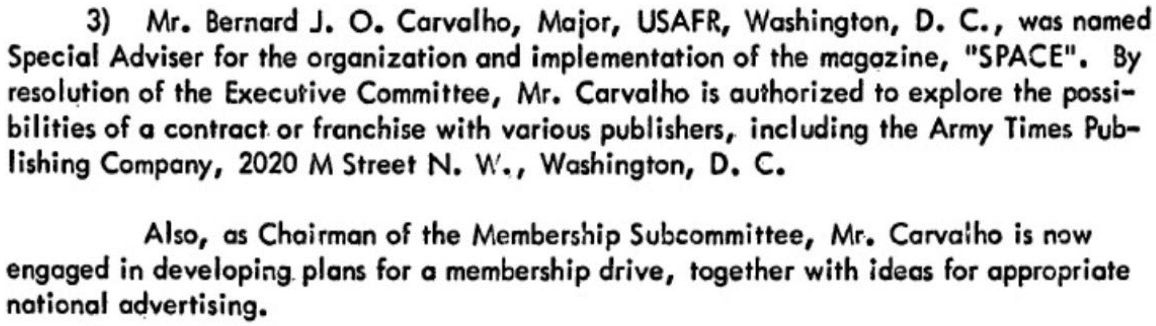
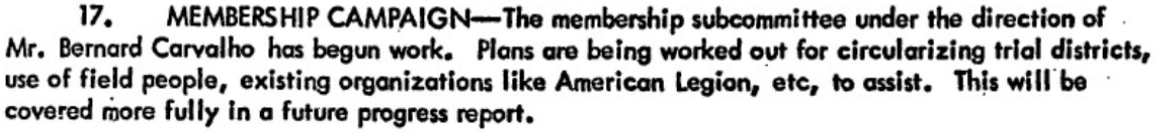
Also please notice the presence on the list of Bernard J.O. Carvalho. He was listed as a major in the Air Force, a circumstance I consider to increase the likelihood he was the same Bernard Carvalho who, a few months earlier, flew the Meher Baba entourage with NBC cameramen in tow through a storm in New York to a spiritual center dedication in South Carolina. Carvalho was designated a NICAP “Special Advisor,” whose responsibilities included producing a magazine. The Army Times Publishing Company was apparently a prospect for a publisher, as indicated below in the same January progress report.



3) Mr. Bernard J. O. Carvalho, Major, USAFR, Washington, D. C., was named Special Adviser for the organization and implementation of the magazine, "SPACE". By resolution of the Executive Committee, Mr. Carvalho is authorized to explore the possibilities of a contract or franchise with various publishers, including the Army Times Publishing Company, 2020 M Street N. W., Washington, D. C.

Also, as Chairman of the Membership Subcommittee, Mr. Carvalho is now engaged in developing plans for a membership drive, together with ideas for appropriate national advertising.

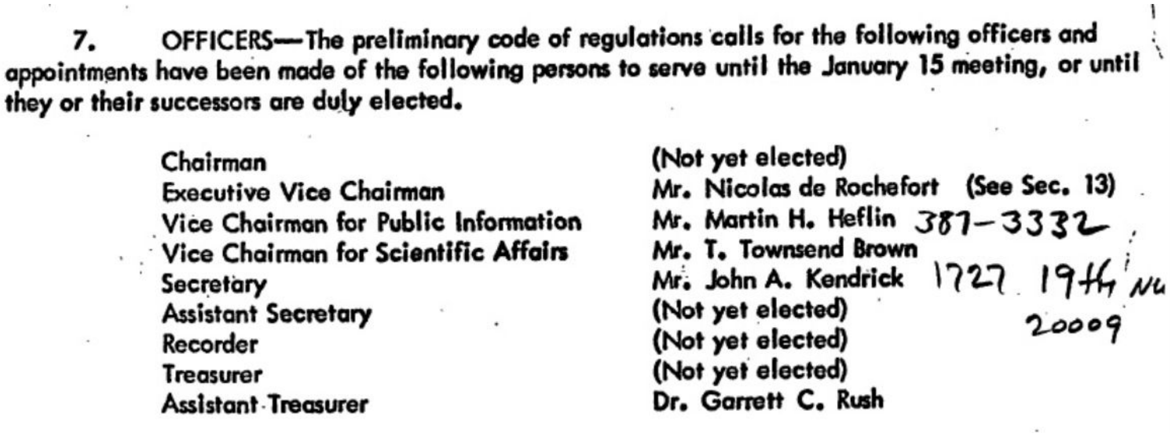
Further evidence in a December 17, 1956, NICAP progress report of Carvalho's position as Chairman of the Membership Subcommittee:[25]



17. MEMBERSHIP CAMPAIGN—The membership subcommittee under the direction of Mr. Bernard Carvalho has begun work. Plans are being worked out for circularizing trial districts, use of field people, existing organizations like American Legion, etc, to assist. This will be covered more fully in a future progress report.

An example of Carvalho's activities in his capacity as Chairman of the Membership Subcommittee included signing a form letter for prospective members. The letter stated NICAP was chartered to implement and direct a united scientific investigation of aerial phenomena.[26]

The January 7, 1957, Board of Governors Progress Report also referenced Nicholas de Rochefort:



7. OFFICERS—The preliminary code of regulations calls for the following officers and appointments have been made of the following persons to serve until the January 15 meeting, or until they or their successors are duly elected.

Executive Vice Chairman

Was a fundraising firm, consulted under Brown's direction, actually serving as cover for Rochefort, Carvalho, and the CIA? As my research continued, it seemed to be an increasing possibility.

Let's take it from the top. In late August 1956, Brown and two of his associates filed a Certificate of Incorporation for NICAP (You will recall, as documented in the previous chapter, the FBI launched investigations of Rochefort the same month, August 1956). The trio of T. Townsend Brown, Mary V. King, and Thomas D. O'Keefe completed the document on August 28. The next day it was submitted to the applicable agency. From a copy of the

FILED: August 29, 1956.

A two-page contract dated August 29, 1956, was drawn up between NICAP and Counsel Services, Incorporated, which was located in Baltimore. This is almost certainly the previously referenced Baltimore firm.

The contract states Counsel Services would direct "initial organizational plans and the general public relations and membership enlistment program" for NICAP. The document goes on to describe plans pertaining to membership recruitment and a sustained public information program. The importance of making a positive initial impression on the public was emphasized, and Counsel Services stressed its need to handle the task, which, it warned, should not be left to amateurs.

The contract was undertaken on behalf of Counsel Services by "Mary Vaughan King, President," who collaborated on the NICAP Certificate of Incorporation 24 hours earlier. Counsel Services was to be paid $1,500 per month beginning October 1 and for three months, with the fee increasing to $1,850 each month for the next 12 months, starting in January 1957. Those figures would be multiplied over nine times to factor inflation as of this writing.

The contract stipulated “additional consultants in related fields, for Regional directors, may be retained as necessary to keep pace with expanding operations – subject to the approval of the Committee's Officers, all to work under the supervision of the senior officers of this firm – namely, Mr. Thomas D. O'Keefe and Mary V. King (Mrs.).” Costs of consultants and all related expenses were to be paid by NICAP. It is reasonable to suspect such consultants included Rochefort and Carvalho.

Att: Mr. Townsend Brown
Executive Vice Chairman

Gentlemen:

This is in confirmation of our mutual understanding, as of August 16, 1956, with respect to this firm's direction of initial organizational plans and the general public relations and membership enlistment program for the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena.

We have undertaken this assignment with the knowledge that present financial circumstances do not permit of payment of usual professional fees for such services, and that we will operate on a minimum cost basis during the six weeks or so developmental period— mostly out of our own offices.

Operating plans will be made gradually, with maximum flexibility in relation to the progress in organizational development, i.e., First things first:

I. Recruitment of a Board of Governors of persons whose calibre will, per se, establish in the public mind the unimpeachable sincerity of the Committee's work and efforts, literally guaranteeing the integrity of its operations, - is of prime importance. These persons should be selected on a Regional basis (except for assuring that a quorum can be obtained for meetings in the Eastern area during the early stages) thus facilitating the enlistment of a National Membership of adequate size and quality.

II. An Advisory Council or similar body should be named to be comprised of interested persons who are willing and able to assist actively in related fields of science, public information, government relations, industrial relations, and international cooperation.

III. The National Membership Campaign can be instituted only after these two steps are accomplished, to assure a sound, dignified presentation to organized groups, persons with special interests in the field (such as aviators) and lay individuals generally.

IV. The preparation of designs for specific promotional and informational materials to be used in conjunction with the above mentioned program may be in process of course, but actual printing and release of such materials must await completement of enlistment of leadership. Meanwhile, artists are already working on designs for appropriate emblems, symbols, color schemes and layouts. The preliminary application forms for Membership are printed, and Membership cards are being sketched for presentation to the Committee for approval.

V. Planning of initial releases to information media must be done with extreme care, and every precaution exercised to prevent premature publicity which could have the very unhappy effect of focusing public attention on an infant organization whose future course of action is yet to be plotted accurately. Thus, by falling into the category of irresponsible, uncoordinated – if well intentioned – amateurs, the Committee Members would be relegated to ignominy and defeat before given a fair chance. This point cannot be over-emphasized, as the successful attainment of the Committee's aims and objectives hinges upon the Initial Impression made when the organization is presented to the public.

VI. Development of sustained public information programs will follow the outline and encompass the areas listed in Section VII of the original Prospectus concerning the formation of the Committee. The chronology of events can scarcely be determined at this early point, inasmuch as the direction to be taken depends upon the outcome of conferences yet to be held to seek the support and guidance of consultants and advisors whose counsel will be invaluable.

This firm is willing to proceed with the assignment on this basis, with the understanding that after the Committee goes into actual operation and funds become available for its operation, this firm will be reimbursed for costs incurred with the consent of the Officers, and professional fees at the rate of $1500.00 per month will be paid for the first three months, beginning with October 1, 1956, and $1850.00 per month for the next twelve months until January 1, 1958. This contract will be renewable by mutual consent of the Officers of the Committee and the management of this firm, with the further understanding that additional consultants in related fields, for Regional directors, may be retained as necessary to keep pace with expanding operations—subject to the approval of the Committee's Officers, all to work under the supervision of the senior officers of this firm —namely, Mr. Thomas D. O'Keefe and Mary V. King (Mrs.). Costs of additional consultants, as well as costs of materials, postage, travel, meetings, printing, etc., as incurred with the consent of the Committee's Officers, will be paid by the Committee directly.

If this is in agreement with your understanding of our arrangement, please sign the attached carbon copy of this letter, thus constituting this a valid contract between us, and return same for our files. We are deeply honored to have been selected for this assignment and feel it a privilege to be associated with a work of such magnitude and significance to our civilization.

Very Sincerely yours,

Date: August 31, 1956

The NICAP Certificate of Incorporation was formally approved October 24, 1956. Organizers of the young group then held a meeting in early November to appoint acting officers and personnel. Most seemed expected to retain their positions until at least the first annual meeting in January. Staff would then be solidified, and meetings of the Board of Governors and membership were envisioned to take place annually thereafter.

A November 6, 1956, letter attributed to NICAP Secretary John Kendrick advised Adm. Delmer Fahrney of the evolving situation.[29] Sort of. Adm. Fahrney would become the inaugural NICAP Chairman of the Board. The letter mentioned some personnel appointments as well as changes already taking place, but was not entirely clear about circumstances surrounding Mary Vaughan King. Neither did it specifically mention the proposed Counsel Services contract, but did advise the admiral that NICAP was pursuing professional fundraising organizations and the Board would be polled when recommendations were reached.

On a semi-interesting aside, It could be argued the letter was not written by John Kendrick, as compared to perhaps composed for his approval. I suggest this because there is mention within the second paragraph of Kendrick by name, which would indicate, if he wrote the letter, he oddly chose not to refer to himself in first person.

An apparent draft of the letter was located in a separate NICAP file.[30] The draft carries what might be considered some interesting differences from the letter eventually sent to Adm. Fahrney. For instance, the draft initially suggested incorporator and Counsel Services senior officer O'Keefe retained his position as NICAP treasurer, then it is amended to suggest he never intended to keep the office but only accepted it on a temporary basis.

We can also observe that Mary Vaughan King is described in the draft as relinquishing her post “in order to assist in the very important work of public relations,” with Kendrick taking her place. In the final letter, Fahrney is told Vaughan King relinquished her position “to assist in the Committee management liaison work”.

Below are the apparent draft and final letter:

Dear Governor____________

The formal details of incorporation have now been completed and there remains only the necessary implementation to put the Committee on a functioning basis

At the initial meeting of the Incorporators on ______ ________, 1956, T. Townsend Brown was appointed as the Executive Vice Chairman pro tempre, Mrs. Mary V ~~Olive~~ King as Secretary, and Mr THOS. D. ____ O'KEEFE ~~Campbell~~, Treasurer, ~~and Mr. ____ ____ Rush as Assistant Treasurer~~. These persons have continued to hold these posts until now, w/exception of MR O'KEEFE who had accepted the ofc on a temp basis, Cameron D. Campbell However, it has become necessary for Mrs. King to relinquish her post in order to assist in the very important work of public relations and John A. Kendrick was selected in her place. It was also necessary to obtain an overall public relations expert and Martin H. Heflin was selected for that post.

Two posts remain open at this time - the Chairman of the Committee and the Executive Vice Chairman. The position of Chairman would logically be held by the Speaker of the Board of Governors and this should be filled by the Board of Governors from among its own membership. This action can probably await the annual meeting in January. Mr. Bown, who has largely spearheaded the entire effort, has agreed to continue as the operating head of the organization until a successor is selected, at which time Mr. Bown would like to assume the direction of the scientific investigation.

It is proposed that the following administrative group be continued until the annual meeting in January:

Executive Vice Chairman - T. Towhsend Brown
Vice Chairman (Pub. Rels)- Martin H. Heflin
Vice Chairman (Scientific) - T. Townsend Brown
Secretary - John A. Kendrick
Treasurer- ____ ____ Campbell
Asst. Treasurer - ____ ____ Rush

RECEIVED
JOHN A. KENDRICK

November 6, 1956

Admiral Delbert S. Fahrney
Roundelay
Chadds Ford, Pennsylvania

Dear Admiral Fahrney:

The formal details of incorporation have now been completed and there remains only the necessary implementation to put the Committee on a functioning basis.

At the initial meeting of the incorporators on August 29, 1956, Mr. T. Townsend Brown was appointed as the Executive Vice Chairman pro tempore, Mrs. Mary Vaughan King as Secretary and Mr. Thomas D. O'Keefe as Treasurer. With the exception of Mr. O'Keefe, who had assumed this office on a temporary basis, these persons have continued to hold those posts until now. Mr. D. C. Campbell then assumed the responsibilities of Treasurer and Dr. Garrett C. Rush as Assistant Treasurer. It has since become necessary for Mrs. King also to relinquish her post in order to assist in the Committee management liaison work and Mr. John A. Kendrick was selected in her place. It was also necessary to obtain an overall public relations counsel and Mr. Martin H. Heflin was selected for that post.

Two headquarters management posts remain open at this time: the Chairman of the Committee and the Executive Vice Chairman. The position of Committee Chairman would logically be held by the Speaker of the Board of Governors, which office will of course be filled by the Board of Governors from among its own membership. From a practical standpoint this action can await the annual Board meeting in January. Mr. Brown, who has largely spearheaded the entire organizational effort, has agreed to continue as the operating executive officer of the organization until a successor is selected, at which time he would assume a vice chairmanship for direction of the Committee's scientific affairs.

It is proposed, therefore, that the following headquarters administrative officers be continued until the annual meeting in January:

Executive Vice Chairman	T. Townsend Brown, pro tempore
Vice Chairman of Public Relations	Martin H. Heflin
Vice Chairman of Scientific Affairs	T. Townsend Brown
Secretary	John A. Kendrick
Treasurer	D. C. Campbell
Assistant Treasurer	Dr. Garrett C. Rush

It is further proposed that Messrs. Brown, Heflin and Kendrick be designated as an Executive Committee to guide the day to day affairs of the Committee. Such a procedure becomes imperative, since the Board of Governors will not meet until shortly after the first of the year.

We are now preparing a Code of Regulations (Bylaws) which will be forwarded to you in the near future for your views.

Plans already are under way for the fund raising campaign and several professional organizations have been contacted in order to obtain estimates of such a program's costs. We will again poll the Board when we are in a position to make recommendations.

We solicit your comments, views and suggestions, and therefore ask your approval and ratification of the following:

1) Appointment of the officers named above until the annual meeting in January.

2) The initial appointments by the incorporators.

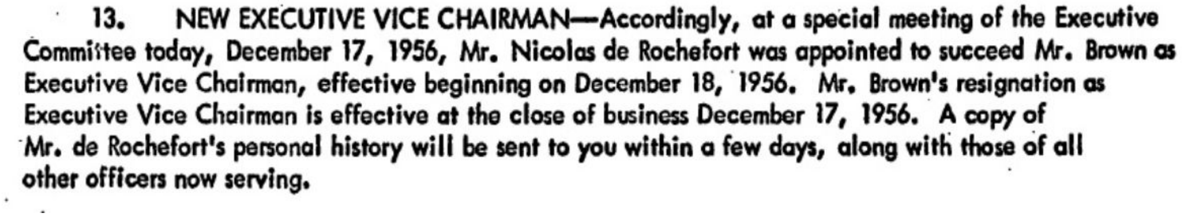
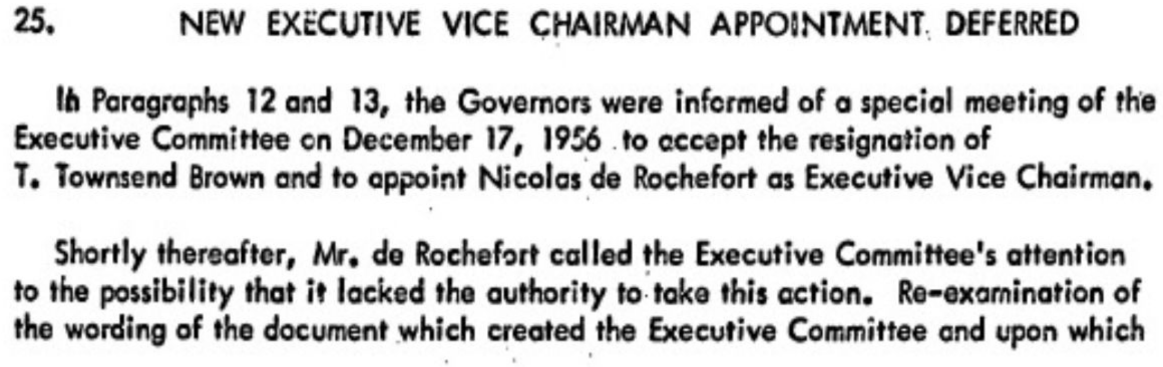
The notes indicate salary considerations, and there is a brief reference to touching base with an attorney named Borzilleri. We will explore his activities a bit more shortly.

A meeting was then held December 17, 1956, and Rochefort was appointed to succeed Brown as Executive Vice Chairman, effective virtually immediately. The circumstances were documented below in a progress report to the Board of Governors composed the same day of the meeting, December 17. This in all likelihood reflects Brown's rapid fall from favor.



13. NEW EXECUTIVE VICE CHAIRMAN—Accordingly, at a special meeting of the Executive Committee today, December 17, 1956, Mr. Nicolas de Rochefort was appointed to succeed Mr. Brown as Executive Vice Chairman, effective beginning on December 18, 1956. Mr. Brown's resignation as Executive Vice Chairman is effective at the close of business December 17, 1956. A copy of Mr. de Rochefort's personal history will be sent to you within a few days, along with those of all other officers now serving.

However, and rather interestingly, Rochefort soon brought it to the attention of the Executive Committee it lacked the authority to make the change. It seems this suggests Rochefort had more than a passing familiarity with the applicable NICAP regulations, or at least a better understanding of Executive Committee authority and limitations than others. It might also be reasonably interpreted to suggest Rochefort had reasons to oppose the removal of Brown. The personnel change was subsequently deferred, as indicated in the images below taken from a January progress report.



25. NEW EXECUTIVE VICE CHAIRMAN APPOINTMENT DEFERRED

In Paragraphs 12 and 13, the Governors were informed of a special meeting of the Executive Committee on December 17, 1956 to accept the resignation of T. Townsend Brown and to appoint Nicolas de Rochefort as Executive Vice Chairman.

Shortly thereafter, Mr. de Rochefort called the Executive Committee's attention to the possibility that it lacked the authority to take this action. Re-examination of the wording of the document which created the Executive Committee and upon which authority the Executive Committee was acting (Secretary's report and request of November 6, 1956, to the Board of Governors) revealed that it did not, in fact, possess the required specific powers. Therefore, the Executive Committee at a special meeting on December 21, 1956, rescinded or annulled such action as it had taken, thereby continuing Mr. Brown in office as Executive Vice Chairman to serve until his successor could be duly elected by the Board of Governors at the January meeting. Mr. de Rochefort's appointment was deferred.

Progress Report 2, Board of Governors

For whatever reasons, Mr. Campbell quickly resigned as treasurer. After taking over the position from Mr. O'Keefe in November, Campbell tendered a resignation in December. Townsend Brown penned a December 18 letter to Campbell, regretfully acknowledging Campbell's desire to vacate the position. A December 28 memo from Brown to the Executive Committee indicates Campbell was subsequently asked to withdraw his resignation until his successor could be elected at the January meeting of the Board of Governors.[32] Campbell apparently agreed.

It was following that fateful first annual meeting of the Board of Governors that Brown and NICAP formally parted ways. Brown's letter of resignation is shown on the following page.[33]

Brown's associates, including Rochefort and Carvalho, were gone in short order as well. As suggested previously, many researchers now believe Brown and company were banished due to problems that arose with NICAP financial accounting, and this is certainly supported by the chain of personnel shuffling. Their suspected ties to the CIA may or may not have been an issue in late 1956, but it is certainly implied by various sources. Coincidentally or otherwise, the forming of NICAP and its tumultuous beginning ran concurrently with FBI investigations of Nicholas de Rochefort, which, as we explored, took place from mid-1956 to at least January 1957, and, in all likelihood, until the year he died, 1964.

Board of Governors

Attention: Major Donald E. Keyhoe

Gentlemen:

In accordance with your request and in a spirit of cooperation with the new policies adopted at the executive session of the Board of Governors meeting of NICAP, held January 15, 1957, I tender my resignation, effective January 15, 1957, as Executive Vice Chairman and as Vice Chairman in Charge of Scientific Affairs.

It is my understanding that it is the Board's desire, for the time being, to streamline the organization by abolishing these offices and to create the office of Director—to be filled at present by Major Donald E. Keyhoe, USMC (Ret.).

I am informed that Major Keyhoe will implement the new policies as set forth by Chairman Fahmey and will take immediate steps to raise the necessary funds. I am also informed that certain economics can be effected without departing from NICAP's basic objectives.

I shall, of course, continue my interest in NICAP, especially in its scientific findings, and I shall be happy to serve whenever needed as Adviser on Scientific Affairs.

Very truly yours,

TTB:RH

T. TOWNSEND BROWN

Maj. Donald Keyhoe would later allude to unfulfilled promises of significant NICAP financial support.[34] In a July 1959 Director's Report to the Board of Governors, Keyhoe wrote that Brown resigned “with NICAP in the doldrums.” Keyhoe indicated NICAP was in debt at the time, but two donations of $5,000 each were promised, as well as an “assurance of $50,000 or more to guarantee operations.”

It is not clear how much debt the organization accrued in its opening months. Factoring inflation, those pledges totaled over half a million dollars. Keyhoe further stated the funding was withheld for reasons he attributed, correctly or otherwise, to “ridicule and pressure.”

There were clearly problems and turmoil in the upstart NICAP financial department. Our story of NICAP early finances demands a deeper look at Counsel Services, Incorporated. Its leadership and the circles it kept raise interesting implications, particularly considering the likelihood Rochefort and Carvalho rode in with them.

OPC & COUNSEL SERVICES

Efforts to learn more about Counsel Services and its President Mary Vaughan King led to the discovery of an assertion Col. Ulius Louis “Pete” Amoss was a client of the corporation. Col. Amoss was a career CIA officer credited with overseeing spy networks and whose lengthy service history included experience in psychological warfare. While I would not rely on any single casual report to conclude Amoss was necessarily a Counsel Services client, extenuating circumstances encouraged me to look further. For instance, Amoss reportedly worked with the CIA division, the Office of Policy Coordination, or OPC. You will recall the OPC was the reported assignment of future NICAP Board of Governors member and psychological warfare expert Col. Joseph Bryan III, according to such sources as E. Howard Hunt.

I located a special collection of correspondence for Col. Amoss kept at the University of Oregon. An administrator helpfully provided pdf copies of select folders of letters I requested. Two of the letters obtained do, in fact, strongly suggest Mary Vaughan King had professional and ongoing relationships with Col. Amoss and his wife, Mary Veronica Grogan. “Ron,” as the latter was known, appears to have exchanged letters from France and Turkey in 1951 with Vaughan King that are contained in the collection of correspondence.

Grogan served in the Armed Forces secret intelligence, as was the case with her husband. Both Grogan and Amoss were employed in the spy trade.

Additional documentation obtained strongly suggests Counsel Services acted as a CIA resource. Such documentation included newspaper clippings and material obtained from the CIA archives.

Further circumstances of interest were found in a 1971 letter from Townsend Brown to the NICAP director at the time, Stuart Nixon.[35] Brown suggested in the letter he had an existing relationship with a public relations firm (I confidently suspect to be Counsel Services) for several years prior to their 1956 collaboration on the incorporation and initial operation of NICAP. He indicated the firm was originally retained years prior due to Brown's antigravity-based Project Winterhaven for which he unsuccessfully attempted to obtain funding from the Department of Defense. We will explore the above and surrounding circumstances further in the following pages.

Let's start with the Office of Policy Coordination. The OPC operated from 1948 until 1952, at which time it was merged with the Office of Special Operations (OSO). The merge created the Directorate of Plans (DDP) and was credited with the solidification of the Clandestine Services of the Central Intelligence Agency.

According to a 1973 CIA Studies in Intelligence report (released in partially redacted form in 2006), the OPC genealogical tree had many branches, but its hardiest limb was the Covert Action Staff of the Clandestine Services. Many of the developments chronicled in OPC may seem to have ceased due to the fixed termination date of the Office. However, the study explains, it should be expected that Clandestine Services maintained continuity where the formal histories of OPC and OSO end. As a matter of fact, the Clandestine Services picked up the pace, the CIA document states.

An intriguing aspect of the OPC was its unique features as a component of the CIA. The Office was described as an anomaly in a 1976 Sen. Frank Church Committee report. This was because the personnel and budget were appropriated within the CIA, but the Director of Central Intelligence (DCI) did not call the shots, at least not for its first couple years. That was done by the Office's director, who was appointed by the Secretary of State. Policy guidance and decisions on the need for specific activities came from the State Department and Department of Defense.

The OPC was headed by Frank Wisner, a Mississippi native from a prominent family. He attended law school in Virginia, practiced in New York, and became an experienced intelligence officer. The growth and reach of the OPC under his command was considered exceptional.

During the inception of the OPC in 1948, then-DCI and future prominent NICAP Board member Adm. Roscoe Hillenkoetter concurred with the position of a State Department representative on matters of OPC direction. The two put forth that political warfare and additional activities conducted by the OPC should be considered tools of U.S. foreign policy and subject to direction by the State Department during peacetime.

The 1973 CIA report states the National Security Council (NSC) created the OPC and “gave it a loose charter to undertake the full range of covert activities incident to the conduct of secret political, psychological, and economic warfare together with preventative direct action (paramilitary activities).” The OPC organizational structure was later echoed in E. Howard

Hunt's book when he stated he served in the Office, and it consisted of three sections: Paramilitary Operations, Political and Psychological Warfare, and Economic Warfare.

The NSC specified the OPC "was to operate as independently of the other offices of CIA as efficiency would permit." That remained the case until late 1950, when Lt. Gen. Walter Bedell Smith replaced Hillenkoetter as DCI. Smith was successful in restructuring the OPC command pipeline to go through his office from the State and Defense Departments. This effectively made him Frank Wisner's boss and at the helm of the OPC.

In 1952, DCI Smith expressed concerns about the objectivity and effectiveness of Air Force UFO investigations. While Smith did not seem to suspect flying saucers were of extraterrestrial origin or even a particularly concerning threat, he wanted to know "what use could be made of the UFO phenomenon in connection with US psychological warfare efforts," according to the CIA.

The Church Committee intelligence report cited above asserts the OPC evolved into a vastly different entity than initially envisioned. The report states the Office achieved an institutional independence that was unimaginable at the time of inception. The numbers alone are staggering.

In 1949 the OPC had a total of 302 personnel. By 1952 it had 2,812 with an additional 3,142 overseas contract personnel. The 1949 OPC budget was $4.7 million. Just three years later, in 1952, it was $82 million. By the time of its merge with the Office of Special Operations, OPC activities included worldwide covert missions conducted out of some 47 overseas stations.

The previously cited 1973 CIA intelligence study and its assertion the Clandestine Services stepped up the pace thereafter could certainly be interpreted as significant, if not outright mind boggling. The study references a CIA-composed history of the OPC made up of five volumes, consisting of 722 pages plus three appendices and eleven attachments (To the best of my knowledge, the five-volume OPC history has not yet been released, although a partially redacted version of its introduction is contained in the referenced 1973 CIA Studies in Intelligence).

The somewhat rogue, snowballing OPC division of intelligence officers seems aptly represented by the likes of Col. Ulius Louis "Pete" Amoss (1895-1961). While the colonel was indeed a career intelligence officer, the description often falls short of expressing deeper context. For instance, Amoss was credited with serving as Director of the Balkan Desk for information, C.O.I. (Coordinator of Information), while in the Armed Forces; Director of the OSS (CIA Office of Strategic Services) Near Eastern Desk, intelligence; Deputy Directory, OSS, for sabotage, intelligence, psychological and guerrilla warfare; Commanding Officer, Experimental Detachment G-3 UASFIME; and Deputy Chief of Staff, U.S. Ninth Air Force. He even married a fellow spy.

Letters obtained from the University of Oregon collection show Amoss was well connected and entrepreneurial. He often provided his contacts with money-motivated investment tips. Interestingly enough, he invented Grecian Formula, a hair coloring product for men. Perhaps hanging around CIA labs had its fringe benefits.

Amoss outwardly had a wide range of financial interests and his primary career objectives might be considered difficult to discern. Truth be told, perhaps he had a number of agendas at different times and as situations dictated.

Amoss was probably best known among his peers for his outside the box stances on warfare and the CIA. He wrote the original essay on Leaderless Resistance, a strategy that does not rely on vertical, hierarchical command chains, but effectiveness through the shared vision and beliefs of an inspired population. I wouldn't think that went over real well at Langley.

Amoss asserted that leaders are not needed, only leading ideas. He further asserted that underground, chain of command-oriented cells, as typically established by the Agency, were often infiltrated by enemies. He argued, in effect, all the cloak and dagger stuff had only questionable returns and got people killed.

This is not to suggest, however, that Col. Amoss did not partake in theater. He most certainly did. What's more, being the professional intelligence officer he was makes it difficult to identify his intentions with much degree of confidence. Similar could be said about a lot of people in these circles.

After the colonel's purported retirement he resided in Gibson Island, Maryland, and launched the International Services of Information Foundation, or ISI. The ISI distributed a variety of bulletins and letters to supporters. Amoss wrote the publications and his wife served as editor. Annual subscriptions went for 25 bucks apiece and at one point the couple claimed to have a thousand subscribers. That would have been pulling in well over 200 grand a year on that venture alone by today's value.

ISI newsletters contained what was portrayed as breaking international intelligence news. Some of the stories proved credible and others did not. Amoss threw more gas on the CIA fire by frequently suggesting intelligence collection did not have to be as secretive as the establishment made it. He maintained the public is more confident in intelligence services that openly report their activities and knowledge of enemies, at least to a reasonable extent.

Officials scoffed, suggesting the very nature of intelligence work is grounded in secrecy.

ISI newsletters caught the eye of, or at least potentially annoyed, the Agency with implications of having sources in sensitive places. Amoss, for instance, once reported a story he ran was obtained after it was overheard in the halls of the Kremlin. From an ISI newsletter archived at the CIA:

THE PLAN IS NICELY ROUNDED OUT by the carefully-prepared anti-colonialist offensive carried on under an Afro-Asian banner, whose main strategic aim is the liquidation of U.S. bases in Asia and Africa.

IN THE HALLS OF THE KREMLIN

From: Moscow (Delayed in Transit)

OVERHEARD IN THE HALLS OF THE KREMLIN: a high Soviet Party official remarked to a delegate to the Party Congress that Mr. Dulles' trips to Great Britain, Paris and Bonn "prove that the attitude of the Western Powers on the German question is unrealistic and cannot produce the compromise the West hopes for".

Further complicating the situation was the fact the CIA knew Amoss was indeed well connected if he wanted to take advantage of his intelligence experience. We can only wonder how much the public rivalry between Amoss and the CIA was performative. Whatever the case, the show apparently sold newsletters and garnered attention. In 1953 the Washington Post carried a lengthy four-part series on what was then known publicly of the career of Col. Amoss and the ISI.

According to the 1953 Washington Post series, which is archived on the CIA website, Amoss received substantial funding from a wealthy philanthropist, Clendenin Ryan, who had an interest in national security issues. He contributed $50,000 to Amoss's cause in one donation alone in 1953. Factoring inflation, that's about $490,000. We can reasonably suspect Mary Vaughan King and Counsel Services aimed to play some part in such DC funding circles.

Another beneficiary of Clendenin Ryan's financial generosity was Desmond FitzGerald, a New York attorney-turned-CIA man, whose story left a fascinating footprint in events surrounding NICAP organizers. Little was known publicly about FitzGerald's role with the Agency until after his untimely death in 1967 at the age of 57. He was stricken with a heart attack while playing tennis at one of his homes in Virginia. He was considered one of the half dozen most influential men in government, in spite of the lack of public information about his specific activities at the time. Upon his death, Agency leaders released statements describing FitzGerald's dedicated service.

"Dez" FitzGerald left a partnership with a New York law firm in 1951 to become a full time CIA officer. He is yet another alumni of the Office of Policy Coordination and had substantial responsibilities in the Agency, rising to the position of Deputy Director of Plans. By 1966 FitzGerald was identified as the man in charge of international espionage operations and succeeded Richard Helms in directing clandestine operations. It should be noted that FitzGerald's leadership role in Plans put him in a position to direct the activities of many of his fellow members of the former Office of Policy Coordination.

Back in 1949, before FitzGerald left the New York law firm, he served as chairman of a reform group which sought unsuccessfully to defeat the incumbent NYC mayor's reelection bid. FitzGerald's group was funded by Clendenin Ryan, who apparently became quite fond of the work of Col. Amoss. Fascinatingly, the title of FitzGerald's New York reform group was The Committee of Five Million.

Four years later in 1953, as previously explored, The Committee of One Million was spearheaded by future NICAP organizer Nicholas de Rochefort. You will recall records reviewed by the FBI, and documented to be on file at the State Department, resulted in FBI reports indicating the psychological warfare expert and then-foreign citizen was employed at the time by the U.S. government. It is curious indeed that shortly after Dez FitzGerald was recruited into the Office of Policy Coordination and as he apparently worked his way up the CIA chain of command, Rochefort was credited with masterminding what became the most prominent group in the wealthy China lobby, which practically shared the same name as FitzGerald's former group.

In light of such circumstances, I think it is reasonable to strongly suspect writer and researcher Stanley Bachrack was correct Mr. Rochefort was affiliated with the CIA. Rochefort was quite likely acting on behalf of the Agency when he proposed forming The Committee of One Million and its activities.

Three years after Rochefort's work in the China lobby, in 1956, he was closely involved in organizing NICAP. He seems to likely have been affiliated with NICAP incorporators Mary Vaughan King, Thomas O'Keefe, and their firm, Counsel Services.

We can discern from documents reviewed thus far that Counsel Services was overtly interested in fundraising and financial management. This is obviously also the case with the CIA circles of Dez FitzGerald and Ulius Amoss.

I obtained two letters from the University of Oregon special collection of Amoss papers. They were written by Mary Veronica “Ron” Grogan, intelligence professional, ISI newsletter editor, and wife of Col. Amoss.[36] The two letters contain greetings to “Mary.” Based on a report that Amoss was a customer of Counsel Services, combined with the fact Vaughan King and Amoss each operated out of the Baltimore area, and factoring the content of the two letters, I strongly suspect they were written from Grogan to Vaughan King.

The letters casually describe general events experienced by Grogan and Amoss over a two-week period during a trip to Paris and Turkey in 1951. The opening line of the first letter from Grogan states, “I thought I would write you a line that has nothing to do with ISI.” Please note, as indicated in the image below of the letter, that a “King” annotation was added to the greeting. Moreover, the folder name containing the letter is “King,” thus my reason for requesting the folder from the University of Oregon in the first place.

I found it intriguing the two letters survived all the miles and years to be archived in the collection. I also found it interesting, whatever it may or may not ultimately indicate, that in 1951 Ron Grogan sat at a typewriter in Paris, apparently explaining to Mary Vaughan King that she would not be discussing ISI. In doing so, she effectively confirmed for me, 70 years later, that ISI may well have been a common topic of their communications and primary aspect of their relationship. It indeed appeared likely ISI was affiliated with Counsel Services, as apparently was the Townsend Brown Family Foundation and later NICAP.

Leo H. McCormick was credited with founding Counsel Services. He was an extremely politically and civically active insurance executive.

Let's momentarily direct our attention to an office called the Economic Cooperation Administration (ECA). It was a government agency that set up headquarters on Connecticut Avenue in Washington, as would the Townsend Brown Family Foundation and NICAP.

A March 1949 letter shown below from DCI Hillenkoetter to the administrator of the ECA clearly establishes the CIA obtained intelligence from the organization. What's more, Hillenkoetter advised the ECA, “In order that the most complete economic intelligence information may be regularly received by this Agency, it is requested that the Central Intelligence Agency be placed on the routing list for all cables, memoranda and reports of all classifications, including TOP SECRET, which are received in the Economic Cooperation Administration.”

“I wish to take this opportunity to thank you for the cooperation you have given in the past,” Hillenkoetter added.

Dear Mr. Hoffman:

The Central Intelligence Agency has a continuing need for current economic intelligence information, a great and valuable part of which it is believed, can be satisfied by such pertinent information as becomes available through the regular activities of the Economic Cooperation Administration.

Information of the above nature is presently being furnished this Agency by your Administration, but to date has been confined to classification of SECRET and lower. In order that the most complete economic intelligence information may be regularly received by this Agency, it is requested that the Central Intelligence Agency be placed on the routing lists for all cables, memoranda and reports of all classifications, including TOP SECRET, which are received in the Economic Cooperation Administration. It is not intended that this request be applicable to data purely administrative in nature.

I wish to take this opportunity to thank you for the cooperation you have given in the past, and I will be most happy to hear from you personally at any time on matters in which you are particularly interested.

Sincerely yours,

Just two months later, in March 1949, The Evening Sun reported Counsel Services was operating under ECA auspices. This fascinatingly involved a mission to China, which would become Nicholas de Rochefort's area of interest.

“Three members of a Baltimore firm are en route by air to China where they will serve temporarily with the Joint Commission of Rural Reconstruction, under ECA auspices,” the Sun reported.

“They are L.G. Shreve, president of Counsel Services, Inc., and Arthur Goodfriend and Henri M. Pascal. They will be joined later by Dr. Gerald F. Winfield, director of United Services to China.

“According to Mrs. Mary Vaughan King, executive vice president of the firm, the men are on special temporary assignment.”

The article continued, “Shreve initiated the project last December when he was in China with headquarters in Canton. A veteran public relations man, he served with the Army in the China theater during the war as information and education officer.

“Goodfriend, a world traveler and lecturer, of New York, and Pascal, of Los Angeles, who has traveled extensively in China,” the Sun concluded, “are affiliated with Counsel Services especially for this assignment.”

A July 1950 article, Baltimore Firm Assists ECA, further established collaborations between the future NICAP incorporators and the CIA asset. “Specialists of Counsel Services are now under contract to the Economic Cooperation Administration in connection with work in Europe after having worked on the ECA's audio-visual education operations in China,” the Sun reported.

In 1956, Mary Vaughan King acted as an incorporator for NICAP. She presented the organization with an extensive and costly marketing strategy. Given the currently available information, I propose it is a distinct possibility, if not likelihood, that whether or not the CIA effectively destroyed NICAP as later alleged, its assets in 1956 were directly involved in launching the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena.

Let's fast forward to September 1971. Stuart Nixon is now the Executive Director of NICAP. He wrote Townsend Brown and asked him to submit an article about the beginning of NICAP. He framed the request in the context of preparing a 15-year anniversary edition of the NICAP newsletter. Nixon urged Brown to be as detailed as possible about how the organization was founded and his role in those events.[38] Brown did not respond.

Nixon wrote him again over a month later and repeated his desire to learn about NICAP beginnings. In this letter Nixon numbered and posed eight specific questions. “How did it all begin?”, “Who had the original idea?”, “Who were some of the people involved?”, “Were there any interesting experiences during the first few months of operation?”, and similar inquiries.

This time Brown responded with a three-page letter. He claimed in an October 1971 response that he had not yet replied because he had been out of town. He suggested it was upon returning home he found the two letters from Nixon.

"Let me say at the outset," Brown wrote, "that my files and records for those early years are in storage and not now available to me, so that I cannot give you detailed information as to names and dates. I simply do not remember some of the names of the persons involved."

Brown went on to explain Clara John's saucer club helped with early interest, and stated he personally chose the name of NICAP. He claimed he asked Maj. Keyhoe to take his place running NICAP after continued operations seemed assured, a description of events that are doubtful and unsupported by the material we have reviewed. Brown's version of his apparent requested departure may not be particularly surprising, however, given its unflattering nature to him.

It should be reiterated at this point that Brown worked for a few years prior to NICAP on his Project Winterhaven, starting as early as 1951. The ambitious - arguably wildly so - undertaking of anti-gravity experiments was described in a proposal he hoped to get funded by the Department of Defense. The large scale project suggested the use of multiple collaborators. As mentioned earlier, ongoing experiments involved small flying saucer-like discs.

For several years prior to NICAP's incorporation, Brown wrote further to Nixon, the Townsend Brown Foundation maintained an office on Connecticut Avenue and was engaged in preparing and submitting Project Winterhaven to the Defense Department. The program was intended to be secured under a secret classification but was never approved by the Department.

"Several radio stations gave [NICAP] some initial publicity, principally a station in Baltimore," Brown went on to explain.

"The Townsend Brown Foundation had retained a public relations firm from Baltimore in connection with Project Winterhaven and that firm, it seems, was well known to the Baltimore broadcasters and this accounted for carrying this news item on the Baltimore station.

"The Foundation also retained an attorney (whose name I do not remember) in the same building where our offices were located, to file the incorporation papers for NICAP. The three incorporators were: 1) the attorney 2) the woman in charge of the Baltimore public relations firm (whose name I do not remember) and 3) myself."

This clearly suggests Townsend Brown had an ongoing relationship with Counsel Services prior to the forming of NICAP. He indicated the firm was hired by the Brown Foundation to work on Winterhaven.

We might wonder about the status of the arrangement at the point Counsel Services assisted with NICAP formation and presented the upstart organization with a substantial service contract. A number of questions arise, such as why Brown ever "retained" Counsel Services "in connection with Project Winterhaven." Whatever the answers to the implied questions might prove to be, the circumstances are surely entangled with the rumors of misappropriation of funds.

Brown's statement his foundation retained an attorney to file incorporation papers for NICAP is further evidence of blurred boundaries between projects and expense reports. An attorney on Connecticut Avenue appears to have indeed assisted with some various filing for NICAP, as indicated in the image below. The attorney does not, however, appear as an incorporator on the documents we reviewed and contradicts Brown's representation of the situation to Stuart Nixon.[39]

It certainly appears Brown's fellow incorporators were, in fact, Thomas O'Keefe and Mary Vaughan King, each described as officers of Counsel Services in the 1956 proposed contract we reviewed. Brown rather notably omitted mention by name of O'Keefe, Vaughan King, and Counsel Services in his letter to Nixon. He failed, mistakenly or otherwise, to so much as describe the existence of Mr. O'Keefe.

The employment resume of Mr. O'Keefe interestingly indicates he worked abroad for the Commerce Department during the formative years of the Office of Policy Coordination, circa 1948. The employment history gives no indication O'Keefe was an attorney, as we might suspect from Brown's description of the incorporators.[40]

A search of documents published at the CIA online reading room, using the term, “1025 Connecticut”, reveals a reference to the office of attorney Samuel C. Borzilleri. I strongly suspect this is the person referenced in the previously explored November 6 NICAP meeting notes, in which it was suggested to check with him about a code of regulations. An image located that was archived on the CIA website:

CIA document search results included a September 1955 letter from Attorney Borzilleri to the CIA Office of the General Counsel. The attorney advised the CIA of his legal interpretations on matters pertaining to rights and royalties of the published book, The Red Interpreter. His specific relationship with the Agency is not clear.

Townsend Brown's representation of events to Nixon were problematic. His 1971 narrative to Nixon has obvious discrepancies. For whatever reasons, he failed to identify almost anyone involved, while describing some of their roles incorrectly. The nature of Brown's description of his existing relationship with Counsel Services at the time he and the firm collaborated to incorporate NICAP could be considered intriguing, given what we can gather of extenuating circumstances.

Col. Amoss has at least one more interesting indirect link to our unfolding story. In 1952, the same year the CIA asserts DCI Smith expressed concerns about Air Force abilities to effectively investigate UFOs and took an interest in the use of flying saucers in the psychological warfare effort, Amoss gave a heads up to the USAF about a UFO report. It turned out to be a wild goose chase, has some intriguing side plots, and wound up in Project Blue Book. The image below is from page one of an eleven-page OSI file.

SYNOPSIS

Investigation requested by Hq. OSI predicated on information received from Air Technical Intelligence Center, Wright Patterson AFB that DONALD STEWART and (FNU) TYLER had observed unconventional type aircraft on 29 March 1952 in the vicinity of Baltimore, Maryland. Information relayed to Air Technical Intelligence Center, Wright Patterson AFB by ULIUS LOUIS AMOSS who received it from LOU CORBIN, a news commentator, employed by station WFBR, Baltimore, Md. CORBIN interviewed, furnished information that DONALD STEWART, 224 Warren Avenue and GEORGE TYLER III, 112 East Montgomery St., Baltimore, Md., had been

The image indicates Col. Amoss alerted the Air Technical Intelligence Center at Wright Patterson AFB he got wind of a UFO sighting. The subsequent report documents Amoss claimed to investigate the sighting, at least to some extent. Wright Patterson passed the info to the Air Force Office of Special Investigations and the chase was on.

The report states Amoss claimed to have obtained the UFO story from a news commentator at a Baltimore radio station. The circumstances could easily be interpreted to overlap with Townsend Brown's later description to Stuart Nixon of the public relations firm he retained, almost certainly Counsel Services, being “well known” to broadcasters at a Baltimore radio station.

OSI interviewed the radio commentator, Louis E. Corbin, who claimed he heard the UFO story from a reporter he knew but did not name. Corbin told OSI he intended for some time to do a UFO documentary, so he was interested in the report. Corbin further claimed he had not released any of the information publicly and would not do so until authorities completed their investigation. He advised OSI, however, he was acquainted with the editor of a civilian intelligence bulletin, Amoss, and what would be his International Services of Information Foundation, and had informed Amoss of the story.

Fascinatingly, the OSI Special Agent subsequently documented Amoss described Corbin as a reserve CIC officer (The Army Counter Intelligence Corps was a Cold War era intelligence agency made up of highly trained officers and later absorbed into the Army Intelligence Corps in 1961). When apparently asked about it, Corbin denied to OSI he was a CIC officer. He did state, however, he was a former intelligence officer under Gen. George Patton and that he held an inactive reserve commission as a lieutenant colonel.

Another intriguing discrepancy was Amoss claimed Corbin advised him of a specific father and son pair of witnesses, George and John Mason, that Amoss said he was unable to locate. Amoss added their address of Yacht Club Road, Riviera Beach, Maryland, did not check out either. Corbin, when directly asked about the father and son by OSI, claimed he was not familiar with the names. It was never conclusively resolved how the names even got in the story.

Neither was it entirely clear why Amoss ever took up the investigation at all, much less alerted the Air Force to the third hand tale. Perhaps he was interested in reporting it in his ISI publication. Maybe he was concerned about adversarial intelligence operations, or perhaps he was acting in an official capacity for unknown reasons. Curiously, the chain of events preceded the dramatic and much discussed July 1952 Washington, D.C., UFO reports by just a few weeks.

The work of James Carrion seems to deserve mention in this context. In his books Anachronism and The Roswell Deception, Carrion argues mid 20th century UFO tales may have been employed as tools to help break codes used by adversaries. He focuses on the 1946-1947 timeframe.

The basic premise involves how an American intelligence agency might manufacture a UFO story through the use of resources such as its officers and media contacts. In the ensuing days, intercepted messages would necessarily contain details of the report, such as location, names of witnesses, and date, particularly if the report carried implications to national security. Such might of course be the case, for instance, with alleged wreckage found in Roswell and announced through an official statement released by military officers. The near certainty such a story would be included in coded messages sent by adversaries would increase the opportunities of deciphering the codes, given the keywords involved.

Given such strategies, it might be considered intriguing the names and address of the apparently nonexistent father and son somehow found their ways into the 1952 Amoss-Corbin UFO story that came to be archived in Blue Book. While I am admittedly speculating, it is not difficult to envision such a code-breaking scenario, or an occurrence in which the names were inserted in the story to see if and where they surfaced, serving as a tool to identify leaks and potential spies. An analogy might be considered tossing a dye pack in a sinkhole and seeing where the dye turns up.

In the event you're wondering, the gist of the Amoss-Corbin UFO story was two Baltimore area young men claimed to see a disc-like flying object. An OSI Special Agent located the two, and during the course of his investigation became increasingly skeptical for several well-defined reasons. Upon follow-up OSI questioning, one of the purported witnesses admitted he had seen no such craft. He said he was persuaded by the other witness to make the fraudulent claim. He added he agreed because he at first believed the claim of his acquaintance, that the man had seen a UFO earlier that day. He said the acquaintance requested he fabricate his part of the story out of fear otherwise no one would believe the sighting happened. Eventually, the confessor came to doubt the acquaintance's tale. The acquaintance nonetheless stuck to his story that they both observed a flying saucer.

I recommend giving the OSI report a read, as it systematically documents statements of witnesses and people of interest, offering an anatomy of a UFO investigation and unraveling story. It is interesting from several perspectives, the presence of Col. Amoss most certainly being among them. As previously stated, it is difficult at times to feel much confidence in discerning the intentions of professional intelligence personnel. I suspect the assigned OSI Special Agent could relate.

We may have been left a clue about intelligence officers and such UFO reports within a 1954 CIA cable, a transcript of which is on file at the Office of the Historian. The message documents CIA assets in Guatemala were instructed to consider fabricating a flying saucer story to serve as a public distraction.

“If possible,” the transcript reads, “fabricate big human interest story, like flying saucers, birth sextuplets in remote area to take play away.”

The distraction was intended to divert mounting public awareness of Agency responsibility for a successfully executed coup. The CIA did, in fact, sponsor the uprising and of course preferred the Guatemalan news cycle to focus on something other than its manipulation of the country's political affairs.

The covertly backed CIA coup brought an end to the Guatemalan Revolution, 1944-1954. A key CIA asset and aspect of the overthrow was the United Fruit Company, headquartered in New Orleans. In 1950 the United Fruit

Company had a reported profit of $65 million, a sum two times greater than the annual revenue of the entire Guatemalan government.

We find potentially interesting correlations in the employment resume of Thomas O'Keefe, a NICAP incorporator, its first treasurer, and an apparent Counsel Services senior officer.[41] It states he previously worked as Assistant to Executive Vice Chairman in the Office of the Secretary of Defense. His employment prior to incorporating NICAP and spending a month as its treasurer included serving as a Consultant on Trade and Finance with the State Department, a career path strikingly, and coincidentally or otherwise, similar to that of Nicholas de Rochefort.

The resume states that 1948-1951 O'Keefe was Special Assistant to the Secretary of Commerce, which included, “Assisting other American Republics in their economic, industrial and agricultural development.” Guatemala is among countries listed as a “previous assignment” where he “spent considerable time.”

O'Keefe also listed his relatively latest previous positions as a member of the Selection Board for Foreign Service Officers with the Department of State, an assignment we can reasonably assume would necessarily place him in the company of spies and intelligence operatives. I frankly found it semi-amusing that O'Keefe, a man formerly employed on a board at least ostensibly tasked with selecting State Department personnel for foreign assignments, was the inaugural NICAP treasurer and designated in the Counsel Services contract as empowered to hire consultants to work as NICAP regional managers. I strongly suspect Nicholas de Rochefort, and likely Bernard Carvalho, were appointed to NICAP positions in such manners.

A search of government records suggests O'Keefe was indeed employed at the State Department, as indicated on his resume. In 1947 he was a Deputy Director in Washington.

When declassified, the 1954 CIA cable inspired a 2003 New York Times piece. The article bore the curious title, Word for Word/Coup Control; The C.I.A.'s Cover Has Been Blown? Just Make Up Something About U.F.O.'s.

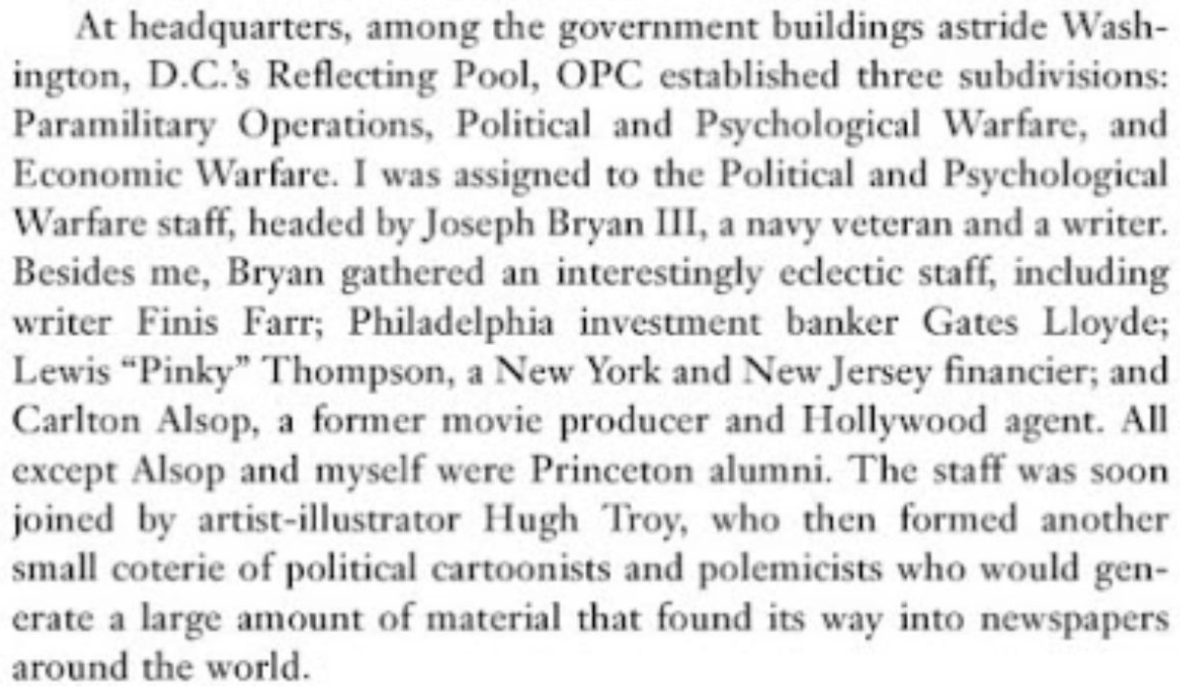
The story about the CIA cable is fairly well known among those of us interested in, as Mark Pilkington and company put it, the “Mirage Men” aspect of ufology. Less discussed in UFO circles, however, are the people credited with the 1954 operation and their indirect connections to the genre.

The National Archives reports notable individuals involved in the coup operation, titled PBSUCCESS, included former DCI Walter Bedell Smith and E. Howard Hunt. The State Department website has a 1952-1954 list of foreign relations personnel pertaining to Guatemala. Making the list are Smith, Hunt, and Frank Wisner, who you will recall ran the Office of Policy Coordination. By this time he was the Deputy Director of Plans. The State Department list additionally includes pseudonyms used by each of the three. E. Howard Hunt, aka Walter C. Twicker, is listed as a CIA case officer and Chief of the Propaganda Branch. There are also pseudonyms listed whose corresponding identities have not yet been publicly disclosed.

It doesn't seem like much of a stretch to me to suppose the Chief of the Propaganda Branch would be in the loop on a cable consisting of suggestions to assets as to how to manipulate public attention by way of a fantastic story about flying saucers or sextuplets. It doesn't seem like much of a stretch it could have been his idea either. Those possibilities are all the more interesting when we consider his apparent history in the OPC.

Hunt worked for the CIA from approximately 1949 to 1970, or at least that's what the record shows and is the consensus among historians. He would later explain in his book, American Spy: My Secret History in the CIA, Watergate and Beyond, that before PBSUCCESS in Guatemala he was assigned to the OPC. It was there that he worked on the Political and Psychological Warfare staff for Joseph Bryan III, who became an ongoing staple of the NICAP Board of Governors.

From Hunt's book:



At headquarters, among the government buildings astride Washington, D.C.'s Reflecting Pool, OPC established three subdivisions: Paramilitary Operations, Political and Psychological Warfare, and Economic Warfare. I was assigned to the Political and Psychological Warfare staff, headed by Joseph Bryan III, a navy veteran and a writer. Besides me, Bryan gathered an interestingly eclectic staff, including writer Finis Farr; Philadelphia investment banker Gates Lloyde; Lewis "Pinky" Thompson, a New York and New Jersey financier; and Carlton Alsop, a former movie producer and Hollywood agent. All except Alsop and myself were Princeton alumni. The staff was soon joined by artist-illustrator Hugh Troy, who then formed another small coterie of political cartoonists and polemicists who would generate a large amount of material that found its way into newspapers around the world.

I am suggesting it is entirely possible CIA officers masterminded the incorporation of NICAP, or at least took significant interest in the developing situation. Perhaps Townsend Brown was utilized. Nicholas de Rochefort almost certainly was. The game plan for the organization may have been designed in a similar manner as was the case when Rochefort acted as lead man for The Committee of One Million. I interpret that if Counsel Services was a CIA resource, then it becomes all the more likely the Agency was involved in the development of NICAP, for what might be any number of reasons. I suspect none of those reasons had anything to do with extraterrestrial visitors.

It seems rather significant NICAP was incorporated by T. Townsend Brown, a man long in search of DOD funding who had peculiar ties to both the UFO and intelligence communities; Mary Vaughan King, who ran a public relations and fundraising service with apparent relationships with Amoss, Rochefort, and Carvalho; and Thomas O'Keefe, who was seemingly an officer of Vaughan King's company and a former State Department man that listed the selection of personnel for foreign assignments among his previous responsibilities. I doubt this crew's interest in saucer hunting.

You will recall Thomas O'Keefe held the position as NICAP treasurer only briefly. His successor, Duncan Cameron Campbell, described himself as a longtime employee of the Federal Housing Administration in Washington, D.C.[42]

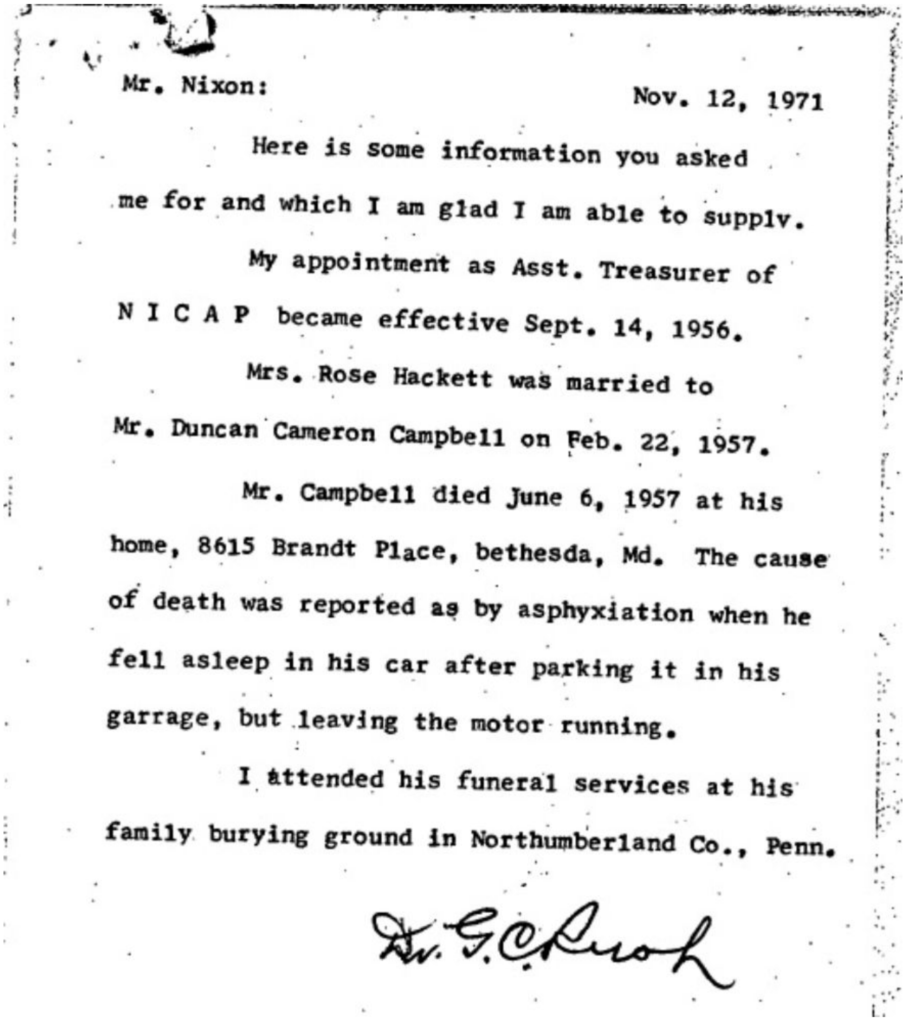
Mr. Campbell quickly served notice to resign his turn at the position in December 1956, making two treasurers in about as many months. He apparently formally vacated the position by January of 1957. Shortly thereafter he married NICAP Office Manager Rose Hackett in February.

He seems to have tragically died in June that same year at his home in Bethesda, Maryland. The manner of death was similar to how Morris Jessup would die in 1959 in Miami: asphyxiation in a car.

Years later in 1971, then-director Stuart Nixon apparently inquired to Dr. Garrett C. Rush about early NICAP happenings. Nixon's inquiry seems to have happened in the same general timeframe as when he was asking Townsend Brown about NICAP origins.

Perhaps Nixon was painstakingly preparing an anniversary edition of the newsletter as he wrote to Brown. Perhaps he personally wanted to know more about what had been going on in the organization he was now directing. Maybe he had some pretty good ideas what had been going on and at least wanted to know what people would say when he asked them. Maybe a bit of all of that.

The letter from Dr. Rush to Nixon:[43]



Mr. Nixon: Nov. 12, 1971

Here is some information you asked me for and which I am glad I am able to supplv.

My appointment as Asst. Treasurer of NICAP became effective Sept. 14, 1956.

Mrs. Rose Hackett was married to Mr. Duncan Cameron Campbell on Feb. 22, 1957.

Mr. Campbell died June 6, 1957 at his home, 8615 Brandt Place, bethesda, Md. The cause of death was reported as by asphyxiation when he fell asleep in his car after parking it in his garrage, but leaving the motor running.

I attended his funeral services at his family burying ground in Northumberland Co., Penn.

Dr. G.C.

Mrs. Rose Hackett Campbell would stay on with NICAP after the death of her husband and work with Maj. Keyhoe and Richard Hall. According to Hall, she was dismissed in late 1958 or early 1959, a circumstance he attributed to her devotion to the contactee movement. Keyhoe and Hall viewed themselves much more as intellectuals and men of science, perspectives they hoped the public would adopt about NICAP.

Before we continue our unfolding story, there are two more suicides to note. Wealthy philanthropist Clendenin Ryan, credited with using his fortune to fund turbulent political crusades, shot himself on September 12, 1957. The Baltimore millionaire and angel donor of Col. Amoss, Dez FitzGerald, and the CIA was 52 years old.

The same fate befell the former head of the Office of Policy Coordination, Frank Wisner. The man who recruited key personnel and ran the whole damn outfit would go on to shoot himself in the head with a shotgun at his Maryland farm in 1965. The New York Times reported Wisner had been ill for some time and shot himself in an upstairs room of his home about an hour after arriving there from Washington. His wife was downstairs when she heard the fatal shot. Frank Wisner was 56 years old when he died.

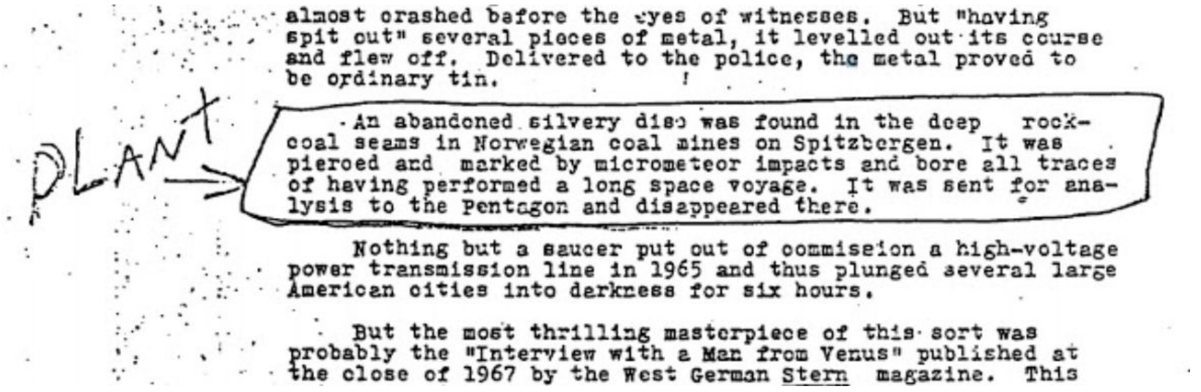
CI, Not ET

The 1954 CIA cable alluding to the use of the topic of flying saucers as an intelligence tool for deception in Guatemala opens a big can of worms. Entire books have been written on such matters, competently documenting decades of intelligence community interest in alleged contactees, UFO writers, and others who wade into saucer waters. A close and sober review suggests official interest is typically much more about ulterior motives and counterintelligence than extraterrestrials. Let's take a look at just a few of the many instances with potential correlations to the NICAP timeline.

As one tale goes, a flying saucer allegedly crashed in 1952 on the Norwegian island of Spitsbergen and was obtained by the U.S. government. The story bounced around for decades. The saucer, if it ever even existed, was suggested at different times to originate from Russia or outer space, among other possibilities. The case was also said to be both a meaningless hoax and matter of extreme importance, depending on who you asked and when you asked them.

In 1968 a Russian science editor wrote an article critical of sensational UFO tales. He devoted a paragraph to the Spitsbergen case. Shortly after publication, a copy of the article was sent by airgram from the American ambassador in Moscow to the State Department. Quite interestingly, the airgram, now archived by the National Security Agency, carries the annotation "plant" beside the circled paragraph pertaining to the alleged Spitsbergen crash:



almost crashed before the eyes of witnesses. But "having spit out" several pieces of metal, it levelled out its course and flew off. Delivered to the police, the metal proved to be ordinary tin.

PLANT

An abandoned silvery disc was found in the deep rock-coal seams in Norwegian coal mines on Spitzbergen. It was pierced and marked by micrometeor impacts and bore all traces of having performed a long space voyage. It was sent for analysis to the Pentagon and disappeared there.

Nothing but a saucer put out of commission a high-voltage power transmission line in 1965 and thus plunged several large American cities into darkness for six hours.

But the most thrilling masterpiece of this sort was probably the "Interview with a Man from Venus" published at the close of 1967 by the West German Stern magazine. This

About the time DCI Smith was inquiring how the UFO phenomenon could be used to improve psychological warfare efforts (1952), a CIA-sponsored scientific advisory panel secretly recommended UFO organizations "should be watched" (1953). The Robertson Panel, as it became known, informed the Agency:

"The Panel took cognizance of the existence of such groups as the 'Civilian Flying Saucer Investigators' (Los Angeles) and the 'Aerial Phenomena Research Organization [sic] (Wisconsin). It was believed that such organizations should be watched because of their potentially great influence on mass thinking if widespread sightings should occur. The apparent irresponsibility and the possible use of such groups for subversive purposes should be kept in mind."

In 1957, a member of the Aerial Phenomena Research Organization (APRO) was indeed reportedly visited by intelligence personnel. The officers expressed a most curious stance on flying saucers and even seemed to circle back to the Spitsbergen case, as explored in Mirage Men by Mark Pilkington.

Dr. Olavo Fontes of Brazil took an interest in UFO investigation and joined APRO. He read a September 1957 newspaper column describing material allegedly retrieved from a UFO. Strikingly similar to the dubious 1947 Maury Island case in the United States, a witness in Brazil claimed to have seen a "flying disc" while fishing and to have retrieved associated metallic material from the water.

Fontes apparently found the circumstances of interest and arranged to have the material tested at Brazil's National Department of Mineral Production. Samples of the debris were also sent to the USAF through the American embassy.

Nothing significant came of the tests. The samples reportedly proved to be mostly magnesium, but the case brought Dr. Fontes significant public attention (Lucky him, right?).

In early 1958, Fontes met Antonio Villas Boas, a Brazilian farmer with a dramatic story of otherworldly beings who flew into his crop field about three months earlier. The Villas Boas case is a whole 'nother head scratcher with far reaching implications.

At any rate, shortly after making the acquaintance of Villas Boas, and maybe even because of it, Dr. Fontes was visited by two intelligence officers from the Brazilian Naval Ministry. They claimed to want to discuss the purported saucer debris.

The officers proceeded to warn Fontes to stay out of matters that did not concern him. They reportedly went as far as to assert that global governments were aware of the extraterrestrial presence, and, what's more, wanted to keep it quiet. Some of the most sensitive information, they added, could not even be shared with the Brazilian president. How trusting of them to confide in Fontes!

Retrieval of crashed saucers was reportedly discussed, including the mention of one from Scandinavia. Pilkington considered the likelihood the reference pertained to the Spitsbergen disinformation story. Pilkington also contemplated the possibility the intelligence officers intended for Fontes to share their statements with his APRO associates and perpetuate the tales. I agree those issues are among the intriguing aspects of the Dr. Olavo Fontes saga, as is the fact it took place during the formative years of NICAP.

The Robertson Panel carries ties to our trail of NICAP and the CIA. The Agency-sponsored Panel met approximately January 14-18, 1953, and was briefed on UFOs. It was made up of five scientists, including chairman and physicist Dr. Howard P. Robertson.

The group collectively concluded the evidence examined showed no indication UFOs were a direct threat to national security.[44] The Panel advised, however, that reporting UFOs and wildly speculating about them was problematic. The threat arose in the form of “clogging of channels of communication by irrelevant reports,” the related false alarms, and the resulting natural tendency to lower defenses. The Panel further warned of a “cultivation of a morbid national psychology in which skillful hostile propaganda could induce hysterical behavior and harmful distrust of duly constituted authority.”

The Panel was not wrong, yet it bears emphasizing the Agency did not overlook the opportunity for the offensive use of saucer-related skillful hostile propaganda itself, as already noted. Neither does it escape this writer's appreciation for irony that the CIA's Col. Amoss was among those clogging communication channels with irrelevant reports.

Those interviewed by the Robertson Panel included Capt. Edward J. Ruppelt, inaugural director of Project Blue Book, a 1952-1970 Air Force official UFO study, at least outwardly. Ruppelt published a book in 1956 that first alerted UFO investigators to the existence of the Robertson Panel. The CIA concealed its sponsorship, eventually preparing a “sanitized” version of the resulting report which was subsequently released through the Air Force. All mention of the CIA and psychological warfare potential of the UFO topic was deleted for the published report, as the Agency now acknowledges was the case.

The Robertson Panel had two associate members in attendance in addition to its five primary members. The two were Dr. J. Allen Hynek along with rocket and guided missile expert Frederick C. Durant III. The latter worked in the CIA Office of Scientific Intelligence and is credited with preparing and composing the findings of the Panel, thus the resulting document is sometimes referred to as the Durant Report.

Durant apparently developed an association with Maj. Dewey J. Fournet, who was interviewed by the Panel. Maj. Fournet was a veteran of Air Force UFO study projects, including Blue Book and Grudge, and a future long term member of the NICAP Board of Governors.

Capt. Ruppelt wrote of Project Blue Book and Maj. Fournet, “I was beginning to spend as much time telling people what was going on as I was doing anything about it. The answer was to get somebody in the Directorate of Intelligence in the Pentagon to act as a liaison officer. I could keep this person informed and he could handle the 'branch office' in Washington. Colonel Dunn bought this idea, and Major Dewey J. Fournet got the additional duty of the Pentagon branch. In the future all inquiries went to Major Fournet, and if he couldn't answer them he would call me. The arrangement was excellent because Major Fournet took a very serious interest in UFOs and could always be counted on to do a good job.”

Fournet spent 15 months as a Project Officer and liaison for Blue Book. The major told the Robertson Panel he eliminated known and probable explanations for a number of specified UFO reports. The Panel acknowledged that his background as an aeronautical engineer and technical intelligence officer “could not be slighted,” but it ultimately did not accept cases he cited because “they were raw, unevaluated reports.”

By 1960 Fournet was a member of the NICAP Board and served well into the 1970's, however cosmetic the position may have become by then. In a 1976 letter to future blogger Robert E. Barrow, Fournet wrote, “[T]here has never been any censoring [of UFO data], per se,” but added, “On the other hand, I'm positive that the public was frequently fed misleading statistics and examples of reports that were atypical, intended only to make the subject appear to be entirely asinine.”

Some might consider the statements to be indicative of an orchestrated UFO cover-up. Others might say it reflects findings of the Robertson Panel that the most serious national security threats posed by UFOs were related to propaganda and hysteria, thus reports of flying saucers were minimized by the CIA. Yet others might point out intelligence personnel, including Agency officers at times, took conflicting positions on the topic over the years, both downplaying and promoting its significance as apparently advantageous. The motives could be many, and necessarily change from one specific instance to the next.

The January 1978 edition of the Just Cause newsletter leveled an accusation suggesting the CIA Office of Scientific Intelligence's Fred Durant developed relationships with both Maj. Fournet and Capt. Ruppelt in order to gain access to Air Force UFO information. “Durant, posing as a civilian, befriended Major Dewey Fournet and Captain Ed Ruppelt in order for the CIA to gain access to the Air Force's UFO data as early as April 1952,” the newsletter asserted.[45] The story originated from “reliable sources,” it was reported. However correct the accusation may have been, I strongly suspect the primary interests of Durant and his employer were not related to either extraterrestrial or paranormal subject matter.

The FBI informed me in a 2020 FOIA response it was unable to identify records on Frederick Durant III. However, the Bureau advised a file transferred to the National Archives and Records Administration was potentially responsive. A subsequent FOIA request was submitted to NARA.

In March 2021 I received an interim response from NARA, stating the file was located and an initial assessment revealed Frederick Durant III to be the subject. NARA informed me the file contains an estimated 50 pages, expected to take 39 months to process at a total cost of $40 for a reproduction. The price reflects the current rate of 80 cents per page for a pdf. It should be noted files may be viewed at no cost by visiting the NARA facility in College Park, Maryland, once processing is complete, which, in this case, looks to be in 2024.

Interestingly, NARA stated the FBI file in question was created between July 1952 and December 1953. As is the case with FBI investigations of others in our story, such as Nicholas de Rochefort, this suggests the Bureau was looking at the activities of Mr. Durant during the same time as is of interest to us. Specifically, the Robertson Panel met in January 1953, and the FBI file was apparently created during the surrounding months. Once again, the date the records were compiled looks to be right on target.

There are a number of reasons potentially responsible for our recurring FOIA timeline of good fortune. For instance, the FBI may have been called upon for security investigations on certain individuals. That certainly does not make the circumstances any less potentially intriguing. I also find it interesting that FBI files tend to provide glimpses of long ago investigations into many varieties of people and their activities. While we might tend to think we should look to the CIA to study a CIA project, it becomes increasingly apparent there is a likely chance J. Edgar Hoover had files on the project personnel and related activities as well. Such records stand to offer alternative perspectives than we might expect to find, for instance, by reading approved CIA material.

History clearly shows us there were rivalries and power struggles between agencies. Hoover would not have accepted without question the motives and intentions portrayed to him by CIA officers. Neither would he have fully trusted their competence in screening personnel and protecting classified information, even if their stated objectives were expressed relatively authentically. Given what CIA officers were doing during this specific point in time, the early 1950's, Hoover's potential doubts would have arguably been well justified. The existence of FBI investigations and resulting files seems to often validate our interests in the circumstances.

A FOIA request submitted to the FBI on Dewey Joseph Fournet, Jr. was immediately closed. The Bureau stated it could neither confirm nor deny the existence of such records, a response known as a “Glomar.”

I soon appealed the ruling, stating the response was not consistent with others. I pointed out the Bureau was typically forthcoming about FOIA requests on deceased people. As a matter of fact, I appealed a very similar Glomar response on the same grounds, resulting in a favorable ruling. While the similar situation did not bear any records, at least they agreed to conduct the search.

In the Fournet instance, however, the appeal was denied. The Glomar stood.

I tried submitting a new request on Fournet with revised information, although the first request was pretty much my standard submission. It was once again Glomar-ed.

Maj. Fournet is the only individual out of many for which I requested FBI files during the course of researching NICAP that, for whatever reasons, resulted in a Glomar final response. I submitted yet a third request on Fournet, once again revising it a bit, and this time received a response stating the Bureau was unable to locate any records. I decided to consider that progress and call it quits, at least for the time being.

The thing is, we could go to the FBI Vault (online reading room) as of this writing, conduct a search using the term “Fournet,” and locate his name in an already public file on NICAP. I'm therefore not sure what the FOIA responses are all about. I have some ideas, but won't speculate. The bottom line is no further FBI records are currently forthcoming on Maj. Fournet.

The Glomar FOIA response, “neither confirm nor deny,” arose out of a Cold War deception operation conducted through a collaboration with the high profile billionaire Howard Hughes. The intriguing story might be considered to carry implications to events surrounding the wealthy and controversial philanthropist Robert Bigelow, who has a more recent history of involvement in questionable projects with intelligence agency funding and personnel.

In 1968 a Soviet submarine armed with nuclear missiles sank in the Pacific Ocean. After two months the Soviets called off their search, conceding the ocean was simply too large to find the vessel, combined with the fact it was probably resting more than three miles underwater.

The sub represented quite an intelligence target to American officers. A plan was subsequently formulated to locate and ultimately retrieve it, and thus was born Project Azorian.

Howard Hughes was enlisted to aid with a cover story to deceive the Soviets. He announced he was launching a venture to build a customized ship to mine valuable material from the ocean floor. In reality, the vessel would have a submersible vehicle with a claw designed to pull the sub to the surface. The operation took hundreds of millions of dollars and six years to execute, but the Hughes Glomar Explorer remarkably retrieved about 40 feet of the 300-foot Soviet submarine. It took about two months from the time the Glomar set sail.

By 1975 the operation began showing up in media reports. Rolling Stone magazine filed a FOIA request to which the CIA responded it could neither confirm nor deny the existence of any such records. From there, using the term to avoid addressing material which, if existent, would be properly classified and exempt from FOIA disclosure, became known as a Glomar response.

During the same time the CIA was manipulating political matters in Guatemala, it also took an active interest in Tibet. Writer Amish Raj Mulmi noted the presence of references to political unrest in the region while exploring CIA declassified documents on UFOs and the Yeti (Yes, Bigfoot). Mulmi documented in a 2019 article for the Kathmandu Post how Cold War era documents relevant to the area included UFO sightings as well as an alleged crashed saucer.

There was also a 1959 memo from the American embassy in Kathmandu to the State Department in Washington, advising about regulations on mountain climbing expeditions conducted in Nepal and related to the Yeti. The memo explained, among other stipulations, payment to Nepal was required for Yeti hunts and permission from the Nepalese government was necessary prior to publishing any news about the existence of the creature.

This may very well be related to the 1950's CIA effort to assist Tibetan rebels in resisting Chinese occupation. CIA support was given in the form of arms, training, propaganda and other resources.

In 1955 a leading CIA operative reportedly posed as a "tourist" in order to confer with Tibetans at a Himalayan village. The American outlined a program to overthrow the Chinese in Tibet, and such infiltration of the borders became common. The operation did not match the results obtained by PBSUCCESS in Guatemala and was eventually referred to by one CIA account as "a military disaster." An American ambassador to India, briefed on the failed effort in Tibet, called it a "particularly insane enterprise."

The era also included what the CIA would later claim was responsible for an increase in UFO sightings, its U-2 spy plane. The Agency rather sensationally suggested in 2014 the plane accounted for some 50 percent of UFO reports occurring during the 1950's and 1960's.

However inaccurate the claim may be, the U-2 saga carries intriguing implications for some of our NICAP characters. The inaugural pilots in the mid-1950's for the secret program are among the earliest documented instances of "sheep-dipping," an intelligence community term referring to staging a person's military retirement. In reality, the person becomes a covert operative. The process typically involves doctoring the official personnel records of a career military service member. Efforts to solidify perceptions of a new yet fictitious lifestyle for the undercover operative may cleverly include their misleading letter-writing to family and friends about their supposed new plans. As one writer jokingly portrayed the contents of such letters, "And that's why I decided to leave the Army and pursue my new life of definitely not being in the CIA."

If all this weren't confusing enough, while the U-2 program was taking flight, rather remarkable strides were made in an operation known as Project PALLADIUM. Its implications to reported UFOs are astounding.

CIA man Gene Poteat penned a now-declassified article published in Agency literature describing some 15 years of mid 20th century information warfare and the development of electronic countermeasures. Initial efforts to confuse enemy radar and conceal flight paths of aircraft evolved into increasingly sophisticated weapons of deception and intelligence gathering. By the 1960's, Poteat asserted, a scheme was developed that could electronically generate and inject carefully calibrated false targets into Soviet radar, deceiving them into picking up and tracking ghost aircraft. An aircraft could be simulated of any size, at any speed and altitude, flying on any path.

Each PALLADIUM operation involved a CIA team with its ghost aircraft system, an NSA team with special communications intelligence and decryption equipment, and a military operational support team. “Covert PALLADIUM operations were carried out against a variety of Soviet radars around the world,” Poteat explained.

The CIA officer described one such operation off the coast of Cuba. The PALLADIUM teams were positioned in an attempt to collect intelligence on the sensitivity of Soviet radar. A false U.S. fighter plane was made to appear to be flying from Key West towards Cuba. Fascinatingly, a Navy submarine was coordinated to surface just long enough to release a timed series of “balloon-borne metalized spheres of different sizes.” The spheres were released into the path of the oncoming ghost aircraft.

The idea was for the false fighter plane to initially alert the Soviet radar, then the PALLADIUM team would monitor communications and responses to assess which balloons the radar was tracking or missing. They got the information they went after, Poteat wrote, as well as some excitement and entertainment.

Cuban fighter planes began circling where the submarine surfaced and released the balloons, and another gave chase to the ghost aircraft. “We had no trouble in manipulating the PALLADIUM system controls to keep our ghost aircraft always just ahead of the pursuing Cuban planes,” Poteat explained. “When the Cuban pilot radioed back to his controllers that he had the intruding aircraft in sight and was about to make a firing pass to shoot it down, we all had the same idea at the same instant. The technician moved his finger to the switch, I nodded yes, and he switched off the PALLADIUM system.”

I have FOIA requests submitted to multiple agencies, citing Poteat's report and pertaining to Project PALLADIUM. They are pending as of this writing.

It might seem rather stunning in hindsight that UFO researchers who focus on the mid 20th century don't typically make more of the impressive operation. We might also question how intelligence officers who subscribed to UFO beliefs could perpetually be so oblivious to reasons such information might remain classified that of course had nothing to do with saucer cover-ups. Before we are too quick to judge, it should be noted electronic warfare continued to evolve. It indeed carries strong implications to today's UFO genre, as reported at The War Zone. In spite of that being the case, it is rarely included in the collective conversation.

During email exchanges, Jan Aldrich pointed out the potential significance to the NICAP saga of a document known as JANAP 146. That was the Joint Army-Navy-Air Force Publication 146. It referred to a Joint Chiefs of Staff directive, Communications Instructions for Reporting Vital Intelligence Sightings (CIRVIS). The 1953 directive outlined procedures for reporting and sharing information about what personnel were witnessing. As the name implies, it was classified, and it most certainly included reporting unidentified flying objects.

As pretty much anyone even remotely knowledgeable about military procedures should tell you, the armed forces have long been extremely interested in air space and its monitoring. It's a primary responsibility. A lot of the confusion comes with framing what differences there may be between a UFO and your run of the mill bogey.

Aldrich suggested Maj. Fournet and Adm. Hillenkoetter were in positions to be aware of CIRVIS, yet bound by security oaths not to disclose it to Maj. Keyhoe and company. That would of course also include any insights they may have had about the circumstances. Potential problems obviously arise when collaborators in a research group, such as NICAP, possess varying levels of awareness of situations, yet have their hands tied about sharing it. We need look no farther than the JANAP 146 and U-2 program for specific examples.

Even without such examples, security concerns should nonetheless be apparent surrounding officers mingling with investigators who are inquisitive about their professional activities. It is my understanding this is typically heavily frowned upon if the officers are not actually working in some type of official capacity, such as counterintelligence.

Moreover, Keyhoe and others argued men such as Hillenkoetter and Fournet were in positions that their interest in UFOs further validated the topic in itself. However, by that very argument, if such men ultimately knew no more about the alleged saucers than the rest of us, the value of their supposedly informed opinions was debatable.

Any way that we may keep coming at it, a primary story line – perhaps the primary story line - is the security issues at stake. Not due to saucers, but the people and officers who carry on about saucers. It seems inevitable that agents and informants would be enlisted to infiltrate such groups and report on what was taking place among the members. Key personnel issued security clearances would be targeted by bad actors for information extraction. False information would be injected into the social circles for a variety of purposes. Deception operations and psychological warfare would inevitably ensue. Were the public and its belief systems simply considered collateral damage?

Even the infamous CIA Project MKULTRA left footprints in UFO history, or vice versa, depending on how we want to look at it. Initial Director of Central Intelligence Adm. Roscoe H. Hillenkoetter (May 1947-October 1950) was followed by Gen. Walter Bedell Smith (October 1950-February 1953). The next DCI was Allen W. Dulles, who held the position the longest of all CIA directors, from February 1953 to November 1961. It was Dulles who formally authorized MKULTRA on April 13, 1953, following several years of questionable and unethical Agency research and development. The large-scale behavior modification endeavor and related programs continued into the 1970's.

The late writer and researcher Hank P. Albarelli, Jr. explored such circumstances in his 2009 book A Terrible Mistake: The Murder of Frank Olson and the CIA's Secret Cold War Experiments. Albarelli explained his interactions with MKULTRA project director Dr. Sidney Gottlieb, a chemist and former chief of Technical Services Staff. In 1997 Gottlieb reportedly told Albarelli UFOs were out of his reach of knowledge, adding that he found the subject fascinating.

“That something is there, and that people see something, is unquestioned,” Gottlieb continued. “I think, for me, it's best to leave it like that.”

“Did the CIA leave it like that?” Albarelli asked.

“I assume not, no,” Gottlieb replied.

Albarelli wrote that in 1956 and again in 1957 Gottlieb asked professional magician John Mulholland to examine and render an opinion on UFO reports. Mulholland, a consultant for the Agency, had in 1953 composed a 71-page CIA manual titled Some Operational Applications of the Art of Deception. He is also credited with writing the Agency manual, Recognition Signals.

Gottlieb reportedly enlisted Mulholland to discreetly investigate the now famous 1955 Kelly-Hopkinsville case which occurred at the Sutton home in Kentucky. There are no known documents pertaining to Mulholland's research or findings. DCI Richard Helms ordered the destruction of MKLUTRA files in 1973, greatly hampering investigation of the program and its some 149 subprojects.

Gottlieb told Albarelli he could not recall anything about the Hopkinsville investigation. He is known among researchers for his selectively poor memory. Gottlieb repeatedly stated during Congressional hearings he was unable to remember details and often even basic aspects of MKULTRA subprojects, including personnel and what they were supposed to be doing.

Albarelli further reported that Mulholland visited Levelland, Texas, in the weeks following widely publicized UFO sightings of November 2-3, 1957. The Levelland case is a staple among UFO enthusiasts who typically consider it rather compelling, at least of something. Writer and researcher Kevin Randle blogged in 2020 about coming across a November 6, 1957, newspaper clipping suggesting the reported UFOs “were American inventions.”

The article contains the account of an Arthur P. Ticknor, a chemical engineer who said he and companions happened upon a secret airfield in 1953 in New Mexico. Their adventure reportedly involved armed security personnel and witnessing the flight of what he seemed to think were extraordinary aircraft. It is from there Ticknor deduced flying objects reported in Levelland in 1957 were American inventions. My initial reaction was to search for Mr. Ticknor's name in locations such as the previously mentioned list of pseudonyms used by State Department employees, but I haven't turned up anything yet.

Albarelli's A Terrible Mistake explores events surrounding the November 1953 death of CIA biochemist Frank Olson. The author makes the case it was a murder, perpetrated for reasons related to Olson's involvement in covert and unethical weapons testing. The author explained that during the decade he spent researching the circumstances prior to the book's 2009 release, he was contacted on multiple occasions by people asserting Olson was killed to keep his knowledge of UFOs and aliens concealed.

"One person, who seemed quite knowledgeable about Camp Detrick," Albarelli wrote, "claimed that 'definitive evidence proving alien contact with Earth' had been removed from UFO crash or landing sites by the government. This evidence was allegedly transported for study to Camp Detrick and other military installations. That several of the key CIA and Army participants in Olson's death were involved in the government's UFO research in the 1950's is certainly interesting."

Had he not become convinced Olson's death involved other reasons, Albarelli continued, "some of these theories may have been much more provocative." I interpret Albarelli to have suggested some of the UFO-related stories may have been put in his path to deter his direction of research. As may have been the case with Dr. Olavo Fontes, and many more both before and since, perhaps tales of crashed saucers and alien artifacts were used in an effort to influence, or exploit, Hank Albarelli.

MIXED MESSAGES

When Maj. Donald Keyhoe took the NICAP reigns in January 1957, he wasted no time promoting the statements of distinguished board members and adding qualified voices to NICAP panels. While the organization was often plagued with financial shortcomings and deserves some criticism in certain areas, the experience and prestige of high profile supporters was a prominent characteristic that should not be overlooked. NICAP assembled an impressive group of flag wavers, even in comparison to future UFO groups. Some of the motives might be questioned at times, but NICAP was irrefutably well connected. A description of the Board of Governors during the Keyhoe years, per Richard Hall, is pictured below.

Keyhoe and his NICAP colleagues consistently landed high profile supporters and coverage from leading newscasts, magazines, and newspapers. Lengthy lists of advisors were compiled in addition to the names populating the Board of Governors. Career intelligence personnel joined the ranks, and many well known personalities promoted NICAP. A host of military officials, along with renowned psychiatrist Carl Jung and Sen. Barry Goldwater, were among those lending their names to the organization's flyers and brochures.[46]

(The following served on the Board for various lengths of time during this period. Those marked "x" served throughout the entire period.)

Dr. Marcus Bach (x), theologian, State University of Iowa

Rev. Albert Baller (x), clergyman

Col. Joseph Bryan III (*), USAF (Ret.)

Dr. Earl Douglass, religious writer/columnist

Frank Edwards (+), newsman

Col. Robert B. Emerson (x), USAR, chemist

Maj. Dewey Fournet, Jr. (), USAFR

J.B. Hartranft, Jr., (x), Pres., Aircraft Owners and Pilots Assn.

Vice Adm. R.H. Hillenkoetter, USN (Ret.), former CIA Director

Dr. Leslie K. Kaeburn (+), biophysicist

Rear Adm. H.B. Knowles, USN (Ret.), submariner

Rev. Leon LeVan, clergyman

Prof. Charles A. Maney (+), physics

Dr. Charles P. Olivier, astronomer

Dr. Bruce A. Rogers, mechanical engineering professor

J. Edward Roush, attorney (former Congressman)

(* = later discovered to be a former naval officer and CIA employee, psychological warfare specialist)

(= former Pentagon Monitor of Air Force UFO project)

(+ = died in 1969)

“Flying saucers – unidentified flying objects – or whatever you call them, are real,” Goldwater was quoted by NICAP.

Likewise, Dr. Jung was described In NICAP literature as writing a letter to Maj. Keyhoe containing the remarks, “I am a NICAP subscriber. I am grateful for all the courageous things you have done in elucidating the thorny problems of UFO reality. I do not possess sufficient evidence which would enable me to draw definite conclusions. The evidence available, however, is convincing enough to arouse a continuous and fervent interest. If it is true the AAF (American Air Force) withholds telltaling facts then one can only say this is the most unpsychological and stupid policy one could invent... The public ought to be told the truth."

Rear Adm. Delmer Fahrney was a 30-year Navy veteran and graduate of the Naval Academy. As was the case with Hillenkoetter, he was a classmate of Keyhoe's at Annapolis, as Richard Hall wrote. Fahrney earned a Bachelor of Science from the Naval Academy and a Master of Science from MIT. The admiral was an aeronautical engineer and an expert in radio controlled aircraft, earning him the title "the father of guided missiles." He also served as the first NICAP Chairman of the Board of Governors.

Fahrney's UFO-related statements as distributed in NICAP literature are shown in the image below.[47] Some readers might note the similarities between the admiral's remarks and those of future high profile figures in the UFO genre, most certainly including more current day trendsetters. The "it's not one of ours" theme seems to particularly get a lot of mileage, in spite of what educated science advocates and intelligence officials should know about differentiating between what people saw and what people say they saw.

Statement on Unidentified Flying Objects by Admiral Delmer S. Fahrney, USN (Ret.)
Chairman of the Board of Governors of NICAP

"Reliable reports indicate that there are objects coming into our atmosphere at very high speeds... No agency in this country or Russia is able to duplicate at this time the speeds and accelerations which radars and observers indicate these flying objects are able to achieve.

"There are signs that an intelligence directs these objects because of the way they fly. The way they change position in formations would indicate that their motion is directed. The Air Force is collecting factual data on which to base an opinion, but time is required to sift and correlate the material.

"As long as such unidentified objects continue to navigate through the earth's atmosphere, there is an urgent need to know the facts. Many observers have ceased to report their findings to the Air Force because of the seeming frustration—that is, all information going in, and none coming out. It is in this area that NICAP may find its greatest mission.

"We are in a position to screen independently all UFO information coming in from our filter groups.

"General Albert C. Wedemeyer will serve the Committee as Evaluations Adviser and complete analyses will be arranged through leading scientists. After careful evaluation, we shall release our findings to the public."

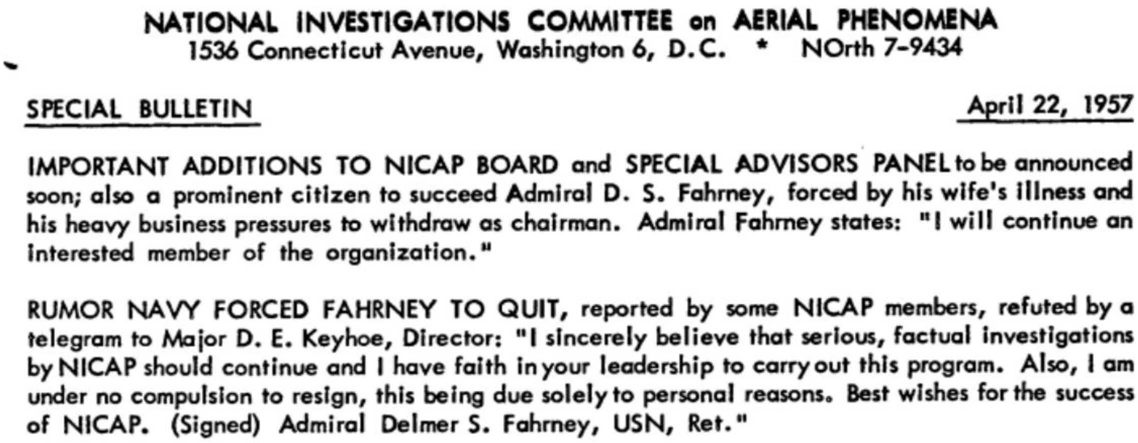
In statements published by United Press in January 1957, Fahrney fully threw the Air Force under the bus. He said UFO reports were declining because they go into Air Force files and never come out. Fahrney added the Air Force deals with such reports with skepticism and ridicule, making people reluctant to come forward. He blamed the circumstances for contributing to the need to form NICAP.[48]

“The reason the Air Force doesn't put out any information, of course, is because the visitors must not be from the earth – therefore they must be from some other part of the universe," Fahrney was further quoted. "The obvious question then, is where are they from and why are they here? And the Air Force can't answer. So they say nothing."

In a February 1957 Director's Report to the Board of Governors, Keyhoe stated NICAP could easily become a tremendous success.[49] We may surmise such success was primarily defined by swaying popular opinion, or what UFO organizations tend to questionably describe as educating the public.

Keyhoe noted in the report that Fahrney's statements were carried widely. The news story, Keyhoe added, was repeated on radio, television, and other mediums, including flying saucer magazines published both domestically and abroad.

Keyhoe was pleased with Adm. Fahrney's aggressiveness, but the major's use of Fahrney as a noteworthy and inspired figurehead was short lived. Fahrney soon resigned as Board chairman, and rumors spread he was forced by the Navy to quit. From an April 1957 "Special Bulletin" signed by Keyhoe:[50]



NATIONAL INVESTIGATIONS COMMITTEE on AERIAL PHENOMENA

SPECIAL BULLETIN April 22, 1957

IMPORTANT ADDITIONS TO NICAP BOARD and SPECIAL ADVISORS PANEL to be announced soon; also a prominent citizen to succeed Admiral D. S. Fahrney, forced by his wife's illness and his heavy business pressures to withdraw as chairman. Admiral Fahrney states: "I will continue an interested member of the organization."

RUMOR NAVY FORCED FAHRNEY TO QUIT, reported by some NICAP members, refuted by a telegram to Major D. E. Keyhoe, Director: "I sincerely believe that serious, factual investigations by NICAP should continue and I have faith in your leadership to carry out this program. Also, I am under no compulsion to resign, this being due solely to personal reasons. Best wishes for the success of NICAP. (Signed) Admiral Delmer S. Fahrney, USN, Ret."

It took Keyhoe little time to secure a new Board chairman, Roscoe H. Hillenkoetter. The former director of the CIA was indeed an impressive addition. Any number of aspects of the Hillenkoetter-NICAP saga are worthy of exploration, and a winding story spanning decades and involving a cloak and dagger myth about crashed flying saucers is certainly among them. Let's begin our look at this intriguing plot line with a review of events as documented by Adam Gorightly and others.

In 1981, a now infamous researcher by the name of Bill Moore was working on a book project (The same Bill Moore who in his 1979 book speculated Townsend Brown was involved in Morris Jessup's tale of an epic experiment in Philadelphia gone haywire, as considered earlier). The working title of Moore's potential 1981 offering was MAJIK-12. It was a never published, fictional account of the supposedly real Majestic 12, aka MJ-12, as based upon quite dubious information provided by Richard Doty.

The MJ-12 were allegedly an extremely secret group of a dozen individuals purported to be charged with overseeing the retrieval of crashed extraterrestrial spacecraft. Moore and his fellow researchers speculated about the identities of the twelve, whose project was of course not verified to exist. Moore then reportedly provided the names to Doty in the possible hope of obtaining confirmation.

Three years later, in 1984, Moore's research partner, Jaime Shandera, reportedly received an anonymously mailed package. It contained a 35mm role of film with photos of what became known as the MJ-12 papers, a set of unauthenticated documents supposedly confirming identities and activities of the MJ-12. Moore's previous speculation about identities of the MJ-12 appeared to be accurate, at least if you put any faith in the dubious docs. The MJ-12 papers are now widely considered fraudulent for many reasons and are, at absolute best, unverified.

Perhaps the whole Moore-Doty bit involved unsavory goings ons or, as Gorightly put it, a feedback loop. A good argument can sure be made. After all, the story and names Moore gave the infamously unreliable Doty are what landed in the mailbox, apparently.

At any rate, Adm. Hillenkoetter turned up among the alleged MJ-12. Besides the fact Moore had already named Hillenkoetter, his inclusion was inevitable in a UFO mythology kind of way. He headed the CIA (1947-1950) in the wake of the alleged Roswell crash of the summer of '47, so he could hardly not be in on the supposed crash retrievals. That might especially be the case considering the story was being told by a guy, Moore, who purported to subscribe to the Roswell crash story.

Also named in the MJ-12 papers as an alleged member of the group, along with Hillenkoetter, was Dr. Donald H. Menzel, an astronomer and astrophysicist. Menzel was critical of views promoted by NICAP, earning a book he authored a place as a reference as a recommended skeptical view in the abstract of the NICAP 1964 cornerstone publication, The UFO Evidence. As a matter of fact, Menzel was so adamant in his position UFOs could be conventionally explained that some later suspected his 1980's inclusion in the alleged MJ-12 was a joke among the hoaxers of the documents.

The FBI provided five pdf files totaling over 200 pages in response to my FOIA request on Donald Howard Menzel. After follow up, the Bureau notified me of three more potentially responsive files transferred to the National Archives and Records Administration.

A FOIA request submitted to NARA for the additional three files resulted in receiving an email establishing Menzel is indeed the subject of each file. The records total an estimated 550 pages and must be processed for release. NARA estimated it would take 39 months to complete processing, potentially making the files available in 2024, at a projected cost of $440.

The date range of the documents provided thus far by the FBI is from the 1940's to the 1970's. The docs tell a story, often portrayed through FBI memos and information obtained from confidential informants, of Cold War measures and a doctor who essentially spent his life subject to the surveillance of intelligence agencies. This was due to his involvement in such projects as the Atomic Energy Commission, which he worked with at Los Alamos. He was also investigated extensively by the Office of Naval Intelligence due at least in part to his responsibilities with "code matters" for the Boston Naval Reserve.[51] Dr. Menzel was frequently the subject of security investigations to either clear him for inclusion in classified projects or revisit the political loyalties of he and his associates due to their ongoing involvement with classified material.

After some 30 years of accumulated investigation memos, the Bureau considered approaching Menzel for work as a double agent. I suppose it stands to reason that guys who are feared to be security leaks their entire careers would be easy sells as traitors to adversaries. From a now declassified 1974 FBI memo in which the Boston Field Office requested authority to proceed with grooming Menzel as a potential double agent:[52]

RE: Boston letter to the Bureau, 11/12/74.

Bureau authority is requested to interview subject in accordance with existing instructions relating to interviews of security subjects. Care will be exercised to protect the original source in this matter. No direct questions will be asked during the interview which will disclose to the subject the identity of the official or the establishment contacted, the method used in the contact, or the fact we are aware of the contact. The interview will be conducted in a manner so that the subject will volunteer the details of the contact. If this subject is cooperative, no affirmative steps will be taken during the initial interview to direct his activities, but a separate communication will be directed to the Bureau setting forth the results of the interview and requesting authority to recontact the subject as a potential security informant or double agent.

The Bureau may not have been the only agency with such ideas. Menzel was apparently considered a potentially advantageous source at least partially because he was frequently invited to international conferences. A 1975 memo indicates the FBI contacted him to make arrangements for a seemingly related interview. Menzel informed the Bureau he was plenty willing to discuss circumstances with them, but advised he'd already been interviewed about his recent trip to the People's Republic of China by the CIA:[53]

Readers may find it somewhat amusing that a 1949 FBI memo noted a confidential informant provided information indicating Menzel “lunches in New York City at the Metropolitan Club with Admiral Chester Nimitz.” The admiral's namesake is the USS Nimitz, a Navy vessel now known around the UFO genre due to its involvement in the celebrated 2004 “Tic Tac” case. For better or worse, the promotion of the 2004 UFO case in 2017 by the New York Times and To The Stars Academy pretty much bears full responsibility for the otherwise shelved story's revived lease on life.

History buffs might also take interest that, in 1942, Adm. Nimitz was relayed analysis of Japanese messages that had been intercepted and successfully decrypted, enabling the U.S. Navy to secure a major victory at Midway. The circumstances changed the entire course of war in the Pacific, according to page 7 of a CIA study.

The FBI files on Dr. Menzel suggest a close association with Dr. Harlow Shapley was consistently among the Bureau's deepest concerns during the 1940's, however warranted it may or may not have been. Menzel and Shapley were employed in the astronomy department at Harvard. Despite their apparent strong differences on certain academic issues, Bureau memos suggest Menzel respected Shapley and defended his right to his opinion. Like Menzel, Shapley was also the subject of an FBI security investigation. Somewhat interestingly, Shapley's apparent take on extraterrestrials would later be portrayed in NICAP literature.

In a NICAP brochure within a section titled, “Published Statements on the Question of Other Worlds,” the first entry reads, “Dr. Harlow Shapley, former Director of Harvard Observatory: 'We must now accept it as inevitable that there are other worlds with some kind of thinking beings.'”[54]

A 1949 report on Menzel contained in the Bureau files indicates a confidential informant stated Menzel and Edward U. Condon shared a mutual contact.[55] As previously mentioned, Condon would go on to lead an Air Force-commissioned study of UFOs, producing in 1969 what became widely known as the Condon Report. The study was a big disappointment to NICAP. In what by now should be no surprise at all, one individual in the professional circles described by the informant was noted in the FBI report to already be the subject of a then-current security investigation. It might be easier to find people not under investigation. “What took ya so long?”, indeed.

In August 2020 I had an email exchange with James Carrion in which he shared some images of Roscoe Hillenkoetter letters. Carrion stated the source of the material was a Bill Moore archive. One of the intriguing images, apparently depicting a copy of a letter authored by Hillenkoetter and once in Moore's possession:

Dear Mr. Nagel:

In reply to the questions in your letter of 8 December, I never stated that the unknown objects were operating under intelligent control. I did say that UFO's should be investigated to try to find out if they existed, and if so where they came from.

As far as I know, UFO's are not of extra-terrestrial origin for the following reasons:

(a) For at least 25 years, there have been no - completely authenticated sighting of such craft - nothing like, for example, seeing a 747 on a runway or in the air, by numbers of people.

(b) In a negative sense, also, in 25 years there has been no definite positive action by a UFO either of friendly or hostile nature. Surely, if they exist, in all that time one or more would have made contact, again either friendly or hostile, with some part of the earth. The lack of such actions makes me believe that UFO's from outside the earth have not as yet visited here.

Neither the U.S. Air Force nor the Pentagon has issued any orders suppressing the truth about UFO's.

I have never heard of anyone who was in possession of UFO fragments and as far as I know no such UFO fragments exist.

The conclusions as to the extra-terrestrial origin of UFO's are, in my belief, insufficient and unproven.

I know of no prominent scientist or officer advocating the extra-terrestrial origin of the UFO's in public.

For your information I am enclosing a copy of a letter received from Dr. Willis in California and my reply thereto. You may like to get in touch with him.

Very truly yours,

R. H. Hillenkoetter

Yet another image shared by Carrion showed a hard copy of a 1963 letter from Hillenkoetter to Dr. Menzel. Across the top of the page was a boilerplate message suggesting the copy was initially printed by the American Philosophical Society Library.

I soon discovered the Library to currently be in operation and rather easily accessible. An email from the Reference Staff confirmed the original 1963 Hillenkoetter-Menzel letter is, in fact, an authentic item housed at the facility. The letter is located in a Hillenkoetter folder within a Donald Menzel collection. The folder consists of ten pages that include letters exchanged between the two and dated from 1961-1965. The American Philosophical Society Library provided a pdf of the folder.

The letters exchanged with Hillenkoetter reflect Menzel's skeptical position on UFOs and his concerns about NICAP. The doctor expressed his interpretation NICAP was undermining authority while its personnel had tendencies to make much more of UFO reports than was justified. He was firmly in opposition to NICAP trying to persuade the government to take up the cause of UFO activism. Congress, Menzel suggested, should be investigating NICAP instead of UFOs.

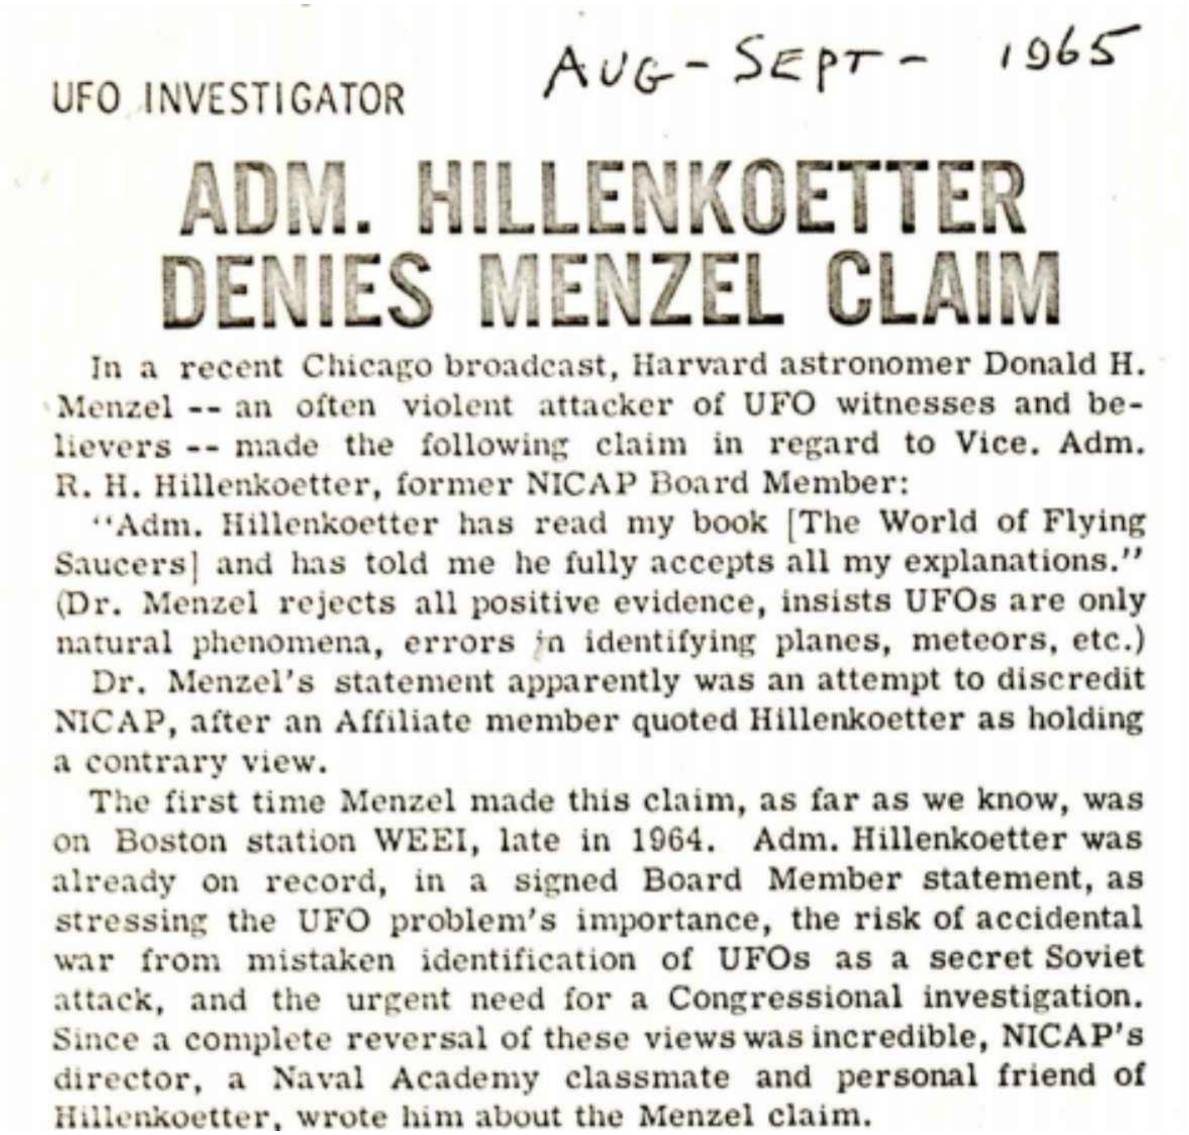
Hillenkoetter sat on the NICAP Board of Governors from 1957 until his resignation in 1962. Most of the letters were therefore written after the admiral's NICAP stint.

In a 1963 letter to Menzel, Hillenkoetter wrote, “I resigned from NICAP about 20 months ago feeling that it had degenerated from an organization honestly trying to find out something definite about possible unknowns, into a body bickering about personalities. The Air Force, too, could have helped by not being so secretive.”[56]

Hillenkoetter, in my estimation, maintained a commitment to portraying himself rather graciously to the unwavering Menzel, a strategy we might not find particularly surprising of a man of his experience and travels. In that same 1963 letter, Hillenkoetter stated, “Thank you very much for your book. To my mind, it was very well done and I enjoyed it and found it of great interest. I should say that you have effectively put to rest all surmises about flying saucers being from 'outer space'. You have done a thorough and praiseworthy job.”

There is, however, a somewhat interesting discrepancy that arises. It becomes apparent to Menzel that Hillenkoetter seems to express a different stance on UFOs to Keyhoe than he communicates to Menzel. The situation further inflames Menzel's ongoing prodding of Hillenkoetter to publicly denounce NICAP and UFOs.

In a 1965 edition of NICAP's The UFO Investigator, the magazine cites and challenges Menzel's assertion that Hillenkoetter accepts Menzel's explanations for UFOs.[57] From the article:



UFO INVESTIGATOR

AUG-SEPT- 1965

ADM. HILLENKOETTER DENIES MENZEL CLAIM

In a recent Chicago broadcast, Harvard astronomer Donald H. Menzel -- an often violent attacker of UFO witnesses and believers -- made the following claim in regard to Vice. Adm. R. H. Hillenkoetter, former NICAP Board Member:

"Adm. Hillenkoetter has read my book [The World of Flying Saucers] and has told me he fully accepts all my explanations." (Dr. Menzel rejects all positive evidence, insists UFOs are only natural phenomena, errors in identifying planes, meteors, etc.)

Dr. Menzel's statement apparently was an attempt to discredit NICAP, after an Affiliate member quoted Hillenkoetter as holding a contrary view.

The first time Menzel made this claim, as far as we know, was on Boston station WEEI, late in 1964. Adm. Hillenkoetter was already on record, in a signed Board Member statement, as stressing the UFO problem's importance, the risk of accidental war from mistaken identification of UFOs as a secret Soviet attack, and the urgent need for a Congressional investigation. Since a complete reversal of these views was incredible, NICAP's director, a Naval Academy classmate and personal friend of Hillenkoetter, wrote him about the Menzel claim.

The article presents a letter from Hillenkoetter intended to resolve the situation and support the credibility of both NICAP and the ongoing UFO hunt:

Adm. Hillenkoetter's reply is reproduced below. (The reference to Maj. Hart was not concerned with Menzel.)

Dear Don:

I apologize for the delay in answering your letter of December 13th but for part of the time over the holidays I was up in Massachusetts.

I think you were misinformed about some of the things you mention. First, as far as I can remember, I never talked to Major Hart nor, also as far as I remember, I have never met him and would not know him if he walked in the door.

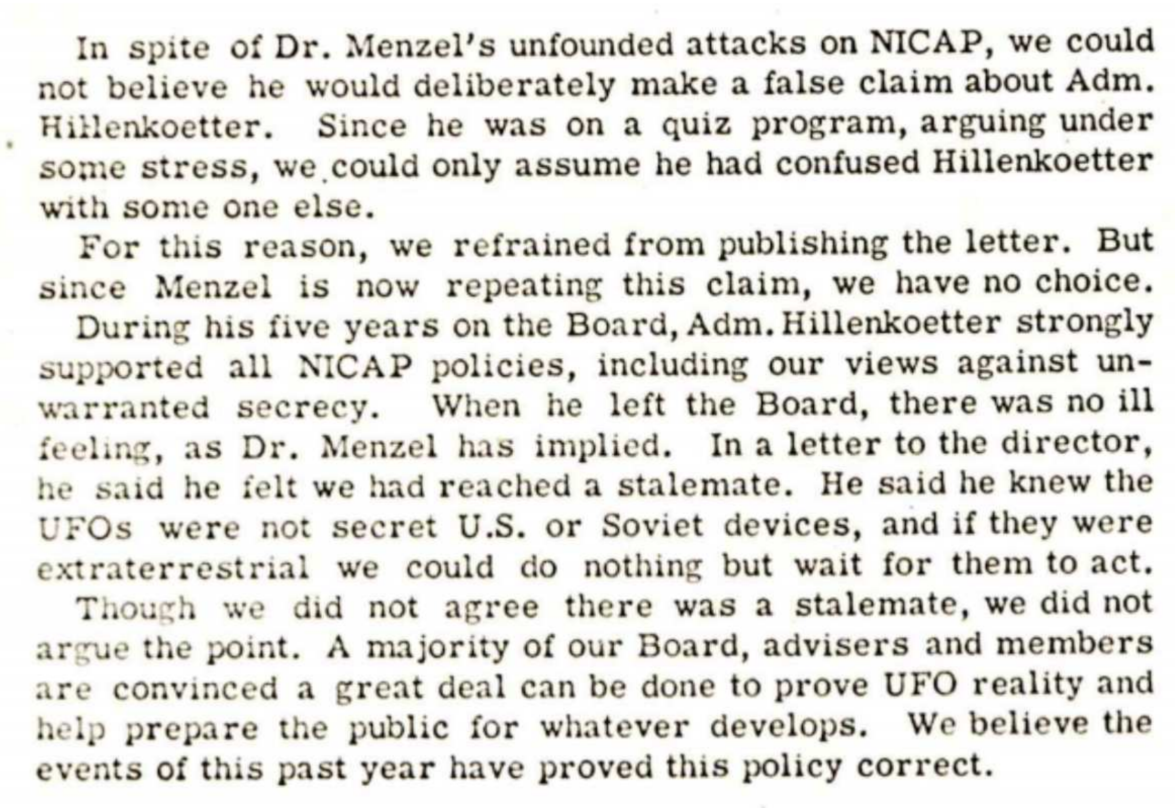
I saw Dr. Menzel at a dinner in December but other than saying "Good Evening - Merry Christmas" there was no conversation and I have never carried on any conversation with Menzel about NICAP or UFO. He did send me a copy of his book for which I thanked him but took no position on the statements he made.

Please take my apologies again for being so long in answering your letter and with best personal wishes to you, believe me, as ever

Sincerely,

R. H. Hillenkoetter

The article continues:



In spite of Dr. Menzel's unfounded attacks on NICAP, we could not believe he would deliberately make a false claim about Adm. Hillenkoetter. Since he was on a quiz program, arguing under some stress, we could only assume he had confused Hillenkoetter with some one else.

For this reason, we refrained from publishing the letter. But since Menzel is now repeating this claim, we have no choice.

During his five years on the Board, Adm. Hillenkoetter strongly supported all NICAP policies, including our views against unwarranted secrecy. When he left the Board, there was no ill feeling, as Dr. Menzel has implied. In a letter to the director, he said he felt we had reached a stalemate. He said he knew the UFOs were not secret U.S. or Soviet devices, and if they were extraterrestrial we could do nothing but wait for them to act.

Though we did not agree there was a stalemate, we did not argue the point. A majority of our Board, advisers and members are convinced a great deal can be done to prove UFO reality and help prepare the public for whatever develops. We believe the events of this past year have proved this policy correct.

The letters in the Hillenkoetter folder contained in the Menzel collection in the care of the American Philosophical Society Library were apparently saved by Menzel on account of this very feud. It seems it was important to Menzel to save documentation of the written statements, which spanned 1961-1965. The latest letter in the folder, which references Hillenkoetter's previously quoted 1963 note, and demonstrating Menzel's strategy for handling the admiral's contradictory statements:

My dear Admiral Hillenkoetter:

I enclose herewith a copy of an article that recently appeared in the UFO INVESTIGATOR, for August-September 1965. You are probably as surprised as I to find this letter used in such a fashion. And Keyhoe, characteristically, states that since he could not believe that I would deliberately make a false claim about you, he could only assume that I had confused you with someone else.

I have many times completely forgotten having written a letter, sometimes to my embarrassment. I think, therefore, you had forgotten the letter I enclose herewith, with its statements about my book and about NICAP. Under the circumstances I have no alternative but to send them to NICAP, asking them to publish them and refute the false charges made about me.

I also beg to remind you that we had quite a discussion about Keyhoe and NICAP at the dinner, during which I specifically told you of Keyhoe's statement over the radio that you had not really changed your views on the UFO's, but that the pressure brought by the government and armed services had made you take a public stand you did not privately espouse. And I clearly recall your reply, "Tell Keyhoe that I am an independent agent and that nobody can tell me what to do or think or say."

I bear no ill will to you for this SNAFU, though I would appreciate any help that you can give towards clarifying it.

In conclusion, may I express the hope that we can discuss this in most friendly fashion at the forthcoming dinner in December. I hope to see you there.

Cordially yours,

Donald H. Menzel

Perhaps no one has been cited to bolster NICAP relevance and credibility more than former Director of Central Intelligence Adm. Hillenkoetter. His statements in support of the extraterrestrial hypothesis and saucer mystery were emphasized by NICAP and continue to this day to be frequently promoted among UFO enthusiasts appealing to authority. Trouble is, those quoted statements may not thoroughly reflect Hillenkoetter's actual views and evolving perspectives, if the quotes are even completely authentic in the first place. They certainly do not accurately represent his apparent contradicting statements or the context of the battles waged to win his public endorsements.

There are clearly implications to the MJ-12 hoax and a lack of evidence pertaining to the UFO mystery contained in the Hillenkoetter-Menzel letters. Whatever classified projects about which these men may have shared knowledge, retrieving crashed saucers was obviously not among them. Unless, of course, the two intended their letters to later be examined as part of a ruse to dupe future researchers into thinking they knew nothing about saucers, in which case they were sure playing the long game!

If Hillenkoetter did consider himself to have any significant knowledge of classified evidence of UFOs, he didn't seem to have a lot of conviction about it. Perhaps knowledge he may have had about the exploitation of the topic for deceptive purposes was another story. The behavior of the former DCI might particularly be considered intriguing in light of his awareness of the relationship the Agency had with the Economic Cooperation Administration and, by extension, Counsel Services.

I could reiterate the difficulty in discerning motives of professional intelligence personnel. As is often the case with UFO stories of yesteryear, the trail takes intriguing twists and turns where we find the merging paths of UFO investigators, skeptics and spies.

CHAPTER 9

UFO TUNNEL VISION

NICAP enjoyed wide coverage from the press. A 1957 archived newspaper article describing the organization and a UFO report it championed provides a typical example.[58]

The clipping explained that the first edition of the NICAP new monthly publication, The UFO Investigator, was going to include a description of a case in which a California radar operator tracked four UFOs. The objects were reportedly cruising in excess of 3,600 mph. The incident would go on to receive frequent mention from NICAP representatives.

The article further explained Adm. Roscoe Hillenkoetter would help govern NICAP. “The CIA which he headed is Uncle Sam's top intelligence agency,” the writer pointed out.

Adm. Fahrney was listed as a founder of the organization. Maj. Fournet's inclusion and expertise as a former UFO investigator for the Air Force was cited, and the involvement of community leaders was noted.

Maj. Keyhoe's career as an author of three UFO books was referenced. He was also reported as believing the Air Force had a plot to keep UFO facts from the public. Keyhoe was quoted as saying the real mission of NICAP was to get the Air Force to open its secret files on saucers. The popularity of the perspective illustrates how UFO tunnel vision creates blind spots for various circumstances such as national security issues.

Frankly, it borders on inexplicable how military officers, many with substantial experience in the intelligence community, could not see it problematic to demand secret files be opened. Potential hidden agendas of the intelligence officers partaking in such a scheme momentarily aside, it is rather dumbfounding how this could not have been understood to inevitably create suspicions about the loyalty and intentions of involved parties, if not their very competence. At least some of them numbered among those who apparently found the prospect of alien life visiting us so overwhelmingly intellectually seductive they didn't care what apple carts they upset.

This is a primary area that demonstrates a difference in the thinking habits among people who find the NICAP story to be about UFOs, as compared to those who find it interesting for social reasons, such as the seeming ongoing CIA presence. Similar could actually be said about the UFO topic in general. It makes perfect sense to people with a burning – and arguably understandable – desire to learn about UFOs if they demand the military and intelligence agencies open all potentially related classified files. It makes equally as much sense to those with an eye to the intelligence community that such files remain classified for reasons that, in probably a vast majority of instances, have little to nothing to do with UFOs.

Such reasons might include properly classified information pertaining to sources and methods. In such cases the publishing of records might detrimentally reveal how data was obtained and analyzed. If your U-2 plane is classified and its pilot is supposed to be retired and running a dairy farm in Wisconsin, you're not very well going to give Donald Keyhoe a file explaining how the plane helped record flight capabilities of an aircraft he happens to mistakenly believe to originate from another planet.

You're also not going to throw caution to the wind and release files which may exist pertaining to flying objects you haven't confidently identified, even if the data collecting process does not jeopardize operations security. You necessarily interpret recorded air traffic as human-manufactured aircraft. You likewise investigate occurrences of radar anomalies as weather phenomena, deceptive electronic warfare (see electronic countermeasures), technical malfunctions or similar circumstances. To you, it's not about a “UFO,” it's an information gathering process and a bit of a poker game in which you don't tip your hand.

You simply do not want your adversaries to know how much you do or do not know about what they're doing. Neither do you want them to know about your latest tools and abilities to document what they're doing. Intelligence agencies are not in the business of clarifying operations, and they most certainly do not exist for the purpose of making their understandings of any given topic clear to the global public. We may argue the practicality of the policies all we want, but the facts will remain.

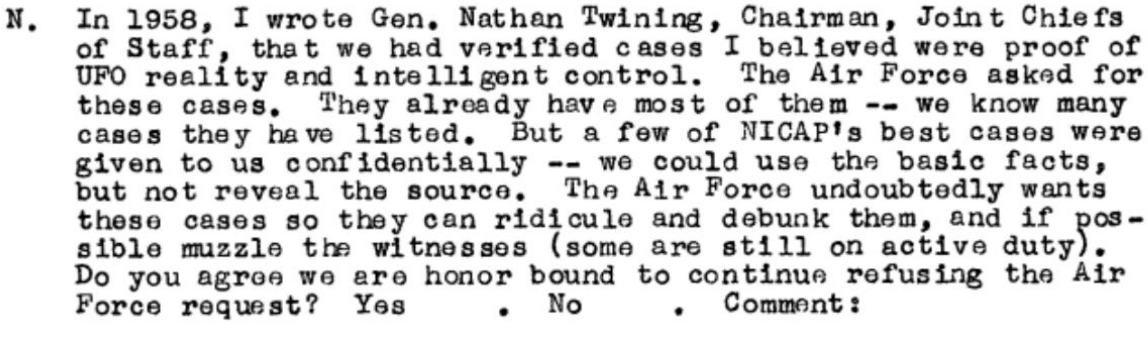
In contrast, those afflicted with UFO tunnel vision tend to only see reports and classified files as indicative of some type of anomalous phenomena, if not nonhuman intelligence or ET. They often confidently believe classified records contain profound revelations about UFOs themselves. Arguments to the contrary, or even suggestions it might not be in the best national interest to reveal which files are about relatively legitimate unknowns and which are not, are typically dismissed out of hand. No matter how many files are released, the supposed best files are always believed to remain slightly out of reach.

UFO groups and their supporters tend to make judgments about what constitutes a mysterious UFO, as compared to an aircraft not yet identified or similar prosaic occurrence. The military has understandably always been interested in monitoring air traffic and related intelligence matters, and often does not detail its reasons and findings. Once saucer enthusiasts form mental constructs and assumptions around events of their choosing, it is often nearly impossible for them to contemplate an alternative and less sensational context.

“I consider that the evidence that the UFOs are real and are interplanetary machines is conclusive,” Keyhoe was quoted in the above referenced 1957 newspaper article. He therefore apparently believed classified files would confirm his conclusion, and he may very well have been unaware his supposition was not an objective observation. He certainly would not have been the first or last.

Keyhoe composed a report to the NICAP Board of Governors and Panel of Special Advisors in 1959 in which he included a poll. The second question asked if they agreed the Air Force withholding information on UFOs is dangerous, and if it could lead to a false claim by the USSR that saucers are secret Soviet weapons.[59] The arguably overly simplistic question represented one of Keyhoe's ongoing talking points in which he employed a strategy of suggesting UFO secrecy was detrimental to public safety. Among his reasons was the argument UFOs could be mistaken for Soviet aggression with potentially catastrophic results.

Keyhoe's poll to NICAP leadership also included the following item:



N. In 1958, I wrote Gen. Nathan Twining, Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff, that we had verified cases I believed were proof of UFO reality and intelligent control. The Air Force asked for these cases. They already have most of them -- we know many cases they have listed. But a few of NICAP's best cases were given to us confidentially -- we could use the basic facts, but not reveal the source. The Air Force undoubtedly wants these cases so they can ridicule and debunk them, and if possible muzzle the witnesses (some are still on active duty). Do you agree we are honor bound to continue refusing the Air Force request? Yes . No . Comment:

Keyhoe's ability to pry UFO reports from within the military became a staple of his reputation. The circumstances might be considered rather astonishing of a retired officer obtaining confidential information with potential security implications while refusing to disclose it to applicable authorities. While some might consider this to be heroic efforts at UFO Disclosure, suffice it to say that was not the position of the U.S. Air Force. It would only stand to reason solutions and counter strategies would be considered by the powers that be.

Records obtained from the CIA indicate in 1958 Keyhoe wrote the Agency inquiring about what would come to be known as the Robertson Panel, the scientific UFO think tank explored earlier. The letter, provided in its entirety in the following two images, contains several points of interest. We can observe Keyhoe implementing his strategy of suggesting UFO secrecy was a threat to public safety. We also see him informing the Agency of his knowledge since 1953 of the meeting of the then-secret CIA scientific advisory panel.

With the approval of Board members with whom I have discussed the situation, I am writing again to ask what part the Central Intelligence Agency plays in the official investigation of the unidentified flying objects.

Since January 1953 I have been aware of the fact that the Central Intelligence Agency assembled a group of scientists at the Pentagon to examine the evidence on UFOs and to decide or suggest a course of action. Several months ago I was questioned by an investigator of the McClellan Subcommittee on Government Operations. During one of the several interviews in which I gave the subcommittee a mass of verified evidence, I told the investigator of the 1953 meeting of scientists and suggested that he ask for the copy of the official report.

Later he told me that the Air Force explained that this was not an Air Force document and that they would have to ask the approval of the agency involved. On still another occasion the investigator told me that this had proved to be the Central Intelligence Agency and that he had been sent a summary of the full report, which was classified.

Until that time, the Air Force had officially denied the existence of any such document. However, shortly after I had the verification from the McClellan subcommittee investigator, the Air Force admitted that there was such a document, as I had claimed. Within a short time they released what they said was a summary of the main points, and the conclusions of the scientists. No mention was made of the connection with the Central Intelligence Agency.

Since then, requests for the full report of this group have been refused, on the grounds that the report is classified.

The National Investigations Committee is hereby requesting declassification of this full report so that we may examine the document and the evidence along with the scientists' conclusions.

The Air Force has repeatedly stated that there is absolutely no danger connected with unidentified flying objects. It has also said that there is no classification as regards national security. It has admitted "official use only" classification, which, the Air Force says, is to protect the names of witnesses who do not wish to be publicly listed.

Since the CIA document is said not to list witnesses' names but to discuss the general problem, there is no reason apparent why it should not be declassified, as requested.

Despite the published conclusions of the 1953 scientists group, we have found that there is an increasing public belief that the UFOs may possibly be unfriendly. We have absolutely no evidence to prove that they are hostile and I cite this only to prove the danger of the present secrecy policy. Secrecy breeds ignorance of the subject and it could lead to hysteria or even panic under certain conditions. I believe that an open discussion of the problem would serve the best interests of the country.

In addition to requesting a copy of the formal report drawn up by the scientists in 1953, NICAP requests an interview with an official of the Central Intelligence Agency who is qualified to speak for the CIA on this subject. It is our belief that a frank discussion of the problems will be of mutual benefit.

In my previous letters, I gave you the name of some of our Board members, including Vice Admiral R. H. Hillenkoetter, USN (Ret.), who formerly was director of the Central Intelligence Agency. I am sure that Admiral Hillenkoetter, as well as all the members of our Board and our Special Advisers would tell you, if questioned, that they disagree with the present secrecy about unidentified flying objects.

With a membership covering all 49 states and many foreign countries, except those in the USSR, NICAP has, by its serious, factual approach won the attention of many important citizens here and abroad. Our factual press releases have been given serious attention by the press and by newscasters. We are in a position to help citizens in America, and elsewhere, for the facts which eventually will have to be made public. We hope the Central Intelligence Agency will agree to a conference or at least an interview on the various aspects of this problem.

Sincerely yours,

/s/ Donald E. Keyhoe

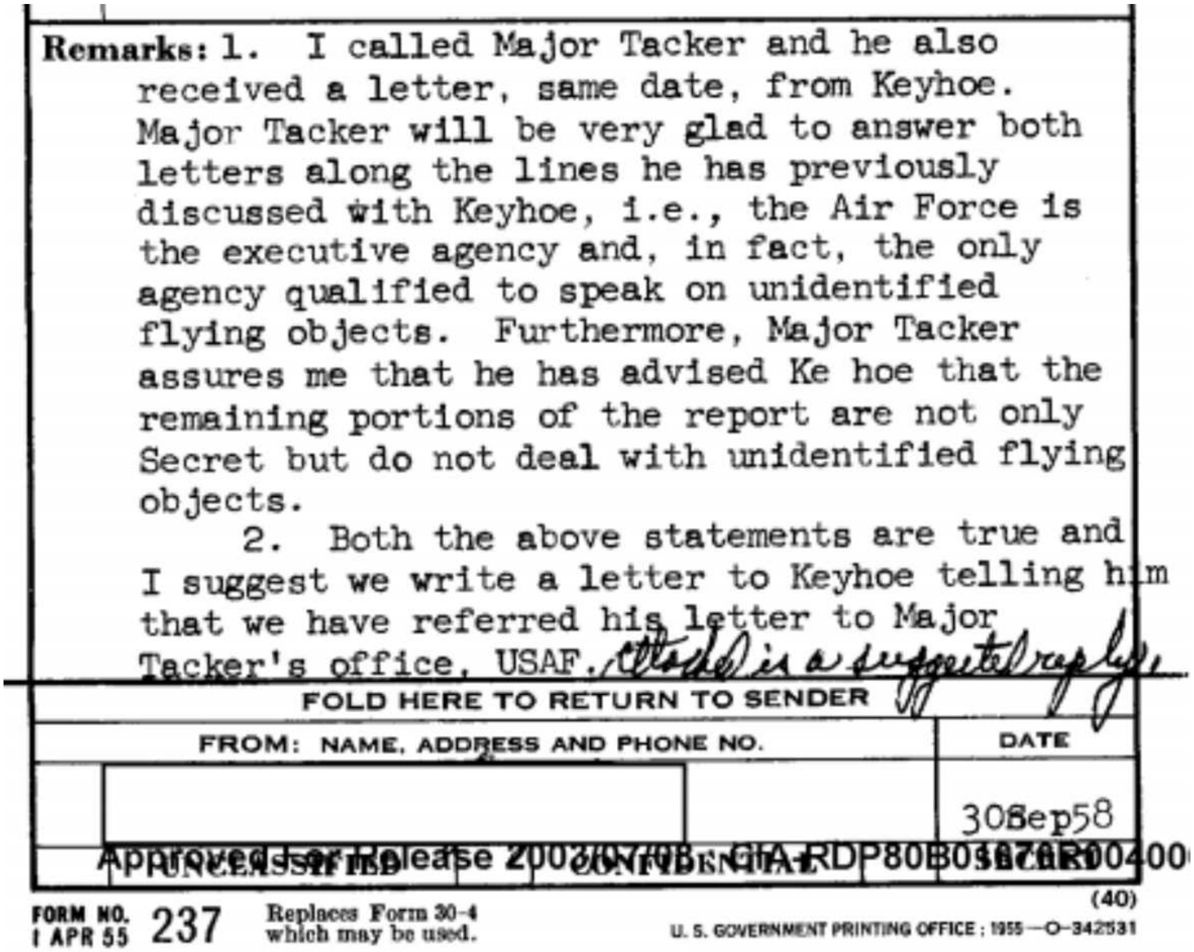
The same CIA pdf contains an inner Agency message, pictured below, discussing a response to Keyhoe's letter. Variations of this dance were recurring themes at multiple agencies.



Remarks: 1. I called Major Tacker and he also received a letter, same date, from Keyhoe. Major Tacker will be very glad to answer both letters along the lines he has previously discussed with Keyhoe, i.e., the Air Force is the executive agency and, in fact, the only agency qualified to speak on unidentified flying objects. Furthermore, Major Tacker assures me that he has advised Ke hoe that the remaining portions of the report are not only Secret but do not deal with unidentified flying objects.

2. Both the above statements are true and I suggest we write a letter to Keyhoe telling him that we have referred his letter to Major Tacker's office, USAF. Attached is a suggested reply.

It would not have been particularly difficult for the CIA to investigate and surmise some circumstances surrounding Keyhoe's sources of information about the Robertson Panel, considering the involvement in NICAP of men like Maj. Fournet, who testified to the group. Perhaps, however, there is a larger point to be made here about UFO tunnel vision. Maj. Keyhoe and UFO enthusiasts apparently found no issues with securing informants in places of interest. Neither did they seem to find it problematic to solicit military personnel to leak documents. They apparently found it honorable and encouraged it, at least to a certain extent.

Keyhoe and company then seemed to feel it completely reasonable to handle such information as if it belonged to them, minding its security, protecting it from the very agencies from which it was obtained. They then suggested they felt harassed when such agencies came calling, or persecuted at the prospect of having their organization infiltrated in similar manners as they were themselves infiltrating agencies. Whatever one's opinion on such issues, it should not be difficult to understand why I question the wisdom or authenticity of people, particularly intelligence officers, who failed to grasp the problematic nature of the ideology. NICAP alienation was arguably much more the expected natural evolution of events than an exception.

A bit of tolerance and empathy may be extended to NICAP and mid 20th century UFO activists. Granted, there wasn't much of a template with which to work. The more experience the UFO scene got under its collective belt, the more difficult it becomes to understand outrage about how swatting beehives leads to bee stings.

The image below is from a now declassified CIA file and represents a handwritten note apparently arising out of Keyhoe's then-latest inquiry to the National Security Council about saucer policy. The four-page file contains a 1958 exchange between Keyhoe and the Council, which includes the NSC advising him copies were being forwarded to the Department of Defense. The NSC Executive Secretary, when subsequently writing the DOD, enclosed copies to the CIA as well, due to Keyhoe's assertion he had proof the Agency was concerned with UFOs.

We might surmise the NSC alerted the DOD and CIA to Keyhoe's persistent questions about UFO policies for any number of reasons that did not necessarily have much to do with covering up literal anomalous sky phenomena. At the least his implication about possessing information contradicting CIA public policy, regardless of the specific topic, was quite possibly viewed as reason enough in itself to keep the Agency advised. He was of course suggesting he had a secret, and at other times he outright said so.

We might also confidently surmise the NSC, CIA, and DOD personnel in this loop had to break their attention from something else in order to repeatedly deal with Keyhoe. It only stands to reason they would rather have not been writing extra letters and expending additional energy to address variations of the same question about UFOs over and over again.

The sheer audacity of some of Keyhoe's inquiries was shocking, perhaps even humorously so in hindsight. The following letter, from a CIA file, is indicative of another round of exchanges between the major and the Agency:

DONALD E. KEYHOE, Major USMC (Ret.)
Director of NICAP

DEK:k

The circumstances arose when in 1957 the CIA Office of Scientific Intelligence (OSI) requested the Contact Division (CD) obtain photos from Ralph C. Mayher, a photographer for KYW-TV in Cleveland. In November 1957, Mr. Mayher provided for analysis five photos he shot in 1952.

John Hazen, a CD officer, returned the photos to Mayher in December 1957. According to the CIA version of the story, Mayher asked Hazen for the Agency's evaluation of the pictures, explaining he intended to make a television show about UFOs and wanted to suggest an intelligence agency found his photos of interest. Hazen reportedly advised Mayher he would prefer the photographer not take that approach, but added Mayher was of course free to choose for himself.

Keyhoe later contacted Mayher, and stories of witness suppression and CIA interest in UFOs resulted. Keyhoe tried to confirm Hazen's employment with the Agency in writing in an effort to expose a CIA interest in UFOs, but no such letter would be forthcoming. Questions persisted about the Agency's role regarding UFOs, and the CIA eventually acknowledged its concern over secrecy made matters worse.

From the perspective of Keyhoe and his supporters, NICAP was advocating government accountability and transparency, or at least that was their public stance. It seems likely there were layers of agendas, and the most prevalent among Keyhoe and his allies appears to have been to separate the United States government from proof of an extraterrestrial presence that some in NICAP were thoroughly convinced the Air Force and CIA were hiding.

It warrants pointing out the CIA and company shared some responsibility in public mistrust, as explored in previous examples of deception and misdirection. It's not as if it was completely unjustified to suspect there were stories to be read between the lines. It is also understandable Keyhoe was motivated to document an apparent CIA interest in UFO photos after the Agency claimed it was not involved in UFO investigations.

It nonetheless seemed to remain outside the scope of UFO activist considerations that a claimed interest in photos did not necessarily translate into having an interest in them for the same reasons as UFO buffs. Neither did it necessarily mean OSI was concerned the pictures portrayed what some of the public happened to believe was captured on the film. There are lots of possibilities and potential scenarios.

For instance, while working on another research project, I happened upon documentation the FBI considered “using the pretext of an automobile accident” to conduct an interview with a person of interest. A file obtained from the FBI contained a 1969 message from the Washington Field Office, informing Director Hoover that, unless advised to the contrary, it would approach the person under the guise of investigating a car accident supposedly occurring in their vicinity and involving a government vehicle. The ruse would enable the interview without revealing the purpose of the investigation, which actually pertained to people the individual was with during the time in question.

The evolving opinion Keyhoe was “a nut” on the UFO topic, in addition to getting tired of conducting tedious correspondence with him, may have had something to do with content he chose to publish. In his 1953 book Flying Saucers from Outer Space, Keyhoe passed along an image now known as Silverman. Keyhoe cited a publication which depicted the photo as the capture of a Mars man, and included in his description a sensational story line that accompanied the picture. Keyhoe noted the tale was not new and had been previously run in a similar version by a different outlet.

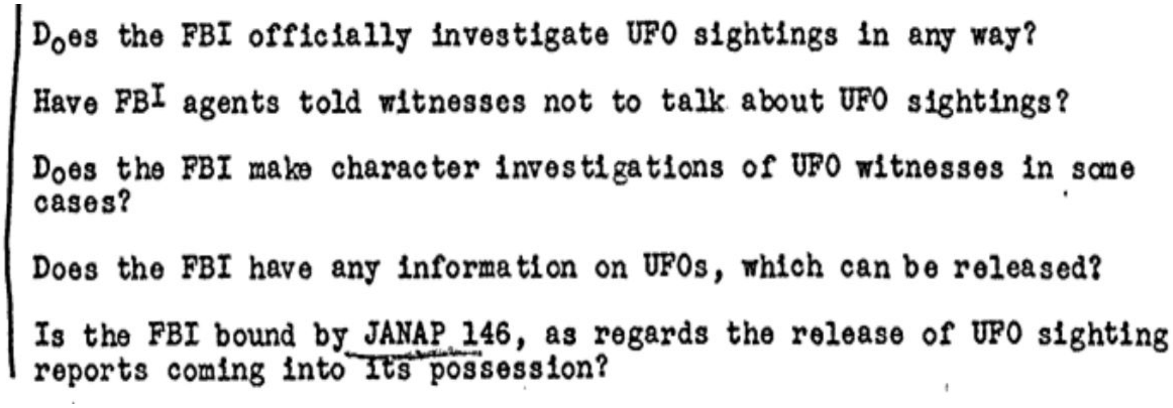
Keyhoe did not report and may have been unaware of the initial source of the story. According to internet personality and researcher Isaac Koi, the original rendition of the photo appeared on April 1, 1950, in the German newspaper Neue Illustrierte with the title "Der Mars-Mensch." A few days later the paper apparently admitted it was an April Fool's joke, but that did not stop the spread of the picture along with various embellished narratives. Silverman, pictured below, continues to periodically surface today, rarely with explanations of its origin as reported by Koi. The false stories are much more commonly repeated from one book and social media post to another.

A 1957 newspaper article, proclaiming saucer investigators offered a deal to the Air Force, reported that NICAP presented an eight-point plan of cooperation.[60] The plan was reportedly designed to end controversy and public confusion over UFOs. Intelligence officers taking up the NICAP cause were apparently either obtuse (for what may have been any number of reasons) or unaware the Air Force was not looking for Marine majors to offer unsolicited advice on how to run its affairs.

It is possible Keyhoe thought some of his moves were good publicity strategies. In a manner of speaking, they were, at least from the perspective that we're still talking about NICAP so many decades later. He may have even enjoyed a certain degree of success “pressuring” the Air Force and intelligence agencies into some UFO-related projects. The practicality and sincerity of the effort expended in such projects is very much in question, however. It is nonetheless clear future FOIA researchers benefited from some paths forged by the likes of Keyhoe and mid 20th century UFO investigators. Everything is relative.

It might also be considered that, somewhat in Keyhoe's defense, a number of UFO researchers still play such games today. It is common for UFO activists to purport to be pressuring government agencies. Whether or not current day UFO researchers sincerely consider their activities to be serious Disclosure ploys or simply a strategy to gain advantageous public attention is another matter.

Records pertaining to Maj. Keyhoe obtained from the FBI include a 1958 letter he authored to J. Edgar Hoover. The two-page letter indicates it was not Keyhoe's first submission inquiring about UFO policies to the FBI director. Along with his usual insinuations, the message included Keyhoe's request for an interview with a spokesperson “acquainted with the facts, and the FBI policy which may be involved,” as he similarly asked of the CIA. The following image from the letter shows questions Keyhoe additionally posed to Director Hoover:



Does the FBI officially investigate UFO sightings in any way?

Have FBI agents told witnesses not to talk about UFO sightings?

Does the FBI make character investigations of UFO witnesses in some cases?

Does the FBI have any information on UFOs, which can be released?

Is the FBI bound by JANAP 146, as regards the release of UFO sighting reports coming into its possession?

Subject, Director of National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena, by letter of 9/22/58 requested particulars of Bureau's participation concerning unidentified flying objects. The committee he heads is described on letterhead as "A privately supported fact finding civilian committee serving the public interests" and he lists several prominent individuals among "our Board members and Special Advisers." He is a retired Marine.

Keyhoe has been known to the Bureau since 1935 and was, and may still be, a free-lance writer. In 1948 he was described by Mr. Nichols as "a flamboyant writer and we have found from previous experience that much of his material is irresponsible." In 1951 the Director concurred with Mr. Nichols' statement that "We should not get involved with him."

As an example of his writing, the January, 1941, issue of "Cosmopolitan" magazine carried an article written by Keyhoe and John J. Daly entitled "Hitler's Plan to Seize the United States Merchant Marine." This article indicated the Bureau had in its possession documents concerning such a plan by Hitler which indication was completely false.

The FBI may have been among the more effective of all the intelligence agencies at dealing with Keyhoe, as evidenced in Hoover's response to Keyhoe's latest inquiry:

Dear Sir:

In response to your letter of September 22, 1958, the following requested information is furnished:

> It is not a function of this Bureau to make character investigations of individuals who have witnessed unidentified flying objects.

flying objects prove to be extraterrestrial, is not a function of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. This Bureau is, of course, interested in any aspect of any development which would affect the internal security of the United States.

Your letter of September 22, 1958, requested an interview with an official of this Bureau concerning the matter of unidentified flying objects and this Bureau's policy in connection therewith. Since this Bureau's policy in connection with unidentified flying objects has been fully set forth above, you may feel that the requested interview is not now necessary.

Sincerely yours,

I requested the FBI conduct a search for additional records, but it indicated no files were located that dated back to 1935, as referenced in the above FBI memo. The reference may have pertained, at least in part, to the mention of Keyhoe's “irresponsible” writing. This was not a perspective limited to the FBI, as it was considered potentially relevant to some of his critics as well.

Keyhoe was a well established writer by the time he authored UFO books, having been published in such popular outlets as Saturday Evening Post and Reader's Digest. He had also written for some of the most widely distributed pulp magazines on topics considered science fiction or “weird fantasy”. That aspect of his writing career contributed to doubts surrounding his motives and objectivity about the UFO topic. Keyhoe's short story “Through the Vortex” made the July 1926 cover of Weird Tales:

Raymond Palmer was arguably the king of the 20th century pulp fantasy genre, publishing such magazines as Amazing Stories and Fate. Palmer covered the Kenneth Arnold flying saucer story extensively, as well as some quite dubious UFO cases. The lines between fact and fiction were extremely blurry. It is widely accepted that pulp mags played substantial roles in cultivating public belief in saucers and fringe topics, and their popularity is undeniable.

Files released by the FBI indicate an investigation of Palmer was opened in 1953 after concerns were expressed to the Bureau he was a Communist sympathizer. The perception was based upon articles advocating peace that were published by Palmer. Such points of view were often considered anti-military and unpatriotic. Similar was the case among messages promoted by so-called contactees, who claimed their ET diplomats wanted everybody to just get along.

The FBI did not find Palmer to be a Communist threat, but problems arose in 1954 when he published a story in his Mystic Magazine titled “Venusians Walk Our Streets!”. The piece was authored by Paul M. Vest, who claimed acquaintance with said Venusians. Of concern to Hoover was Vest's allegation that FBI labs were in possession of a plate of heavy steel which, according to a letter received by the Bureau, Vest's story claimed “a man from space marked with a half inch deep streak by simply, and without effort, passing his fingernail over it.”

Hoover subsequently confirmed to his satisfaction the Bureau was not in possession of any such steel plate, nor did it have knowledge of visitors from Venus. The director then advised agents to make Palmer, of Evanston, Illinois, aware that was the case. Hoover further requested agents inform Palmer “we do not appreciate having the name of the Bureau used in fantastic stories appearing in his publication to add credence to his stories and articles.”

A resulting FBI memo in response to Hoover indicates Palmer was contacted. He claimed it was an oversight on his part to allow the dubious reference to the Bureau to remain in Vest's story and apologized for it. He also offered to print a retraction, refuting Vest's claim about the FBI. According to the FBI report, Palmer stated “he would be glad to insert an article agreeable to the Bureau” in the next issue of Mystic Magazine. He was informed the FBI had no recommendation in that respect, and that whether or not he desired to refute part of Vest's article was solely up to him.

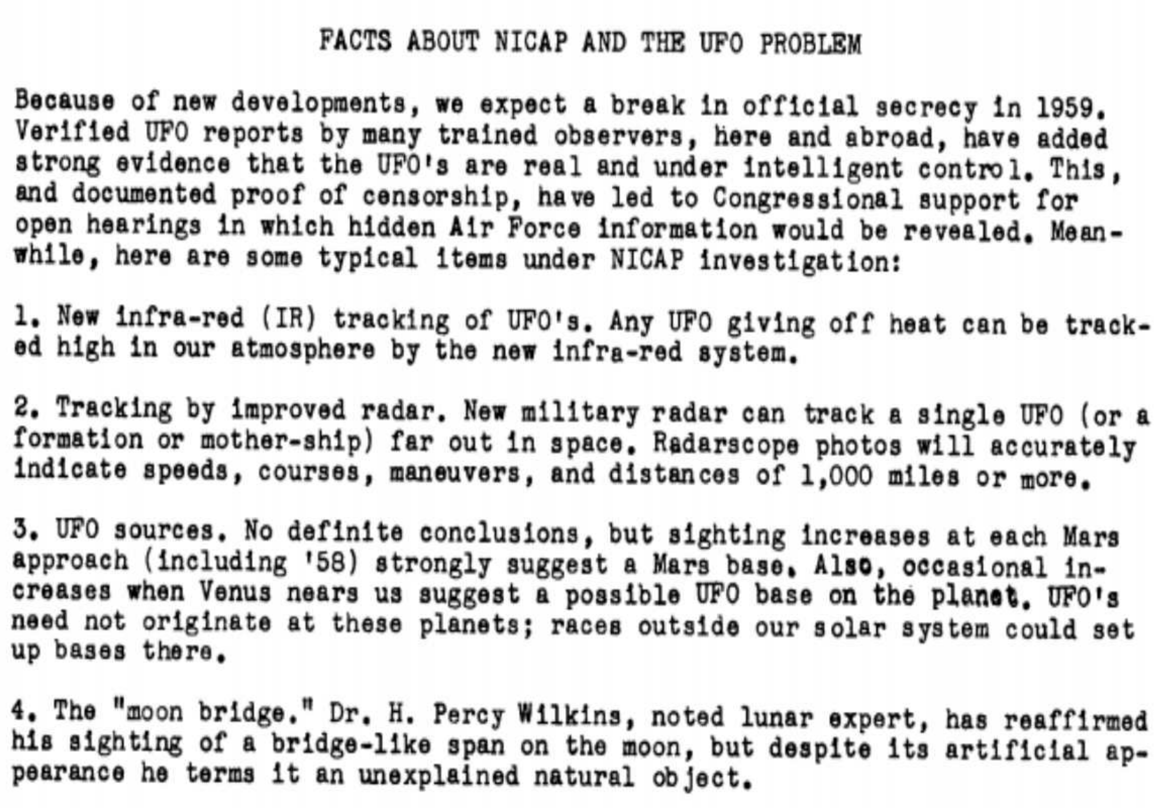
During the course of the interview, Palmer told the FBI he regularly forwarded UFO-related letters to the CIA. The July 22, 1954, memo explains, “Mr. Palmer advised that he receives approximately 50 letters per week concerning flying saucers and pointed out that he takes those letters which appear to be the most feasible and furnishes the information to the Central Intelligence Agency in Chicago, Illinois, noting that he has been advised that they are interested in flying saucer reports.”

A 1953 report contained in the FBI Palmer file lists five publications operated by Palmer at that time, including Fate. The report added that Fate magazine had a circulation of 65,000. One might wonder if Palmer made similar offers to the CIA as he extended to the FBI about publishing agreeable stories.

The FBI responded to my 2020 FOIA request on Palmer with the above referenced file. It informed me another file might be obtained from the National Archives and Records Administration. NARA responded to my subsequent request that it indeed located and would process the file, which consists of 33 pages, after NARA returns to regular operating procedures following the pandemic. The file has not yet been received as of this writing.

NICAP Secretary Richard Hall piled on the Air Force in a 1959 article in the Hartford Times titled Air Force Study Called Fiasco.[61] Hall stated NICAP did not necessarily hold the idea that saucers are vehicles from other worlds. Someone apparently needed to make Director Keyhoe aware that was the case. Keyhoe's public statements obviously suggested otherwise.

In the same article, Hall made the point that UFO data obtained by the Air Force was not available for study by the scientific community, only the conclusions in the form of fact sheets. While Hall's point is well taken, the following item, attached to a message signed by Maj. Keyhoe, is the type of fact sheet NICAP distributed in its literature and apparently preferred:[62]



FACTS ABOUT NICAP AND THE UFO PROBLEM

Because of new developments, we expect a break in official secrecy in 1959. Verified UFO reports by many trained observers, here and abroad, have added strong evidence that the UFO's are real and under intelligent control. This, and documented proof of censorship, have led to Congressional support for open hearings in which hidden Air Force information would be revealed. Meanwhile, here are some typical items under NICAP investigation:

1. New infra-red (IR) tracking of UFO's. Any UFO giving off heat can be tracked high in our atmosphere by the new infra-red system.

2. Tracking by improved radar. New military radar can track a single UFO (or a formation or mother-ship) far out in space. Radarscope photos will accurately indicate speeds, courses, maneuvers, and distances of 1,000 miles or more.

3. UFO sources. No definite conclusions, but sighting increases at each Mars approach (including '58) strongly suggest a Mars base. Also, occasional increases when Venus nears us suggest a possible UFO base on the planet. UFO's need not originate at these planets; races outside our solar system could set up bases there.

4. The "moon bridge." Dr. H. Percy Wilkins, noted lunar expert, has reaffirmed his sighting of a bridge-like span on the moon, but despite its artificial appearance he terms it an unexplained natural object.

The suggestion of an impending break in official UFO secrecy was destined to become an assertion of remarkable staying power. Its perseverance weathered some 70 years and is going strong.

In more recent times, the proclamations of intelligence community figures-turned ufologists at To The Stars Academy fueled hope that UFO Disclosure was upon us. The primary flag wavers have since left the organization and the “Academy” appears relatively disbanded as of this writing. Among the TTSA crew was a Pentagon employee asserting he directed a UFO research program, a former Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Intelligence, a defense contractor, and a veteran CIA officer, among others. The similarities to NICAP were striking.

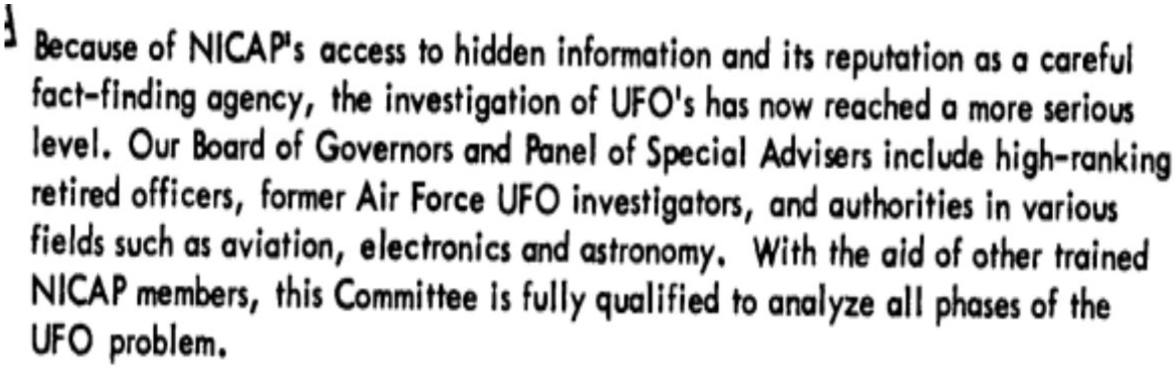
After their TTSA departures, plenty of talk persisted among them about unidentified aerial phenomena (UAP) maneuvering at excessive speeds, retrieved UFO debris, and the ever present “it's not one of ours” theme. Actual evidence was disappointingly scarce, particularly as compared to talk that it existed but was classified. Like their predecessors from years past, this crew was also fond of intermittently saying it's aliens and then chastising people for accusing them of saying it's aliens. Basically, the current and former TTSA personnel asserted they'd love to tell us what they know but can't, but, not to despair, they would be happy to demand Uncle Sam tell us what he knows and let the saucer out of the bag.

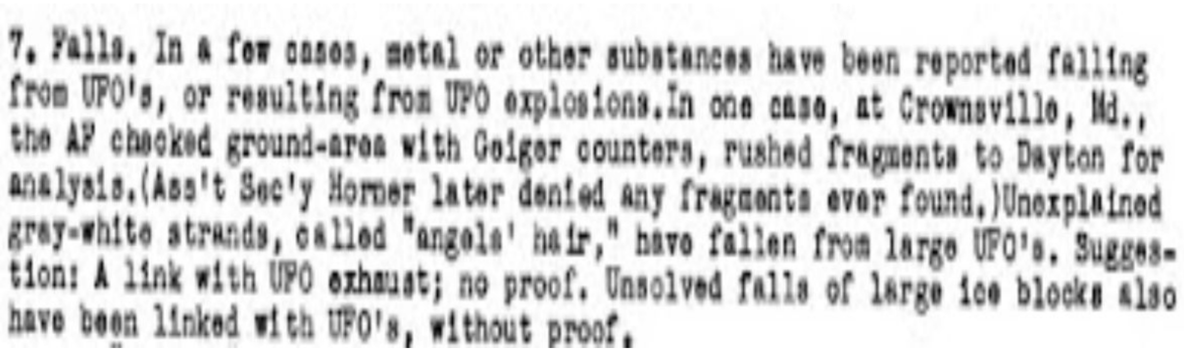
A concern about the credulous acceptance of the TTSA movement was how its leaders and followers alike had tendencies to suggest the circumstances were unprecedented. The talking point was along the lines of government insiders had never before come out in such strong support of the reality of UFOs and made such commitments to bust through the wall of official secrecy. The perspective was simply not true, and those cultivating it were either poorly informed or disingenuous, either of which obviously devalues discourse.

Certain aspects of TTSA were remarkably similar to NICAP, as illustrated in the image below taken from a letter signed by Keyhoe and distributed by NICAP. The message was a staple of the organization, repeated widely.[63]



Because of NICAP's access to hidden information and its reputation as a careful fact-finding agency, the investigation of UFO's has now reached a more serious level. Our Board of Governors and Panel of Special Advisers include high-ranking retired officers, former Air Force UFO investigators, and authorities in various fields such as aviation, electronics and astronomy. With the aid of other trained NICAP members, this Committee is fully qualified to analyze all phases of the UFO problem.

The following statement distributed in NICAP literature shows the long held theme of retrieved UFO debris.[64] As in the cases of Maury Island and Dr. Olavo Fontes in Brazil, nothing substantial ever seems to come of these samples.



7. Falls. In a few cases, metal or other substances have been reported falling from UFO's, or resulting from UFO explosions.In one case, at Crownsville, Md., the AF checked ground-area with Geiger counters, rushed fragments to Dayton for analysis.(Ass't Sec'y Horner later denied any fragments ever found.)Unexplained gray-white strands, called "angels' hair," have fallen from large UFO's. Suggestion: A link with UFO exhaust; no proof. Unsolved falls of large ice blocks also have been linked with UFO's, without proof.

TTSA representatives frequently discussed alleged exotic metals and UFO debris, often suggesting significant research was in progress. The narrative culminated into securing an Army contract and the rather stunning acquisition of “Art's Parts,” a sample of material of dubious origin. The material was once provided to the late paranormal talk radio icon Art Bell by a listener with a story, and more recently kept in the care of Linda Moulton Howe. Its 2019 transition to TTSA included a $35,000 payday for Ms. Moulton Howe. As of this writing, the story pretty much ended there, other than lots of questions that remain about the Army contract.

Some of the most celebrated TTSA story lines involved the credit the group got for influencing politicians such as Sen. Harry Reid, Sen. Marco Rubio, and former Director of National Intelligence John Ratcliffe to openly discuss UAP. A report from the Office of the Director of National Intelligence was produced in mid 2021. A lot of hope was hung on the circumstances, particularly given there wasn't much else left to cling to about TTSA in the wake of its breakup. You shouldn't be entirely surprised to read there wasn't too much conclusively established about UFOs in the report, and further investigation would be required.

Some felt the UAP report marked an intriguing change of policy by the powers that be, acknowledging a UFO reality of sorts, while at least somewhat proposing a course for future research. Others interpreted the report as less significant, failing to clarify the said phenomena necessarily amount to anything more than incidents lacking enough data to aptly make a conclusive identification of relatively prosaic circumstances.

There is an enormous amount of precedence of official and upper level interest in UFOs, even if often ignored by many current UFO enthusiasts. Involved parties include Barry Goldwater, Gerald Ford, the Clintons, the Rockefellers and many more. Reviews such as conducted by the Robertson Panel are not entirely uncommon by any means, and discussions of UFOs and the groups that investigate them may be found in the Congressional record.

Reports on the overall UFO situation, as well as specific incidents and intelligence studies, have been produced by the CIA, Air Force and other authorities, even if their thoroughness and sincerity may often be argued.

We might observe about TTSA, similarly to NICAP, that it is quite concerning when intelligence officials, of all people, seem to either not understand the problematic nature of demanding UFO Disclosure or, for whatever reasons, pretend they do not. In the case of NICAP, it did not have 70 years of hindsight to draw upon. TTSA did.

We might consider similar about inadequate research practices. For instance, it would seem such seasoned personnel would be keenly aware of the importance of presenting evidence for public review, as compared to demanding claims be accepted on faith.

Intelligence officials and scientists are rather uniquely qualified to understand the 'put up or shut up' principle, and should anticipate being held accountable for providing verifiable proof in proportion to assertions. They should expect to be questioned about unsupported suppositions presented as facts. They are otherwise indistinguishable from UFO story peddlers who disingenuously target audiences who simply do not know any better.

Vulnerable demographics in the UFO genre are all too eager to embrace stories that support their bias. They are historically considered advantageous targets for charlatans due to their willingness to support and defend those who tell them what they want to hear, all the while showing a near total lack of concern for verifying the claims.

When less scrupulous UFO investigators avert from journalists who pose relevant, pointed inquiries, and they become defensive about an increasingly apparent lack of research integrity, it is entirely reasonable to question the value of their contributions to a body of evidence. We not only have the right, but the responsibility.

Hoover and the Bureau may have held fast to a public policy of neutrality towards NICAP, but by 1961 internal reports revealed a much more decisive view.[65] Information was compiled for the New Orleans Field Office after a clerk inquired whether there would be any objection to becoming active in NICAP. The resulting FBI report frowned upon the NICAP attack on the Air Force and criticized Keyhoe's writing.

“A number of former United States military officers have been affiliated with the NICAP,” the document continued, “and Keyhoe has openly attempted to capitalize upon their names and military titles. The Bureau has been most cautious in handling correspondence from the NICAP to avoid any inference that we hold views, either favorable or unfavorable, to this organization.

“As the above information regarding Donald Keyhoe and the NICAP reflects, the NICAP is not the type of organization with which the Bureau's name should become connected – either through membership of FBI employees in the NICAP or by any other means.”

It is for such reasons I find it difficult to accept without question that intelligence professionals decide to get involved with UFO organizations, sometimes deeply so, in strictly recreational capacities. It often just doesn't make sense for a number of reasons.

Meanwhile, members of the public persisted in writing Hoover and requesting guidance on NICAP. In 1962 a high school student, expressing concern about Communism and interest in propaganda, posed a question to the FBI director. The young man wanted to know if Hoover thought NICAP was either inspired or influenced by Communism.

Hoover diplomatically explained in response the FBI was strictly an investigative agency of the federal government and did not provide evaluations on organizations. He soon added, “Perhaps you will like to refer to my books, 'Masters of Deceit' and 'A Study of Communism'.”[66]

KEYHOE YEARS

Whatever culmination of events may specifically have contributed to the formation of NICAP, Donald Keyhoe at least seemed to be flying solo, independent of intelligence agency influence in daily operations. He was assisted by a cast, significant members of which included but were not limited to Richard Hall, Gordon Lore, Isabel Davis, Ann Druffel, Ted Bloecher, Don Berliner, and Larry Bryant. Many who contributed at NICAP became higher profile members of future UFO organizations and the UFO research community at large.

For all of its faults and questionable motives, NICAP was quite effective in some areas. Keyhoe and his closest allies were committed to certain standards of evidence, even if their methods of applying those standards might have been called into doubt at times. NICAP frequently made a point of criticizing aspects of the UFO circus it felt devalued the topic. Circumstances and people involved in such devaluing, Keyhoe reasoned, made it all the more difficult to accomplish getting the subject of UFOs taken seriously. NICAP committed itself to calling out those who tried to capitalize on the UFO topic through questionable means, a policy largely abandoned by future UFO organizations and to the detriment of the genre.

To be clear, many UFO organizations and high profile “researchers” became shameless enablers of poor investigative practices and sensational yet unverified tales. The most widely accepted reasons for such tactics is those tales put butts in seats. Little concern is typically given to the damage sustained to the credibility of an organization, the genre as a whole, or the consumers.

UFO writers and similar such individuals who rely on popularity for livelihood are often extremely hesitant to critically examine any story being embraced by their targeted audience. They would often much rather ride coattails than implement professional research standards. Likewise, they frequently refuse to acknowledge scientific findings that contradict cherished beliefs, such as those pertaining to memory fallibility, the unreliability of witness testimony, and even forensics research which could be implemented in some instances. Such common practices might be considered particularly hypocritical and self-defeating given the genre's disingenuous longstanding claim to strive for acceptance from the scientific community.

Among those criticized by Keyhoe were contactees, a demographic who claimed to interact with flying saucer occupants from other worlds. Keyhoe floated the idea contactees should be administered lie detector tests, facilitated by NICAP.

He was likewise outspoken against charlatans who incorporated UFOs into their scams. Keyhoe took the opportunity in 1957 to write a letter of congratulations to FBI Director Hoover when a Bureau investigation resulted in just such an arrest. The accused had used a UFO story as a tool to swindle a woman out of 38 grand. Calculating inflation, that would currently be over $360,000. From an ensuing article:[67]

“Following up the FBI arrest of Harold J. Berney, 59 year old ex-convict, for a 'Trip to Venus' swindle in Washington, D.C., the National Investigations Committee has congratulated FBI Director, J. Edgar Hoover, for exposing the fraud and has offered its full cooperation in securing evidence of other false UFO claims.

“'One of our purposes,' NICAP wrote Director Hoover, 'is to turn the spotlight on such fraudulent claims, whether made for personal gain, publicity or other reasons. Acting for the Board and the members of NICAP, I should like to congratulate you and the Federal Bureau of Investigation for your public exposure of this case.'

“Berney was arrested in Alabama on charges of swindling Pauline E. Goebel, Washington, D.C., out of $38,000 in an alleged scheme to set up communications between Venus and the earth.

“Berney's arrest followed his attempt to sell a book manuscript in which he had related a dramatic story of visits to Venus.

“According to Berney, he was picked up by a flying saucer which landed in Texas with two frozen bodies inside. After transferring to a larger ship, the story ran, Berney reached Venus where he learned advanced sciences and cultures. During his stay, Berney said, he was chosen to be an earth agent for Venus, specifically to set up a communications system.

“A publisher to whom Berney submitted the manuscript tipped off Washington police and Detective Sgt. Millard Dixon uncovered some interesting facts which brought in the FBI.

“After producing a new type of antenna, Berney had set up a Delaware company he called the Telewand Corporation. Miss Goebel and another backer financed the operation, according to the FBI, including the 'trips to Venus' which Berney reported. Later a package reached the backers, supposedly from a Venusian comrade of Berney's named Ucellus. Inside were Berney's camera, his credentials, pictures of his family and about $300 in cash. Along with these was a message saying that Berney had died on Venus.

"A check on Berney's record, according to the FBI, disclosed that he had served two years for selling watered stocks in Michigan, eight years for violating postal regulations in West Virginia, and five years on another charge in Florida.

"Following Berney's trail from Eagle Pass, Texas, where the package had been mailed, the FBI located him working as a sign painter in Pritchard, Alabama, where the arrest took place."

The article went on to explain Hoover diplomatically stated to Keyhoe in a June 6, 1957, response, "I have received your letter of May 29, 1957, concerning our activities in the 'Trip to Venus' case and I want to thank you for your thoughtful congratulations."

One of the more fabled Keyhoe incidents involved his January 22, 1958, live CBS television appearance on Armstrong Circle Theater. His microphone was cut during the program as he asserted a Congressional committee was examining evidence that would prove UFOs were machines under intelligent control. Resulting accusations of conspiracies and censorship thrived.

The CBS director of editing countered that the program was carefully reviewed for security reasons. Statements to be made by Keyhoe on the show were reportedly cleared beforehand with the Air Force by the network, and Keyhoe was seemingly silenced when he deviated from the script.

Keyhoe's point of view on the matter as expressed in his subsequent letter, apparently distributed by NICAP to its mailing list:[68]

MAJOR DONALD E. KEYHOE
USMC (RET.) DIRECTOR

Dear friend:

Please accept my apologies for this form letter, made necessary by hundreds of queries about the Armstrong Theater UFO program. The statement I began when cut off the air was as follows:

"In the last six months, we (NICAP) have been working with a Senate committee investigating official secrecy on Unidentified Flying Objects. If open hearings are held, I feel it will prove beyond doubt that the flying saucers are real machines under intelligent control."

This statement was discussed with a sponsor's representative and he agreed it would get wide attention; but later the producer told me that since he personally was not informed he had no choice under CBS rules but to cut me off; however, even though this action was not deliberate censorship by CBS, strong AF pressure previously had caused deletion of a vital statement from my script. This script contained a statement listing four Air Force documents never officially released but which had been confirmed by the former chief of the AF Project Blue Book, Capt. E. J. Ruppelt, and by another former Project officer. The documents were:

1. A September 23, 1947 secret conclusion by Air Technical Intelligence Center (ATIC) that the flying saucers were real.
2. A 1948 top secret ATIC document concluding that the UFOs were interplanetary spaceships.
3. A secret Air Force Intelligence analysis of UFO maneuvers, also concluding that the objects were interplanetary.
4. A secret report by a panel of top scientists convened at the Pentagon in January 1953 which urged a) that the Air Force quadruple its UFO project, and b) that they give the American people all UFO information, including secret Air Force conclusions, unsolved sightings and photo analyses. (These recommendations were officially rejected.)

According to one of the program staff, when my script was shown to the AF representative he warned that the Air Force would immediately deny the documents' existence if I were permitted to make the statement. This would also include denouncing the quoted source—their own former Project chief—even though his book containing these items had been cleared by Air Force Security and Review. This Air Force threat, which appears to be censorship by intimidation, caused my planned statement to be cut out. In addition, though the program officials tried to present an impartial program, the AF insistence on an unfair share of the time forced me to delete many factual items refuting most AF claims. Among these were: Listing of official orders which silence armed forces personnel; citing of an AF letter to NICAP by Maj. Gen. Joe Kelly, Director Legislative Liaison USAF; refusing to release UFO reports; and admitting they are classified "For official use only."

In case you wish to join us and help to make all the facts public, we are enclosing information on NICAP. Regardless, we appreciate your interest and your protest against secrecy on this vital subject.

Sincerely yours,

Donald E. Keyhoe

A privately-supported fact-finding body serving the national public interest

It is not difficult to understand Maj. Keyhoe's perspective. That stated, his assumptions and preferred conclusions are reflected in his numbered points. He suggested a secret conclusion was reached that flying saucers were “real”; secret documents concluded UFOs were interplanetary spaceships; and he strongly implied the 1953 Robertson Panel advocated some kind of UFO disclosure policy.

Those claims are not entirely incorrect in all instances, not exactly, but they are certainly not accurate either. Keyhoe often alluded to information contained in some select reports, but took great liberty with context. I tend to think such discrepancies were typically due to the major's overwhelming desire to believe his suspicions were correct, combined with a certain amount of hearsay and similar dynamics that muddied the proverbial waters. I suspect that to be the case as compared to intentional distortion of the circumstances, but I of course do not conclusively know what drove Donald Keyhoe. I just tend to think the major succumbed to motivated reasoning, and he was clearly immersed in personal grudges. It's not difficult to envision he had a lot emotionally vested in chasing his white whale.

As Keyhoe indicated, there were in fact some reports associated with projects Sign and Grudge that suggested the possibility some UFOs could be interplanetary spacecraft. The conjecture was obviously not conclusive. Moreover, we now know the Robertson Panel collectively concluded the biggest threat from UFOs was related to propaganda, and the Panel actually found the UFO evidence presented to be unconvincing.

Keyhoe's incorrect supposition foreshadowed use of a tactic destined to characterize certain questionable researchers – and which would ultimately haunt truth seekers - for decades to come: as long as a claim could not be falsified, it was thoroughly promoted for maximum benefit. As this related to government reports and eventual FOIA researchers, the proverbial smoking gun document was perpetually believed, or at least claimed to be believed, to be just around the corner.

It was speculated the Robertson Panel report would tell all. When it did not, this was suspected to surely be due to a carefully orchestrated cover-up. The pursuit was then on to the next cache of documents, promoted as the ones “they” didn't want us to see. It was then fair game to purport the highly sought after docs would reveal most anything anybody felt like speculating, at least until it was conclusively discovered they did not. The process would then repeat. Many researchers were so certain their suspicions were correct that it didn't seem to ever occur to them what the circumstances might look like if, in fact, there were no documents confirming interplanetary spacecraft. The very notion of no hidden, damning UFO documents continues today to be considered by many to simply be outside the realm of possibility.

Perhaps in some instances, like the case of the MJ-12, some guys just decided to make their own so-called government documents. It's not as if there wasn't a demographic fully primed and eager to believe the batch of papers was authentic.

Later in 1958 Keyhoe was on another television show, The Mike Wallace Interview. Such public relations appearances were common for the NICAP leader.

The tolerant but skeptical Wallace allowed Keyhoe plenty of room, but did indeed question some of his proclamations. Keyhoe asserted the same four points about official government documents as contained in his above letter. Wallace countered that the Air Technical Intelligence Center was contacted at the Pentagon and strongly disputed Keyhoe's claims about the contents and even existence of the docs.

The show host conceded, however, the issue really came down to a matter of why Keyhoe believed the Air Force would conceal such information and deceive the American public. Keyhoe argued the reasons involved minimizing panic, and implemented as an analogy a famous Orson Welles radio broadcast, The War of the Worlds. It originally aired in 1938 and depicted a Martian invasion that scared the daylights out of listeners who thought it was really happening. The creative work was adapted into a film in 1953, just five years prior to the Wallace-Keyhoe interview.

Mike Wallace referenced the previously explored Harvard astrophysicist Dr. Donald Menzel. His status was cited as a leading authority in the scientific community who held a dismissive view of UFOs. Keyhoe challenged the doctor's assessment, suggesting the man was simply wrong.

“What would you like to see done about flying saucers that is not currently being done?” Wallace asked Keyhoe, a question I personally appreciated. Keyhoe's response included suggesting viewers write their Congressmen and urge inquiries and hearings, circumstances that have since not proven particularly productive on several occasions, spanning multiple generations. As I write this, rumblings for Congressional UFO hearings are once again making news cycles.

In a fascinatingly paradoxical sign of the times, the video clip of the interview includes Mike Wallace holding a lit cigarette made by Parliament, the show sponsor. Wallace periodically takes a break from his no nonsense investigative journalism to ironically explain the superior quality of the Parliament filter, findings, he asserts to the audience, to be confirmed by the United States Testing Company.

In 1958 NICAP landed a researcher who substantially shaped its future. Richard Hall was born on Christmas in 1930 in Hartford, Connecticut. According to his resume, he enlisted in the Air Force in 1949.[69] He enrolled at Tulane University in 1954 and graduated with a BA in philosophy and minor in mathematics.

Hall first became aware of Keyhoe's writing in the early 1950's while serving in the Air Force. A few short years later, while attending Tulane in New Orleans, he came across a letter written from Keyhoe to the college's resident astronomer. By that point Hall was publishing his own newsletter, Satellite, and immediately upon learning of NICAP wrote Keyhoe and offered his services. It was after his 1958 graduation, Hall later wrote in 1994, that he set off to the nation's capital “on an adventure that would dominate my life until this day.”

He was soon offered a part-time position with a commitment from Keyhoe it would become full-time as finances improved. “The prospect of receiving any salary at all for investigating UFOs was irresistible,” Hall wrote. He would go on to be credited with organizing NICAP subcommittees, coordinating a network of investigators, and editing publications, among other responsibilities and substantial contributions.

A transcript of a 1958 article published in the Fayetteville Observer quoted Hall as stating there was no doubt in his mind UFOs were real. It did not necessarily have to follow that they were spaceships, he added, but identified that as “probably the most reasonable explanation.”[70]

“Somebody knows a lot more about UFOs than they are willing to admit,” Hall asserted, “but the public in general is blissfully unaware that it is being deprived of the facts.”

Although NICAP enjoyed support among the UFO faithful, that was not the case with entirely everyone who kept an eye cast towards saucer-hunting researchers. The late Jim Moseley had an infamous streak for skeptically-minded humor, often portrayed in his long running newsletter, Saucer Smear. In his 2010 book, Shockingly Close to the Truth!, Moseley explained Hall occasionally contributed content to Saucer Smear while attending Tulane. Moseley added he thought Hall considered himself “a high-powered intellectual,” and provided the following account:

“Sometime in 1958 or 1959, Hall and I had a telephone conversation concerning my 'attacks' on NICAP. Almost before we began, he asked me if I was taping our chat. I truthfully told him I wasn't and that I didn't own a tape recorder (I still don't). He kept coming back to this, alleging he could hear clicks on the line and so on. I kept denying it. Finally, Hall practically shouted into the phone that I was lying, that he knew I was taping the call. I saw red, yelled 'Paranoid!' into the phone, and slammed down the receiver. Things haven't been the same between the suspicious, ill-tempered, and very full of himself Dick Hall and me since."

Longtime UFO proponent and author Jerome Clark expressed a different view of Hall. "Under the sometimes fierce exterior," Clark wrote in a tribute to the late researcher, "Dick was a warm, gentle, witty, and forever curious man. He had many friends, and all of us will never cease missing him. He was a giant in ufology's earth."

Clark further suggested in his tribute to Hall it was more apparent all the time the extraterrestrial hypothesis was a correct explanation for some UFO reports. This, Clark implied, further demonstrated the wisdom Hall and he possessed. I would not agree, and I would be critical of Clark's choice to present the ETH in more of a factual context than matter of opinion.

It has been said money is not the primary reason most people stay at a job, and the notion is certainly supported by a review of NICAP. Keyhoe addressed the organization's financial shortcomings in a 1959 Director's Report to the Board of Governor's and Panel of Special Advisors.[71] He explained that he was often not drawing his own salary, and the organization was chronically behind in paying employees Richard Hall and Elizabeth Kendall. The latter, Keyhoe noted, worked five nights per week processing mail, filing material and the like. Kendall often voluntarily worked for free, or more hours than she was scheduled to be paid, due to her interest in UFOs. Keyhoe indicated he sometimes paid her out of his own pocket when able.

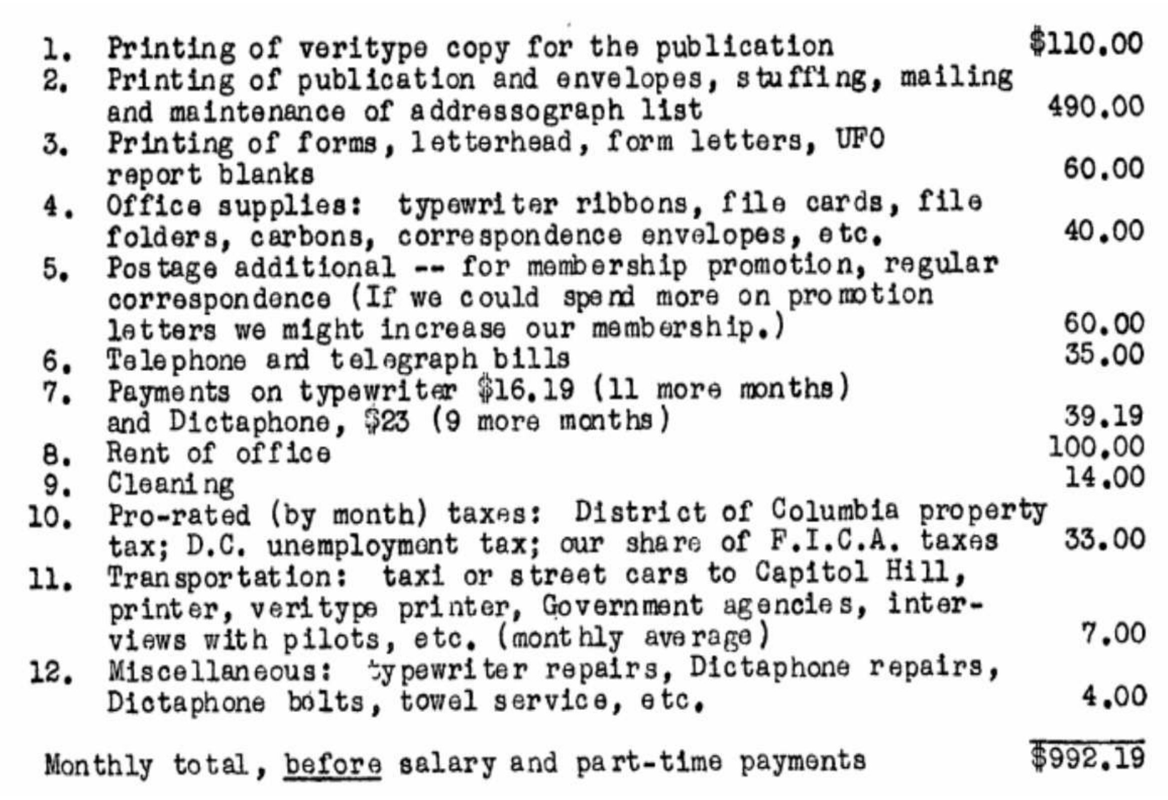
Keyhoe informed the Board he gave Hall a full-time position due to Hall's abilities to analyze UFO reports, write articles, handle correspondence and such. Hall's experience with UFO research was noted, as was the fact he declined better offers than NICAP could match from other potential employers.

According to the salary structure set up by the Board in 1957, Hall should have been receiving $6,000 per year, or what would be the current equivalent of over $57,000, factoring inflation as of this writing. However, Keyhoe explained further, Hall was initially only offered $45 per week. The pay was eventually upped to $270 per month, which would have been a bit over $2,400 monthly, calculating inflation.

At the time Keyhoe composed the 1959 report, he explained, NICAP had been unable in recent months to even pay Hall the $45 per week. To add insult to injury, Hall lent NICAP money.

“Not only that,” Keyhoe reported about failing to pay the young writer even his original salary, “Hall has borrowed on his insurance to loan NICAP money.”

The 1959 report included an itemized budget. The budget, excluding salaries, is pictured below:



1.	Printing of veritype copy for the publication	$110.00
2.	Printing of publication and envelopes, stuffing, mailing and maintenance of addressograph list	490.00
3.	Printing of forms, letterhead, form letters, UFO report blanks	60.00
4.	Office supplies: typewriter ribbons, file cards, file folders, carbons, correspondence envelopes, etc.	40.00
5.	Postage additional -- for membership promotion, regular correspondence (If we could spend more on promotion letters we might increase our membership.)	60.00
6.	Telephone and telegraph bills	35.00
7.	Payments on typewriter $16.19 (11 more months) and Dictaphone, $23 (9 more months)	39.19
8.	Rent of office	100.00
9.	Cleaning	14.00
10.	Pro-rated (by month) taxes: District of Columbia property tax; D.C. unemployment tax; our share of F.I.C.A. taxes	33.00
11.	Transportation: taxi or street cars to Capitol Hill, printer, veritype printer, Government agencies, interviews with pilots, etc. (monthly average)	7.00
12.	Miscellaneous: typewriter repairs, Dictaphone repairs, Dictaphone belts, towel service, etc.	4.00
	Monthly total, before salary and part-time payments	$992.19

The strong majority of expenses were costs associated with the printing of publications. Of the roughly $1,000 per month budget, a figure that would be over nine times higher if we factor inflation, substantially over half was allocated to printing, postage, and related items. That was certainly a factor in NICAP chronically failing to meet its newsletter commitments.

If minimum salaries for Hall and Kendall were added to the equation, the payroll would substantially increase the total expenses, before even counting the pay owed to Keyhoe. As future organizations and researchers learned, it was difficult to consistently raise that kind of money to pay people to specialize in UFOs.

In a 1957 report, Keyhoe previously told the Board the primary purpose of NICAP personnel was to investigate and report facts. “This is our main job,” he wrote with authority, underlining the final words of the phrase for emphasis.[72] How well he understood the differences between reporting facts and trying to persuade people to agree with him may be at issue, but it seemed clear enough he felt it was the NICAP purpose.

Trouble was, Keyhoe could not count on NICAP for his livelihood. The funds just frequently were not available. According to his reports to the Board, it was not unusual for him to spend more of his personal money on the organization than he earned.

Financial challenges momentarily aside, we might still consider the reasons researchers of the era thought their work was urgent and justified full-time, paid employment. It seems UFO investigators of the 1950's were often under the impression flying saucers were interplanetary vehicles, and that their perceived arrival was a relatively new occurrence. That might account for some of Keyhoe's passion and martyr-like behavior. It might seem much more difficult to envision how present day ufologists continue to attach such urgency to the notion of extraterrestrial visitors and similar concepts, as if the ideas are novel or some important event is imminent, in spite of the fact the genre has collectively held to that belief now for some 70 years.

In late September 1961 Maj. Keyhoe was written a letter by Betty Hill.[73] She described the now famous UFO sighting she experienced with her husband Barney less than a week earlier. Richard Hall forwarded Betty's letter to Walter N. Webb, who headed the Massachusetts NICAP Unit #1 Subcommittee at Cambridge. Webb was an astronomer who studied under Dr. J. Allen Hynek.

Betty's September 26, 1961, letter to Keyhoe did not include a description of having been abducted and examined by aliens. It seems to have taken the Hills a while to develop those perceptions. Her letter stated Barney saw “many figures scurrying about” on a pancake-shaped craft when he viewed it through binoculars. Betty added Barney's “mind has completely blacked out” about what happened after he made the observation, and indicated the couple was considering the services of a competent psychiatrist who used hypnotism.

Walter Webb soon made contact with the Hills. His October 26, 1961, resulting initial report is considered documentation of the first interview conducted with the Hills by a UFO investigator. Some future researchers would refer to it as a significant tool in identifying ways the story evolved and was seemingly embellished over time.

Webb wrote a final report on the Hill case in 1965. Points of interest include an assessment of the case as rendered by Dr. Benjamin Simon, the psychiatrist who worked with the couple and implemented hypnosis, apparently as a means to treat emotional trauma.

Webb explained Simon believed the Hills saw an aircraft of some kind, either conventional or perhaps classified, during what came to be known as the first encounter. The doctor did not suspect it was an alien spacecraft. Likewise, Simon did not believe the Hills encountered aliens at a later point in the evening.

“Regarding the second encounter (the abduction story),” Webb wrote, “[Simon] believes it happened only in Betty Hill's dreams and that Barney, upon hearing his wife tell about her dreams repeatedly, finally felt he must have been abducted, too.”

Simon's position has been misrepresented repeatedly as subscribing to alien abduction as an explanation for the Hill case. Not only did Walter Webb document in 1965 the psychiatrist stated no such thing, but multiple sources have concurred, including statements attributed to those familiar with the investigation.[74] The position of Dr. Simon, as reported by Mr. Webb, was also clarified in statements made by Dr. Simon himself.[75] The incorrect framing of Simon's position nonetheless often persists.

In 2016 I wrote about my interactions with Massachusetts mental health professional Donna Killeen, who explained she felt duped by the UFO community and its misrepresentation of Simon's opinion on the Hill's reported abduction. Killeen stated she was once impressed a prestigious psychiatrist was apparently supporting the story, and how that was a critical part of the case to her. It was upon speaking directly to Dr. Simon in the 1970's she came to think otherwise.

Killeen described how Simon explained to her that although he was portrayed in books and the media as believing the Hills were abducted by aliens, he actually never thought that was a likely scenario. Killeen stated Simon indicated he suspected the Hill's perceptions arose out of anxiety and dreams, as Webb likewise documented in 1965 to be the doctor's stance.

“After speaking directly with Dr. Simon,” Killeen explained to me, “I felt duped by the UFO community and media. There was misrepresentation of Dr. Simon's conclusions in the Hill case. These false conclusions were widely continued on in movies, books, etc. I was very disappointed and discounted the case as a result of hearing the truth from the practitioner.”

NICAP and Webb's 1960's documentation of the circumstances could certainly be considered relevant contributions to the genre. That's the case even if the contribution may not have turned out quite like it was initially intended.

By the early 1960's the NICAP Board of Governors was shaping up to include Col. Joseph Bryan III, Maj. Dewey Fournet, and Adm. Herbert B. Knowles.[76] Dozens more were listed as members of a Panel of Special Advisers. Among them were numerous scientists and career military officers, as well as a few names more typically associated with UFO circles, such as Lee Munsick and Leonard Stringfield.

Meanwhile, Richard Hall was apparently a quick study of his mentor Keyhoe, as by 1960 Hall was writing the FBI. I obtained over 20 pages of records pertaining to Hall through a FOIA request submitted to the Bureau. Included was a 1960 letter in which Hall asked Hoover about a UFO photo reported by the Detroit Times and involving FBI agents at the Flint office. Hall requested info about the case as well as clarification if the Bureau had revised its policies to include investigating UFOs, a recurring topic of correspondence between NICAP and intelligence agencies. The FBI response to my request did not include a reply from Hoover to Hall.

The FBI advised me of records transferred to the National Archives and potentially responsive to the request. My subsequent FOIA request to NARA is pending as of this writing.

In 1962 NICAP would again cross paths with an FBI investigation. The above referenced FBI records on Hall include a letter he wrote Hoover. Hall informed the FBI director it had come to the attention of the Committee the Bureau had to some extent investigated a Dr. Frank E. Stranges. A “Doctor of Divinity,” Frank Stranges is quite the story himself.

Hall provided the FBI with a fact sheet on Stranges, which stated he joined NICAP in 1958. The sheet goes on to state the doctor's “sermons” addressed such topics as Communism, parental and juvenile delinquency, crime and, naturally, UFOs. Stranges claimed to have been in contact with “a Venusian in the Pentagon.” He also claimed to be a good friend of Keyhoe, who, incidentally, denied they ever so much as met. Stranges was reportedly in the habit of suggesting to audiences far and wide he was some type of special NICAP member and was authorized to speak on its behalf.

Hall documented to Hoover various communications outlining the circumstances, including inquiries he sent to Stranges about the allegations. Stranges would call them false, going so far on one occasion, Hall explained, as to reply in writing they were “UNFOUNDED accusations.”

Hall would seemingly no sooner get such assurances from Stranges than once again receive word the preacher was asserting his NICAP VIP status and acquaintance with a Pentagon Venusian. Hall explained to Hoover the Venusian story was so widely touted by Stranges it became common public knowledge, and Stranges eventually ceased denying it after he published it in one of his books. The Venusian gained legendary status as Valiant Thor.

It became increasingly apparent to NICAP Stranges was associating himself with what Hall termed “crackpot 'contactee' conventions,” and misusing his NICAP membership. The Los Angeles Subcommittee was subsequently instructed to refund his registration fee and Stranges was informed his membership was revoked.

While this all would have certainly annoyed Hall, I seriously doubt Hoover cared about any of it until he got to the part about Stranges claiming he worked for the FBI. The Bureau had gotten wind of that before, and it was the kind of thing that tended to get Hoover's attention.

By May 1962 Hoover was writing the San Francisco Field Office and directing it to locate Stranges. Hoover instructed, “He should be admonished to cease making any such statements or in any way implying that he is associated with the Bureau.”

The Los Angeles Field Office ended up in the loop and promptly informed Hoover that Stranges was advised as directed. Stranges denied ever stating he was associated with the FBI, an agent documented, adding Stranges claimed he often referred to Director Hoover and the Bureau in a “complimentary manner” during his talks. Stranges further stated he would be more cautious in the future to be certain none of his listeners received the impression he was associated with the FBI. I suspect getting “admonished” by the 1962 LA FBI had a way of rapidly moving one to see things their way.

In 1967 Frank Stranges founded the National Investigations Committee on Unidentified Flying Objects. We might reasonably suspect that was a bit of a dig at NICAP.

A 2020 FOIA request to the FBI on the now deceased Frank Stranges resulted in receiving a 56-page file. It consists of allegations and resulting investigations pertaining to the reverend. The file also contains materials demonstrating what were referred to by the Bureau as his “veiled hints” of having been employed by the FBI.

The Frank Stranges saga offers food for thought about laws, or lack thereof, pertaining to making outlandish claims. It often seems difficult to differentiate between expressing religious-like beliefs and committing fraud. The line seems to get crossed when money is extracted for purposes that cannot be shown to be factual, such as in the previously explored case of Harold Berney and his “Trip to Venus” swindle, but a lot of ambiguity obviously remains.

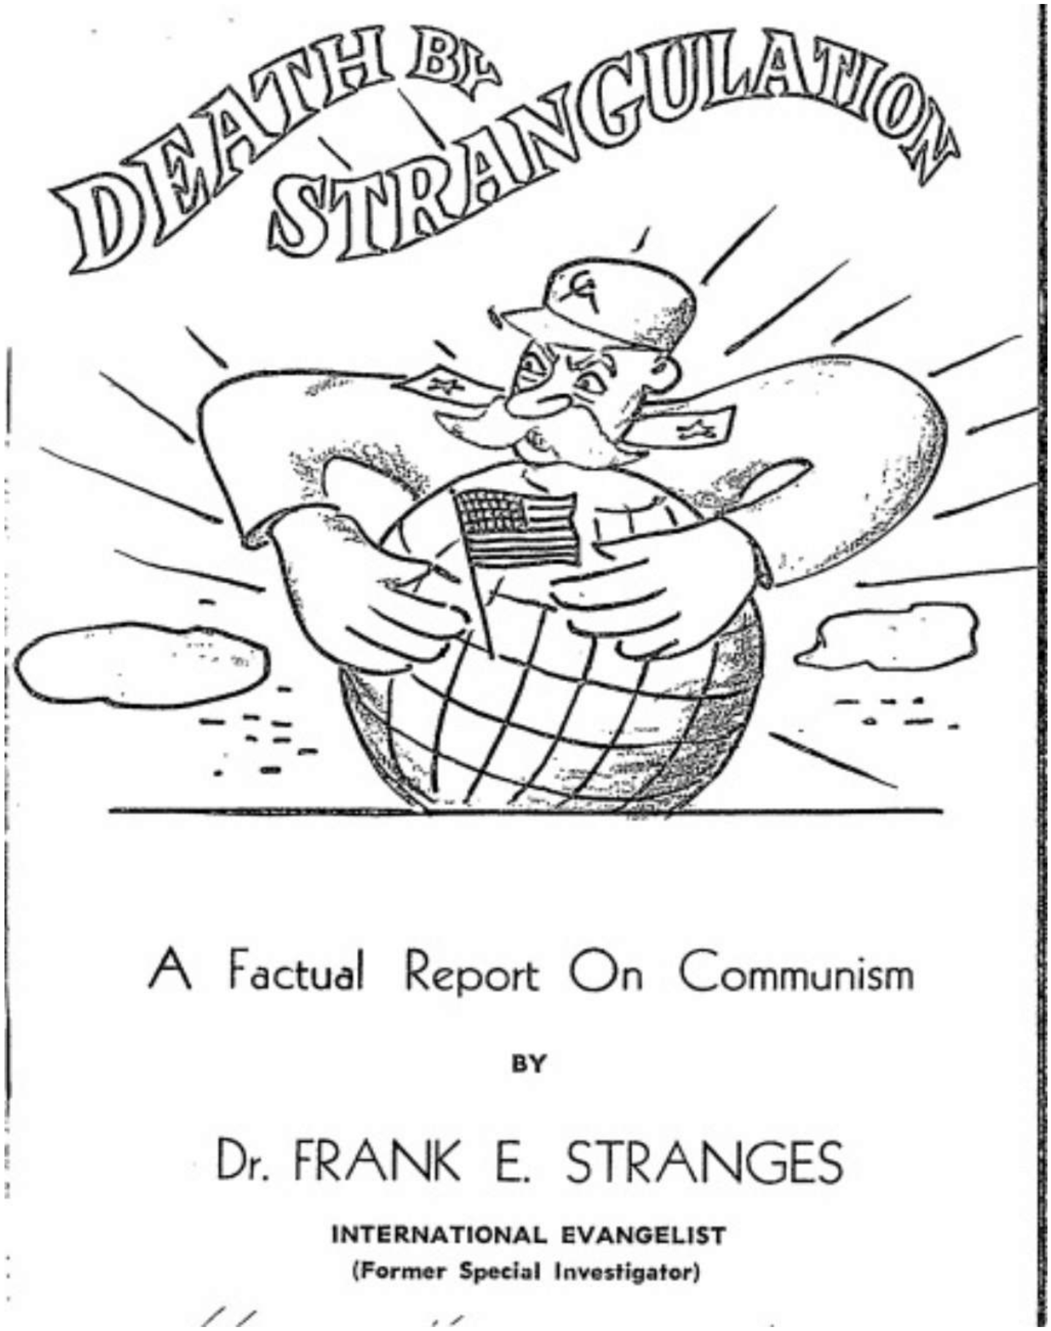
Payment of donations, speaker fees, and similar financial transactions become relatively fair game, with legalities often seeming to have little to do with the quality of the information presented. A person can pretty much claim anything they want, and the consequences fall on the consumer. The implications to the UFO genre are obvious. Even more to the point, it has never been against the law to conduct a UFO hoax, and one is particularly likely to avoid trouble if they do not submit falsified reports to law enforcement agencies.

One of the seeming attempts by Stranges to suggest he worked for the FBI without actually saying so, and as contained in his FBI file, is shown below.



DEATH BY STRANGULATION

A Factual Report On Communism

BY

Dr. FRANK E. STRANGES

INTERNATIONAL EVANGELIST
(Former Special Investigator)

The 2020 FOIA response received from the FBI on Frank Stranges indicated the records provided were released in previous requests. This means a search for files was not actually conducted, only to the extent of files provided as the result of past requests. I subsequently submitted a request for all records not included in the first response. This resulted in a wider search, and obtaining some 20 additional pages of documents on Stranges in 2021.

One of the newly acquired files pertains to a threatening letter sent to Stranges in 1992. A subsequent FBI investigation included documentation of statements from Stranges, who indicated he knew the man who wrote the letter.

The man, Stranges told an FBI agent, was originally a member of his brother's church. Stranges suggested he was like a father figure to the individual, and produced letters received from him in 1987 that were friendly and cordial.

In 1988 or 1989, Stranges continued, the man murdered both of his parents while suffering from severe mental illness. He was subsequently found not guilty of charges by reason of insanity, and placed in a maximum security mental health facility.

Stranges added he kept in touch with the man after the family tragedy and visited him in 1990. When asked why he thought so much had changed in his relations with him, Stranges stated he believed it was due to extreme mental illness and drugs the man was currently taking.

Contact was made by the FBI agent with a caseworker at the facility who stated the man suffered from schizophrenia, was considered a danger to society, and was probably not going to be released anytime soon. However, they added, the individual could be released at some point if a judge deemed them no longer a threat, since they were not convicted of any charges. The caseworker had a bit different evaluation than Stranges for the cause of the threatening letter.

“[The caseworker] stated that [the man] has said he gave quite a large sum of money to the International Evangelism Crusades, and he believes this ruined his life,” the FBI agent reported. “He has fixated on FRANK E. STRANGES, the head of that organization, as the cause of all his problems which led up to his family tragedy.”

The FBI directed the mental health facility to send notification if the man was released, but the Bureau was presumably not needed further on the case. Frank Stranges lived until the year 2008, at which time he passed away in Van Nuys, California.

Learn more about Dr. Stranges by listening to The Saucer Life, a high quality podcast produced by historian and author Aaron Gulyas. He explored the activities of Stranges in episodes titled “A Valiant Effort” and “A Strange(s) Update”.

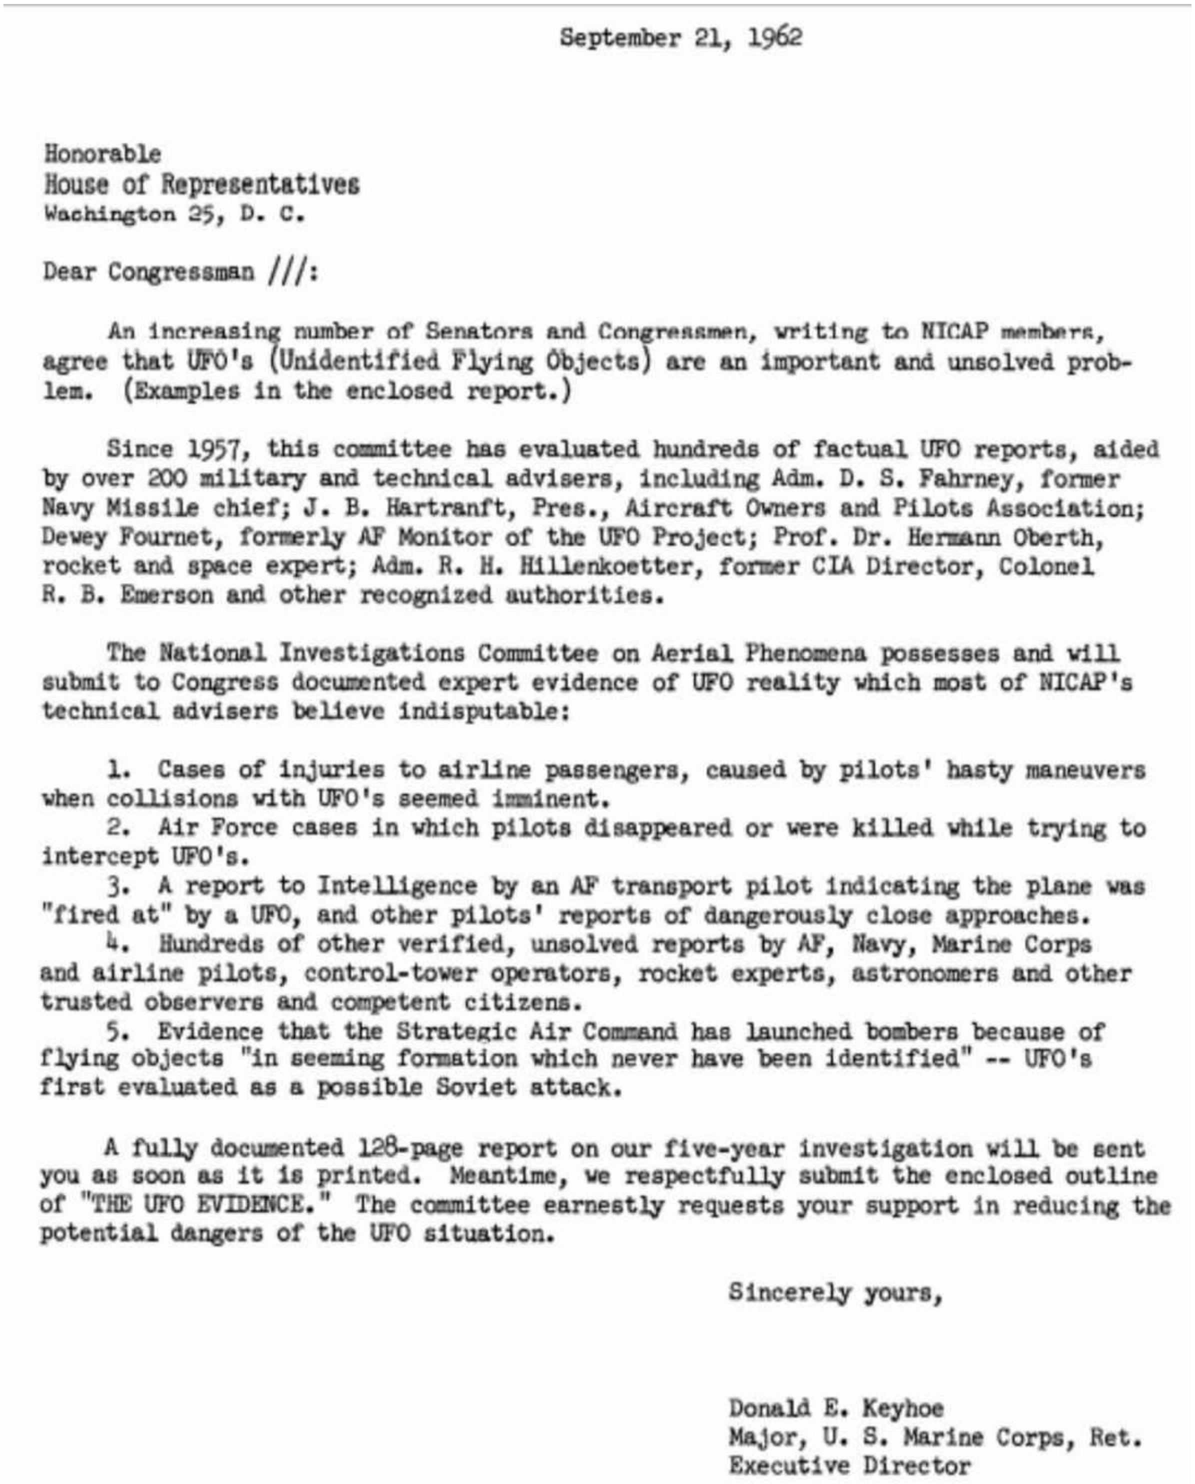
NICAP files contain reference to what the organization considered “educational work” conducted in 1962. During the first quarter of the year, “special material” was sent to 62 students and teachers for what was described as use in preparing term papers, science projects, research reports, and so on.[77]

Such material included “a bibliography, source material, back magazines, etc.” More shipments for the fall were reportedly being processed.

Similar efforts to “educate” Congress were also undertaken, as indicated in a 1962 form letter apparently authored by Keyhoe:[78]



September 21, 1962

Honorable
House of Representatives
Washington 25, D. C.

Dear Congressman ///:

An increasing number of Senators and Congressmen, writing to NICAP members, agree that UFO's (Unidentified Flying Objects) are an important and unsolved problem. (Examples in the enclosed report.)

Since 1957, this committee has evaluated hundreds of factual UFO reports, aided by over 200 military and technical advisers, including Adm. D. S. Fahrney, former Navy Missile chief; J. B. Hartranft, Pres., Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association; Dewey Fournet, formerly AF Monitor of the UFO Project; Prof. Dr. Hermann Oberth, rocket and space expert; Adm. R. H. Hillenkoetter, former CIA Director, Colonel R. B. Emerson and other recognized authorities.

The National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena possesses and will submit to Congress documented expert evidence of UFO reality which most of NICAP's technical advisers believe indisputable:

1. Cases of injuries to airline passengers, caused by pilots' hasty maneuvers when collisions with UFO's seemed imminent.
2. Air Force cases in which pilots disappeared or were killed while trying to intercept UFO's.
3. A report to Intelligence by an AF transport pilot indicating the plane was "fired at" by a UFO, and other pilots' reports of dangerously close approaches.
4. Hundreds of other verified, unsolved reports by AF, Navy, Marine Corps and airline pilots, control-tower operators, rocket experts, astronomers and other trusted observers and competent citizens.
5. Evidence that the Strategic Air Command has launched bombers because of flying objects "in seeming formation which never have been identified" -- UFO's first evaluated as a possible Soviet attack.

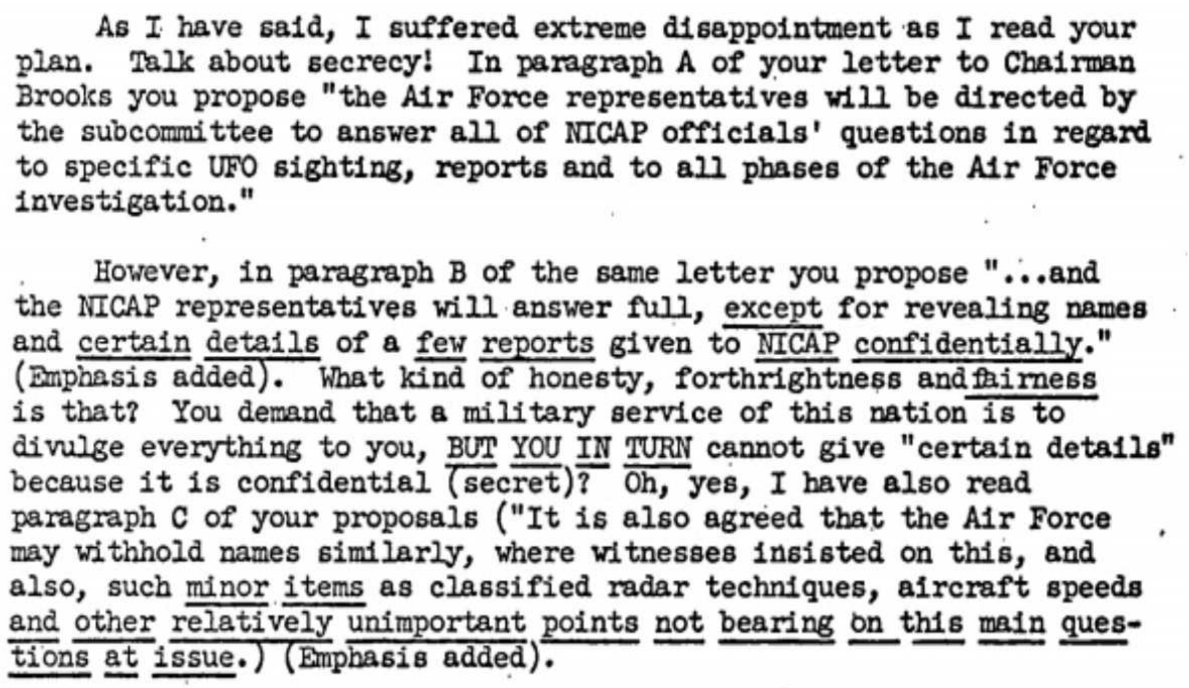
A fully documented 128-page report on our five-year investigation will be sent you as soon as it is printed. Meantime, we respectfully submit the enclosed outline of "THE UFO EVIDENCE." The committee earnestly requests your support in reducing the potential dangers of the UFO situation.

Sincerely yours,

Donald E. Keyhoe
Major, U. S. Marine Corps, Ret.
Executive Director

We can observe Keyhoe's tactic of declaring UFOs represented a national security threat. This would hold obvious significance to elected officials and intelligence agencies. Perhaps, however, applying the term “UFO” to such potential threats was not as relevant as UFO proponents might prefer the public believe. Beyond groups like NICAP using the issue as a public relations ploy, it's not clear how the armed forces should do its job any differently if it called air incursions UFOs instead of radar returns. Similar circumstances may be observed today.

Keyhoe previously ran into resistance on such matters. Rep. Joseph Karth, in a 1961 letter to Keyhoe, addressed Keyhoe's proposal for a Congressional hearing. Karth wrote:[79]



As I have said, I suffered extreme disappointment as I read your plan. Talk about secrecy! In paragraph A of your letter to Chairman Brooks you propose "the Air Force representatives will be directed by the subcommittee to answer all of NICAP officials' questions in regard to specific UFO sighting, reports and to all phases of the Air Force investigation."

However, in paragraph B of the same letter you propose "...and the NICAP representatives will answer full, except for revealing names and certain details of a few reports given to NICAP confidentially." (Emphasis added). What kind of honesty, forthrightness and fairness is that? You demand that a military service of this nation is to divulge everything to you, BUT YOU IN TURN cannot give "certain details" because it is confidential (secret)? Oh, yes, I have also read paragraph C of your proposals ("It is also agreed that the Air Force may withhold names similarly, where witnesses insisted on this, and also, such minor items as classified radar techniques, aircraft speeds and other relatively unimportant points not bearing on this main questions at issue.) (Emphasis added).

Rep. Karth expressed disappointment in Keyhoe's apparent intention to focus on Air Force secrecy as compared to presenting substantial evidence of UFOs. It has since become an all too standard part of the ufologist tool kit to plead their cases based on the obstruction of evidence rather than its presentation.

Furthermore, Karth suggested he questioned Keyhoe's arrogance and hypocrisy concerning national security and secrecy. The Congressman appeared perturbed Keyhoe seemed oblivious to the sensitivity of classified material, referring to it as “minor items,” while expecting to be granted the luxury of withholding information as he saw fit. This of course became a staple of the UFO genre, and it continues today. Such concealed details frequently obstruct fundamental aspects of the universally recognized fact-finding process. The double standards try the patience of the more discerning members of the community at large. Rep. Karth was apparently in the “put up or shut up” camp, and saw the irony in Keyhoe reserving the right to remain silent while demanding answers from men charged with protecting national security.

Nonetheless, as noted in the above 1962 letter penned by Keyhoe, The UFO Evidence was on its way. It was destined to be considered among NICAP and editor Richard Hall's most significant contributions to the study of UFOs. From a July 1, 1964 NICAP press release:[80]

“A documentary report charging Air Force censorship of unidentified flying objects was submitted today to Congressman John McCormack, Speaker of the House, and Senator Mike Mansfield, Majority Leader. The report is based on a 7-year investigation by military and technical experts of the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena (NICAP).

“The 184-page document, titled 'The UFO Evidence,' contains hundreds of verified UFO sightings by airline and military pilots, aerospace scientists and engineers, and other experienced observers.

“NICAP, a private fact-finding organization, includes on its Board of Governors and Advisers: Army, Navy and Air Force officers, scientists, veteran pilots, and other specialists...

“The charge of official secrecy was backed by a majority of the Board and Advisers, including Colonel J. Bryan III, USAFR (Ret); Admiral H. B. Knowles, USN (Ret); Dr. Leslie K. Kaeburn, biophysicist, University of Southern California; and Dr. C. P. Olivier, President of the American Meteor Society...

“The NICAP Report covers approximately 750 cases selected from over 5000 on file. The documented cases include numerous reports by Air Force pilots, and incidents of UFOs which made close approaches to aircraft... According to NICAP, the large majority of these cases are totally unsolved. Although Air Force analysts claim to have explained some of the cases, NICAP says counter-to-fact answers have often been given to Members of Congress and the press...

“After the current outbreak of UFO sightings, the Air Force admitted it had 910 unsolved cases out of 8128 - approximately 11%. Heretofore the Air Force had insisted it had solved all but 1 or 2%. The most recent unexplained sighting, according to the Air Force, is the April 24 observation by a police officer in Socorro, N.M., who saw an egg-shaped UFO take off from a gulley. Imprints and scorch marks were found at the site.

"The NICAP report states '...it is a reasonable hypothesis that the unexplained UFOs are real physical objects... artificial... under the control (piloted or remote) of living beings'... Many of the NICAP Board Members and Advisers have gone further, contending that the UFOs are extraterrestrial devices observing the earth. Among these are Col. J. Bryan III; Admiral H. B. Knowles; Prof. C. A. Maney; Dr. Leslie K. Kaeburn; and Capt. William B. Nash.

"Verified cases in the report show speeds and maneuvers beyond the capabilities of any earth-made machines, often confirmed by radar... In addition to the massive U.S. evidence, NICAP reports dozens of foreign cases from trained observers which confirm the observations of high performance objects and lead to the same conclusion.

"In order to reduce the dangers of accidental war caused by misidentification of UFOs on radar screens, and to educate the public to the realities, NICAP advocates a sweeping review of government policies on the subject by Congress. Speaker McCormack and Senator Mansfield have been asked to request UFO hearings. Many Members of Congress in recent years have gone on record in favor of open hearings...

"In releasing the document, NICAP warned that crackpot groups might try to take advantage of it by claiming it supports their views. The Committee disowned any claims that UFOs proved any particular religious or philosophical views currently being expounded by UFO cults. NICAP stated it had not found verification of a single claim of communication with space men."

NICAP would indeed eventually see its hopes come to fruition for a Congressional hearing on UFOs, but before that happened, CIA officers paid a visit to NICAP headquarters. A now publicly available CIA memo dated January 25, 1965, reflects Agency interest in obtaining materials, including UFO reports, from NICAP for delivery to its Office of Scientific Intelligence (OSI). The memo further states OSI desired the information to assist in preparing a paper on UFOs.

The CIA Contact Division met with Richard Hall on January 19, 1965, at which time he loaned the dispatched officers material and UFO reports for review. It was noted in the January 25 CIA document there was a strong feeling on the part of NICAP officials that the Air Force tended to downgrade the importance of UFO sightings. Hall apparently told the CIA officers there had been instances where the Air Force attempted to intimidate witnesses and get them to sign false statements.

In closing, the report stated a security clearance was being requested on Hall. There are various accounts and anecdotes around the UFO community about Hall's interactions with intelligence agencies, often framed as Hall having a rather nonchalant attitude about them. A generally accepted consensus is Hall was never issued a security clearance and did not develop a significant relationship with the CIA, and I have not discovered any particular reasons to suppose otherwise.

A now declassified OSI memo is dated January 26, 1965. You will note it was apparently composed the day after the above memo was written. The OSI memo was sent to the Director of Central Intelligence from OSI Assistant Director Donald F. Chamberlain. It was written in response to a request from DCI John McCone for an assessment on UFOs. The materials borrowed from NICAP contributed to findings reported by Chamberlain in the memo, according to the CIA.

Chamberlain summarized some then-recent UFO reports, adding no evidence was revealed UFOs were of foreign origin or were a security threat to the United States. He clarified OSI monitored UFO reports, including those investigated by the Air Force, and concurred with Air Force conclusions.

Ironically, while Keyhoe and his supporters were convinced an orchestrated UFO cover-up was being perpetrated by the CIA and Air Force, the two agencies were apparently actually in agreement there was not even a threat, at least not from unknown airborne objects. Threats of propaganda and espionage were another story, as suggested previously by the Robertson Panel. An argument could be made such concerns, and the resulting minimization of the topic for what may have been considered in at least some instances the public's own good, contributed significantly to the perception of official UFO secrecy.

Similar might be said about the intelligence community's aversion to publicly addressing UFOs due to reasons that included its own manipulation of the topic in an offensive capacity. Uncle Sam obviously did not want to address his own covert use of the UFO subject.

There was additional irony in the way UFO enthusiasts tended to interpret CIA interest in NICAP. For instance, NICAP and Keyhoe chose to withhold certain information because they did not want to divulge sources of reports and documents. They subsequently feared the CIA was snooping around to infiltrate their lines of communication. That may have been true to some extent, but not for the reasons NICAP chose to believe, which hinged upon the perception the CIA was scrambling to keep the existence of an extraterrestrial presence from becoming publicly revealed.

In a manner of speaking, NICAP activities and subsequent CIA responses served as a self-fulfilling prophecy for NICAP. Intelligence community actions often seemed to be interpreted to confirm what UFO investigators chose to subjectively believe, and that largely continues to be the case in the UFO genre today.

Gordon Lore explained it was during this point in time he began working at NICAP. In his book Flying Saucers from Beyond the Earth, Lore stated he had taken a job as a writer-editor in Washington, D.C. In addition to writing, the future NICAP assistant director was also a musician who played the guitar at night at a local coffee house.

Richard Hall was in attendance during one of Lore's performances in the summer of 1965, Lore wrote. He accompanied Hall and a group of friends back to Hall's apartment where they hung out and Lore entertained some more. Lore told Hall about his interest in UFOs, and was hired to join NICAP by the end of the night. He soon submitted his resignation at what he described as a subsidiary of U.S. News and World Report and was on his way to work with Keyhoe, Hall and NICAP.

“It was to become a dream job,” Lore wrote, “mixed with more than a little anxiety about keeping the organization afloat during the next five years.”

In 1966 a series of dramatic UFO sightings began in Michigan. The widely reported events included dozens of witnesses, as well as police officers giving chase to whatever they were seeing in the sky. Renowned UFO investigator J. Allen Hynek infamously suggested swamp gas as a feasible explanation.

Then-House Minority Leader and future-President Gerald Ford took interest. As an elected official of Michigan, he was among those supporting calls for a Congressional hearing on UFOs. The House Armed Services Committee soon conducted just such a hearing, although it was relatively brief. While there wasn't much in the way of substantial information getting revealed, a chain of events was by that point in motion that would forever shape the timeline of UFO World.

The Air Force announced a forthcoming independent review of Project Blue Book and related UFO evidence. It was titled the University of Colorado Scientific Study of UFOs, conducted by what was known as the Condon Committee due to the lead researcher, physicist Dr. Edward U. Condon.

Richard Hall described events of 1966 and how they influenced NICAP in his previously referenced 1994 paper, The Quest For The Truth About UFOs: A Personal Perspective On The Role Of NICAP. With a little help from the UFOs, Hall explained, NICAP was thrust further than ever into the media spotlight. As a result of all the buzz, NICAP was deluged with mail, routinely receiving hundreds of letters a day. Public interest in UFOs, and subsequently NICAP, produced a degree of financial stability previously unknown to the organization.

Don Berliner reported that by early 1967 NICAP grew to some 14,000 members. The Committee then employed nine full-time staff, which, Berliner noted, was more than could be said for the Blue Book payroll.

Hall wrote that NICAP worked diligently to provide Dr. Condon and his staff with the best evidence possible to assist in compiling its report. NICAP understandably saw the UFO study undertaken at the University of Colorado as significant, or, as Hall put it, that their dreams were coming true. The help was enrolled of Dr. James E. McDonald, an outspoken UFO proponent and atmospheric physicist at the University of Arizona. Many UFO proponents probably fully anticipated a desirable outcome, at least initially, because they sincerely believed the evidence did indicate an abundance of interplanetary craft. Intelligence agencies and other scientists, not so much.

In his 1973 book, Aliens From Space, Maj. Keyhoe stated NICAP eventually compiled some 9,300 UFO cases, 2,000 of which he suggested were top notch. I guess he was suggesting there were aliens all over the place. Perhaps it did not occur to Keyhoe that overwhelming Condon and the public in endless stories might not be as effective a tactic as he hoped.

Hall wrote NICAP “worked on a massive project of copying files for the Colorado scientists.” This went on for over the course of a year and included “hundreds of strong cases,” as well as NICAP subcommittees sending Condon new reports perceived as potentially important.

Keyhoe further wrote that almost right away Condon and the project administrator, Robert J. Low, began indicating to the press they did not anticipate arriving at conclusions supporting anything overly significant about UFOs. The two were quoted as speaking favorably about Air Force investigative efforts, as well as suggesting the government should get out of the UFO business. Such positions were of course in conflict with stances held by NICAP.

In spite of the statements, Keyhoe and NICAP tried to stay the course. That might have particularly been due to repeated assurances received from Condon and Low the study would be conducted objectively, according to the writings of Keyhoe and Lore. Dr. Condon and Robert Low reportedly minimized the significance of their published remarks when asked about them by Keyhoe.

The final straw came for Keyhoe when he learned of what came to be known as the “Trick Memo.” It was a leaked Condon Committee memo written by Robert Low in which he described an operating strategy for the UFO study. The committee would consist of scientists, Low explained, who could not possibly prove a negative result, even though they might indeed publish an impressive body of evidence suggesting there was nothing extraordinary about UFO observations. Low then added, “The trick would be... to describe the project so that, to the public, it would appear a totally objective study, but, to the scientific community, would present the image of nonbelievers trying their best to be objective but having an almost zero expectation of finding a saucer...”[81]

Keyhoe and his organization, when they got wind of the memo, responded with an April 30, 1968 press release, “NICAP Calls Colorado UFO Project Failure”.[82] The release stated NICAP sent a report to the president of the United States, containing evidence of “grave deficiencies” in the University of Colorado UFO project. It was further stated NICAP broke relations with the project after 17 months of cooperation. Reasons listed for the break included Condon had never conducted a field investigation of a UFO sighting or interviewed responsible witnesses, although named as chief principal investigator.

“Dr. Condon summarily discharged two Project scientists,” the news release continued, “for revealing written proposals by Project Coordinator Robert J. Low that the Colorado Project be represented to the public as 'totally objective', when in fact it would be constituted almost entirely of non-believers, with 'an almost zero expectation of finding a saucer'.”

It was further alleged Condon and Low “both refused, in writing, to answer NICAP questions as to whether the Project was being conducted in a biased and negative manner.” Condon, it was asserted, “refused to guarantee he would examine any of the hundreds of NICAP-investigated UFO reports, submitted at the Project's request.”

Keyhoe and NICAP took measures to prepare for public response to what was clearly going to be, from their perspectives, an unfavorable report from Condon. Their efforts included a second Congressional hearing, organized by NICAP supporter Rep. J. Edward Roush, an Indiana Congressman who chaired the House Committee on Science and Aeronautics. He held the Symposium on Unidentified Flying Objects on July 29, 1968.

While a few qualified scientists and NICAP representatives attended and provided testimony, the event was limited in scope. It did, however, mark the historic occasion of a second Congressional hearing on UFOs.

The Condon Report was published in January 1969. The general conclusion stated nothing had come from the study of UFOs that added to scientific knowledge. It was additionally reported, “Careful consideration of the record as it is available to us leads us to conclude that further extensive study of UFOs probably cannot be justified in the expectation that science will be advanced thereby.”

The issue was addressed in the document as to what, if anything, the federal government should do about UFO reports received from the general public. “We are inclined to think that nothing should be done with them in the expectation that they are going to contribute to the advance of science,” the Condon Committee wrote.

If the implications were not clear enough as to what the group collectively recommended about operating government UFO research projects outside normal military channels, it explicitly clarified its stance. “It is our impression that the defense function could be performed within the framework established for intelligence and surveillance operations without the continuance of a special unit such as Project Blue Book, but this is a question for defense specialists rather than research scientists.”

The Condon Committee made its position clear: The study of UFOs was producing nothing of scientific value and Blue Book should be discontinued.

The report, eagerly anticipated by the public, was now actually published. Gordon Lore wrote a memo to the NICAP office in the aftermath. The January 27, 1969, memo declared the organization and the UFO subject were facing perhaps their most critical period. Refuting the Condon Report was crucial and would require cooperation and hard work on the part of NICAP, Lore suggested.[83] Time would show the goal was not to be achieved.

Challenges included quarrels among the staff and a declining membership. If the negative Condon Report wasn't bad enough, it had now been over two full years since the Michigan sightings. People were tired of waiting for answers, or at least the answers they wanted to hear. What's more, a growing number of NICAP supporters' patience was wearing thin about attacking the Air Force.

As explored earlier, it is difficult to tackle the UFO subject without drawing lines in the political sand. This was not only true in Keyhoe's day, but was the case for years to come. As I write this, current news cycles are more likely to include statements about UFOs from Pentagon spokespersons, Senators, and bureaucrats than from scientists. We should take that into deep consideration when forming our assessments. We might also question what practical contribution Congress might even make to the topic of UFOs. In hindsight, much of it seemed to be performative and in pursuit of a mixed bag of agendas.

In the case of Keyhoe, he seemed to have come to believe lobbying elected officials and leveling demands at intelligence agencies was UFO research. At the least, it appears he considered it the most likely way to produce substantial results. If his actions were indicative of his beliefs, and he truly thought he was pursuing the most productive path, he was simply wrong. He gave it a hell of a try, though, for what that may or may not be worth.

Many at the time seemed to believe the Condon Report was part of an orchestrated cover-up to deny the reality of UFOs and ultimately the extraterrestrial presence the reported craft were often believed to indicate. More than a few still think so, at least among those in UFO circles who are aware of the Condon Committee. Frankly, I doubt many people could tell you why they believe the study was a sham, the idea just took on the quality of one of those “everybody knows” kind of things.

I strongly suspect very few people could articulate such circumstances as the Trick Memo and offer specific reasons why they believe the Air Force and Condon Committee conspired to deceive the public and cancel Project Blue Book. In most circumstances, the primary reason for such beliefs seems to be because UFOs were not confirmed to be sensational, thus there must have been a government cover-up.

Perhaps there actually were more deceptive motives at play. It's possible, for any number of reasons. It's also possible the Air Force came to conclude chasing UFOs was a waste of time much more often than not, and Condon and Low were subsequently identified as good candidates to arrive at such a conclusion.

It's a reasonable likelihood Air Force officials sincerely found UFOs and the related controversies to be an unproductive drain of resources, and believed objective scientists would concur – as had often been the case up to that point. The powers that be may therefore have identified a somewhat “fixed” study as the best way out of the problem. It may not have been they were trying to rig the study as much as they were trying to ensure it did not fall under the care of overly enthusiastic saucer fanatics.

It could even have been the intent, at least in part, for the Condon Committee to upstage NICAP, and create an alternative group of respected scientists and researchers. The alternative group would, of course, reach different conclusions than those promoted by NICAP. In the process, it would ease the Air Force burden of answering questions about UFOs and constantly finding itself in the crosshairs of Donald Keyhoe.

Richard Hall did not seem to subscribe to conspiracies about the Condon Committee. That was the case even though he was admittedly bitter over circumstances surrounding his August 1969 final departure from NICAP. He described negotiations as long and contentious with Board members Col. Joseph Bryan III and Joseph B. Hartranft, Jr. Hall wrote the conflict was over back salary issues and stated the negotiations ultimately went nowhere.

Hall extensively supplied information to the Condon Committee, as well, which stood to substantially increase his disappointment about the resulting report and overall circumstances. Nonetheless, he did not promote the Condon cover-up angle.

“Was the Colorado UFO Project a conspiracy to debunk the subject?” Hall wrote in 1994. “Another 'front' operation to sweep the UFO problem under the rug? Many UFOlogists today write it off in that way, assuming that it must have been a put-up job from the start. However, there is a much simpler and all-too-human explanation for what happened.”

Condon and Low were simply not interested in UFOs, Hall suggested. Hall wrote that during one briefing he attended, Condon fell asleep.

In another instance, Hall explained he personally hand-carried to Condon what he felt was an impressive and thick investigation report on a 1966 UFO case. When the Condon Report was later released, Hall was astonished to find no mention of it at all.

“It had never occurred to me,” Hall explained, “that he would simply ignore it.”

In his previously referenced 2018 book, Gordon Lore reflected, “Following the public release of the Condon Report, the prospects for NICAP continuing as a viable UFO organization quickly took a downward spiral. Adding fuel to the fire, unfortunately, was Keyhoe himself. Being an organizational and money manager was not his cup of tea. Some had even compared him to 'a second Townsend Brown.'

“In a secret meeting on December 3, 1969, the NICAP Board with Colonel Joseph Bryan III presiding, fired both Keyhoe and myself. It soon became apparent that I had to be terminated as a convenient 'scapegoat.'”[84]

And like that, the Keyhoe years were over.

Staffer Stuart Nixon became director, and John “Jack” Acuff was soon appointed president. Ted Bloecher recalled the circumstances in a letter written to Richard Hall in approximately 1973. He was initially referencing his own business disagreement with Nixon, as compared to those concerning Keyhoe and Lore, when he wrote, “I have underestimated the lengths Stuart is capable of going to. But then, he's the one who fixed it so Major Keyhoe and Gordon Lore got axed. The shame of it is, I went along with it.”[85]

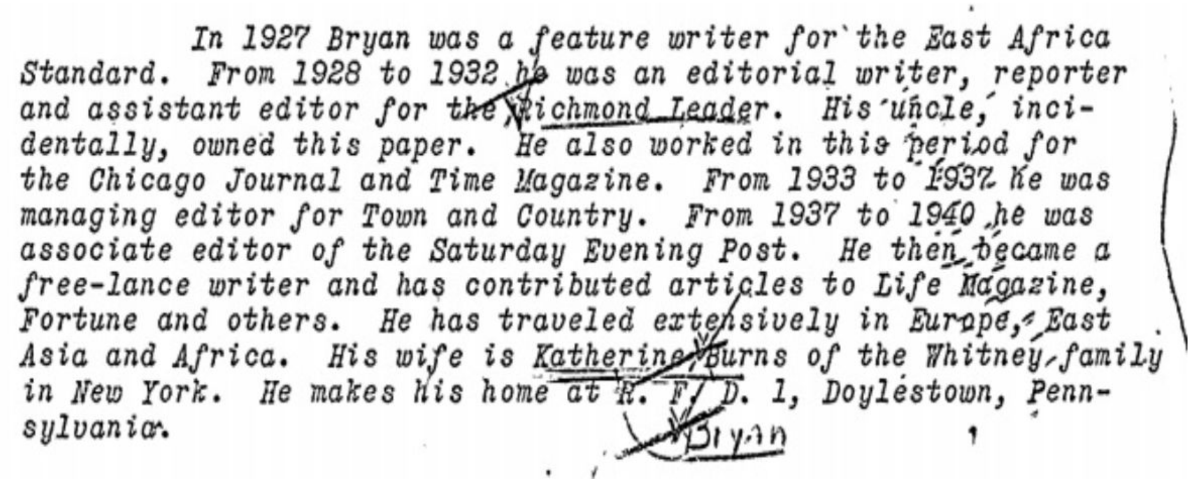
COL. BRYAN

Joseph Bryan III (1904-1993) had the distinction of serving in three different branches of the service, the Army (lieutenant), Navy (lieutenant commander), and Air Force (lieutenant colonel). Bryan reportedly worked for the CIA from the late 1940's until 1953. His apparent background in intelligence and expertise in psychological warfare was not widely known during his years as a staple of NICAP.

Bryan was born into an influential Virginia family. He went to Episcopal High School in Alexandria before attending Princeton University, where in 1927 he obtained an A.B. degree. Bryan had a rather extensive and significant writing career.

The image below is from a 1947 FBI memo, "Subject: Joseph Bryan III," which is part of an FBI file compiled on Bryan and obtained through the FOIA: [86]



In 1927 Bryan was a feature writer for the East Africa Standard. From 1928 to 1932 he was an editorial writer, reporter and assistant editor for the Richmond Leader. His uncle, incidentally, owned this paper. He also worked in this period for the Chicago Journal and Time Magazine. From 1933 to 1937 he was managing editor for Town and Country. From 1937 to 1940 he was associate editor of the Saturday Evening Post. He then became a free-lance writer and has contributed articles to Life Magazine, Fortune and others. He has traveled extensively in Europe, East Asia and Africa. His wife is Katherine Burns of the Whitney family in New York. He makes his home at R. F. D. 1, Doylestown, Pennsylvania.

Bryan

For a bit of clarification on the "Whitney family" reference, the memo went on to assert, "His mother-in-law is a Whitney and as a result of his marriage he is independently wealthy."

In 1942 Bryan was commissioned a lieutenant in the Navy and his service included assignment to the Southwest Pacific. In 1944 as a lieutenant commander he reported for duty to the Office of Public Relations in Washington.

An online search conducted at the CIA reading room, using the term "Office of Public Relations," returned documents suggesting, as one might expect, the Office served propaganda and intelligence efforts. Interestingly, Navy brass, future NICAP Board member, and inaugural CIA Director Roscoe Hillenkoetter has a few appearances among the documents.

A 1948 letter written to Hillenkoetter from Army Brig. Gen. E.J. McGaw is among the documents that carry implications of the significance of the Office of Public Relations. The general offered an apology in his letter for declining an invitation to meet Hillenkoetter following the latter's public speaking engagement. McGaw indicated he had to promptly leave the event because his presence was required elsewhere. He was unable to stay and make the CIA director's acquaintance, McGaw advised Hillenkoetter, "because Admiral Robert F. Hickey, Deputy Director, Office of Public Relations, Department of the Navy, was arriving at Carlisle Barracks at 12:15 PM."

The CIA online reading room has a few documents that contain reference to both Hillenkoetter and the Navy Office of Public Relations. Additional search returns on the Agency website include a 1947 National Security Council report referencing the Office. The report addresses steps "required to strengthen and coordinate all foreign information measures of the U.S. Government in furtherance of the attainment of US national objectives." It seems an entirely reasonable assumption Bryan's 1944 involvement in the Office of Public Relations helped facilitate his path to the CIA and 1948 Office of Policy Coordination.

The previously referenced 1947 FBI memo indicates the Richmond Field Office reported that after the death of Bryan's father, he inherited his father's stock in Richmond Newspapers, Inc. Bryan was then a small stockholder in the newspaper company apparently owned by his uncle.

The New York Times reported Bryan held editorial positions with Time magazine, The New Yorker and Town and Country, and was associate editor at The Saturday Evening Post from 1937 to 1940. He then became a freelance writer. His continued interactions with media outlets, particularly newspaper executives, were destined to become significant to his career in intelligence, as we shall see.

The 1947 FBI interest in Bryan was because he was under consideration by the Saturday Evening Post for an assignment to write a series of articles profiling the FBI. Director Hoover and his agents of course wanted to know about the author and assess the likely tone of the series. Bryan was not the first writer considered by the Post for the project, and the Bureau previously expressed dissatisfaction with the candidates. It was important to the FBI to identify its ability to influence the content of the articles and framing of the Bureau.

The 1947 FBI memo stated Bryan had been characterized as being born with “a silver spoon in his mouth” and developing an unrealistic personal interpretation of the world. Bryan, the memo suggested, might be unaware of the social and economic conditions of the time, due to his understandings being limited to “cafe society” of New York. He was described as an individual who enjoyed and appreciated a good time. He was also described to the Bureau by multiple professional journalists as an excellent writer.

The Bureau spoke with various acquaintances of Bryan, including a general manager at the Richmond newspaper. The man suggested Bryan tended to write about observations he could see on the surface, rather than dig into operations of an organization. While the general manager expressed the opinion Bryan would write critically if he felt a situation warranted, he added Bryan was more inclined to focus on the glorious rather than critical side of any operation. He indicated Bryan was extremely ethical and could maintain confidences. Bryan was described as physically very tall, and a fashionable dresser who liked to be the center of attention in New York society. He was said to be extremely conservative and his loyalty to the United States was unquestioned.

The memo added, “It was pointed out that the best way to handle Bryan is to outline exactly what information he should publish and have a clear understanding with him as to the information he could not publish.”

The FBI talked to Jack Patterson, described as formerly “in the public relations office of the Department,” a reference I interpret to mean the Justice Department, which includes the FBI. Patterson was employed with the State Department at the time the FBI memo was composed in 1947, and was referred to as knowing Bryan personally. He described Bryan as very witty, and echoed previous comments indicating Bryan could be trusted to maintain confidences.

“Patterson thought that the thing to do with Bryan was to be very factual and lay the cards on the table,” the memo added.

A 1947 FBI memo authored by Assistant Director L.B. Nichols documents Bryan visited Bureau headquarters the week of October 13, 1947. Nichols greeted Bryan and provided a rather extensive tour. They discussed the potential series of articles, and the memo indicates Nichols was optimistic about Bryan.

Hoover shared the optimism, going as far as to highlight conditions put forth by Bryan for writing the articles. He was so fond of Bryan's suggested conditions he noted they should be kept in mind for future dealings with writers. Bryan shared some ground rules he used for writing about Navy Adm. William Halsey, resulting in a book considered by some to have been his best work, as noted in a previous memo. Bryan suggested to Nichols, and Hoover highlighted, that “he would write nothing except that which was true; that he would not write anything which would cast a reflection on the Naval Service; that he would not put anything into direct quote which Halsey did not specifically authorize.” It is not difficult to understand why Hoover would appreciate the gist of the strategy.

When Bryan and Nichols met with Hoover, Nichols took the opportunity to emphasize Bryan committed to publish only that which was true and stated he would let them see the material. The meeting apparently went well for the Bureau, and Nichols described it as very much worthwhile.

An observation Nichols noted and described as “rather interesting” involved Bryan reportedly telling a friend he would meet them at 5pm, yet appearing unconcerned as the appointment time passed. Nichols wrote the late afternoon meeting with Director Hoover went on for some two hours, lasting until 6:15pm, even though Nichols reminded Bryan of his 5pm commitment.

“Even though I had reminded him of the 5:00 o'clock appointment,” Nichols noted, “he had lost track completely of the time.”

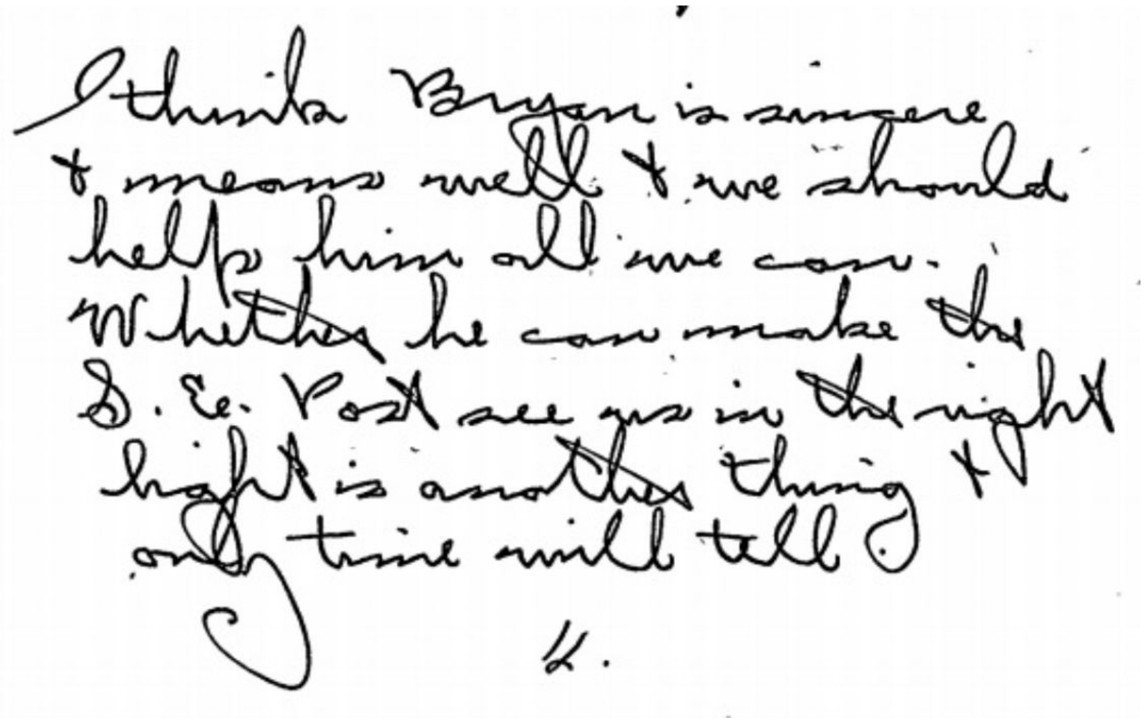
Nichols further wrote in the memo a question Bryan posed after meeting Hoover, and the answer he was ostensibly given. Nichols apparently documented the situation in the event it should come up again and any agents with access to the memo would be aware of it.

During his conversation with Hoover, Bryan mentioned he was still a Naval officer, to which Hoover replied, “I know.” Bryan later asked Nichols how Hoover knew.

Nichols constructed a story in response in which he claimed he asked a mutual acquaintance in Richmond about Bryan after learning Bryan might be writing about the FBI. The acquaintance, Nichols told Bryan, subsequently sent a newspaper clipping with an extensive bio on Bryan. The director undoubtedly saw the clipping, Nichols added. One might suspect a number of such games were represented in comments exchanged between Bryan, Hoover, and Nichols during Bryan's visit to the Bureau.

Nichols included the following passage in his memo, “I further told Bryan if he wished we would be glad to give him an office and a typewriter and he could write here at the Bureau and if questions arose he could put them to us and if the question necessitated research we could compile the information at the time. This seemed to please Bryan and he stated that he would be very glad to take advantage of this offer. It frankly is my idea that the closer we can keep Bryan to the Bureau, the more voluminous information we can furnish him, the less he will be seeking it from bootleg sources."

Hoover noted at the end of the Nichols memo he felt Bryan was sincere. He concurred the Bureau should "help him" all it could, but it was yet to be seen whether Bryan could make the Saturday Evening Post see Hoover and his agents "in the right light":



I think Bryan is sincere & means well & we should help him all we can. Whether he can make the S. E. Post see us in the right light is another thing & only time will tell.

H.

Nichols later documented in a November 1947 FBI memo a telephone conversation he initiated with Bryan, who stated there was no rush on the FBI series. Bryan added he was just about to write Nichols to inform him another matter arose that the Saturday Evening Post insisted he handle immediately. Hoover noted it looked like the series was fading.

Bryan would later indicate he scrapped the project entirely. In a February 1948 letter to Assistant Director Nichols, Bryan suggested his workload would not allow him to author the series of articles on the FBI. He informed the Bureau he would not be writing about it:[87]

J. BRYAN III

Dear Mr. Nichols:

Most reluctantly, I have been forced to abandon my hopes and plans of writing the series on the FBI. Since I last had the pleasure of seeing you and Mr. Hoover, one assignment after another has been handed me —each marked "Rush!"— with the result that it would be unfair to both the Bureau and the Saturday Evening Post for me to reserve this series any longer, when I have no idea how soon I could give it the concentrated attention that it deserves. I have already explained my decision to the Post, so it remains only for me to thank you and Mr. Hoover for your great courtesy and to express my regrets for having monopolized your time to no avail.

I can at least assure you of this much —that my visits to the Bureau have gained it and its officers a vociferously devoted admirer in

Yours sincerely,

I think there is a strong likelihood this chain of events reflects Bryan's recruitment into the Office of Policy Coordination, which you will recall was launched in 1948. You will also recall E. Howard Hunt asserted he worked for Bryan in the OPC as a member of the Political and Psychological Warfare staff. The OPC, its personnel, and its merge with the Office of Special Operations in 1952, as previously explored, tied into DCI Smith's interest in the UFO topic as a psychological warfare tool; the celebrated PBSUCCESS CIA operation in Guatemala; the 1954 CIA cable to assets in Guatemala suggesting consideration be given to fabricating a flying saucer story as a public distraction, and related events.

Let's consider how a series of FOIA requests on Joseph Bryan III progressed. In 2019 I submitted requests to the CIA and FBI for records pertaining to Bryan.

In a 2020 response the CIA denied my FOIA request and would neither confirm nor deny the existence or nonexistence of any such records, as the information itself is properly classified: the Glomar response. The Agency did acknowledge its website hosts two documents related to Bryan. One is a file containing a 1966 NICAP-related newspaper article.

The other is a 1951 CIA calendar with a brief reference to an October 25 telephone call with Bryan. The call quite possibly was conducted with DCI Smith, given the date and the fact the file is part of a Smith special collection.

The FBI promptly responded by providing a 37-page pdf containing material as linked and described above. The file contains several more letters and memos which will be explored on the forthcoming pages.

The Bureau advised of the existence of two additional potentially responsive files and indicated more potentially responsive files were destroyed. The two files were identified as 62-HQ-116607 and 100-HQ-93216. The FBI suggested both were in the care of NARA, the National Archives and Records Administration.

NARA responded to my resulting FOIA request it was not in possession of 62-HQ-116607 and stated the file remained in FBI custody. A subsequent series of follow-up correspondence with the FBI, including a FOIA appeal, did not produce the file. The Bureau ultimately implied it was destroyed.

NARA indicated the second of the two files, 100-HQ-93216, was indeed in its possession and was believed to contain material pertaining to Joseph Bryan III. The Administration further stated the file consisted of some 8,500 pages and would have to be processed for release pursuant to the FOIA. Subsequent correspondence with NARA revealed only two of the pages referred directly to Bryan. NARA processed and provided the two pages as requested, which we will explore a bit later. Other aspects of the large file would prove to be of interest as well.

Further research revealed the file, 100-HQ-93216, was previously released in part to John Greenewald of The Black Vault. In 2005 he received about 360 of the 8,500 pages. Its primary subject was bacteriological warfare, or, perhaps more specifically, FBI investigation of potential threats of bacteriological warfare and related issues.

In 2019 I published a blog post related to the circumstances. The post included a link to the pdf of the approximately 360 pages previously obtained by Greenewald. I was soon contacted by microbiologist Dr. Tyler Kokjohn, who informed me he had been reading the file and discovered an intriguing document within it. He directed my attention to pages 207-212 of the pdf, which contain a memo dated May 31, 1949, Subject: Biological Warfare.

The six-page memo is written from FBI Assistant Director Ladd to Director Hoover and referenced an Advisory Committee to the Secretary of Defense. The Bureau was repeatedly encouraged to send a representative to meetings of the Committee, which explored "matters relating to biological warfare." The Bureau held fast it preferred a relationship with the Advisory Committee via a liaison rather than direct participation.

The memo summarized meeting minutes provided to the FBI from a then-recent gathering of the group, indicating representatives from academic institutions and the CIA were in attendance. Discussion topics included what were described as security precautions pertaining to a presumably human research subject. The project and a potential lack of adequate security precautions, it was suggested, "might prove unsafe for public consumption and that knowledge of the existence of such a project might bring forth ridicule."

The memo continued, "The Committee expressed considerable interest in the various methods of isolation of the subconscious mind which were discussed, particularly in the use of drugs as an aid to hypnotic techniques."

The area of the memo following the above statement was redacted, as was the case with additional sections. I soon submitted a request to NARA for a Mandatory Declassification Review of the memo. NARA complied and in its response released a substantial amount of the previously redacted material.

One of the more intriguing finds of the MDR was it revealed FBI documentation a CIA scientist asserted the Advisory Committee represented the first time the CIA sought to collaborate with American intelligence agencies and institutions about behavior modification research. The memo further documented the CIA sought support from the Committee for vigorous exploration of such research. The scientist was Scientific Branch Chief Dr.

~~SECRET~~

The Committee expressed considerable interest in the various methods of isolation of the subconscious mind which were discussed, particularly in the use of drugs as an aid to hypnotic techniques.

Dr. Machle indicated that:

(a) He considered present research facilities adequate.

(b) For obvious security reasons, the fact that research in this area was being conducted was very closely held and this Committee was the first group outside of CIA to be informed of the project.

(c) The Scientific Branch of CIA had deferred seeking the cooperation of other government agencies, such as the FBI or the Army Counter Intelligence Corps, until after techniques for positive control of the experimental subjects had been validated.

(d) He expected to obtain such validation in the near future.

(e) He would appreciate receiving the support of this Committee for a program of vigorous exploration of these techniques.

The MDR also revealed further information about Committee attendees, who apparently met May 14, 1949, in the Park Avenue New York apartment of Dr. Alfred L. Loomis:

PURPOSE:

To inform you of the results of the fifth conference held by the Advisory Committee to the Secretary of Defense on matters relating to biological warfare in an unconventional attack by enemies of this country. This meeting was held in the apartment of Dr. Alfred L. Loomis, Mayfair House, 610 Park Avenue, New York City, on May 14, 1949, and was attended by the regular members of the committee and by Mr. G. C. Backster, Jr., CIA representative; Dr. A. H. Corwin, Director of the Chemical Laboratory, Johns Hopkins University; and Dr. Irving L. Janis, Department of Psychology, Yale University. (The files are presently being reviewed on these three persons and you will be furnished with any pertinent information concerning them.)

BACKGROUND:

You will note that this is the Committee which was set up by Lt. Col. Edwin F. Black with the approval of former Secretary James Forrestal of the National Military Establishment to study various methods of unconventional methods of warfare. In connection with this program Black has reportedly secured the assistance of Jay Lovestone. I have previously furnished you with memoranda in this matter reflecting that certain members of the Committee are at least questionable from a loyalty standpoint.

It is for such reasons I have come to believe FBI archives are a significant resource for researchers on topics typically not considered to pertain to the FBI. If something mattered, there is a really good chance J. Edgar Hoover had a man on it. In many instances, he had multiple field offices on it. FBI files stand to provide us with reports compiled by professional investigators on any number of issues and people, which apparently include activities and personnel related to operations Bluebird, Artichoke, and the eventual MKULTRA. FBI documents archived and reviewed by NARA may provide information on CIA projects typically withheld and redacted by the CIA. Similar may likely be the case on any number of topics investigated by the Bureau and subsequently framed from the perspectives of its agents.

You will recall the above memo was plucked out of about 360 previously released pages of a large, vastly unprocessed 8,500-page file, 100-HQ-93126. In early 2020 I requested through the FOIA that NARA release the file in its entirety. The process will take several years, and NARA indicated it will incrementally notify me of progress.

The estimated total cost of a reproduction of the completely processed file, such as a pdf, is $6,800. I am considering options such as enrolling the help of journalists who have grounds for fees to be waved. Additional options include partnering with institutions which recognize the potential historical value of the file, or undertaking crowdsource fundraising. The first job is to get the file or sections thereof processed and available, then we can work on the best ways to obtain and start combing through the material, thus, the FOIA request.

So, back to how we got the 8,500-page 100-HQ-93126 file in our sites in the first place: It was identified by the FBI as potentially responsive to records pertaining to Joseph Bryan III and in the custody of NARA. After inquiring further, NARA helpfully informed me just two of the pages referred directly to Bryan.

NARA subsequently provided me with the two pages, a 1953 memo pertaining to a brainwashing movie shown during a meeting held in the Attorney General's office and attended by, among others, FBI Director Hoover and CIA Director Allen Dulles. The author of the memo, FBI Assistant Director D.M. Ladd, who also attended the meeting, explained the film contained confessions of four captured American pilots who were portrayed to admit to Chinese interrogators they flew missions with the purpose of dropping bacteria.

Discussion topics included techniques potentially used to solicit false confessions. Ladd noted CIA representatives indicated the Agency was conducting related studies. The memo carries several implications to biological warfare, the study of interrogation techniques, and the evolution of CIA mind control projects. This would prove to become somewhat of a theme of documents pertaining to Bryan and his associates, even if more an indication of the Agency's obsession with the issues than that of some of its specific personnel.

The memo contains one single mention of Bryan, who apparently was an associate of an involved party, midway through the third paragraph. The paragraph:

“The film was then shown and, in sequence, the four American flyers were shown being questioned by Chinese Reds, and they admitted in considerable detail dates when they allegedly received briefing on bacteriological warfare and dates of missions which they allegedly flew for the purpose of dropping bacteria. After each sequence showing the questioning of one of the four airmen, the group was briefed in a very genera[redacted] It will be re[redacted] was an associate of Joseph Bryan III and was questioned in connection with rumors circulated by [redacted] the group that the statements of the prisoners obviously were not correct, inasmuch as a check had been made and no lectures or briefing had been given at the camps on the dates alleged by the prisoners, and several of the missions which they claimed to have flown were, in fact, never flown by them."

It could be considered interesting that apparently no explanation about Bryan was required, seeming to suggest those with access to the memo – and perhaps in attendance at the April 1953 meeting - would be familiar with him. We can only wonder what additional information may have been contained in the records on Bryan that were destroyed as indicated by the Bureau.

Turning our attention back to the 37-page file on Bryan provided by the FBI, we find copies of a pair of short 1950 letters composed by Director Hoover.[88] The first is to Judge Edward Allen Tamm of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. Hoover thanked Judge Tamm for forwarding a letter to him from "Mr. Neil Vanderbilt."

The second note from Hoover is written directly to "Major Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr.," thanking him for furnishing data contained in his March 14, 1950, letter forwarded by Judge Tamm. "I appreciate having the information made available to me," Hoover wrote Vanderbilt.

Each copy of the two letters from Hoover have handwritten notations, presumably added by Bureau staff, stating, "Joseph Bryan III alias Gil Bryan." The Hoover letters were obviously placed in the file pertaining to Bryan, for whatever reasons.

The referenced letter written by Vanderbilt and forwarded to Hoover from Tamm is not in the file. A FOIA request for the document was submitted to the FBI. The Bureau responded in 2021 that potentially responsive records were identified but not in their expected location. An additional search was conducted but also met with unsuccessful results, the response explained.

I believe Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr. to have been the son of the founder of Vanderbilt University. I interpret this to be a potential further indication of Joseph Bryan's prestigious social status, among other possibilities. As previously suggested, NICAP Board members and advisors were socially and professionally well connected, and often financially well off. These were not only desirable characteristics for positions of leadership within UFO and nonprofit organizations, but, in the case of Bryan and his circles, traits indicative of those sought for recruitment into the CIA.

It is noteworthy the Vanderbilts are documented to have been well represented in the Office of Strategic Services.[89] The OSS was the World War II precursor to the CIA.

In 1983 Athan G. Theoharris of the Marquette University Department of History published a paper titled “The CIA and the New York Times: An Unanswered Question”. Appearing in Government Publications Review, Vol. 10, pp 257-259, 1983, the abstract reads, “The author surveys a mysterious contact between CIA psychological warfare official Joseph Bryan III and New York Times officials in 1951, noting the need for further research into the relationship between the Agency and the media and the Agency and the FBI.” We now know the timeframe in question was right in the heart of both the escalation of the Office of Policy Coordination and future NICAP Board member Bryan's apparent service to the CIA.

The paper explored two January 1951 meetings Bryan conducted with newspaper executives. The first was in Paris with the Times European bureau chief Cyrus Sulzburger. The second took place in New York with the uncle of Cyrus, Times publisher Arthur Hays Sulzburger.

Theoharris cited a letter dated January 15, 1951, written by Cyrus to Arthur between the two meetings and emphasizing the importance to his uncle to clear his schedule to accommodate Bryan. “I want to call this to your attention so that you are sure to see him, no matter how busy you are,” Times European Bureau chief Cyrus Sulzburger wrote. He added in his “personal and confidential” letter to his uncle, “I am sorry to be so mysterious about this, but I want to be sure and call this subject to your attention ahead of time so that there can be no misunderstanding.”

The purposes of the two meetings are not clear. Theoharris cited interviews later conducted with Cyrus Sulzburger and Joseph Bryan in which the men provided conflicting accounts of the circumstances. Theoharris described each as “not fully responsive when not apparently evasive.”

Cyrus was quoted as suggesting Bryan had been traveling throughout Europe in the winter of 1951 signing up reporters for nondisclosure statements. The contracts represented agreements to provide journalists with information as long as they did not reveal the CIA as the source, Cyrus indicated.

Bryan denied the allegation, suggesting Cyrus was the only newspaperman he knew in Europe. Bryan further suggested any meeting with Cyrus would have been to get information from him, not to give it to him. As for the meeting with Times publisher Arthur Sulzburger in New York, Bryan claimed he could not recall the details.

Oh, that Joe Bryan.

So how does the Bureau fit into this part of the story, besides conducting investigations on everybody? That would be due to something the FBI called its “obscene file,” and Bryan's request for access to it, which was granted. Theoharris explained in his 1983 paper:

> “Whether or not coincidental, Bryan’s approach to the New York Times’s European bureau chief and publisher coincided with his request, initiated that same winter, to secure authorization to review the FBI’s 'obscene file.' A discrete file maintained in the FBI laboratory, the 'obscene file' had been created in 1943 and contained either derogatory personal information on diverse individuals or memorandums/letters containing obscene language. FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover personally supervised access to this file; 'outsiders' were only 'rarely' permitted to view this file and then approval was granted 'for official reasons.' To obtain access to the obscene file on an individual(s) (the name or names have been deleted in released FBI documents), Bryan went through the appropriate CIA and FBI channels, secured the needed authorization, and in May 1951, reviewed the file. He now claims that 'nothing came of' having reviewed this file.”

Theoharris aptly pointed out the saga brings up a number of relevant questions about the activities of the early 1950's CIA psychological warfare division, as well as its relationships with the FBI. Also at issue was the government obstruction of answers to those questions. It did not escape my attention that Theoharris's concerns and lines of reasoning in 1983 echoed those addressed in the previous decade by writer and researcher Stanley Bachrack, pertaining to FOIA exemptions applied to Nicholas de Rochefort and his relationship with the CIA.

Before continuing this line of inquiry, it should be noted the FBI file on Bryan contains a copy of an April 23, 1953, clipping of a social column from a New York publication.[90] Among other society news of note, the writer explained the “fabulous Aga Kahn” announced from Paris that a book deal was obtained. The forthcoming work would reveal the truth behind his “demi god playboy facade,” according to the columnist.

The aging ruler of the Ismail sect, who had apparently been in the news for half a century, was set to extract as much as a million dollars from the American reading public. His contract with Simon and Schuster reportedly included the highest royalties ever paid to an author at that point in time, some 20 percent.

“The memoirs must be hot property indeed,” the article stated.

“The Aga Kahn has promised to 'tell everything,'” the writer continued, “no matter how embarrassing it may be to many famous people living in dread. In fact, the memoirs deal with so many personages close to home that publishers in France and England wouldn't touch them with an asbestos glove.”

The article further stated the book's writer-editor was Joseph Bryan III. He would travel with Aga Kahn to five different European destinations, including Cannes and Venice, over the next few months “to whip the material into shape.” Whether significant or not, the article reminded me of Bernard J.O. Carvalho's 1956 publicity tour with Meher Baba, among other implications. I interpret researcher Theoharris may have suspected the combined circumstances suggest Bryan was in the business of obtaining dirt on potential Communists or others in order to provide political leverage. Motives may have included inspiring persons of interest to defect from the Soviet Union.

A similar April 1953 article was published in the Washington, D.C., Evening Star. It stated Aga Kahn, the “spiritual head of 80 million Ismail Moslems,” decided to write his memoirs and reached all the way to Washington to get the man who would do it for him. The article identified ghostwriter Bryan as the former assistant to the Secretary of the Air Force and a New York socialite. Bryan moved to DC with his wife, the piece stated, “a few years ago when he joined the Central Intelligence Agency.”

We pick up the trail of Joseph Bryan and the FBI “obscene file” back in the pdf compiled on Bryan by the Bureau. The implications are complex and not entirely clear as contained in some 1955 letters and memos. It is completely clear, however, the cast of characters were very much involved in issues surrounding Communist China, the hunt for Communist sympathizers, and the related accusations potentially used as intelligence tools, whether true or not.

It is noteworthy Nicholas de Rochefort's apparent areas of interest, Red China and psychological warfare, were very much at issue, as were agencies such as the State Department which repeatedly surface in our saga of NICAP and its personnel. It additionally seems worth keeping in mind that Office of Policy Coordination activities in the early 1950's included Project BGMARQUE, an operation consisting of commando raids against China's mainland coast. Other CIA operations targeting China during the same timeframe include the curiously titled HTMERLIN, which sought to create the perception Nationalist China discredited itself in the eyes of its population.

Related material suggests such initiatives came to include U-2 reconnaissance missions. I find it likely the involvement of Rochefort and his associates, as explored earlier, in the 1956 NICAP scheme may have been an extension of the themes of the 1950's intelligence community.

Plot lines represented in the Bureau file pertaining to Bryan include copies of letters provided to the FBI by J.G. “Jay” Sourwine.[91] He served as chief counsel for many years on Senate committees that conducted inquiries into such topics as lack of security in the State Department, Communist activities in the United States, and operations considered harmful to American interests undertaken with media outlets. The New York Times was particularly called into question, while some accused Senate committees of unjustly targeting the newspaper. In June 1955 Sourwine gave the FBI copies of two letters exchanged between Bryan and Capt. Robert A. Winston, USN (Ret.).

The letters are contained in the Bryan file. They indicate strong disagreements between Bryan and Winston over testimony Winston provided to a Senate committee during a closed door hearing to which Sourwine had access. Accusations of derogatory comments were thrown about, including questions of “scurrilous” statements allegedly made by Bryan about Director Hoover himself. Bryan and Winston, both Navy men, apparently knew one another a significant amount of time, as Bryan wrote to Winston he “thought” he was still his friend.

In a response to Bryan, Winston referenced a Lyle Munson, “who worked with us in the CIA and whom you personally had recommended to me as a thoroughly reliable and patriotic individual with enough guts to testify before the same group I went to.” Winston suggested Bryan's name did not come up during a telephone conversation with Munson, who apparently told him he could put complete trust in Jay Sourwine, Counsel for the Committee. Sourwine was subsequently briefed by Winston, who again suggested to Bryan his name did not come up, and the counselor immediately arranged for Winston to testify under oath in an executive session.

“Before and after my testimony I stressed its sensitivity and the danger to our country should it be revealed,” Winston explained further in his letter to Bryan. “I now urge you to keep this matter from public knowledge, for the same reasons.”

Winston informed Bryan, specifically about his testimony, “I did state that you had made certain statements to me in private, in your office, in the course of explaining to me why you personally could not visit the FBI Obscenity Room and why you wanted the FBI's permission for our two staff artists to go there.”

The letters indicate the Office of Naval Intelligence was asking around about Winston, presumably conducting an investigation. It at least partially pertained to Communist sympathizing, distribution of propaganda, moral conduct and similar issues.

A resulting 1955 FBI memo, Subject: Joseph Bryan III, authored by Assistant Director Nichols indicates he discussed the circumstances with Sen. Jenner, a player in the saga. Nichols paraphrased the Senator as stating he never had any doubt in his mind but that Winston told the truth.

“He furthermore never had any doubt in his mind,” wrote Nichols, “but that Bryan was a 'liar' as he has tangled with Bryan before...”

Nichols documented explaining to Sen. Jenner that Bryan denied making the statement in question (whatever exactly it may have been), adding that Bryan provided a hand-written letter to Hoover reiterating the denial. It was made clear to the Senator the Bureau wanted him to know this because it did not like having malicious lies circulated.

The overt representation of the significance of Communism, Red China, and related social dynamics of the intelligence community, observable among these men as the incorporation of NICAP loomed closer, could be considered interesting. That, and Robert A. Winston had a specific history in UFO lore, even if the UFO community did not know it.

Winston composed some of the most comprehensive intelligence reports on the “Ghost Rockets” of the 1940's and figured prominently in James Carrion's nonfiction book, Anachronism. The book explores the likelihood the UFO topic served intelligence interests as a tool of deception during the 1946-47 timeframe. Carrion cited documents establishing Winston as the U.S. Naval Attache at Stockholm, Sweden, during 1946, at which time Winston observed the brass was quite unconcerned about the reported rocket sightings.

Winston continued that the Swedish Defense Staff obviously wished he and others to believe the objects were rockets, but he was clearly unconvinced a threat was genuinely perceived. He concluded the Swedes knew the origin of the missiles and were not worried about them. Moreover, Winston added, “[T]he Swedish Defense Staff will conceal any evidence of the true nature of the reported objects until it deems expedient to release the information.”

Carrion proposed there were a limited number of American officials in on the Ghost Rocket ruse along with their Swedish counterparts. He just didn't think Winston was in the loop at the time. Winston's future career in the CIA seems to have possibly increased his information access.

Bureau files obtained on Robert A. Winston contain memos from 1960 indicating he went on to write a fiction novel, The Pentagon Case, under the name Col. Victor J. Fox. The book pertains to DC politics and the Communist threat, particularly, as I understand it, a heroic Pentagon official fighting for democracy amid persecution and mounting odds. As of this writing, I am not aware if Capt. Winston wrote in an official capacity for his CIA employer. Given the timeframe of his work as a Naval Attache in 1946, I would not find it surprising to discover his recruitment into the Agency corresponded in some way with the launching of the Office of Policy Coordination in 1948 and its subsequent escalation.

A 1962 newspaper clipping archived on the CIA website identified Winston as a former staff member of the Agency and the author of seven books. The article was an announcement for a speaking engagement for Winston. He was described as a controversial figure who had been the subject of attacks from Communist publications, left-wing columnists, and unnamed Pentagon “spokesmen,” the latter specifically put in quotes. The reasons for the attacks were attributed to his writings.

Continuing our exploration of the 37-page pdf on Bryan provided by the FBI, there is a four-page 1953 memo on Lewis “Pinky” Steenrod Thompson, Jr. I found the inclusion of the memo in the file intriguing because it contains no mention whatsoever of Bryan, only the handwritten addition of his name beneath the subject line. The notation was presumably added for filing purposes at some point after the document was read by the recipient, Assistant Director Nichols. The top of page one of the memo:

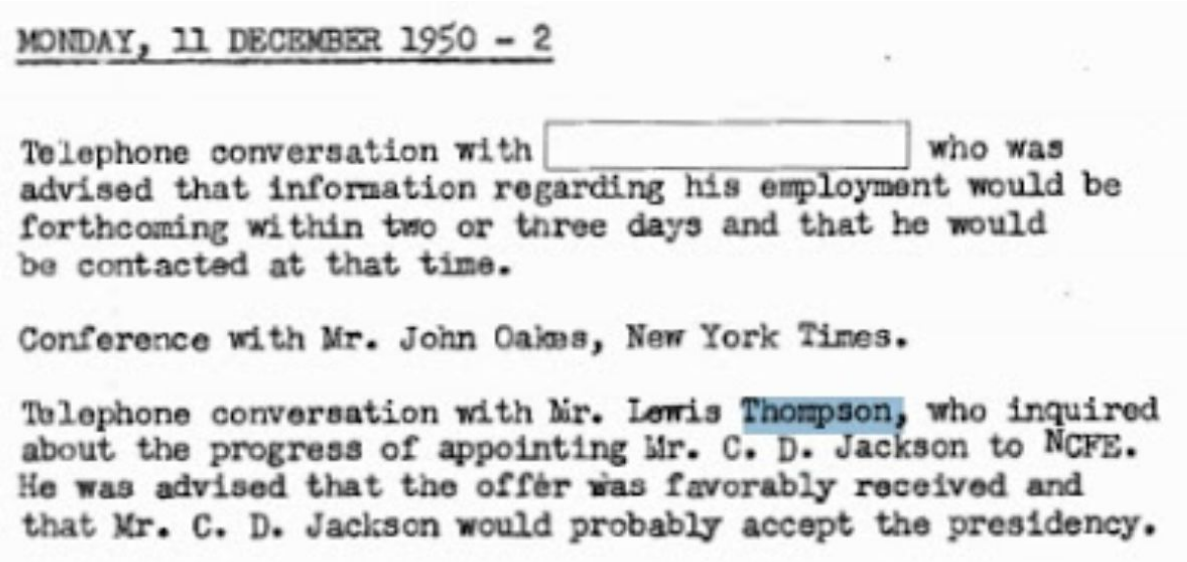
SYNOPSIS:

Lewis S. Thompson, Jr., aka "Pinky" Thompson born March 15, 1904, New York City. Father multimillionaire World War I hero who was large stockholder in Standard Oil. His mother was reported to be very prominent person in Republican politics. Graduated from Princeton 1926 and was suspended one week in 1923 at Princeton for drinking in dormitory. Served on Board of Managers, New Jersey State Prison 1936 and has been member of American Prison Association since 1936. Bureau applicant investigations of Thompson favorable, reflecting him to be millionaire who is ambitious, capable and loyal. He has been employed by Standard Oil Company and during World War II worked for Office of Production Management, War Production Board, and Combined Production and Resources Board in Washington, and for Mission for Economic Affairs, London, England. Native of New Jersey, he resided in 1950 at 3111 N Street, Northwest and was last known to be president of Briggs Filtration Company, Washington, D. C.

The basis of the memo was stated to be a summary of pertinent information in Bureau files regarding Thompson, and in accordance with the instructions of Nichols. Surmising Nichols requested the summary, and Thompson's activities somehow related to Bryan, I began searching for further information about Thompson.

Having read quite a bit about Bryan by this point in my research, it did not escape my attention Thompson was a Princeton alumnus, as was Bryan. The time period matched, as well.

An initial search of CIA records resulted in several returns on Thompson. They included such items as a reference to Thompson in an entry on page 79 of the 1950 calendar of DCI Walter Bedell Smith:



MONDAY, 11 DECEMBER 1950 - 2

Telephone conversation with [redacted] who was advised that information regarding his employment would be forthcoming within two or three days and that he would be contacted at that time.

Conference with Mr. John Oakes, New York Times.

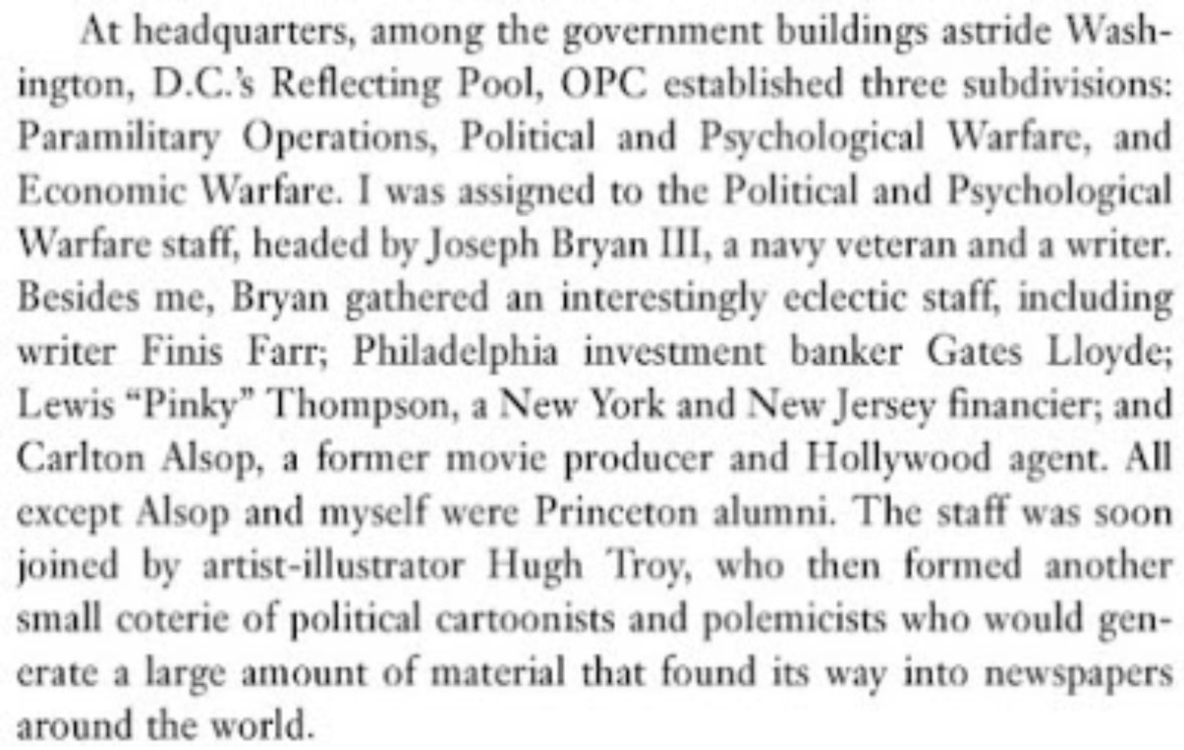
Telephone conversation with Mr. Lewis Thompson, who inquired about the progress of appointing Mr. C. D. Jackson to NCFE. He was advised that the offer was favorably received and that Mr. C. D. Jackson would probably accept the presidency.

I discovered an intriguing passage in author Hugh Wilford's 2013 book, The CIA, the British Left and the Cold War. Page 229 describes the likelihood an organization called the American Committee on United Europe (ACUE) was in fact a front for the Office of Policy Coordination and, in essence, the CIA and State Department. According to the recollection of one source, Wilford explained, an initial payment funneled through related channels "arrived in the form of a bag containing $75,000 dumped on his desk by CIA officer Pinky Thompson with the words, 'This is for you.'"

Wilford goes on to explain the operation became more sophisticated and described the scale of funding as massive. Only about a third of the total disbursements were recorded on the ACUE's books, Wilford continued, adding payments were disguised as gifts from fictitious donors or company-sponsored foundations and trusts. The remaining two-thirds were described as being transacted covertly. Wilford explained his research suggested the CIA was passing nearly a million dollars a year via the ACUE to the European unity campaign in the mid-1950's.

Another file located at the CIA website documented minutes of a 1952 meeting that included such notables as DCI Gen. Smith, Frank Wisner, and Allen Dulles. Others in attendance included Deputy Director for Administration Walter Reid Wolf, who stated Pinky Thompson would be coming to work, initially as a special assistant.

It seemed increasingly likely the FBI memo pertaining to Pinky Thompson was placed in the file compiled on Joseph Bryan due to something to do with such circumstances as their positions with the Office of Policy Coordination and CIA. It was during this phase of my research in 2019 I first discovered the previously referenced book written by E. Howard Hunt and Greg Aunapu, American Spy: My Secret History in the CIA. The following entry located on page 46 would become a primary factor in what led me to learn more about NICAP, the OPC and, eventually, Counsel Services, Mary Vaughan King, and her associates:



> At headquarters, among the government buildings astride Washington, D.C.'s Reflecting Pool, OPC established three subdivisions: Paramilitary Operations, Political and Psychological Warfare, and Economic Warfare. I was assigned to the Political and Psychological Warfare staff, headed by Joseph Bryan III, a navy veteran and a writer. Besides me, Bryan gathered an interestingly eclectic staff, including writer Finis Farr; Philadelphia investment banker Gates Lloyde; Lewis "Pinky" Thompson, a New York and New Jersey financier; and Carlton Alsop, a former movie producer and Hollywood agent. All except Alsop and myself were Princeton alumni. The staff was soon joined by artist-illustrator Hugh Troy, who then formed another small coterie of political cartoonists and polemicists who would generate a large amount of material that found its way into newspapers around the world.

Learning more about the activities of the men who worked for Bryan in the OPC does not necessarily tell us more about NICAP. It does, however, provide us a better profile of Bryan, the work he did, the circles he kept, and the interests of an agency, the CIA, which employed numerous people associated with NICAP. No less than seven such people, in Nicholas de Rochefort, Bernard J.O. Carvalho, Roscoe Hillenkoetter, Joseph Bryan, Alan Hall, Harry Cooper, and Charles Lombard, were verified or strongly implicated as CIA personnel or associates. Most filled positions of leadership in NICAP, spanning from its inception to dissolution.

You will note Hunt's awareness above of Bryan's apparent partiality to employing Princeton alumni. It was a little before Bryan and Thompson's days at the university, but Dulles was a Princeton man himself.

THE OPC PSY WARFARE CREW

FOIA requests submitted to the FBI resulted in some 50 pages of records on Lewis "Pinky" Steenrod Thompson, Jr. (1904-1965). The majority of the records are FBI memos pertaining to Thompson that resulted from "special inquiries." A 1941 memo, pictured in part on the following page, with a misspelling of "Lewis" as "Louis," shows the initial request for FBI investigation.[92]

A chain of investigations on Pinky Thompson was undertaken that included the participation of FBI offices from Boston to New Orleans and several points in between. The numerous resulting reports indicate he was born in 1904 in New York City, raised in Massachusetts, and attended Princeton University, where he played football and had considerably above average grades. He graduated in 1926 with an A.B. degree.

He made his home on what was described as an estate in Red Bank, New Jersey, when he was not relocating for work. He came from a wealthy family, having made its mark in the oil business. Thompson continued the tradition, working for Standard Oil.

Incidentally, Standard Oil would later be identified as sharing a history with the CIA forerunner, the Office of Strategic Services. “The families Vanderbilt, DuPont, Archbold (Standard Oil), Ryan (Equitable Life Insurance), Weil (Macy's department store), Whitney were all represented in the ranks of [“Wild Bill”] Donovan's [OSS] army,” wrote Frances Stonor Saunders on page 29 of her book, The Cultural Cold War. You will recall Col. Bryan married into the Whitney family, according to a previously referenced FBI report.

Thompson's father passed away, leaving him large stock holdings in Standard Oil. This gave him a financial worth of some $7 million in the 1930's.

Pinky married twice and had three children.

His associates and neighbors consistently described him as having excellent character. His credit record was very good and his loyalty to the United States was unquestioned. FBI interviews showed him again and again to be thought of as honest and high in integrity.

Thompson's mother was a prominent New Jersey political activist. She was registered Republican, as was Pinky. The Red Bank police chief described the Thompsons as a well respected family.

Thompson was a longstanding member of the American Prison Association. He served as a member of the New Jersey State Prison Board of Managers in 1936 and sat on the New Jersey State Parole Board in 1941.

Fred Moss, a New York City oil businessman and former employer of Thompson, stated Thompson was an excellent salesman and entirely reliable. He added the Thompson family was friends with the Roosevelts.

Mr. J.C. Richdale, another oil executive, explained to the Bureau he had known Pinky all his life. He told an agent that Lewis S. Thompson, Sr. was a hero in the first World War. At the time of the veteran's death, Richdale explained, Time magazine ran a long article honoring him and his service. Richdale added he was positive Pinky wanted to follow in the footsteps of his father.

“Mr. Richdale stated that he had just returned from New York City,” the 1941 FBI report continued, “and while there he had heard that Thompson had gone to Washington, D.C. to offer his services in Government defense work.”

It is not difficult to surmise Thompson would have been considered favorably by certain potential government employers, given such investigation findings from the FBI. In the early 1940's he worked with the Office of Production Management and the War Production Board. Bureau files indicate it was during this time, in 1942, Hoover received a letter from the Office for Emergency Management inquiring about Thompson.

“Inasmuch as Mr. Thompson has access to extremely confidential material,” the letter stated, “it will be appreciated if this case can be expedited so that we may have a report as soon as possible.”

Hoover replied an investigation was completed on Thompson for the Office of Production Management. He pointed out some six different reports were compiled by various field offices in cities across the nation where Thompson resided and/or conducted business. Hoover included a copy of each report in his response.[93]

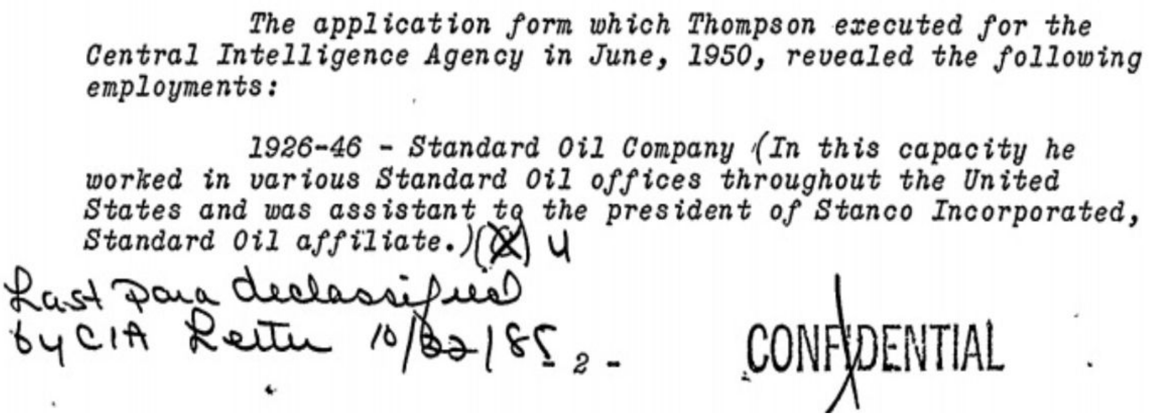
The Office for Emergency Management should not be confused with the Office of Emergency Management. The parent agency of the former, where

Thompson worked, was the Executive Office of the President. The Office for Emergency Management, in turn, was the parent agency of some half-dozen additional agencies and several departments to be found within them. They included the Office of Production Management and the War Production Board, each of which became recognized by the FBI as employers of Thompson.

A 1943 FBI report composed by an agent of the Washington Field Office indicated Thompson had a brush in 1942 with the subject of an espionage investigation. It seems that a Madame Helene Jules-Henri was the subject of an "Espionage – F" investigation, and Thompson owned a car that showed up at the house where she resided. "The occupants of the automobile registered to Thompson were seen to enter the house where Madame Jules-Henri was living," it was documented in the previously referenced 1953 FBI memo on Thompson contained in the file compiled on Joseph Bryan.[94]

The memo indicated that in 1942 Thompson was working for the Office of Production Management, followed by the War Production Board that same year. It might therefore be somewhat reasonably assumed his employment in some way shaped the circumstance of his automobile turning up at the residence of Jules-Henri. There were no apparent consequences to Thompson arising out of the incident.

That same 1953 memo, "Subject: Lewis Steenrod Thompson also known as 'Pinky' Thompson", states the Bureau conducted two "applicant-type investigations" on Thompson. They occurred in 1941, as we explored, and again in 1950. The 1953 memo, composed for FBI Assistant Director Nichols per his instructions, indicated the 1950 investigation correlated with Thompson's application to work with the CIA. From the second and third pages of the memo:



The application form which Thompson executed for the Central Intelligence Agency in June, 1950, revealed the following employments:

1926-46 - Standard Oil Company (In this capacity he worked in various Standard Oil offices throughout the United States and was assistant to the president of Stanco Incorporated, Standard Oil affiliate.) (X) U

It might be considered interesting that, years after the 1942 Jules-Henri incident and according to 1953 meeting minutes on file at the CIA, Thompson provided DCI Dulles with a document pertaining to the Julius and Ethel Rosenberg case. An FBI investigation launched in 1949 discovered the couple to be a driving force behind a spy chain responsible for transferring state secrets pertaining to the atom bomb. In 1950 the Rosenbergs were arrested and charged with numerous crimes stemming from espionage conspiracy. In 1951 they were convicted and issued death sentences. Following failed attempts through the court to avoid the sentences, they were each executed at Sing Sing Prison in New York on June 19, 1953. From January 28, 1953, CIA meeting minutes:

a. Stated he had received a memorandum (author unknown) from Pinky Thompson in regard to the Rosenberg case and had given a copy to Sam Papich. Since the contents of this memorandum did have foreign implications, a copy was also given to Mr. Helms for Tracy Barnes to study.

In 2019 I received the previously explored pdf from the FBI pertaining to Joseph Bryan III. I blogged about it, and pointed out it did not escape my attention the memo on Pinky Thompson contained in the file was dated April 17, 1953, just four days after the start of Project MKULTRA. DCI Allen Dulles officially authorized the now infamous project on April 13, 1953.

There seemed to be several implications of MKULTRA in the unfolding FOIA material I was obtaining in my pursuit of learning more about Joseph Bryan. Among them were the repeating overlap with biological warfare; the 1953 FBI memo on the brainwashing film that documented a meeting in the Attorney General office attended by Dulles and Hoover with reference to Bryan; $75,000 reportedly dumped by CIA officer Pinky Thompson upon a desk in Europe in the mid 1950's; and even Thompson's participation on governing boards within the prison system seemed potentially advantageous to the Agency. Preferring to err on the side of caution in my blog posts, I gave the circumstances mention but offered no opinions, inventorying them for the record and allowing readers to make of it what they would.

I subsequently heard from and consulted with multiple researchers knowledgeable on the topics. It was suggested to me the material could be interpreted to imply the FBI and CIA collaborated to various degrees on research related to interrogation techniques, or, essentially, projects leading up to and including MKULTRA.

The April 1953 FBI memo pertaining to Thompson clearly indicated he was vetted for employment with the CIA in June 1950, quite possibly due to his work with Joseph Bryan's psychological warfare division within the Office of Policy Coordination. Moreover, the 1953 memo could easily be interpreted to indicate he was being vetted by the FBI at the time of its composition, for what knowledgeable sources suggested to me could quite possibly have been his inclusion in work related to Project MKULTRA. You will recall that is the memo on Thompson located in the FBI file on Bryan, with Bryan's name added by hand below the subject line.

Among the people who reached out to me about the blog post was researcher Mary Jo Watts, who stated she had extensively documented MKULTRA subprojects and how they were funded. Her initial message somewhat amusingly expressed her observation my post referencing the above FOIA documents danced all around MKULTRA without overtly suggesting its apparent relation. She explained she was quite familiar with Thompson through her own research, suggested he was heavily implicated in the MKULTRA saga, and volunteered receipts if I wanted to see them. Indeed I did.

In subsequent correspondence Watts provided me with various tips and copies of newspaper clippings, including a 1965 death announcement for Thompson. The announcement stated, "In lieu of flowers, contributions may be made to Geschickter Fund for Medical Research, Georgetown University Hospital." (A 1965 obituary published in a DC newspaper and archived at the CIA states Thompson, described as a CIA aide, died after a long illness.)

Anyone familiar with the MKULTRA saga, transcripts of the resulting Senate hearings, and works such as The Search for the Manchurian Candidate by John Marks, should recognize the significance of the Geschickter Fund. In the years after Thompson's death, the Fund was identified as among the most significant conduits for the covert transfer of CIA funding to institutions conducting MKULTRA subprojects.

The Geschickter Fund was a preferred CIA cover managed by Dr. Charles Geschickter, and as reported by John Marks. It served as a CIA "cutout," Marks wrote. He further explained the Geschickter Fund for Medical Research was a Washington, D.C. family foundation, headed by Dr. Geschickter, who provided the Agency with a variety of services for more than a decade.

The circumstances were more recently summarized by The Hoya, a Georgetown publication. It noted Dr. Charles Geschickter was "a Georgetown University professor of pathology who, according to CIA documents, had top-secret clearance and received CIA funding to construct a new research wing in the Georgetown University Medical Center. A description of the proposed facility — the Gorman Annex — suggested that human patients and volunteers would be available for experimental purposes. The testing began in March 1959."

Further information is available through the now declassified CIA material on MKULTRA Subproject 35, which involved construction of a new research wing at Georgetown Hospital. The arrangement enabled CIA covert research and undercover personnel.

The Geschickter Fund funneled money to many MKULTRA subprojects, and, in addition to Subproject 35, Dr. Geschickter served as an asset on Subproject 6 of Project MKSEARCH, the successor to MKULTRA. A portion of the transcript of August 3, 1977, Senate hearings on MKULTRA reads, "Authorization to contribute CIA funds toward construction of the Gorman Annex is contained in Subproject 35 of MKULTRA. Recently discovered material indicated that Dr. Geschickter continued his research for sleep- and amnesia-producing drugs under Project MKSEARCH through July 1967 at Georgetown University Hospital."

The involvement of Dr. Geschickter and his family foundation in CIA behavior modification research is considered common knowledge among historians. It is indeed noteworthy that respects to a deceased CIA employee were requested to be expressed through contributions to the Geschickter Fund. Obituary › Washington, District of Columbia › 1965 › Washington Post, Times Herald, The (1959-1973)

THOMPSON, LEWIS S., JR.

At Gillionville Plantation, Albany, Ga., on June 11, 1965; husband of Loulie T. Thompson; father of Mrs. Francis Gray, Lewis S. Thompson III, and Walter G. Thompson; son of Mrs. Geraldine L. Thompson of Red Bank, N.J.; brother of Mrs. Elizabeth T. Babcock of Woodbury, Long Island. Private service and interment at Gillionville, on June 14. Memorial service at noon Monday, June 21, at Old St. John's Episcopal Church, Georgetown. In lieu of flowers, contributions may be made to Geschickter Fund for Medical Research, Georgetown University Hospital.

Watts additionally supplied me with a copy of a clipping from the June 22, 1963, edition of the Asbury Park (New Jersey) Press. The clipping indicated a relationship between Pinky's son and the Geschickter Fund.

The article announced the marriage of Lewis Steenrod Thompson III, son of Mr. and Mrs. Lewis S. Thompson, Jr. The bridegroom, Thompson III, was reported to be “with the Geschickter Fund for Medical Research of Georgetown University Hospital.”

Watts provided yet another clipping, this one from the May 28, 1963, Red Bank (New Jersey) Register. The article explained an ongoing court trial reached its fifth week concerning allegations a racehorse owned by Pinky Thompson failed post-race drug tests. The horse, Star Ice, was disqualified after winning two races and the purses from each were forfeited. Thompson and the horse trainer denied any wrongdoing. Interestingly, Dr. Geschickter testified on their behalf.

“Dr. Charles Geschickter of Washington testified yesterday that on a basis of reports made by three other Washington authorities on a Star Ice urine specimen in September, 1959, he would conclude there was no presence of a drug in the nature of amphetamine,” the article reported.

It seems some of us may have stranger job perks than others.

Readers will recall we went down the trail of Pinky Thompson after finding an FBI memo, of which he was the subject, located in an FBI file on Joseph Bryan III. We subsequently discovered E. Howard Hunt's assertion Hunt and Thompson worked for Bryan in a political and psychological warfare unit. The unit was a subdivision of a 1948-1952 CIA and State Department front, the Office of Policy Coordination. Another individual Hunt identified as a member of the unit was “Philadelphia investment banker Gates Lloyde,” a misspelling of CIA man H. Gates Lloyd II (no “e” on the end of Lloyd).

Horatio Gates Lloyd II (1900-1993) was described in a 1993 New York Times obituary as a Philadelphia investment banker who also served for ten years as a Deputy Director of the Central Intelligence Agency. He graduated from Princeton in 1923 and joined Drexel and Company, a Philadelphia investment bank founded by his father, where in 1927 he was made a partner of the firm. Mr. Lloyd joined the CIA in 1950, the article continued, and was appointed Deputy Director in 1954, a position he held until his retirement in 1964.

A FOIA request submitted to the FBI resulted in a response indicating no records were located pertaining to H. Gates Lloyd II. A search of the CIA website, however, revealed many declassified documents pertaining to Lloyd. Among them was a 1955 CIA memo verifying his appointment as Deputy Director of Support shown below.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ASSIGNMENTS TO KEY POSITIONS

OFFICE OF THE DEPUTY DIRECTOR (SUPPORT)

During the temporary absence of Lawrence K. White from on or about 4 August 1955 to on or about 4 September 1955, H. Gates Lloyd is designated Acting Deputy Director (Support).

ALLEN W. DULLES
Director of Central Intelligence

Another 1955 CIA memo, Subject: Implementation of a Verbal Understanding Between DCI and Mr. Nelson Rockefeller, was sent to the attention of Gates Lloyd. It advised him an agreement had been reached between DCI Dulles and Nelson Rockefeller for a method of dispersal of funding to “be used as directed by Mr. Rockefeller but not specifying the exact objects or purposes for which it is to be used.” The most practical method of making funds available, it was determined, “would be to simply increase CIA's contribution to PCG,” apparently for such expenses as a consultant.

Further research revealed the “PCG,” or Planning Coordination Group, was chaired by Nelson Rockefeller. A transcript of a 1955 memo posted at the Office of the Historian indicates the Group was set up within the Herbert Hoover-led Operations Coordinating Board. “The Planning Coordination Group was established," the memo states, "to aid in developing planning in both overt and covert fields and to advise and assist the responsible operating agencies in the coordinated development of plans and programs to carry out those national security policies appropriate to its functions." The memo further indicates the functions and composition of the PCG were described in a Budget Director's memo to the president and titled, "Coordination of Economic, Psychological, Political Warfare, and Foreign Information Activities."

The historic record suggests the PCG may have been intended to function in a capacity of coordinating and overseeing covert activities, but Rockefeller rather quickly identified its futility. Essentially, the CIA was not to be restrained. Incidentally, Nelson Rockefeller, Daniel Inouye, Barry Goldwater, who supported NICAP, and other notables would go on to sit on Senate committees conducting inquiries into CIA activities and MKULTRA. Joe Biden numbered among them as well.

A September 1956 CIA memo authored by Gates Lloyd shows he continued to play a supporting role in CIA finances from his position as Deputy Director. Lloyd advised the Director of Training about budgets for "position ceilings" for fiscal years 1957 and 1958. The ceiling allowances, which are redacted, were applicable to both military and civilian personnel, Lloyd wrote in the memo.

During an email exchange with Mary Jo Watts pertaining to circumstances surrounding Pinky Thompson, she described a network of CIA assets involved in transferring money into the Geschickter Fund. The operation included a relative of Dulles and employees at financial institutions. She mentioned one of the group was involved with a Pennsylvania investment bank.

Suspecting the individual might have something to do with Gates Lloyd and his work as a Philadelphia investment banker, I mentioned him to Watts. She was indeed familiar with Lloyd and responded with research tips surrounding the following information.

In September 1977, Sen. Edward Kennedy presided over a Senate health and scientific committee conducting inquiries into human drug testing done by the CIA. Dr. Charles Geschickter testified to the committee and responded to questions posed by Sen. Robert Schweiker.

The Senator asked how the Geschickter Fund received money designated for MKULTRA subprojects. Page 90 of a hearing transcript pdf indicates Dr. Geschickter explained the "original conduit" was a Philadelphia foundation.

Upon further questioning about the Geschickter Fund's role in distributing CIA money, the doctor described a system in which universities submitted research proposals and he would in turn see the projects were funded. Sen.

Schweiker then further sought clarification the previously described Philadelphia foundation acted as a funding entity.

“Yes,” Dr. Geschikter testified. “We only got, Senator Schweiker, we only got about $75,000 anonymously in our books that I can trace to CIA. All this money that we are talking about, the big volume of money, came through the Philadelphia Foundation.”

Mary Jo Watts explained the foundation was almost certainly an entity titled the Investment Association of Philadelphia. During the same hearing, Dr. Sidney Gottlieb, the director of MKULTRA, testified he could not recall details about the Philadelphia connection. Historians will recognize Gottlieb's failing memory as a recurring tactic implemented by the CIA chemist when asked specifics about subprojects he oversaw.

H. Gates Lloyd II had a son, H. Gates Lloyd III. According to The Philadelphia Inquirer, “he followed in the footsteps of his father,” graduating from Princeton in 1950 and ensuring a future in investment banking by taking a position at Drexel. In 1959, the Inquirer further reported, Gates Lloyd III was made the president of the Investment Association of Philadelphia.

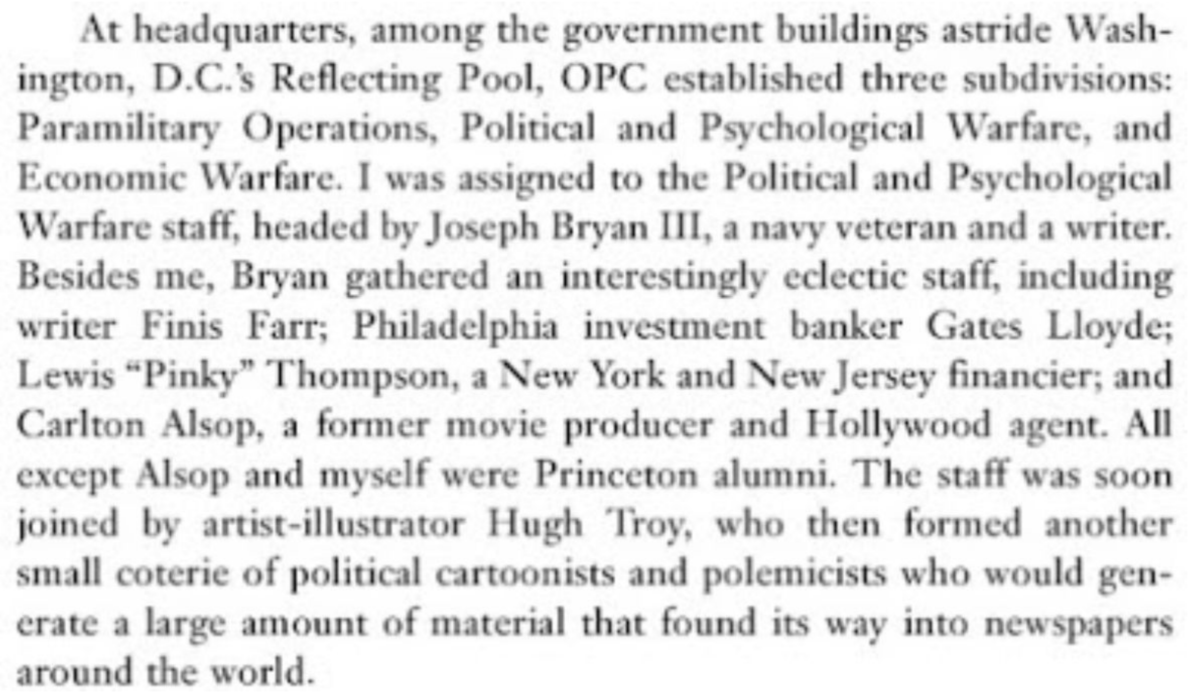
Files readily available in the CIA online reading room include an April 1956 society column published in The Georgetowner. The article describes a dinner party hosted by the Undersecretary of the Army and his wife, honoring the Secretary of the Air Force and his wife. The 125 guests in attendance included Mrs. Frank Wisner, wife of the CIA officer who launched the Office of Policy Coordination; Joseph Bryan III, who headed up a political and psychological warfare subdivision of the OPC and was soon to sit on the NICAP Board of Governors; Mrs. Lewis Thompson, wife of Pinky, who worked for Bryan in the OPC; and CIA Deputy Director Gates Lloyd, who worked for Bryan in the OPC.

A 1962 Washington Post society article archived on the CIA website documented dozens of celebratory dinner parties taking place one September evening in Georgetown. The community was commemorating the reopening of a refurbished landmark tavern. Mrs. Wisner's participation was again noted. Attending another party were Mr. and Mrs. Gates Lloyd, along with Mr. and Mrs. Desmond FitzGerald. You will recall Dez FitzGerald was the NY high profile attorney who chaired the Committee of Five Million, worked in the OPC, and became a powerful CIA officer.

E, Howard Hunt, who described himself as working for Joseph Bryan in the OPC, wrote a number of novels. In the OPC, Hunt secured a contract with a publisher to do several paperbacks. It is not known how many total books the CIA sponsored, as a list has never been disclosed, but the New York Times alleged in 1977 the Agency was responsible for the publication of at least 1,000 books.[96]

As previously explored, Hunt went on to be credited with playing a key role in Operation PBSUCCESS and its destabilization of the government in Guatemala. His activities of note were many and diverse, and have filled entire books. He is best known for his role as a Watergate "plumber."

So what about the other members of the Office of Policy Coordination's political and psychological warfare unit as identified by Hunt and others? Let's take a look at more of Bryan's crew, but first, for context, let's take one more look at what Hunt wrote about the OPC and Bryan's group:



At headquarters, among the government buildings astride Washington, D.C.'s Reflecting Pool, OPC established three subdivisions: Paramilitary Operations, Political and Psychological Warfare, and Economic Warfare. I was assigned to the Political and Psychological Warfare staff, headed by Joseph Bryan III, a navy veteran and a writer. Besides me, Bryan gathered an interestingly eclectic staff, including writer Finis Farr; Philadelphia investment banker Gates Lloyde; Lewis "Pinky" Thompson, a New York and New Jersey financier; and Carlton Alsop, a former movie producer and Hollywood agent. All except Alsop and myself were Princeton alumni. The staff was soon joined by artist-illustrator Hugh Troy, who then formed another small coterie of political cartoonists and polemicists who would generate a large amount of material that found its way into newspapers around the world.

"Finis Farr is an experienced journalist but not, to put it charitably, a great biographer," a 1973 book review published in the New York Times began. Perhaps the circumstances would have been more clear to the reviewer had they known Mr. Farr was another of Joseph Bryan's recruits in an OPC psychological warfare unit.

Finis Farr, born New Year's Eve 1904 and deceased January 3, 1982, was in the Princeton Class of 1926. The "J Bryan Papers" collection maintained at a Princeton library (Bryan was the Class of 1927) includes some 500 letters exchanged between Farr and Joseph Bryan. The library collections are not available to the public as of this writing due to renovations being made. Farr, known as a writer with Hollywood connections, came on board with the OPC at the same time as Carlton Alsop.[97]

Carleton William Alsop (1900-1979), aka Carlton Alsop, was considered in his day to be the CIA's “most valuable asset in Hollywood.”[98] That was really saying something, considering the mid 20th century Agency reached into Fox, MGM, Universal, Disney, and now list many other production companies and film executives to have been among its propaganda arsenal.

Alsop operated undercover as a producer and agent at Paramount Studios. He worked with Judy Garland in the late 1940's and early 1950's, by which time he had joined Wisner, Bryan, Hunt and the political and psychological warfare subdivision of the OPC.

Alsop's responsibilities and contributions went on to include compiling movie reports. His work was part of a larger CIA campaign to discredit Soviet claims about discrimination in the U.S. against people of color and the accompanying issues of low pay, unequal justice, and violence. The Soviets took frequent advantage of opportunities to emphasize America's history of poor race relations. Alsop subsequently assisted the Agency in monitoring Communists in Hollywood, and reported on the success and failure of a covert group he led. The group was charged with introducing specific themes into films that furthered CIA objectives, and often minimized aspects of racism and oppression otherwise commonly found in the United States.

It was Alsop and Farr who were dispatched by the CIA to England after George Orwell's death in 1950 to meet his widow and secure film rights to Animal Farm. The rights acquired, Hunt secured a producer, Farr and Alsop funneled CIA funds into the project, and production began in November 1951. The most ambitious animated film ever made at the time included 80 cartoonists and arguably had minimal resemblance to the message portrayed in Orwell's classic writing. His moral that greedy, power-hungry Communists were impossible to discern from greedy, power-hungry capitalists was replaced with a much more overtly positive framing of CIA-promoted values.

Incidentally, writer and researcher Robbie Graham documented CIA influence in Hollywood, particularly including its portrayal of flying saucers and incoming extraterrestrials. The involvement of Agency assets was present in the making, for instance, of the iconic 1951 classic The Day the Earth Stood Still.

Alsop reportedly once turned down an offer from Walt Disney to manage Disneyland, and was known for mingling with the stars, many of whom he contributed to their careers in some fashion. While executing a career as a CIA officer, he was a Tinseltown publicist, advertising executive, and radio and film producer.

Hugh Troy (1906-1964) of Bryan's outfit was an artist and award-winning writer of children's books. He painted noteworthy murals in addition to his talents as an illustrator, and wrote for Life Magazine, The New Yorker, and Esquire. A native of Ithaca, New York, Troy attended Cornell, but was reportedly suspended without receiving a degree. Even the fact his father was a professor at the university was not enough to save him from the wrath of a faculty grown tired of his practical jokes.

Hugh Troy had an absolutely famous penchant for clever gags. To a legendary extent, as a matter of fact. Popular humorist H. Allen Smith, in his book, The Complete Practical Joker, referred to Troy as “the most imaginative and ingenious of all practical jokers.”

Troy holds the distinction of having been credited with devising an epic Cornell stunt during a winter snow storm. He took a wastebasket made out of a rhinoceros foot and used it to make it appear tracks had been left across the campus. The trail led to Beebe Lake, which the college used as a source for drinking water. It was there where the tracks came to an end that Troy created a large cracked area in the ice covering the lake.

Perhaps he experienced a mild bit of remorse over the next few days as people stopped drinking the water. Troy reportedly sent an anonymous note to administrators, revealing it was a joke and confessing how it was executed.

Other tricks in his bag included a bit where he got arrested leaving Central Park with a park bench. Upon reaching the police station, he produced a bill of sale for the bench, demonstrating he owned it and had brought it with him to the park.

As unconfirmed legend has it, police got so tired of the routine they ceased questioning the smart aleck who liked to walk around with a park bench. Troy then enlisted the help of his buddies to make off one night, one by one, with every bench in the park.

His college hijinks also reportedly included some stunts in which he and his team of pranksters dressed to appear like a work crew. In one instance, they descended upon the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel and removed all the light bulbs without being questioned.

In another, they began digging a hole in the street with presumed authority. As the story goes, police even showed up and helped divert traffic. At some point the band simply left, leaving the police and town with a hole in the street.

Funny guy, that young man destined to be a CIA recruit. His talent at perception management is evident, and I must say I found the implications to UFO hoaxes intriguing, particularly considering his artistic abilities. Mirage Men, indeed. Perhaps there is the odd UFO case or three from the 1950's followed by an anonymous confession it was a hoax.

At any rate, Troy's understanding of behavior and inducing incorrect assumptions did not escape this writer, nor, apparently, the CIA. In 1951 he moved to Washington, D.C., presumably in relation to the Agency and OPC.

While we are left to wonder the extent these men may have been involved in the UFO mix, that is much less the case with Joseph Bryan. The colonel was among the military officials thrust upon the public by NICAP, and apparently headed up the Board when Maj. Keyhoe and Gordon Lore were relieved of responsibilities.

Bryan's UFO advocacy, ostensibly or otherwise, included his stated position on UFOs as contained in a 1966 article published in the DC-based Sunday Star and archived at the CIA. The article, Flying Saucers Again: Do You Believe in Them?, was authored by retired USAF Lt. Col. Charles Cooke. The piece described Bryan as one of NICAP's most highly qualified members of its Board of Governors, and noted Bryan's former position as Special Assistant to the Secretary of the Air Force and a former member of the staff of Supreme Allied Commander at NATO Gen. Lauris Norstad.

“It is my opinion,” Bryan was quoted, “that the UFOs reported by competent observers are devices under intelligent control; that their speeds, maneuvers, and other technical evidence prove them superior to any aircraft or space devices now produced on earth; and that these UFOs are interplanetary devices systematically observing the earth, either manned or under remote control, or both.”

Col. Cooke further reported that a photo published with the story was provided by NICAP. The image depicted a plane and an alleged nearby flying saucer, a dubious interpretation at best. A more clear copy of the article and photo than archived at CIA may be viewed at Jan Aldrich's Project 1947 website.

A substantial amount of material was made available to us about Joseph Bryan and the surrounding characters via the Freedom of Information Act and related methods. There is clearly, however, more to learn. Whether further answers to key questions can be obtained at this distant point in time is yet to be seen. I have a number of FOIA requests still pending as of this writing. Perhaps some will bear significant fruit.

In yet other instances, FOIA officers replied that requested files were identified, yet, after multiple searches, could not be located. All things considered, I do not find that particularly unreasonable. Disappointing, yes, but not necessarily unreasonable. It's been a while since Townsend Brown met Nicholas de Rochefort.

A question we're going to keep coming back to, the more we learn about the intelligence officers involved with NICAP and the circles they kept, is if it seems feasible they would have been interested in the organization in an unofficial capacity. Are we to believe these men in the business of the State Department professional spy trade, employed as Central Intelligence officers, and experts in psychological warfare all just decided, over the course of NICAP's 20-plus years of operating, it would be fun or rewarding to be in a UFO group? Are we to believe all of their employers, former or current, found no conflicts of interest, potential security issues, or similar problematic aspects of their involvement with NICAP? I do not find such scenarios likely.

Sure, maybe a CIA propaganda specialist decided to help with UFO Disclosure. It's possible, and the irony would be fascinating, but, no, I do not find it probable.

Statements attributed to Joseph Bryan's son indicate he did not suspect his father had an agenda to undermine NICAP. Moreover, C.D.B. Bryan apparently described his father's outspoken stance on UFOs as an embarrassment.

"Anyone who knows anything about the history of NICAP knows that the group didn’t need anybody's help in its disintegration; it simply self-destructed," C.D.B. Bryan was quoted.

He apparently went on to write, “[M]y father’s unswerving, outspoken faith in UFOs... was, I felt, something of an embarrassment... I do not believe it was the sort of public position an agent would take whose covert goal was to smother interest in UFOs."

I tend to agree, yet it still does not absolve intelligence agencies or some of their personnel from covert interest or discreet agendas pertaining to NICAP. Whether the Agency intended to destroy NICAP is but one potential scenario. There are many more possibilities.

In his previously referenced book, Howard Hunt wrote that Joe Bryan eventually resigned in disgust from the OPC. “Nonoperational OPC bean counters and administrators made work increasingly harder,” Hunt asserted. This allegedly resulted in the departure of Bryan, who Hunt described as “our creative thinker.”

Bryan's apparent departure from OPC would probably have been in 1953 or so, after the Office merged with the Office of Special Operations, forming the Directorate of Plans. Perhaps Bryan stayed on with the Agency in some capacity after his reported split from OPC, or perhaps not.

Either way, we can easily surmise an environment of turmoil and distrust in the intelligence community. This is evident in the previously reviewed FBI investigations, and, particularly, the letters provided to the Bureau that were exchanged between Capt. Winston and Col. Bryan. Combined with Winston's published writing, which included a novel about a heroic conservative Pentagon official fighting the good fight against Communism in spite of attempts to undermine him, a theme is clear. The theme was even overtly expressed and explicitly played upon in the work we explored of Col. Amoss. It's also as old as politics itself: People, in this case CIA officers, feeling persecuted and hampered by bureaucratic red tape. That might be considered particularly ironic given the things we now know about the lack of effective CIA oversight and the extremes the Agency employed to further its priorities. It is indeed no less ironic those charged with oversight felt stifled as well, as suggested by events surrounding Nelson Rockefeller, the Planning Coordination Group he chaired, and of course eventual hearings on MKULTRA and unwitting human experimentation.

Nonetheless, a feasible argument could be made that perhaps Bryan, disgusted with an intelligence community which he had served that nonetheless apparently came looking to tarnish his reputation at one point, became resentful and distrusting of Uncle Sam's minions. This might be suggested, for instance, in the discrepancies concerning statements made about Edgar Hoover, and circumstances surrounding Winston's testimony to a Senate committee. The Soviet Union was no doubt pleased with America's obsession with loyalty as prioritized and fueled by the FBI and select politicians, and the resulting accusations and decreased productivity it manifested.

It is possible Bryan subsequently numbered among a percentage of intelligence officers who got caught up in the UFO steeplechase when they saw their colleagues getting involved with NICAP, and got on board for various personal reasons. Perhaps his disgust with a turning tide of CIA directors, merging offices, and untrustworthy bureaucrats contributed to suspicions he may have harbored that there actually was a significant UFO cover-up. Or maybe the subject provided an attractive forum for criticizing his former employers. He would have been neither the first nor the last to argue any given stance on a UFO topic based more on the dislike of the opposition than concern about the issue at stake.

Perhaps arguably most likely, however, is that Col. Bryan was just doing his job, whatever the objectives may have been. A job he may have taken pride in for personal reasons, as compared to financial compensation.

It seems noteworthy Bryan took on the ghost writing project for Aga Kahn in 1953, presumably after his purported CIA departure and as the incorporation of NICAP grew closer. Bryan's experience with the FBI obscenity room, and the "tell all" nature of the book project seem relevant, as does Bryan's expertise in propaganda. It is difficult to dismiss potential implications of his continuing official relationship with the Agency and/or U.S. intelligence community in the Aga Kahn project.

It is for such reasons I find Bryan's experience in the OPC potentially relevant. The talents and activities of his crew hold implications to the 1950's UFO genre as a whole, but each of their continuing service to the CIA arguably carries significance to the NICAP story. The career paths taken by members of Bryan's crew over the course of the 1950's and 1960's offers us a profile of his OPC outfit and intriguing implications. If Joe Bryan was not - at the least - called upon by the Company for the occasional favor or task, he would be the only one among them who was not. Howard Hunt continued as a significant CIA officer, given particular credit for his work in Operation PBSUCCESS, among other notable events; Pinky Thompson became a special assistant and an asset in the funneling of funds, as apparently did his son; Gates Lloyd became a Deputy Director of Support and worked with funding and budgets, and his son apparently assisted as well; Finis Farr was a high profile writer with Hollywood connections; Carlton Alsop was recognized as the Agency's most valuable Hollywood asset; and Hugh Troy was a talented artist and perception manager who oversaw the distribution of CIA propaganda into publications throughout the world. With all of that being the case, we are left to consider their boss, Joseph Bryan, joined NICAP.

It seems likely that intelligence agencies indeed had concerns about Keyhoe's sources of classified information and reports perceived to relate to UFOs. It only seems reasonable the CIA, FBI, Air Force and other agencies would be concerned about identifying those sources and any individuals overly interested in them. It might even be considered somewhat surprising if there were not some lower profile assets than Bryan involved in NICAP and infiltrating the lines of communication. There is even the possibility the entire operation was a counterintelligence effort designed to roll up spies, aka people inordinately interested in gaining the trust of personnel with situational ethics when it came to leaking classified information. Keyhoe and his closest supporters – those genuinely interested in the UFO mystery - would not necessarily have been aware of such an operation. As has been aptly pointed out by others, the best front organization is one that doesn't know it's a front.

Therein might lie some of the reasons for the NICAP resignations of esteemed officers, as compared to the rumors they were pressured to leave the organization. It seems about as likely some of them preferred to avoid getting caught up in security issues and potential spy games, as opposed to the idea they were urged to resign from NICAP by former employers for other reasons.

Perhaps further research will provide deeper understandings yet to be found, but my general thesis is the intelligence community played a significant role in the incorporation of NICAP. I suspect the interest rose and fell over time, with assets serving various purposes to one extent or other as deemed advantageous. In the end, the CIA seems to have used its associates to oversee managing and eventually dissolving the organization. That was done for what could have been a number of reasons, none of which I suspect had much to do with UFOs.

IN THE NEWS

Although DCI Allen Dulles authorized MKULTRA on April 13, 1953, the project roots can be traced back much earlier, as is typically the case with any given program. CIA directors Roscoe Hillenkoetter and Walter Bedell Smith have their rightful spots as well in overseeing the progression of unconventional warfare and mind control research.

It was Hillenkoetter who was at the helm in 1949 when the Advisory Committee to the Secretary of Defense was meeting, as documented in the previously explored FBI memo on biological warfare. Readers will recall CIA representatives sought support from the Advisory Committee for what was described as vigorous exploration of techniques to achieve positive control of experimental human subjects.

A CIA memo, Subject: Project Bluebird, indicates Hillenkoetter's authorization of activities and funding for the MKULTRA forerunner in 1950. Knowledge of Bluebird was specified to be limited to an absolute minimum number of people. That need to know basis was designated to include representatives of the Office of Policy Coordination.

The memo continued, “The purpose of this project is to provide for the immediate establishment of interrogation teams for the operational support of OSO [Office of Special Operations] and OPC [Office of Policy Coordination] activities.”

Please allow me to briefly direct our attention back to the FBI memo, “Subject: Lewis Steenrod Thompson also known as 'Pinky' Thompson”. The memo documented Thompson executed an employment application for the CIA in June 1950, coincidentally or otherwise, two months after Hillenkoetter authorized Bluebird.[99] The memo was also placed in the file of Joseph Bryan III, for whatever specific reasons.

Back to the 1950 CIA Bluebird memo, it stipulated for a doctor's office to be set up in Washington, staffed with psychiatrists and personnel to “serve as cover for training, experimentation, and indoctrination purposes in the use of drugs and hypnosis.” Field support for interrogation teams was designated to be provided by either OSO or OPC.

A total annual budget of $65,515 was allocated for Bluebird, with $18,000 of it earmarked for transportation, second only to payroll. That was an estimated $1,500 per person for each trip, projecting three people making an average of four trips per year. Factoring inflation, that would be almost $17,000 per trip for each person, not counting salary. They got around.

In August 1951 the name of Bluebird was changed to Artichoke. The launching of Artichoke took place during the tenure of DCI Smith, the man responsible for initially pulling the OPC under his and CIA control before merging it with OSO into the Directorate of Plans in 1952. Artichoke received guidance from at least mid-1951 through 1953 from the “Bluebird/Artichoke Committee,” which consisted of representation from various divisions, including the Office of Policy Coordination.[100]

Frank Wisner, who directed the OPC and was credited with its expansion and subsequent reach, led the above referenced Directorate of Plans from 1952 to 1958, with future DCI Richard Helms as his Chief of Operations. Allen Dulles took the Central Intelligence reigns and authorized MKULTRA in 1953, and it was Helms who would eventually give the now infamous orders to destroy all related documents. It was apparently only due to some boxes of overlooked files, later obtained by John Marks through a FOIA lawsuit, that the public ever began to learn anything at all about the grossly unethical research projects.

In E. Howard Hunt's descriptions of the activities of the OPC political and psychological warfare staff, he suggested a significant aspect of operations included publishing content in newspapers. Specifically, Hunt wrote Hugh Troy formed a group of personnel “who would generate a large amount of material that found its way into newspapers around the world.” The assertion is certainly supported by any number of documents and accounts of OPC activities. It is a given that propaganda techniques include such methods.

James Carrion wrote about interesting potentially related circumstances, as mentioned earlier, in his books Anachronism and The Roswell Deception. Each are available for free download in searchable pdf at his blog, historydeceived.blogspot.com.

Carrion suggested select UFO cases, including the reported 1946 Ghost Rockets and events which took place during the fateful UFO summer of 1947, served as opportunities for the American intelligence community. He documented how the press was fed incorrect information about such events by intelligence officers, and proposed the published stories had specific purposes. The targeted demographic would not have been the public at large, but a combination of spies attempting to report the information back to their home agencies, along with the ultimate recipients of the messages, such as Joseph Stalin, and the manipulation of their perceptions and resulting actions.

It would be somewhat of a given Stalin would not suspect UFO reports to be indicative of otherworldly visitors, but some type of weapons development, classified exotic aircraft, and/or related disinformation effort. This would necessarily make select UFO reports of interest to the global intelligence community.

Resulting advantageous opportunities might include, for instance, intercepting diplomatic carriers transporting coded messages and subsequently cracking the codes. The task might be made less difficult if intelligence personnel could be reasonably sure they were looking for certain proper nouns and circumstances contained within the coded messages. You will recall we briefly explored Carrion's hypothesis earlier when Col. Amoss advised the Air Force Office of Special Investigations of a UFO report, and the account given to an OSI officer by Amoss somehow came to include alleged witness names and an address unknown to all other involved parties. That was curiously the case even though Amoss stated he got the story from one of those parties. Such circumstances might potentially serve a variety of purposes, such as code breaking efforts or as a means to identify security leaks if the names surface at a later date, among other scenarios.

Another instance of potential interest arose pertaining to the activities of UFO skeptic Dr. Donald Menzel. As explored earlier, the astronomer and astrophysicist worked with the Atomic Energy Commission at Los Alamos. Documents obtained through the FOIA revealed he also worked with the Boston Naval Reserve on code-related matters. At least some of Menzel's work was apparently related to identifying atmospheric conditions most advantageous for activities pertaining to message transmissions, according to previously referenced records already obtained. Hundreds of pages of additional FBI documents pertaining to Dr. Menzel are being processed for release by the National Archives and Records Administration stemming from the original FOIA request.

Carrion suggested the careful and intentional manipulation of UFO reports in the media might lead adversaries to suspect the existence of advanced weapons research and development. While some of the potential benefits are rather obvious, others might be more subtle. This might include anticipating how a figure like Stalin would react to such manipulation, and conducting operations accordingly, or, in effect, staying a step ahead of where you're directing his next move.

Carrion cited how a specific operation, Project Seal, was misrepresented to the American press. Reporters were told it was a research project involving an airborne weapon as powerful as the atomic bomb. In actuality, Seal was an already discontinued project that explored the possibility of creating tsunami waves through underwater explosions. In some instances, Carrion demonstrated, the doctored reports about Project Seal were published on the same 1947 newspaper pages as those that carried stories about Kenneth Arnold's famous UFO sighting.

Sweetening the pot even more, Carrion shared how he developed reason to suspect that even the shape of Arnold's reported craft, and the ensuing parade of published saucer reports thereafter, potentially played a role in the narrative constructed by the powers that be. Stalin demonstrated a particular post-World War II interest in securing the services of an Austrian husband and wife team of weapons developers. The couple were known to have been working on plans for a disc-like aircraft to act as a long range delivery system for bombs. The aircraft would theoretically skip across the atmosphere, not unlike a stone across a pond, effectively outdistancing missiles of its day. Carrion therefore proposed an intended effect of misrepresenting Project Seal, combined with manipulation of the 1947 UFO stories, may have been for Stalin to suspect his American counterparts had landed the Austrian couple and/or outpaced his efforts to achieve the advanced delivery system.

Such circumstances may have influenced UFO media reporting, the accompanying rapidly growing public interest, the overlapping of the UFO and intelligence communities, and even the existence of UFO reports themselves. As suggested, Carrion suspected all of this may have ultimately been related to deciphering codes. Public confusion obviously becomes a byproduct of such operations.

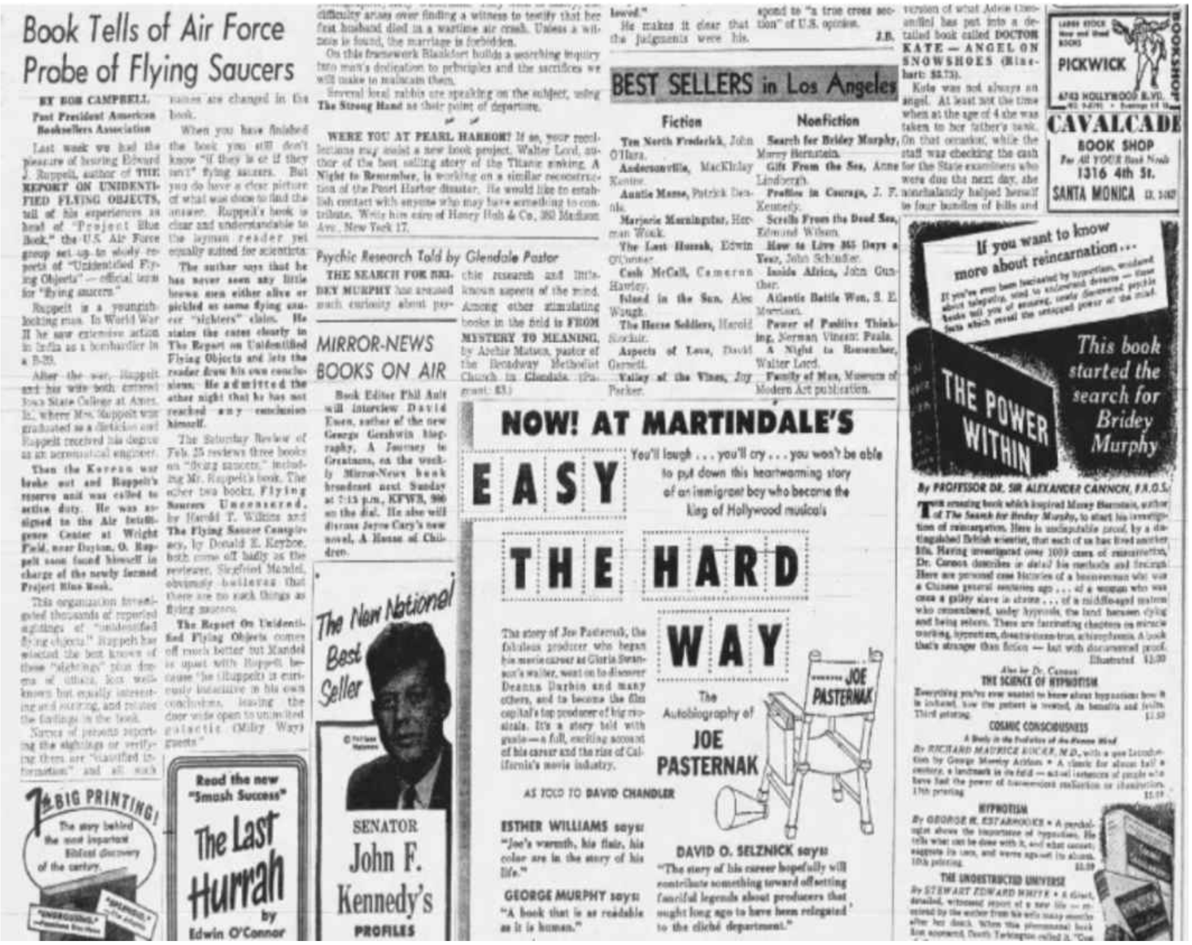
Mary Jo Watts mentioned in an email that she discovered instances in which research later known to be related to MKULTRA was published in mid 20th century newspapers. At my request, she helpfully offered an example. The clipping she shared involved Dr. Geschickter and his work with experimental drugs.

My previous research into such topics as the CIA and its descent into the study of hypnosis revealed similar circumstances. Dr. Martin Orne, for instance, published material on hypnosis later known to be the result of his work conducted under the umbrella of the Agency. One might suspect such circumstances to be common, and arguments have been competently made the CIA steered the formations of 20th century paradigms in fields such as psychiatry, or at least its funding recipients did. We might wonder what other purposes may have been involved in publishing such stories.

I found it interesting when Watts added that, in the course of her research, she came across archived newspapers in which MKULTRA-related material was published on the same pages as UFO-themed stories. She further noted that even though some of the articles were wire stories, she found it curious the pieces varied a bit from one publication to another, circumstances I happened to be aware Carrion observed in his work as well.

Theoretically, if select details were published in a newspaper in Oak Ridge, Tennessee, while alternative details were reported in the same wire story in Los Alamos, New Mexico, one might gain opportunities to collect valuable information on those who incorporate the different key words into their reports and messages. This might include learning more about their locations, capabilities, interests, and codes used in communications, among other things. The methods potentially stood to assist the code breaking process, gain intelligence on spy rings, and manipulate the actions of the recipients of the coded messages. There stood to be a lot of reasons intelligence officers might publish news stories in addition to simple propaganda and political warfare.

Watts provided me with an image of a page from the March 12, 1956, edition of the Mirror-News, pictured below. Across the bottom of the page, from left to right, we find an article on Capt. Ruppelt and his book about flying saucers and Project Blue Book; a reference to a book, The Search for Bridey Murphy, which pertained to psychic research, reincarnation, and "little-known aspects of the mind," among other esoteric subject matter; and, far right, a book on hypnotism by George H. Estabrooks, a Harvard graduate and Colgate psychologist later known for his MKULTRA efforts to intentionally split the personalities of undercover spies, aka Manchurian Candidate research.



Book Tells of Air Force Probe of Flying Saucers

BY BOB CAMPBELL,
Past President American Booksellers Association

Last week we had the pleasure of hearing Edward J. Ruppelt, author of THE REPORT ON UNIDENTIFIED FLYING OBJECTS, tell of his experiences as head of "Project Blue Book," the U.S. Air Force group set up to study reports of "Unidentified Flying Objects"—official term for "flying saucers."

Ruppelt is a youngish-looking man. In World War II he saw extensive action in India as a bombardier in a B-29.

After the war, Ruppelt and his wife both entered Iowa State College at Ames, Ia., where Mrs. Ruppelt was graduated as a dietician and Ruppelt received his degree as an aeronautical engineer.

Then the Korean war broke out and Ruppelt's reserve unit was called to active duty. He was assigned to the Air Intelligence Center at Wright Field, near Dayton, O. Ruppelt soon found himself in charge of the newly formed Project Blue Book.

This organization investigated thousands of reported sightings of "unidentified flying objects." Ruppelt has selected the best known of these "sightings" plus dozens of others, less well-known but equally interesting and exciting, and relates the findings in the book.

Names of persons reporting the sightings or verifying them are "classified information" and all such names are changed in the book.

When you have finished the book you still don't know "if they is or if they isn't" flying saucers. But you do have a clear picture of what was done to find the answer. Ruppelt's book is clear and understandable to the layman reader yet equally suited for scientists.

The author says that he has never seen any little brown men either alive or pickled as some flying saucer "sighters" claim. He states the cases clearly in The Report on Unidentified Flying Objects and lets the reader draw his own conclusions. He admitted the other night that he has not reached any conclusion himself.

The Saturday Review of Feb. 25 reviews three books on "flying saucers," including Mr. Ruppelt's book. The other two books, Flying Saucers Uncensored, by Harold T. Wilkins and The Flying Saucer Conspiracy, by Donald E. Keyhoe, both come off badly as the reviewer, Siegfried Mandel, obviously believes that there are no such things as flying saucers.

The Report On Unidentified Flying Objects comes off much better but Mandel is upset with Ruppelt because "he (Ruppelt) is curiously indecisive in his own conclusions, leaving the door wide open to unlimited galactic (Milky Way) guests."

THE POWER WITHIN
This book started the search for Bridey Murphy
By PROFESSOR DR. SIR ALEXANDER CANNON, F.R.G.S.
The amazing book which inspired Morey Bernstein, author of The Search for Bridey Murphy, to start his investigation of reincarnation. Here is indisputable proof, by a distinguished British scientist, that each of us has lived another life. Having investigated over 1000 cases of reincarnation, Dr. Cannon describes in detail his methods and findings. Here are personal case histories of a businessman who was a Chinese general centuries ago . . . of a woman who was once a galley slave in chains . . . of a middle-aged matron who remembered, under hypnosis, the land between dying and being reborn. There are fascinating chapters on miracle working, hypnotism, dreams-come-true, schizophrenia. A book that's stranger than fiction — but with documented proof.

The article was published alongside references to both Hungarian refugees and hypnosis experimentation, topics which would each prove of significant interest to the CIA.

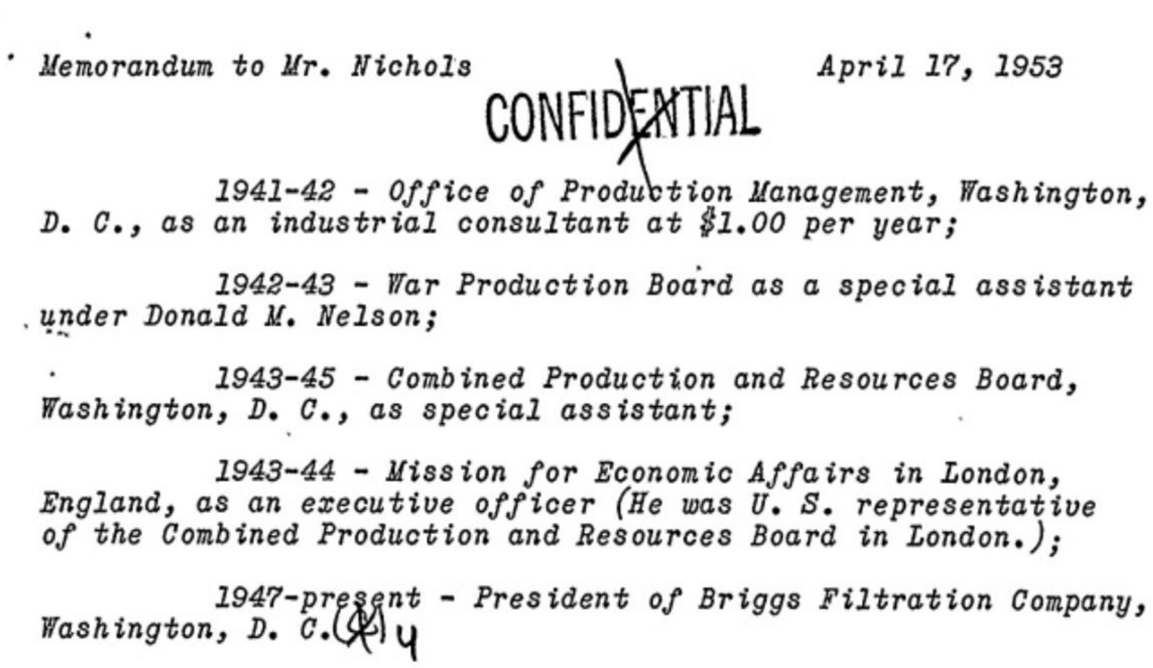
Further food for thought can be found in the previously referenced 1953 FBI memo on Pinky Thompson located in the Bureau file on Joseph Bryan III. Readers will recall the memo included documentation of a 1950 employment application submitted by Thompson to the CIA. As shown in the image below, Thompson was documented as listing his position at the time of the CIA application in 1950 as president of Briggs Filtration Company of Washington, D.C.



Memorandum to Mr. Nichols April 17, 1953

CONFIDENTIAL

1941-42 - Office of Production Management, Washington, D. C., as an industrial consultant at $1.00 per year;

1942-43 - War Production Board as a special assistant under Donald M. Nelson;

1943-45 - Combined Production and Resources Board, Washington, D. C., as special assistant;

1943-44 - Mission for Economic Affairs in London, England, as an executive officer (He was U. S. representative of the Combined Production and Resources Board in London.);

1947-present - President of Briggs Filtration Company, Washington, D. C.(X) 4

In an effort to learn more about the activities of Briggs Filtration Company, I came across an internet search return which directed me to a 1955 article published in Scientific American and archived at the JSTOR digital library. The article, The New Psychiatric Drugs by Harold E. Himwich, curiously pertained to the exploration of new avenues for the application of drugs to treat mental illness, including reference to lysergic acid and mescaline.

I soon obtained a pdf of the article from JSTOR, and discovered a reference to Briggs Filtration Company located in a full page advertisement for Alcoa Chemicals. The chemical company, as seen in the image below, proudly demonstrated its collaboration with Briggs to supply the Howard Hughes-owned Trans World Airlines with air filtration systems for its jets.

The 1955 Scientific American piece additionally contained an advertisement to sell Douglas aircraft, “designed for the U.S. Navy.” An ad for Hewlett-Packard was also featured in the article.

FINAL YEARS

America's cultural transition from the tumultuous 1960's into the 1970's was not lost on NICAP. If the first two categories of the evolution of NICAP were the 1956 Townsend Brown crew followed by 13 years of Keyhoe rule, then the decade of the '70s began its third and final chapter.

Stuart Nixon, formerly a NICAP staffer, was in effect running the organization after the removal of Donald Keyhoe and Gordon Lore. Richard Hall had ceased being a steady fixture since even before the Condon Report. In 1970 Nixon was made Secretary-Treasurer and later given the position of Executive Director. He was known for his interest in photo analysis, as compared to boots on the ground field investigation or other aspects of UFO research that had come to characterize NICAP.

John L. "Jack" Acuff was appointed President of NICAP in May of 1970, and thus formally began what came to be known as the Acuff-Nixon era. Acuff was the former director of the DC-based Society of Photographic Scientists and Engineers. He was also the proprietor of Acuff Associates, Inc., a business management services provider. He did not seem to know much or care a whole lot about UFOs, but perhaps that suited the Board just fine in the wake of the passionate Keyhoe and other circumstances.

The arguably drama-prone Todd Zechel reported in the August 1978 edition of the Just Cause newsletter that the Russian KGB targeted Acuff and the Society of Photographic Scientists and Engineers. From 1967 to 1970, Zechel asserted, Acuff was in communication with the FBI as a result of Soviet transactions conducted with the Society. As the story went, the Soviets ordered books from the Society and paid by check through the mail. The FBI began monitoring the payments and asked Acuff about the purposes of the checks. This purportedly fostered a relationship between Acuff and the Bureau, and Acuff would notify the FBI about transactions with Russians.

According to Zechel, the situation progressed to the point Acuff "would meet Soviet personnel at the secret request and guidance of the FBI."[101] Assuming this happened anything as described, perhaps KGB interest was related to classified work conducted by the Society and relationships its members may have had with select CIA personnel.

A search of the CIA online archive returned a number of documents responsive to “Society of Photographic Scientists and Engineers.” The documents include, for instance, a 1962 CIA Office of Training internal publication that provided details for the Society's annual conference. The information was listed in a section designated for professional meetings and conferences of interest.[102]

Additional documents indicate CIA interest in papers presented and topics explored by the Society. The evolution of photography techniques, photo analysis, and film development would naturally be of interest to global intelligence agencies. The same might be said of experts who study the activities.

A 2020 FOIA request submitted to the FBI for files referencing or pertaining to the late John Leland “Jack” Acuff, Jr., resulted in no responsive records. It is always possible such records remain classified for one reason or other, or were destroyed, or something of that nature, but the Bureau did not suggest potentially responsive records may have been lost or destroyed. It simply stated there were no records pertaining to Acuff.

A FOIA request on Acuff was also submitted to the CIA. It remains open as of this writing.

Zechel further asserted that in May 1977 the KGB attempted to recruit Acuff while he was employed as the president of NICAP. Zechel identified “Gennadiy I. Fedosov, First Secretary for Public Cultural Exchanges, Soviet Embassy offices, Washington, D.C.,” as a suspected KGB officer targeting Acuff for recruitment.

Suspected purposes for continued KGB interest in Acuff as described by Zechel included confidential sources developed by NICAP. Such sources provided NICAP with information related to UFO reports, in one instance including a message from NORAD, the North American Aerospace Defense Command. Some of the UFO reports involved international cases, such as a now famous event in Iran, and NICAP published the material in 1975 and 1976 editions of newsletters.

Zechel further theorized KGB interest might have been due to NICAP personnel in and of themselves. NICAP may have been targeted because of certain covert CIA employees who held important positions in the organization, Zechel wrote.

Rumors of CIA tampering in NICAP were bound to spread, even if no one knew at the time of circumstances we have opportunities today to review in hindsight and as explored in this book. Intel community intrigue was simply baked into the NICAP mode of operation, and it was and remains entirely reasonable to take interest in the cast of characters.

Richard Hall wrote that in 1971, with Acuff as president and Joseph Bryan still on the Board, two new members were added to the Board of Governors. One was Brig. Gen. Robert C. Richardson III, USAF (Ret). Hall described Richardson as a World War II fighter group commander who served in various planning and R&D roles for NATO, Air Force Systems Command, and the Defense Atomic Support Agency.

Harry C. Cooper was the other 1971 new addition to the Board. “Harry C. Cooper,” Hall wrote in his 1994 paper, “had served in the CIA from its inception in 1947 until retirement in 1966, including service in the Operations Branch. He became Special Assistant to the Deputy Director for Intelligence.”

Acuff negotiated contracts on behalf of Acuff Associates, Inc., or AAI, with NICAP in order to manage the organization. Services were to include maintaining business and research files, coordinating investigations, distributing newsletters, conducting administrative duties, and similar responsibilities. NICAP was run from an AAI office along with other clients.

Available files suggest the NICAP cost of these contracts may have run in excess of $30,000 per year.[103] Calculating inflation from 1974 to the time of this writing, AAI was requesting payment of some 170 grand a year by current standards. In a manner of speaking, NICAP curiously ended up back where it started, contracted with a business management corporation, in this case AAI instead of Counsel Services.

Stuart Nixon left NICAP in 1974, reportedly due to a power struggle involving Acuff's plans to mold NICAP into his personal enterprise.[104] This might not be entirely difficult to envision, considering Acuff's contract negotiations.

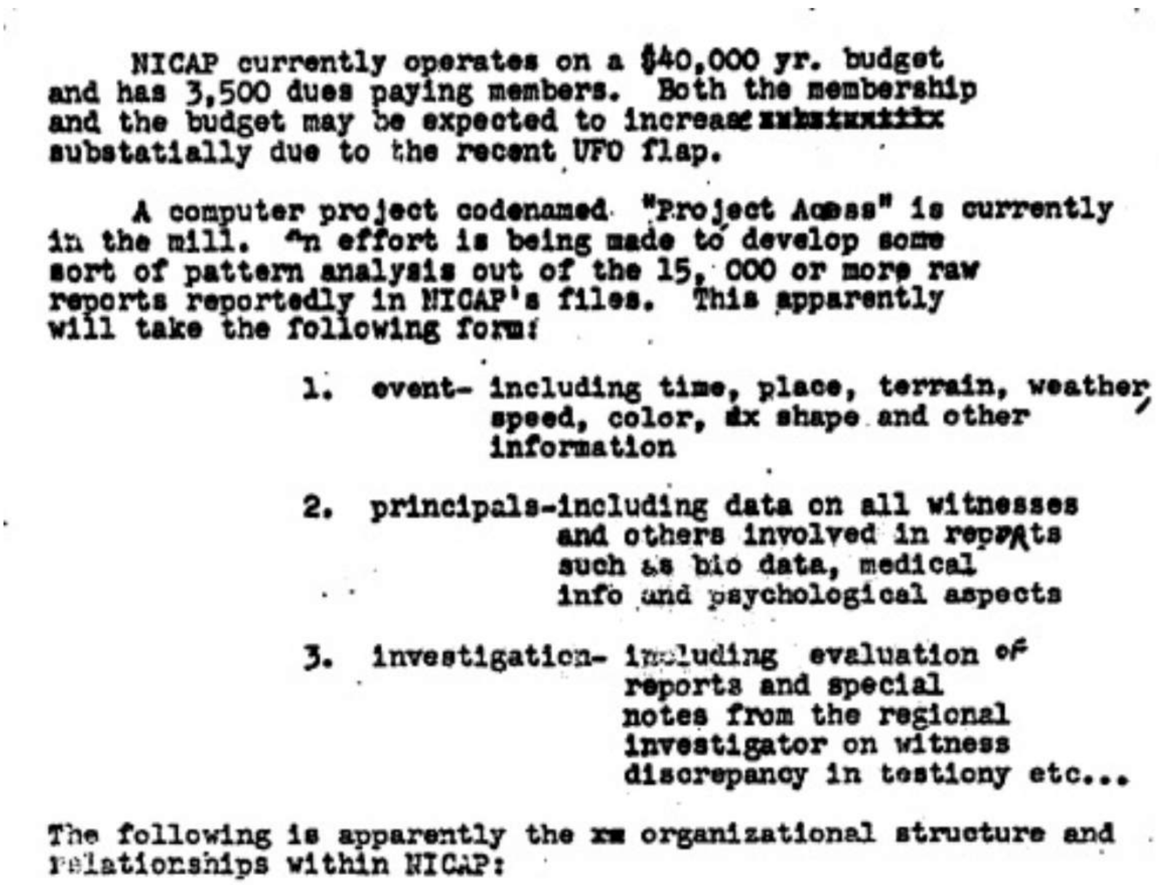
It was the early 1970's phase of NICAP, while Nixon held the position of executive director, depicted in typed notes on file at the CIA. The undated, unsigned profile of NICAP archived at the Agency is shown in the images below.

National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena (NICAP)

Appears to be a fairly loose structure but rather efficient. Stuart Nixon (background in investigative journalism) is currently Executive Director. He along with John Acuff and Charles Miller (backgrounds unknown) make up the organizations Editorial Review Board which is responsible for policy, including the newsletter, pxxx press and other media relations, as well as special xxpxqx reports and xx programs.

This board xmkmk relies heavily on both a loosely xxx structured advisory group and a fairly well developed and well placed xx network of investigators. The advisory group is made up of experts in xkk many disciplines including physics, astronomy, anthropology, medicine and psychology. This group also includes some ex-CIA and Defense Intelligence types who advise on investigative techniques and NICAP / Government relations. There does not seem to be any logical or systematic program by which these advisors are chosen, but rather xx the procedure seems to be to simply offer one's services to the organization through either Nixon or the Review Board. Often the advisors simply joined NICAP (a rather easy task since all it takes is a specified membership dmxx fee) found something out about the organization, and then made their qualifications known to the Review Board.

The xt system of investigators is a good one. Nxon has divided the country into regions and has established, "investigators" in each of the regions. Any member of NICAP is encouraged to xmkxkkx request a form by which one can apply for this position. The requirements for the position xxemxtmxxbmx include a minimum age of 25, formal training or experience in some branch of science, or other specialized background applicable to systematic collection of information, the ability to cover an area of at least 50 miles in diameter xf or one hour of driving time. As of a few months ago some 35 investigators were located throughout the country, with NICAP in the process of establishing even more. A breakdown of their backgrounds looked like the following: 7 PhDs, 2MAs or MS, 23 BAs or BS, 1AA and 2 with college training but no degrees. Occupationally they included 4 physical scientists, 13 engineers, 3 college profs, 13 specialists, including doctor, technician, computer programmer and businessman. Five of the 35 are pilots. Also xxxtxx utilized as " legmen" for the investigators are investigator xxxtx assistants. All investigators carry ixx credentials xt identifying them as investigators for NICAP.

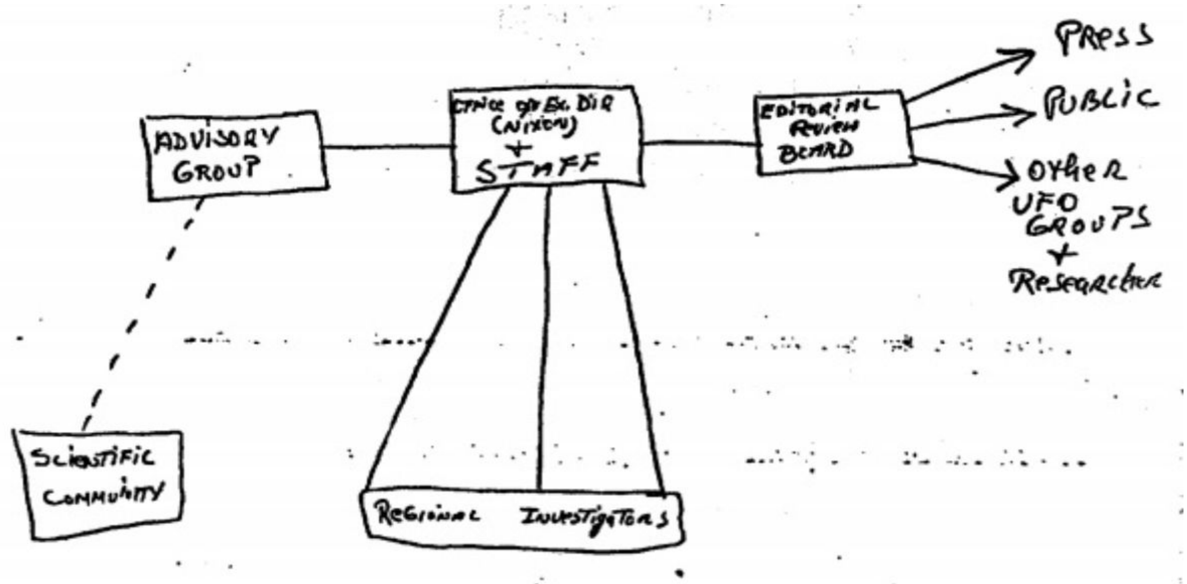


NICAP currently operates on a $40,000 yr. budget and has 3,500 dues paying members. Both the membership and the budget may be expected to increase substatially due to the recent UFO flap.

A computer project codenamed "Project Acess" is currently in the mill. An effort is being made to develop some sort of pattern analysis out of the 15, 000 or more raw reports reportedly in NICAP's files. This apparently will take the following form:

1. event- including time, place, terrain, weather, speed, color, shape and other information
2. principals-including data on all witnesses and others involved in reports such as bio data, medical info and psychological aspects
3. investigation- including evaluation of reports and special notes from the regional investigator on witness discrepancy in testiony etc...

The following is apparently the organizational structure and relationships within NICAP:



OFFICE OF EX. DIR (NIXON) + STAFF
ADVISORY GROUP
EDITORIAL REVIEW BOARD PRESS
PUBLIC
OTHER UFO GROUPS + RESEARCHER
SCIENTIFIC COMMUNITY
REGIONAL INVESTIGATORS

The same year Nixon departed, 1974, longtime NICAP flag waver Sen. Barry Goldwater took a seat on the Board of Governors. For whatever reasons, NICAP was reportedly spending minimal amounts of revenue on UFO investigations during this era, further depleting its dwindling membership while its reputation continued to slide.[105]

By 1978 the wheels were coming off. Acuff was complaining he was owed significant sums of money and the cupboards were bare. If there weren't enough problems already, NICAP staffers and members were barraged with mailers of Nazi propaganda. The material arrived bearing NICAP computer labels and membership codes. Goldwater's office was reportedly particularly displeased with the turn of events, which does not seem a huge stretch, given potential political fallout of the Senator having a leadership role in an organization disseminating Nazi reading material.

The trail seemed to go through Ernst Zundel, aka Christoff Freidrich, the head Nazi at a group in Toronto called Samisdat. “Freidrich” claimed he bought the NICAP mailing list twice from Acuff – and he had complaints about it, too. He was reportedly angry at Acuff because the list of past and present NICAP members he paid for included 8,000 names of people who were physically dead.[106]

If there might be anything to say in defense of Acuff in the whole mess, it would be that by some accounts he was tricked into the transaction when Samisdat used a front organization to buy the mailing list. Other sources believed Acuff knew where the list was going, and an argument might still be made he shouldn't have been selling and releasing the information at all.

About this same time, an interested party happened one Sunday to be driving in the vicinity of Acuff's office, aka NICAP headquarters, when they caught sight of a bunch of kids running down the road with armloads of UFO magazines. The person became suspicious and followed the line of youths back to the source: the dumpster at the NICAP office, where they promptly discovered even more youngsters making off with UFO loot. Doing their own dumpster dive, the concerned adult reportedly filled a station wagon with NICAP books, magazines, files by the hundreds, correspondence, photos, film negatives and related items while apparently keeping scavenging future ufologists at bay.

A number of individuals were understandably concerned about the state of NICAP. Some contacted the Board of Governors in attempts to preserve files and help shape whatever tentative future the org might have had left. Acuff was reportedly shopping NICAP around for a sum of about $30,000, an amount that could settle the books with him if he were to pull off the sale. By some accounts, Acuff claimed NICAP owed him over $20,000.

Richard Hall, Dr. John Carlson, and Larry Bryant were among a group of people making up an informal committee to preserve NICAP. The three entered into negotiations with NICAP representatives in 1978.

Hall, who at that point had not been involved with NICAP in several years, later wrote that Gen. Richardson, Joseph B. Hartranft, and Charles Lombard, an aide to Sen. Goldwater, acted on behalf of NICAP. Dr. J. Allen Hynek was also involved in negotiations, although his Center for UFO Studies would not absorb NICAP for a couple more years yet. In 1978, Richardson and Lombard expressed interest in reviving NICAP, Hall indicated. MUFON and CUFOS were by that time leading organizations in the field, and Hall's group was more concerned with preserving NICAP files than perpetuating its existence.

Negotiations continued for five months, with Richardson and Lombard occasionally suggesting Hall was under consideration to be offered the job of president. Hall would later express concerns about ulterior motives, suggesting an overall lack of interest in UFOs was exhibited by the NICAP representatives and Board. Throwing everything in a dumpster might have been a tell, as well.

Hall's group was struck by what he termed the complete ignorance of UFO history, UFO groups, and prominent ufologists displayed by these Board members. “We wondered if there were some hidden agenda behind their machinations,” he wrote.

It surely didn't help such suspicions when in October 1978 the Board removed Acuff, as anticipated, but rather than offering the position of president to Richard Hall as discussed might happen, installed alleged career CIA man Alan Hall in the spot. Acuff was officially said to have resigned and was moved to the Board, instead of severing all ties, for reasons widely figured to be related to the money the org owed him. Acuff retained possession of NICAP files for the time being, or, as one former member put it, was holding them ransom.[107]

Two new Board members were voted in at that same point in time, Charles Lombard, who had been assisting with negotiations, and John Fisher. As touched on earlier, Fisher was the head of the American Security Council and Communication Corporation of America, a conservative fund-raising organization.

Alan Hall's work as NICAP president seems to primarily have been limited to answering the phone and occasionally writing a letter out of his home. The organization existed in little more than name during its final couple of years.

I located minimal information about either Harry C. Cooper or Alan N. Hall. Patrick Huyghe, a writer and researcher well known among those with UFO interests due to his popular website, The Anomalist, explored NICAP in his 1979 article published in the New York Times, U.F.O. Files: The Untold Story.

“There are presently three former C.I.A. employees on the NICAP board of directors,” Huyghe wrote, “including Charles Lombard, a congressional aide to Senator Barry Goldwater, who is himself a NICAP board member; and retired U.S. Air Force Col. Joseph Bryan III. Bryan feels, as he did back in 1959 when he joined the board, that U.F.O.'s are interplanetary. NICAP's current president is Alan Hall, a former C.I.A. covert employee for 30 years.”

The CIA online archive has little to no information about Harry Cooper or Alan Hall. That is not the case for Charles Lombard, to which a CIA website search results in many documents.

Among the CIA documents is a pdf containing notes from 1972, apparently approved for release in 2006, indicating Agency interactions with representatives from the Office of Legislative Counsel. As shown in the first of two images below, the notes suggest Lombard was granted compartmented security clearance due to his work with the Senate Space Committee.[108]

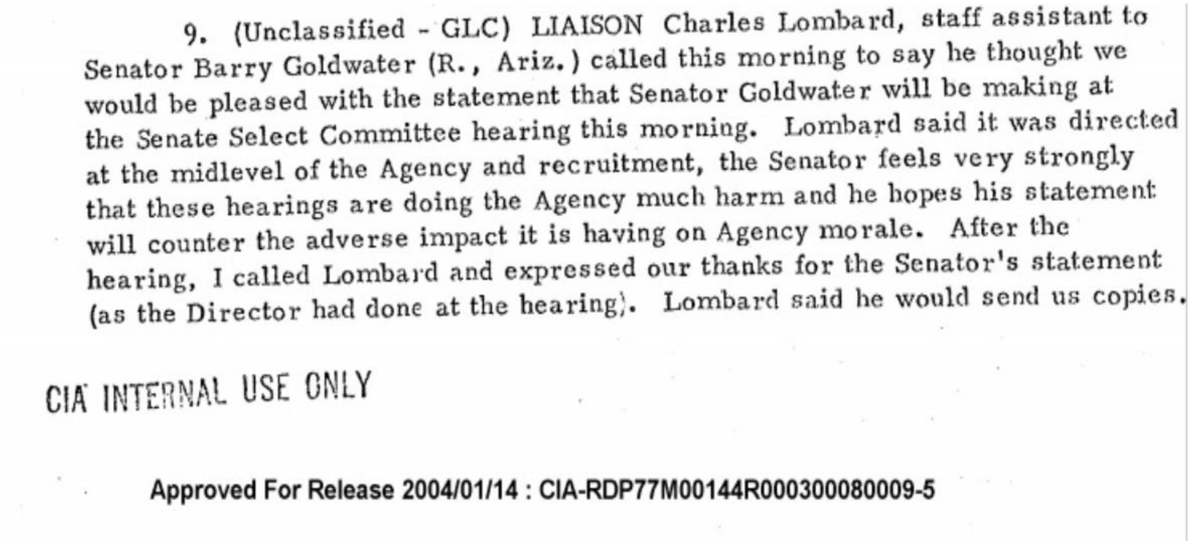
OFFICE OF LEGISLATIVE COUNSEL

Wednesday - 12 January 1972

1. [redacted] Met with Charles Lombard, Minority Staff Director of Senate Space Committee, and gave him the briefings for granting him compartmented clearances. Lombard then executed the appropriate security agreements.



9. (Unclassified - GLC) LIAISON Charles Lombard, staff assistant to Senator Barry Goldwater (R., Ariz.) called this morning to say he thought we would be pleased with the statement that Senator Goldwater will be making at the Senate Select Committee hearing this morning. Lombard said it was directed at the midlevel of the Agency and recruitment, the Senator feels very strongly that these hearings are doing the Agency much harm and he hopes his statement will counter the adverse impact it is having on Agency morale. After the hearing, I called Lombard and expressed our thanks for the Senator's statement (as the Director had done at the hearing). Lombard said he would send us copies.

The second image depicts a similar September 24, 1975, CIA internal document indicating Lombard advised the Agency of Goldwater's intentions to make statements in support of the CIA at a Senate Select Committee hearing. This was during an era the Church Committee and other Senate hearings scrutinized the CIA and outed such programs as drug testing on unwitting human subjects, unauthorized tampering with mail, and numerous such abuses of privacy and human rights.[109]

In 2021 I contacted the CIA Office of Public Affairs, informing it I was writing a book on interactions between the 20th century intelligence and UFO communities. I requested a statement on whether Harry Cooper, Alan Hall, and Charles Lombard were ever publicly acknowledged to be employed by the Agency. I emphasized any information available would be most appreciated. I have not received a response as of this writing.

Numerous articles are available that chronicle the NICAP involvement of Joseph B. Hartranft, Jr. Among them is a July 12, 1957, story published in the Cedar Rapids Gazette. It opens by reporting Dr. Marcus Bach, a professor of religion at the University of Iowa, was appointed to the NICAP Board. It curiously added Dr. Bach was then-currently leading a group of Iowans on a tour of Russia.[110]

The article went on to list the addition of several Board members, including Hartranft. He was described as president of the Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association.

Hartranft participated along with other NICAP key personnel at a 1966 press conference held at the National Press Club in Washington. A NICAP document containing bio information on the conference participants indicates

Hartranft served on leadership committees of multiple aeronautical organizations, and was the recipient of the 1966 Award for Achievement of the National Aviation Club.[111]

A 2020 FOIA response from the FBI indicated a file potentially pertaining to Hartranft was transferred to the National Archives and Records Administration. Subsequent correspondence with NARA revealed it evaluated the subject of the file in question to be Joseph B. Hartranft. NARA further indicated the file was created between June 1940 and February 1968, and consisted of an estimated 100 pages. The file must be processed for release, with an estimated date of completion in June 2024. The estimated cost for a reproduction is $80.

In 2020 the CIA issued a response to my FOIA request for records on Stuart Nixon, excluding the two files already published on the Agency website. The material subsequently provided on Nixon only consisted of a copy of a newspaper clipping on file. It was a 1973 article quoting Nixon, who indicated NICAP was swamped with calls in the wake of the reported UFO abduction of two fishermen in Pascagoula, Mississippi. Charles Hickson and Calvin Parker were destined to become storied names of UFO lore.

The July 28, 2020, CIA response emphasized in bold font that the Agency has no organized effort to do research in connection with UFO phenomena, nor has there been an organized effort to collect intelligence on UFOs since the 1960's. I found the phrasing mildly amusing, considering my request was simply for records pertaining to Stuart Nixon. I did, however, appreciate the Agency's apparent desire to make its position crystal clear.

The CIA further explained a list was compiled of hundreds of previously processed documents pertaining to UFOs and in response to FOIA requests. The list consists of some 30 pages, representing titles of documents containing over 2,700 pages, and the Agency included the list in the July 2020 FOIA response. Also included were instructions how to order the documents individually or in bulk, such as on a compact disc. In addition to clarifying its position, I had a bit of appreciation for the CIA's apparent understanding of where such a line of inquiries leads a FOIA requester. In a manner of speaking, it felt as if the CIA was responding, “Here's what we got. Help yourself and leave us alone. We're not doing the 20th century CIA-UFO dance.”

In 1980 the transfer of NICAP was again on the bargaining table. Negotiations probably never really stopped as much as experienced lulls. Gen. Richardson, J.B. Hartranft, and John Acuff were involved in coordinating the CUFOS acquisition of NICAP. CUFOS Chairman John P. Timmerman primarily conducted communications for Dr. Hynek's organization, acting as liaison through the process.

It appears in May 1981 a transaction was arrived upon involving a payment of $3,000 from CUFOS to NICAP, along with stipulations concerning assets.[112] NICAP was in the process, for instance, of receiving funds from the settling of an estate, the deceased owner of which had designated NICAP as a beneficiary. Correspondence conducted during the negotiations suggest CUFOS was directed by Acuff to retain the NICAP name and a semblance of activities long enough to deter legal complications and possible voiding of the estate settlement. This took a few more months of time, until early 1982, when CUFOS-NICAP began receiving about $7,700 from the estate. Combined with other stipulations and agreements reached, this seems to have been enough to cover a sum agreed was owed to Acuff.

John Acuff then finally left the NICAP Board, or what was left of it, when the estate settlement was secured and an initial payment of about $500 was apparently made to him in January 1982. Records suggest Acuff shipped the NICAP files at that point.

Mr. Timmerman wrote in a June 4, 1982, letter to Acuff, “It is with considerable pleasure that [I] send you the final check with payment in full to complete our agreement between your firm and the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena. We have received all but the final 25% of the estate settlement and hope to receive that in the next three or four months. Our total share of the estate will be $7,779.24, including the first partial which you received in January.” The letter further stated the June and final payment to Acuff was $3,532.79.

A January letter authored by Acuff to Sen. Goldwater indicates Acuff's early 1982 resignation from the Board. The message, copied to Timmerman, additionally carried a somewhat intriguing “P.S.” about a letter Acuff wanted Goldwater to make sure got to a Senate committee. The January 1982 letter:[113]

COPY FOR YOUR INFORMATION

Senator Barry Goldwater
United States Senate
Washington, D.C. 20510

Dear Barry:

I presume that General Bob Richardson has by now mentioned to you the recent changes in NICAP. Those of us that were involved on the Board could no longer devote the necessary time, energy and money needed by the organization and new board members were named. I have stepped down as chairman and been replaced by John P. Timmerman who may be contacting you to determine if you would like to remain involved. John is also chairman of CUFOS (the group Dr. Allen Hynek started).

I would like to take this opportunity to thank you for serving as a Board Member and for the help that you and your staff gave me as chairman. We wish you continued success and good health.

Sincerely yours,
Jack
John L. Acuff
President

JLA:pam

P.S.
Could you have a member of your staff route the enclosed copy of my letter to the post office to the proper Senate Committee. I do not have the chairmans name. Thank you in advance.

CC: John Timmerman

Acuff requested Goldwater have a member of his staff “route the enclosed copy of my letter to the post office” to the proper Senate committee. Goldwater chaired the Senate Intelligence Committee during this time, from January 1981 to January 1985, but it did not seem likely this was the destination of the letter, given Acuff's phrasing.

I asked some of my contacts experienced with NICAP what they made of it. While I did not come across anyone who felt confident about an interpretation, Barry Greenwood and I were in agreement it seemed to be a reference to a copy of a letter Acuff had written to a post office that he had some apparent reason to provide to a Senate committee. We speculated it might have been related to the Canadian Nazi mailing list caper. Regardless, it seemed a somewhat fitting ending to the enigmatic NICAP saga.

The NICAP tank was finally on empty, even if the Committee had long since ceased existing in the eyes of its members and staff from the Keyhoe years. With that, in 1982, the settling of an estate, shipment of the files, and departure of Acuff, NICAP was reaching a formal end. Perhaps some of the original organizers heard the news.

CLOSING THOUGHTS

Thank you for joining me on this exploration. Your time and attention are appreciated. Such journeys are destined to remain ongoing stories, even though the subject matter is relegated to the past, as FOIA responses and the discoveries found therein remain in the future.

I made a concentrated effort in several instances to separate my opinions of what the material and events indicate from their presentation. When I did offer some analysis, I hope I was overt enough in clarifying it was my opinion. Following is a summary of my thoughts on some of the circumstances.

Among the things I found most interesting was the saga of Nicholas de Rochefort. It is intriguing that he lived a life known to political historians due to his involvement in the China lobby, yet those historians typically had no interest in UFO organizations. Similarly, UFO researchers tend to have no interest in Rochefort's political activism. To Count de Rochefort, I suspect those two aspects of his life were one and the same. There might even be some clues to the strategy employed in the fact his detour into ufology seems virtually dismissed as irrelevant by historians.

The involvement of Counsel Services in founding NICAP appears significant. Its associates and relationship with the Economic Cooperation Administration, as established to be a CIA resource, are worthy of consideration. Counsel Services played a key role in the initial existence of NICAP.

Also of interest was that I got further with researching the specific aspects of the CIA that are potentially relevant to NICAP than I initially thought I would. It was less difficult than I suspected it would be to learn with whom Col. Bryan worked, the office in which it took place, and aspects of key personnel in that office. Not only did I find it intriguing that those in Bryan's subdivision were skilled at deception and propaganda, but we documented his associates went on to hold positions of increasing responsibility within the Agency as well. Their career paths were potentially relevant, as were the divisions in which they worked. Perhaps future research will continue to provide insight into the circumstances.

I suppose I thought it would be harder to learn some of this than it turned out because I incorrectly figured it would be more frequently discussed if it were accessible. I'd say the same about the hundreds of pages of documents now being processed on parties of interest as the result of my FOIA requests. I am a bit both surprised and disappointed such FOIA requests were apparently simply never made before.

I came to think the lack of attention given to such parties of interest is probably indicative of people who want to learn about UFOs aren't typically concerned with things like the organizers and board members of a group. They just don't find that interesting. I obviously think they should. In some instances, I suspect it might even be a matter of researchers would rather not know about certain material than have to incorporate the circumstances into their already formed opinions.

Suffice it to say I find it relevant that a Princeton library has a collection of hundreds of letters pertaining to Col. Bryan. Perhaps I will explore this further as the library increases operations and makes the collection available once again.

If I had to venture a guess as to what CIA interest in NICAP meant, I'd of course start by saying it was complicated and the implied question does not have one single, all inclusive answer. That stated, I suspect Nicholas de Rochefort and his associates were empowered to execute a plan that was probably scrapped pretty early on. I tend to think an evaluation of risk to reward was made, and circumstances became complicated rather quickly. I have suspicions the purposes of launching a CIA UFO organization may have included raising funds, controlling the narrative, spy hunting, and numerous possibilities as situations warranted.

It seems reasonably apparent to me the CIA, and quite possibly the State Department as well, had initial interests in the formation of NICAP. I have come to think this likely did not represent a burning desire to infiltrate the UFO community as much as the CIA meddled in everything, from magic mushrooms and Pentecostal church services to Guatemalan politics and psychic spies, and did not exempt UFO researchers from its collection of demographics for potential exploitation.

Moreover, the opportunities for intelligence operations within the genre were and remain self-evident. People issued security clearances and entrusted with national security show a rather amazing willingness to mingle at UFO-themed events and online social media sites where angels fear to tread.

Apparent CIA involvement in the incorporation of NICAP may be a story of money. There are many signposts that could be interpreted to point in that direction. Dez FitzGerald and Nicholas de Rochefort were talented in creative fundraising and lobbying techniques. We might consider the seemingly disproportionately expensive contract presented by Counsel Services, and Bernard Carvalho's apparent responsibilities in growing NICAP membership. Combined with the rumors of funds misappropriation, an argument could be made NICAP was considered for use as a resource to raise, launder, and distribute CIA funds.

The significance of the Cold War climate, Red Scare, and potential use of NICAP for propaganda purposes can likewise not be overlooked. A variety of strategies might have been considered for implementation, ranging from implying the presence of otherwise nonexistent advanced weapons projects to infiltrating Communist sympathizers believed to be in the circles of so-called contactees and the UFO genre at large.

I tend to suspect Col. Bryan was urged by the CIA, possibly from within the Directorate of Plans, to approach Keyhoe and get involved with NICAP. I do not suspect Bryan's participation was intended to suppress public knowledge of an alien presence or similar such typically hurled accusations. I think it more likely the Agency wanted to keep a finger on the pulse of an organization it created. As is the case with any project, advantageous opportunities might present themselves over time, and, in Bryan, a man was in place to identify and put such opportunities in motion, perhaps not unlike Carleton Alsop's role in Hollywood.

It is of course also possible Bryan was simply interested in UFOs and believed the things he said about them, I just happen to doubt it. I don't envision a man with his experience in the intelligence community would have identified such behavior as a productive way to proceed if that had been the case.

I was unable to conclusively identify exactly how Maj. Keyhoe got mixed up with this crew in the first place, and that bothers me a bit. I don't find it entirely suspicious, at least not as compared to individuals like Rochefort and Carvalho who apparently had no existing interest in UFOs, but I would have liked to know for sure. One might think there would at least be some version of a story around about Keyhoe's initiation into the NICAP beginnings, but there does not seem to be.

I tend to think Keyhoe was reasonably sincere, even if overzealous. One of my primary reasons for suspecting so, as compared to Keyhoe being some kind of intelligence operative or con man, is there were people who worked with him at NICAP for years who seemed to reasonably trust him. Could they have been deceived? Yeah, sure, but the burden would be on us to prove it, and it just doesn't seem particularly likely, not versus the likelihood he was what he relatively appeared to be.

It bears emphasizing that whatever was going on with the Board, the daily operations were rather removed from it, as is often the case with any organization. I would suspect there would have been stretches during the 1960's that Joe Bryan went months at a time without interacting with Keyhoe and his staff. I lean towards thinking NICAP, under Keyhoe's direction, may very well have gone a lot like it went whether or not it was initially launched by the CIA. It is curious how some Board members withdrew, such as Fahrney and Hillenkoetter, as the heat turned up, but, in general, I think Keyhoe got a long leash. That, or the powers that be didn't always mind what he was doing. The involvement of Fahrney, Hillenkoetter and other NICAP advisors is worthy of continued examination.

However much we may minimize potential intelligence community involvement during the '60's, there is no getting around how the org evolved at the end of the decade. While the termination of responsibilities of some key personnel, including Keyhoe, may have had nothing to do with the CIA, the fact remains Agency associates were involved in negotiating the terms of the situations and maintaining NICAP for years afterward. I find it beyond comprehension this would organically happen if the CIA had not held a specific interest in ensuring the timeline of the org was not left to chance.

I do not find it coincidental that the ebb and flow of NICAP drama somewhat reflected the eventual scaling down of highly controversial Agency activities, the changing of CIA leadership, and 1970's Congressional oversight hearings that probed an intelligence agency run wild. The CIA had some pretty big demons to publicly confront, and it might be considered somewhat on script to flip a UFO organization to CUFOS and leave the sleeping dog lie a while.

As for other UFO organizations, the 1980's, and ever since... that might be a different story.

PREAMBLE

On the Road to the Fourth Reich

The Geopolitical Framework of Virtual Government

The Dragon of Order Castle

In February, 1945 the U.S. Army's Ninth Division, still smarting after a brief exchange of bullets with a band of Nazi die-hards near Vogelsburg, trudged along a fire-gap cut into the spine of a mountain. Saw-toothed pine breached the fog swirling in the valleys on either side and sloped to a sprawling lake far below. The soldiers rounded a bluff and the fog scattered at the sudden rise of immense brownstone towers and flying buttresses.

The Americans entered the castle and explored its cavernous corridors, passed splashing marble fountains, moribund gargoyles and murals of the Teutonic Knights.

The interlocking fortresses sprawled over hundreds of acres.

The castles of Vogelsburgen were training grounds of the Hitler SS elite—"the elite of the elite," per William Shirer. The "Order Castles" (there were four) represented the pinnacle of the Aryan romance. Vogelsburgen lent the SS a sense of mystery and power. Only the highest-scoring students of the academies were accepted. Graduates acquired discipline, knowledge, elitist myopia and blind obedience to authority.

Following the German defeat at Stalingrad in 1943, the Order Castles were transformed into bustling wombs of future political leaders, scientists, spies, military officers and industrialists. Students of the Ordensburgen were given new identities and dispatched to countries around the globe to settle in as "sleepers."

Racial hatred was applied on a mass scale, parading as ideology. Like Hitler, to whom the students of the Order Castles swore allegiance, they were inculcated in, as Pope Pius XII described it, "the cult of violence, the idolatry of race and blood, the overthrow of human liberty and dignity." The castles were modeled after the fortresses of the Teutonic Knights, and students were trained to rule over "inferior" men with conspiratorial terror. The school operated in much the same way as a criminal organization. A charter retrieved from the castle of Vogelsburg by the Ninth Division explained that students were expected to be "dedicated to the Order for life and death. These men must know that there is no road back for them. He who fails, or would betray the part of his leaders, will be destroyed by this Order. Every National Socialist leader must know that he is climbing a steep grade." Confidence of success was inspired by "an absolute belief in ... Adolph Hitler."

In 1944, more than 2,000 Order graduates were trained at Vogelsburgen in the event of an Allied victory. The purpose of the castle, its ominous implications, may have been clear to the Americans. Or, after the horrors of World War

II, it is possible they overlooked the ominous implications.

A wind, a low, growl, rumbled up through the castle, growing louder and subsiding like the lugubrious moan of a waking dragon.

"Un-American Activities"

> Those were days when, as we have since found out, Project Paperclip brought such Nazi scientists as Arthur Rudolph and Otto von Bolschwing into the American aerospace industry; when our Central Intelligence Agency was formed by the wholesale grafting of Hitler's Eastern Front intelligence corps onto the remnants of the Office of Secret Services; when friends became enemies and enemies, friends.
> Nowadays, when the world takes industrial might for granted as the only order all must march to, one can do no more than pray that the truth will continue to pick its slow way through the blood and smog.
> —Peter Carey, San Jose Mercury-News, July 18, 1986

In 1933, the year of the Long Knives, Representative Hamilton Fish's life was derailed by a reading of Communism in Germany, issued by a Nazi propaganda house. Inspired by this tract, Fish joined forces with George Sylvester Viereck, ranking Nazi agent in the United States. Ever the public servant, Fish graciously conferred upon Viereck free reign of the Congressman's suite in the House Office Building.

A few years later, hours of thunderous Congressional oratory followed the arrest of George Hill, Fish's office clerk, on charges of spying for Himmler's SS.

Well before the Martin Dies Committee convened, Congressman Fish conducted the very first inquisitional federal "investigation of Communism," otherwise known as the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC). Between the pair of right-wing hot-seats, Dies and HUAC, came the McCormack-Dickstein Committee, formed in 1934 to investigate the dissemination of Nazi propaganda in the United States. This panel discovered that there was, in progress, a "fascist plot to seize the government." Shortly thereafter, the McCormack-Dickstein Committee was dissolved and its successor turned a deaf ear to any mention of fascist agitation on domestic soil.

But confirmation that Nazis were quietly rallying for the next phase of the war came with the publication of Treason's Peace, by Howard Armbruster, in 1947. Ambruster: "A few weeks after the surrender, Democratic Senator Harley M. Kilgore returned from an early postwar trip to occupied Germany with the announcement that he had uncovered proof of the plot to revive I.G. Farben and other German war industries, and that German industrial leaders were already preparing for the next world war."

Domestic fascists conspired with their European counterparts to transform the American political and military bureaucracies into a low-intensity battleground.

In The Yahoos (Marzani and Munsell, 1964), a study of Aryan Nations-type groups in America, author Mike Newberry detailed the bona fidés of ranking HUAC "investigators," among them:

> EDWARD SULLIVAN: HUAC's first "chief investigator," a career criminal with a record of nine arrests [ranging from sodomy to larceny]. Co-editor of a Nazi hate sheet with James "Kike Killer" True. Addressed German-American Bund rallies prior to his concern with "Un-Americanism" and was director of an openly fascistic Ukrainian group.
> DR. J.B. MATTHEWS: HUAC's "second chief investigator." Predicted in his autobiography that America's answer to Communism would be fascism or "something so closely akin to it that the difference will not greatly matter." His autobiography was published by John Cecil, a veteran anti-Semite, and his writings were reprinted by Contra-Komintern, the official house organ of the Nazi Foreign Office. He was a close advisor to Robert Welch of the John Birch Society.
>
> DR. FRED SCHWARTZ: One of HUAC's most revered "experts." Chairman of the Christian Anti-Communist Crusade.
> FULTON LEWIS, III: Rabidly "Christian" leader of Young Americans for Freedom, a front for Nazis entering the country from Munich. Earned his spurs on the HUAC staff. He wrote for the anti-Semitic American Mercury, edited by Harold Lord Varney, formerly a propagandist for the Italian Fascisti.

Let America Live Her Own Life | Communists in the Army | Are You Assisting In the Liquidation

The National Record was festering homegrown Nazi propaganda of a patriotic strain, published in the 1940s by Senator Robert Rice Reynolds. Prior to WWII, the Senator travelled to Germany and returned chanting his praises for Hitler. He called for the formation of a Nationalist Party back home, and wrote in the Congressional Record: "The dictators are doing what is best for their people. I say it is high time we found out how they are doing it."

Dance of the Antipodes

We Germans should be realistic. We lost two wars to the Jews.
Why should we lose another?
—Nazi Propagandist, Werner Naumann to British intelligence agents, July 1953

"Let us show them who is the natural elite!
Who is the world's greatest killer? White man!"
—Dan Burros, national secretary, American National Party

In September 1944, Sims Carter, then assistant chief of the economic warfare section of the Justice Department, testified before the Kilgore Committee that despite military defeat, the industrial cartels of German had renewed activity from bases in Argentina. "All the machinery," he said, "is ready for safeguarding German supremacy in the steadily expanding South American market." Much of that economy had been incorporated by I.G. Farben and other financial backers of Hitler years before the war began.

In the 1930s, as German factories tooled for the onslaught, Nazi entrepreneurs quietly constructed manufacturing bases, railroads and chemical and steel plants throughout South America. The munitions industry was all but cartelized by Farben and Krupp, providing business fronts for the Nazi fifth column. The insinuation of Nazism into Caribbean politics was directed by Alfred Becker and Arnold Margerie, officers of Farben La Quimica Bayer in Caracas. Down in Argentina, Axel Wenner-Gren, the Swedish millionaire, inventor of the modern refrigerator and a crony of Herman Goering, Hitler's propaganda minister, established subsidiaries and gracefully snatched up key industrial plants.

After the war, Nazis quietly assumed new posts en masse within the German government, and the Adenauer administration adopted an anti-Nazi facade in public while elevating war criminals to bureaucratic seats of power. By 1951, 134 former members of the National Socialist Party held senior positions in the West German Foreign Office. One of them was Dr. Franz Massfeller, a specialist on racial blood purges. Massfeller once advised his superiors in the Hitler regime to kill all half-Jews after the full-blooded victims were completely decimated. In the 50s, Dr. Massfeller was employed as a counselor in the Bonn Ministry of Justice.

In Germany, as in the United States, a virtual government was conceived with the trappings of democratic rule by the engineers of the Holocaust.

Attorney Hans Globke, author of the legal rationale underlying the Third Reich's racial laws, was entrusted with the directorship of President Adenauer's Federal Press and Chancellory Bureau.

Werner Naumann, formerly an officer of the SS and Goebbels' propaganda machine, was the founder of the German Reich Party, secretly abetted by the Adenauer government in Bonn. Herr Naumann's role in the postwar Reich was the placing of Nazis in business and industry.

On May 10, 1996, the Reuters news service released a story that trotted up to the door of the resuscitated Reich, nearly entering for a look-see ...

> NEW YORK (Reuter)—Realizing they were losing the war in 1944, Nazi leaders met top German industrialists to plan a secret postwar international network to restore them to power, according to a newly declassified U.S. intelligence document.
> The document, which appears to confirm a meeting historians have long argued about, says an SS general and a representative of the German armaments ministry told such companies as Krupp and Roehling that they must be prepared to finance the Nazi party after the war when it went underground. They were also told "existing financial reserves in foreign countries must be placed at the disposal of the party so that a strong German empire can be created after the defeat."
> The three-page document, released by the National Archives, was sent from Supreme Headquarters of the Allied Expeditionary Force to the U.S. secretary of state in November 1944. It described a secret meeting at the Maison Rouge (the Red House Hotel) in Strasbourg, occupied France, on August 10, 1944.

Jeffrey Bale, a Columbia University expert on clandestine Nazi networks, said historians have debated whether such a meeting could have taken place, because it came a month after the attempt on Adolph Hitler's life, which had led to a crackdown on discussions of a possible German military defeat.

Bale said the meeting was mentioned in Nazi hunter Simon Wiesenthal's 1967 book The Murderers Among Us, and again in a 1978 book by French Communist Victor Alexandrov, The SS Mafia.

"As soon as the [Nazi] party becomes strong enough to re-establish its control over Germany, the industrialists will be paid for their efforts and cooperation by concessions and orders," the intelligence document said. The meeting was presided over by a "Dr. Scheid," described as an SS Obergruppenfuhrer [general] and a director of Hermsdorff & Schonburg Company.

Attending were representatives of seven German companies including Krupp, Roehling, Messerschmidt, and Volkswagenwerk and officials of the ministries of armaments and the navy. The industrialists were from companies with extensive interests in France and Scheid is quoted as saying the battle of France was lost and "from now on ... German industry must realize that the war cannot be won and it must take steps in preparation for a postwar commercial campaign."

The Real McCloy

In October, 1929, Martin Heidegger, [the existentialist and constructivist] warned an official in the German Ministry of Education against Verjudung (growing Judaisation) as a threat to "our German spiritual life."... Heidegger was to Sartre what Hegel was to Marx.

—D. CAUTE, 1995, Spectator 21 x Reviewing Elzbieta Ettinger, Hannah Arendt/Martin Heidegger, Yale University Press

Meanwhile, backstage at the war crimes show trials, Rockefeller counsel John J. McCloy, the high commissioner of Germany (later a high commissioner of the JFK murder investigation) courted Nazi officials on behalf of the U.S. government. Defendant Gustav Krupp once controlled 138 private concentration camps utilizing slave labor—yet the German industrialist was permitted to hold board meetings with executives of the Krupp business empire while still a prisoner at Nuremberg. McCloy freed Krupp and kindly returned the munition-builder's property. The CIA banker also assembled a panel chaired by David Peck, leading justice of the New York Supreme Court, to "review" the sentences of Germans wanted for recruitment by the Allies. Otto Skorzeny, Krupp's representative in Argentina, Hitler's very own Commando, was among the first German spies surreptitiously placed on the American Cold War intelligence dole.

On January 19, 1953, the New York Times took notice: "Nazism is not dead in Germany." Given time and opportunity, "a form of Nazism could again rise to power. Materially speaking, Nazism was smashed into a pulp by 1945," but the "vigorous roots remained."

A national priority was made of economic recovery in the Fatherland. A memo from the German Press Department of B'nai B'rith to officials of the Jewish organization on July 1, 1953, detailed a meeting of the former Waffen SS in Verden, once a Nazi garrison town: "The reason this little alumni club exists is, one might say, plausible, even sentimental—to care for those in their ranks who survived and to locate lost comrades. The reunion, their first since the war, brought five thousand men to Verden. Mufti-clad, they marched through cramped, flag-bedecked streets to the rally with all their famous and former military precision."

Among their contacts in the United States, the Nazi "elite" could rely on the generous assistance of a patron, Pedro Del Valle, who went on to become a vice president of ITT. In 1954, Del Valle, a retired Marine Corps lieutenant general, was soundly defeated in his bid for the Republican gubernatorial nomination. His campaign was spiced with public endorsements of a foaming, anti-Semitic booklet, Know Your Enemy. In 1974, Del Valle and ITT consultant John McCone, formerly a CIA director, threw in to overthrow Allendé in Chile's 1970 coup. ITT funneled some $350,000 into the elections, and when the brutal dictatorship of Pinochet was installed, conspired with other politically "conservative" companies to pirate the country's natural resources.

As a hedge against the fall of the Third Reich, German industrialists made provisions in 1944 for protecting their loot from confiscation by the U.S and England. On the instruction of Martin Bormann, the surviving SS, now ODESSA, established hundreds of corporations abroad, donated handsomely to far-right political candidates and cleared the path for the reconstruction of the Reich on foreign soil. All of this was accomplished by channeling the loot through a labyrinth of secret bank accounts. The funds were transferred to nonbelligerent nations and under Bormann's direction financed some 750 new companies to oversee the Nazi Party's revival.

Over 100 of those companies were based in the United States.

Funds materialized in the accounts of Germany's agents around the world. They were instructed to invest in selected businesses and propaganda fronts in the U.S. and elsewhere, channel legal aid to indicted Nazis, purchase out-of-the-way estates for Nazi leaders in foreign countries, and so on. These funds also supported the "ratlines," ports-of-call situated every 40 miles along the German border for Nazis fleeing the Allied noose.

In December 1946, a memorandum from Laurence Frank, the US Consul in Austria, was sent to the State Department noting that Goering and Goebbels had moved funds to Geneva in diplomatic bags to avoid detection. "It is reported that Reichsmarshall Goering lately used this method to transfer personal funds," wrote Frank. "Goering sent more than $20 million of his personal fortune to Argentina." He shipped some of this fortune via submarine in the summer of 1943. Goebbels secreted $1.3 million in a safety deposit box in Buenos Aires.

The Times of London reported on December 6, 1996 that the Nazis "secretly sent more than $1 billion to Argentina in the last month of the war and scoured the world for sanctuaries for their plundered wealth. It was reported that Eva Perón may have conspired with the Nazis to set up secret accounts on behalf of her husband to hide hundreds of millions of dollars obtained from looted Nazi gold, cash and art treasures."

Reactionary opinion in the United States was fomented by American Nazis. For America, a spin-off of the America First Committee, was formed in 1954, steered by leading WWII isolationists. One of the organization's steatorian spokesmen was Colonel Robert McCormick, publisher of the Chicago Tribune. The Chairman of For America was Clarence Manion, formerly dean of law at Notre Dame University. Manion once sat on Eisenhower's Commission on Inter-Governmental Affairs. Robert Wood, then CEO of Sears, Roebuck, was a ramrod leader of the bund.

The stated aim of For America was support of political candidates sympathetic to the Nazi cause. Three Congressmen made up the recruiting arm of the organization: Burton K. Wheeler, Hamilton Fish and Howard Buffett. Fish, the Republican Party leader, had as his greatest ambition the start of a third party based on principles of National Socialism. The others were already in disrepute for involvement in pro-Nazi, "non-interventionist" groups during the war.

"What will it take to disband this group?" asked the Atlanta Journal of this reincarnation of America First, "World War III?"

General Wedemeyer's Ultraconservative, Lonely-Hearts Club Bund & Dr. Becher's Beltway Brotherhood

The war came marching home. The German military machine had been pounded to scrap in Europe and Japan, but the propaganda that fueled it resurfaced in San Antonio, Texas ... and the proletariat, including veterans, greased the gears. The 1961 "Let's Look at America" seminar, sponsored by the Fourth Army and the San Antonio Chamber of Commerce Jaycees, drew a crowd of 3,500 strong. Retired General Alfred Wedemeyer, a supporter of the John Birch Society, railed at President Kennedy's "appeasement" of the Soviet Union. Cleon Skousen, formerly an FBI agent and a scion of the Christian Anti-Communist Crusade, demanded the end of all diplomatic relations with the Eastern Bloc. Dr. Gerhart Niemeyer, a writer for the National Review, spoke at the rally, and so did Senator Strom Thurmond and Donald Jackson of HUAC.

The "seminar" spurned direct orders from the Pentagon—a "violation of Army policy," Army Secretary Elvis Stahat cautioned. Unmoved by orders, Colonel William Blythe of the Fourth Army's G-2 Division shot back: "We are not interested in politics! The Army intends to stand up and be counted!"

General Wedemeyer flew from the San Antonio session to Dallas, where he met with oil baron H.L. Hunt, a financial sponsor of Joseph McCarthy (Borger, Texas News Herald, September 25, 1961).

A small battalion of military personalities threw in with a host of fascist front organizations, figureheads for the domestic war, among them:

Generals Nathan Twining, Admiral Radford, J.B. Medaris and Rear Admiral Chester Ward: Military-Industrial Institute.

Admiral Arleigh Burke: Featured speaker of the Christian Anti-Communist Crusade.

General Charles Willoughby and General Peyton Campbell: Christian Anti-Communist Crusade.

General Stratemeyer: Liberty Lobby and the Christian Crusade.

General Bonner Fellers: Endorsed the Birch Society and Americans for Constitutional Action.

Admiral Strauss and General Wedemeyer: National Advisory Board of Young Americans for Freedom.

And a blue-ribbon coalition of military officers who joined forces with Ultracons and Aryan Nationals alike. While ranking officials raised the rabble against Soviet "expansionism," the Nazis sought influence in D.C. One of the most influential Nazi spies in the U.S. was Dr. Walter Becher, an anti-Communist "refugee leader" from Germany. Becher joined the National Socialist Party in December, 1931, and took the job of editor of Die Zeit, a Nazi propaganda sheet, in 1937. He was a brownshirt for a spell, and a recruit of the National Socialist Student Bund. Dr. Becher editorialized for the purge of all Jews from state-owned radio in Prague. During the war, he worked in the Goebbels Propaganda Ministry and for the Wehrmacht as a correspondent. Shortly after the fall of the German military, he founded a newspaper and agitated for a restoration of National Socialism.

Herr Becher had his advocates in Washington, a powerful collection of dupes and political operatives. In 1957, Congressman Usher Burdick inserted one of Dr. Becher's propaganda pieces in the Congressional Record; in August 1959, seven more appeared in the pages of the same journal. When Becher traveled to the States, conferences were arranged for him by the State Department. His political views were trumpeted by the Mutual Broadcasting Network and scores of newspapers.

Dr. Becher's early contacts in Washington were Joe McCarthy, William Jenner in the Senate and a handful of Congressmen in the House. T.H. Tetens, in The New Germany and the Old Nazis, was awed by the Nazi's camaraderie with Beltway politicians, and tracked Becher's movements through the District of Columbia: "During the early fifties, when he first came to Washington, he began to build for himself a formidable political machine. His scheme was very simple. If he could obtain the support of leading politicians in the United States, his prestige and stature would grow enormously at home.... With the help of the McCarthy faction in the United States, he could establish a nationwide reputation as the foremost leader of the anti-Communist crusade."

Among the senators who sent personal letters of support to Dr. Becher in Munich in the 1950s, count: Prescott Bush, Albert Gore, Pat McNamara, William Knowland, Strom Thurmond, Thomas Dodd, Robert Byrd, William Langer and Stuart Symington. House Speaker John McCormack also tendered a letter of support to the Nazi propagandist.

Ultraconservatives place much emphasis on character, a quality all too often absent within their own ranks. A glaring example is Willis Carto, publisher of Spotlight, a populist newspaper that backed Patrick Buchanon for president in the 1996 election. Carto was the protégé of Francis Parker Yockey, a radical right-winger indicted for sedition during WWII. Yockey's indictment included charges of supporting the Nazi Party.

Carto's organization was one of five "Liberty Lobbies" founded in 1957 at the first major world anti-Communist conference in Mexico City. The faction known today as the Liberty Lobby was run by a steering committee of American fascist leaders and Nazi spies, including:

Major Gen. Charles A. Willoughby: Born Adolph Tscheppe Weidenbach, born in Heidelberg, Germany in 1892. Nazi agent in the Army Supreme Command and intelligence chief under MacArthur in Korea. "Security Director" of the Shickshinny Knights of Malta.
Willis A. Carto: Treasurer and founder.
Major General Edwin Walker: US Army, John Birch Society.
Lt. Col. Philip Corso (ret): US Army Intelligence under Willoughby-Weidenbach.
Robert Morris: American Security Council (ASC), Young Americans for Freedom, Birch Society.
Senator Strom Thurmond (D-S.C.): Since, a "defector to the Republican Party," a senator his mid-90s.
Otto Otepka: Director, security evaluations, State Dept.
Senator James O. Eastland (D-Miss.): The director of internal security in the U.S. Senate.

A maze of bridges was erected by the Liberty Lobby to Germany's Nazi Party. Edwin Walker was the coeval of Gerhard Frey, publisher of the neo-Nazi Deutsche National-Zeitung und Soldaten-Zeitung. A bosom ally of Major General Willoughby-Weidenbach. Theodor Oberlander, the German commander of the Ukraine Nightingales during the war, wrote for the German newspaper. He settled in Canada after the war. Dick Russell, in The Man Who Knew Too Much, drew connections between the Munich-based Reinhard Gehlen apparat under Allen Dulles and sundry WACL "lobbies" under Charles Willoughby-Weidenbach: "German veterans were included, notably Fritz Kramer [another German agent, a crony of American economist Peter Drucker and an intelligence asset from Nazi Germany. Kramer haunted the Plans Division of the DoD during the Vietnam War]—a former Abwehr officer who once headed up a private vigilanté cadré that ferreted out German leftists at the behest of private industry. Its U.S. sister organization was the ASC." The American Security Council a private, Washington-based security force, was established in 1955 by former FBI agents, and compiled an index of over one million alleged "subversives" for the corporations. Willoughby-Weidenbach, a close friend of Fritz Kramer, went on to sit on the ASC board.

Kennedy assassination researcher William McLoughlin, in an unpublished essay on Willoughby-Weidenbach, notes that MacArthur's Nordic intelligence chief engaged in a lifetime of acts "with the direct intention of facilitating either the success of the Third Reich or the rise of the Fourth. The most frightening thing to consider is that he almost succeeded in his intentions on several different occasions.

"It is my contention that Charles [Adolph] Willoughby will eventually be remembered as one of the most prolific mass murderers in the history of mankind, behind only Joseph Stalin and Adolph Hitler."

McLoughlin cites "the surprise attack on Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941 and the ensuing bombing of the U.S. Far Eastern Command in the Philippines. Both of these events fell under the aegis of MacArthur and his sidekick Willoughby [Weidenbach] as head of intelligence for the Far Eastern Command. Even after he was told of [the] Pearl Harbor attack, Willoughby [Weidenbach] declined to suggest a search of the Pacific rim for the Japanese carriers supporting the surprise attack and instead opted for leaving the U.S. Army's entire air strike capability sitting on the tarmac in the Philippines in closely clustered groups, which made them easy targets for the Japanese Zeroes ten hours later."

The presence of ranking military officers at extreme right-wing political rallies did not pass unnoticed. In The Warfare State (1962), Fred J. Cook detailed the doomed attempt of Senator Fulbright to rein in the "Prussianized" officers:

> Senator J. William Fulbright, the intellectual and independent Arkansas Democrat who is chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, sent Secretary McNamara a memorandum protesting against the activities of the military in indoctrinating the public at a nationwide series of Radical Right forums. Fulbright made the vital point that the military, whose proper role is the execution of it, were attempting to determine public policy by lending the prestige of their rank and uniforms to some of the most rabidly extremist groups in the nation....
> He had struck at the juncture, at the military link of the military-industrial complex, and the roars of outrage that were emitted from the jungles of the Radical Right filled the halls of Congress and reverberated across the nation. The bellowing was led by Senator J. Strom Thurmond, a Major General in the Army Reserves and a Dixiecrat from South Carolina whose mind rebelled at the racial heresies of the twentieth century. Thurmond denounced the Fulbright memorandum and thundered that a "dastardly" attempt was being made to "muzzle" the military and keep them from fighting the Communist enemies of America.

> Joined by other far-out conservatives, Thurmond kept a daily oratorical barrage rolling in the Senate....
> Here, visually demonstrated in action, was the military-industrial combine of which Eisenhower had spoken as a potential menace to the nation. The revolt of the Military Brass against the rule of a civilian Secretary, the collaboration of the military and big business in whipping up war-like passions among the people limned an overall issue of greatest magnitude.... At conflict, in essence, were traditional American principles and the kind of Prussianized military-industrial concept that produced Hitler.

The Economics of Virtual Government

Confiscated Jewish assets were poured into the Nazi rebirth and turned up in the oddest places. On September 20, 1996, a half century after the fact, the Associated Press at long last noticed: "Tons of gold looted by Nazis during World War II—some of it possibly taken from the fillings in Holocaust victims' teeth—are stored in the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and the Bank of England in London. Recently declassified federal documents show that six tons of gold looted by Nazis are stored in the two banks, the World Jewish Congress [WJC] said. The group's president has written to the two countries asking that the gold be returned to Holocaust survivors."

Elan Steinberg, speaking for the WJC, based his allegations on declassified State Department documents that confirm two tons of Nazi gold had turned up in New York vaults (worth about $28 million) and four tons ($56 million) in London.

One of the concealed links in the gold transfers was the Wallenberg family. The Wallenbergs ran Sweden's largest commercial bank during the war and assisted the Nazis in the movement of gold and jewels stolen from the Jews. In The Art of Cloaking, Dutch authors Gerard Aalders and Cees Wiebes describe the Wallenberg family as front men cozy with Hitler and Co., a covert arm of the regime that disguised foreign subsidiaries of German corporations. Jakob Wallenberg's Stockholm Enskilda was the largest privately-owned bank in Sweden. The authors suggest that the family's links to Hitler may explain why the famed Raoul Wallenberg—an agent of a "semi-clandestine U.S. agency," according to a Reuters report on October 1, 1993—was seized by Soviet troops in 1945. Aarons and Loftus came to the conclusion "the Soviets captured Raoul and tortured him for several weeks before they realized they had the wrong Wallenberg."

In March, 1996, Senator Alphonse D'Amato tinted the whitewash with gold: "From the 1930's until the onset of the Holocaust, European Jews and others deposited funds and other assets in Swiss banks for safekeeping. In doing so, they were trying to avoid what some inevitably saw as the writing on the wall, namely the coming Nazi onslaught. Others did so simply for business reasons. At the end of the war, however, a great many Swiss banks denied holding these assets."

Throughout the intervening years, Allied governments requested cooperation in finding the assets. Several organizations made a determined effort to persuade the Swiss to examine their records and find the missing assets. For the Swiss, though, the matter was simple: they did all they possibly could to evade an audit to conceal evidence of collusion with the Nazis. The Swiss cowered behind the 1934 Bank Secrecy Act, originally implemented to protect the identity of Jewish clients, to withhold the assets from survivors and rightful heirs of Holocaust victims.

Edward Stettinius, U.S. secretary of state, speaking at an inter-American conference in 1945, warned that the Nazis would attempt "to escape the consequences of their crimes. We must be constantly on the alert for the flight into this hemisphere of Nazi funds and Nazi underground leaders who will seek to find a refuge here for an ultimate comeback."

Among those to slip through the Allied dragnet in occupied Germany, scrabble across the ratlines set up by American intelligence and the secret orders of the Vatican and settle in South America were Klaus Barbie (Bolivia), Heinrich Mueller (Argentina), Joseph Mengele (Paraguay), Walter Rauff (Chile), and Freidrich Schwend (Peru). Financial and political ties in South America, the collusion of American and Latin officials and military intelligence, subverted any attempt to block the resurgence. The heart of the Nazi Party, the General German Staff, remained nearly intact.

In A Combine of Aggression, German emigré Karl Otten described the underground leadership's ability "to perpetuate itself, and to render itself immortal, through its innermost core, the brains of a bellicose nation's brains ... in anonymity, [residing in] unknown places, secluded from the world, controlling politics no less than operations in the field."

The Nazis were created by the world oligarchy for war and wore Gnostic vestments. German terrorist units had names like "The Death's Heads" and were known to commit ritualistic murder. "The roots of the Nazi Party were buried in hidden places," declared Hitler's friend Hermann Rauschning. The German military is not to be confused with the Nazi covert operators; the former fought on the battlefield, the other undercover.

After the military was flattened, the Nazis gracefully pushed on with the war.

In August, 1945 the U.S. argued for, and succeeded in disbanding, the UN War Crimes Commission in favor of the Nuremberg Tribunal. The one-man think tank who planned Nuremberg was Henry Stimson, former secretary of state under Herbert Hoover. Stimson, a vocal atom bomb proponent, suggested it be dropped on Japan and every wheel and cog in the Uranium Wing of virtual government went into motion to accommodate him.

At Nuremberg, he fell back on a strategy that would become standard in all pupeteered Congressional hearings—narrowing the scope of the investigation.

"With judgment at Nuremberg," wrote Stimson in Foreign Relations (January 1947), "we at last reach to the core of international strife." Articulate, smooth, disingenuous words.

Stimson's tribunal reached to "the core of the strife," but the "penalty" for participation in Nazi genocide was set by agents of virtual government. The directors of I.G. Farben, the economic and industrial sponsor of the Nazi party, and Krupp, the principal supplier of munitions, were tried for making war in violation of the Briand-Kellogg Treaty ... and were led through a revolving door—seems it couldn't be "proven beyond a doubt" that their intent was "aggressive," as stipulated by the treaty. Upon their release, the directors of Krupp and Farben immediately went on to exchange Nazi gold for Swiss notes on the sly. They stashed reserves away for the cold phase of the war.

All I.G. Farben facilities were left standing by American bombers on strict order from Washington. To smooth the path to corporate growth, General Patton stepped in and—in violation of the Potsdam Agreement, which specifically called for the dismantling of Farben—reorganized the company and promoted many of its former mid-level executives.

For every Nazi convicted at Nuremberg, four were released. With "Judgment at Nuremberg" constricted by such reasoning, it was hardly surprising that the first trial ended with the conviction of a dozen Nazis from a pool of 22. For the next trial the definitions of intent and authority were constrained even further, and 49 of the 52 leading German officers and industrialists were freed.

Dr. Robert Kempner, who might be described as an early "conspiracy theorist," wrote that with few exceptions, "the other SS leaders convicted at Nuremberg on charges of murder have been prematurely pardoned and freed, as a result of strong pressure by certain, partly still anonymous hinter-manner [sponsors]." In June, 1949, jurisdiction over the war criminals was handed off to High Commissioner John McCloy, the hard-core "anti-Nazi." His attitude underwent a drastic change in closed sessions, however. McCloy's secret Clemency Board reduced the sentences of all but the most intractable SS. Nearly a third were released for "good behavior" at the behest of the General German Staff. Others were granted amnesty by the thousands.

A year later, Jim Martin, a Defense Department investigator, traveled to Germany to track down Gerhard Westrick, the CEO of ITT in Germany and already a mover in the formation of the Fourth Reich. Westrick had fled the Berlin bombing and took refuge in a castle to the south. By post he appealed for help from his Army cronies, who smuggled him to Paris to apprise Colonel Alex Sanders of the condition of ITT's German holdings. Westrick received a token prison sentence and was released.

Hermann Abs, one of Hitler's principal financial backers, was employed as a consultant in the British zone for Deutsche Bank.

As an agent for the OSS in eastern Europe, Frank Wisner had compiled a list of SS men. In Pullach, a Bavarian village, Wisner and Dulles contacted Reinhard Gehlen, formerly the head of Hitler's eastern military intelligence corps. Gehlen was decked out in American uniform and flown to Fort Hunt, Virginia, where he was interrogated, processed and returned to Germany in July, 1946 to recruit SS and White Russian operatives for the Cold War. Gehlen, rapidly promoted to the rank of U.S. intelligence official, took up residence in Martin Bormann's mansion, or the "White House" to enlistees.

The emerging order was a reorganization of the old. Anyone who caught on was ignored, or if the whistle was blown, tarred by government officials as Communists, including Dexter White and Lauchlin Currie of the Treasury Department. White and Currie were investigating financial dealings with Germany throughout the course of the war by Standard Oil, Chase and National City Banks, the Morgan family, ITT, Ford and GM, among others. The careers of both investigators were buried by the McCarthy hearings and they were conveniently silenced.

Telford Taylor, the chief counsel at Nuremberg, saw the proceedings for what they were. He was beside himself that the most powerful Nazis had been acquitted on legal technicalities. "Murder, maiming, enslavement, ravage and plunder are a familiar litany," he wrote in 1970. The unique ingredient, especially in Eastern Europe, he argued, "was the enormous scope of the atrocities and the systematic planning and meticulous execution of these hideous enterprises."

One of those strategists was General Adolf Ernst Heusinger, inspector general of the West German Bundeswehr, former Wehrmacht General and chief of operations and planning of Hitler's land forces, responsible for ordering the wholesale atrocities in Poland and Russia. At Nuremberg, Heusinger testified that he was but a humble courier and denied any connection with the Nazi Party. Not only was he released—he turned around and talked American officials into letting his colleagues in the General Staff off as well. Among those freed as a result of his intercessions were several SS officers responsible for shooting unarmed American pilots downed over Germany. Killing American prisoners, it seems, was a standing order of "courier" Heusinger.

After Nuremberg, the Nazi joined the Gehlen spy organization, now split into the early CIA and the security arm of the Bonn government. Heusinger and Gehlen immediately set out to assemble a new German General Staff and an underground army that drew heavily upon the European criminal element. In the early 1950s, Heusinger was named West German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer's security adviser, and accepted his kind invitation to rebuild the German army.

"The new look of the next German army will be strictly non-Prussian," announced the New York Times, "middle class.... Its brains and boss will be Adolf Heusinger ... a very American type." In 1963, Heusinger was appointed chairman of the Permanent Military Committee of NATO.

Nuremberg was an inside job, instigated by Stimson, George Kennen, Allen Dulles and Dean Acheson at the State Department. Dulles was a vocal apologist for Hitler's Germany until Pearl Harbor, and as a lawyer at Sullivan & Cromwell planted Farben subsidiaries in the United States. Dean Acheson was an unabashed "Pan-German." The San Francisco Chronicle for August 4, 1963 captured his bilateral enthusiasm before a group at Yale and Smith college students: "I believe the single most important country in Europe is Germany, and we should treat her like a 51st state. We should consult her on every move we make."

The Cold War German-American alliance was the source of the Adenauer regime's "economic miracle." In The Paperclip Conspiracy, Tom Bower details the machinations behind Germany's miraculous recovery:

> The truth is sinister. In Washington a number of officials expected the resurgence of German industry, but only Samuel Klaus and a few sympathizers had wanted to prevent it, and they had failed for a series of reasons. Within Germany, the early schemes of the American military government to destroy the masonic industrial cartels had been curbed as a result of unrelenting political, commercial and diplomatic pressure from Congress, New York bankers and the British government....
> The publicly-stated policy of the U.S. to remove Nazis and their supporters "from the civil service, the judiciary, the educational system, the professions and the police" lamentably failed. Germany was not denazified.

The National Security Act of 1947 gave rise to dual governments, the existing system and a covert military regime. Among the authors of this virtual constitution was Paul Nitze, an employee of the the Nazi-entangled Dillon, Read investment firm and a political protégé of James Forrestal. Nitze's affinity with the Nazi cause fell under the scrutiny of the FBI in 1940.

The investigation was ordered up by Alfred Berle, then assistant secretary of defense, and Nelson Rockefeller, coordinator of inter-American affairs, who appears in fact to have been scouting for new talent—Paul Nitze resigned from Dillon, Read a few months later to take the job of financial manager of Nelson Rockefeller's office.

Nitze's doting respect for the Hitler regime was acknowledged by all he knew. One "reliable, confidential informant," who furnished "valuable information" to Hoover's FBI, said of Nitze that his political thoughts were "leaning more and more" toward Nazism, that he had "expressed feelings of admiration for totalitarianism and considerable contempt for the processes of democracy."

Transcontinental Ultraconservative Cold War cross-breeding was at play in the formation of a new U.S. intelligence group formed in May, 1948, the Office for Policy coordination (OPC), the nascent bureaucracy of America's Cold War army. The OPC and its liaisons in the intelligence sector operated with unrestrained freedom, according to NSC directive.

The early Cold War turned on the decisions of Kennon's staff. Another intelligence branch, the fledgling CIA, was an appendage of the OPC early on, but fear of exposure led the State Department to conceal the latter inside the former, away from the prying eyes of Congress and the public.

Roscoe Hillenkoetter, an early CIA director, wasn't at all pleased with this arrangement, or with this mysterious sub-agency with its WASP agents, but followed orders to look the other way while the OPC escorted Nazi war criminals to the States. Immigration irregularities were ironed out by the so-called International Rescue Committee, a CIA enterprise headed by a young intelligence agent named William Casey.

The OPC was established to take any assignment the CIA didn't have the stomach to accept. It soon became the operating arm of the Agency, acting on information gathered by CIA operatives, often at cross-purposes.

On Acheson's recommendation, a wealthy Wall Street attorney, Frank Wisner, formerly an OSS operative, accepted the position of director. If the OPC charter opened the Cold War floodgate, Wisner held the throttle. His orders to terrorize the Soviets was limited only by "plausible deniability" on the part of his superiors. Wisner was granted license to employ economic warfare, propaganda and wide-open terrorism to assist underground resistance groups.

Wisner's political power base included John McCloy, Averell Harriman (like Stimson and Kennan, a Yale Bones man), and Secretary of Defense James Forrestal. The Agency was initially supplied with 302 agents and a budget of $4.7 million. By 1952, the OPC employed 4,000 people and inhaled $84-million in federal revenues.

But Wisner's Nazi-hunting operation had a hidden source of funding to place emigrés in the U.S. as well.

Many of the mysterious emigrés found employment with the newly-established "research institutes." Operating funds were donated by the Committee for Liberation from Bolshevism, or Radio Liberty. The Committee was an OPC front founded by George Kennan well before the CIA was chartered. Funds gushed through "private" fund-raising organizations, including the "Crusade for Freedom," chaired by General Lucius Clay, who retired from his post as the American governor of the American Zone in 1949. Dwight Eisenhower and Ronald Reagan, among others, solicited public contributions. But more than 90 percent of its income was drawn from the unvouchered accounts of the CIA, not public donations. The State Department laundered the cash through private charities. The Rockefeller and Carnegie Funds were the fattest sugar daddies. And the Ford Foundation's Russian Research Committee performed a little public relations number applauding its own contributions to the flagrantly seditious Crusade for Freedom.

The Pentagon embraced the Nazis' refreshing ideas for waging covert warfare and devising horrific new weapons. It would be 40 years after the dust settled on the detritus of Berlin that the United States government acknowledged that domestic intelligence services frequently employed Nazi and Eastern European Quisling refugees as "informants," and even conspired to scuttle their prosecution for war crimes. In Unholy Trinity, a history of the Vatican's collusion with Old Guard fascists and the Soviet intelligence apparat, authors Aaron and Loftus observe: "It seems certain the Ratlines are still alive and well in America. The Nazis ... have found a new home: the World Anti-Communist League [WACL], formerly headed by retired US General John Singlaub. This is the same organization suspected by the US Congress of complicity in running guns [and drugs] for Contragate."

At the Chemical Warfare Service, founded in 1944 with $2.5 million in its bankroll, anthrax and botulism, two strains of biochemical poisons the military has had no qualms about using on Third World populations, became a mainstay of the American arsenal. George W. Merck, the pharmaceutical kingpin and an adviser to Secretary of War Henry Stimson, was the founder of the Biochemical Warfare Division, drawing on scientists from ivied American universities. The show was run in the early 1950s by Lawrence Laird Layton, a Nazi agent who resettled in the U.S. after WWII. His family made up the inner-circle of the People's Temple, the CIA's mind control and medical experimentation center in Guyana.

Thirty years after the CIA was founded, some of its most appalling abuses of public trust seeped out. There were demands for a Congressional inquiry, in effect circumvented by President Gerald Ford, who issued an executive order establishing a presidential commission to "investigate" the Agency. Nelson Rockefeller, then vice president, chaired it. Knowledgeable observers compared the appointment to setting the fox to guard the hen-house, given Rockefeller's links to the intelligence community and his vast working knowledge of covert activities. A second investigation concluded that the Rockefeller panel had been convened to undermine further investigations of abuses by the intelligence groups.

The godparents of the organized insanity about to be unleashed across the fresh green breast of the New World were "Wild Bill" Donovan and Allen Dulles from the inner-circle of a reorganized American "intelligence" network. Donovan was a bundle of raging contradictions. In public he despised fascism but was a staunch elitist himself. He rose Gatsby-like from poor Irish stock and grew to be an outwardly warm if professionally ruthless lawyer of influence on Wall Street. The firm is currently located at Rockefeller Plaza: Donovan, Leisure, Newton and Irvine. It was whispered in Washington that Wild Bill was the crony of wretched European aristocrats.

The Round Table of the Fourth Reich

As one OpEd town crier moaned: "If the Bilderberger group is not a conspiracy of some sort, it is conducted in such a way as to give a remarkably good imitation." The commentary was the complaint of G. Gordon Tether, a writer for England's Financial Times. He was subsequently ordered not to write about the organization again. Within a year, Tether was sacked.

Prince Bernhard was the first chairman of the Bilderberger Round Table, but the founder of the conference was Dr. Joseph Retinger, a compulsive financial and political schemer. Retinger was also the founder of the European League of Economic Cooperation and other groups formed to promote European solidarity.

Retinger, born in Poland in 1888, studied psychology in Munich and received his Ph.D in literature at the Sorbonne. In 1911 he settled in England and made contacts in government circles through London's Polish Bureau. Before long, Retinger made the acquaintance of Prime Minister Asquith—but lost that contact when the social climber publicly declared Lady Asquith to be a lesbian.

During the First World War, Retinger lived in Paris until, for unknown reasons, he was roughly expelled. From France he moved on to Cuba and Mexico, where he founded a nationalistic secret society, and ran intelligence missions for the Mexican government under diplomatic cover. On a trip to Italy in the 20s to warm relations between the Mexican government and the Vatican, Retinger found allies in Rome.

During World War II, Retinger was back in England, in league with General Sikorski and the Polish exile movement. Following the death of Sikorski in 1943, Retinger boarded the SOE under the direction of Sir Colin Gubbins, code-named "M," a Scottish Highlander and seething anti-Communist. Gubbins was born in 1896 in Yokahama, the son of a short-tempered British linguist. He graduated from Woolwich and fought in a field artillery unit throughout the First World War. When Hitler picked off Norway, Gubbins led the Independent Companies, the direct forerunner of the commandos. Gubbins was selected to organize "stay-behind parties," secret death squads formed to prey on any German troops that might step foot on British soil. Under Gubbins, Retinger trained as a paratrooper.

He resumed his obsession with a unified Europe with a fervor after the war, accompanied Winston Churchill on his 1949 tour of the United States. Their fund-raising gave birth to the American Committee for a United Europe (ACUE), chaired by William Donovan, former director of the OSS. His second was Allen Dulles, former head of the OSS office in Berne, Switzerland, who provided the group with covert funding. At the top of the agenda of the ACUE (and a slew of CIA clones) was the remilitarization of Germany and Western Europe. An open call for "unification" was delivered at a 1948 Hague conference in which Churchill and Germany's Konrad Adenauer (still busily rebuilding the German government, drawing heavily on Nazi elements) dominated the proceedings. A year later, Retinger's Council of Europe, partially supported by the CIA with a bankroll filtered through the ACUE, was formed in Strasbourg.

The anti-Communist message soon took on the trappings of a political crusade. In 1947, muckraker George Seldes lamented the drift toward unification driven by CIA opinion-shapers with king-making arrogance in their blood, among them Henry Luce at Life:

> Historians will discover that the first clarion call for a holy crusade of the Western Democracies for the Third World War was sounded while Second was still in progress, and that it appeared in the pages of a Luce publication.
> The author was William C. Bullitt, onetime ambassador to Moscow, and one-time ambassador to France. The date was September 4, 1944. The editorial introduction called Mr. Bullitt "a special Life correspondent" who had gone to Italy where "he was granted interviews with well-informed and authoritative personages, among them Pope Pius XII." There was more than an inference that Bullitt was quoting the Pope as favoring what was euphemistically called a holy crusade.

The proposal to divide the world into a Western and an Eastern bloc, and to fight it out for control, was later taken up by Winston Churchill, whose writings were purchased by Life and the New York Times, and eventually by leaders throughout the world. Mr. Luce may therefore point with journalistic pride to the fact that one of his publications was the first to propose World War III.

From the anti-Communist annexes of the Vatican came Intermarium, a Catholic organization on comfortable terms with the Nazi eugenics movement under Alfred Rosenberg. In Germany, the Abwehr, Hitler's intelligence arm, drew on Intermarium for information on the movements of East European emigrés and sent members abroad to influence foreign political and corporate leaders. With the assistance of Pope Pius XII, the Vatican offshoot established ratlines for Nazi collaborators from the eastern bloc, the single largest fascist escape route to the United States and Canada.

Such groups became the army in the holy war against the USSR, and the call to arms was signaled by the corporate press and several umbrella intelligence operations, many of them founded by Retinger. These included the Council of Europe, chaired by Paul Rijkins, the chairman of Unilever. It was Rijkins who introduced Prince Bernhard of the Netherlands to Dr. Retinger.

Bernhard, soon to become the Bilderberg figurehead, was the son of an early recruit to Himmler's SS. World War II historian John Keenan notes: "It was a measure of Himmler's obsession with heredity that he particularly welcomed as recruits representative of the German aristocracy." Among the early aristocrats to join the SS were Prince von Waldek, Prince von Mecklenburg, Prince Lippe-Biesterfeld (Bernhard's father), Prince Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen and the archbishops of Brunswick and Freiburg. Later, with the foundation of the Order Castles as enclaves of the SS, Himmler molded the upper echelon of the organization into a pagan order of chivalry.

Bernhard was recruited by Retinger, the godfather of right-wing groups around the world. As Bernard tells it, his ascension to chairman of the Bilderbergers was an alruistic act. "Retinger came to me," he recalled later, "and told me about his worries concerning the rising tide of anti-Americanism in Europe."

Pietro Quarino, an Italian recruited to the Bilderbergers by Retinger, found the doctor to be a born schemer. "A Pole once remarked to me, many years ago, 'every Pole has conspiracy in his blood.' First came very vague hints concerning desirable aims. Then, as I gradually caught on, a few details, then he revealed further details, then a few names ..."

The first meeting of the Bliderbergers took place around a ping-pong table on September 25, 1952. The membership roster included Retinger's old boss at the SOE, Sir Gubbins, and Antoine Pinay, the prime minister of France. The first resolution voted upon was a plan to draw the United States into the group's geo-political activities. Retinger and the Prince traveled to Washington to meet with Allen Dulles, whose exploits on behalf of the Nazis are well documented, and Walter Bedell Smith, director of central intelligence and former chief of staff to Eisenhower during WWII—and one of the key officers to rubber-stamp the residency papers of genocidal Ukranian Nazi emigré Mykola Lebed for "national security" reasons. The American Bilderberger Committee had David Rockefeller, Dean Rusk, Henry Heinz II and Joseph Johnson of the Carnegie Endowment for Intenational Peace.

The first full-blown conference took place in May, 1954 at the Hotel de Bilderberg in Oosterbeck, Holland with the CIA and the Dutch government graciously picking up the tab. Topics of discussion included "the attitude toward European integration and the European defense community." The press was barred from the proceedings. The world outside remained blissfully unaware of the telling resolution made and recorded in the "strictly confidential" minutes of the first meeting:

> "Insufficient attention has so far been paid to long term planning, and to evolving an international order which would look beyond the present-day crisis. When the time is ripe our concepts should be extended to the whole world."

The attendance list at Bilderberger conclaves read like a Who's Who of bloodless American Nazi collaborators. Arthur Dean, a partner with John Foster Dulles at the Sullivan & Cromwell law firm since 1929, was named co-chairman. Dean invited a group of German bankers and industrialists to the meetings. J.F. Dulles was chairman of the Rockefeller Foundation (with $854 million in assets) and the Carnegie Endowment. Allen Dulles liaisoned with Gerhard Westrick, the ITT-Nazi financial operative, until 1944, and was a director of the Schroeder Trust Company, a wing of the international banking empire of Baron Kurt von Schroeder of the German General Staff. The bank run by Henry and his brother Bruno was credited by Time as an "economic booster of the Rome-

Berlin axis." And Schroeder, Rockefeller and Co., Investment Bankers was the financial nexus of the Nazi fifth column on the East Coast during the war. John J. McCloy from the law firm of Milbank, Tweed and Chase Manhattan Bank was a regular at the conferences.

On the steering committee sat Robert Murphy, chairman of Corning Glass and Eisenhower's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board, and William Baker, a Rockefeller Institute trustee. Robert Lovett, a former secretary of defense, also attended. Lovett was a business partner of Averell Harriman in Brown Brothers, Harriman and Co., the firm that employed George Bush's father and grandfather.

Noting the involvement of the same corporate conspirators in the running of the leading American universities, Congressman John Rarick was moved in September 15, 1971 to lament: "The university as a strategic institution within American society provides both the technical manpower and the ideological justification of ... state capitalism. Since the legal and political power of the university system clearly rests in the hands of the ruling class, it follows that as an institution the university's primary function is to serve the interest of wealth and power rather than free inquiry."

The influence of Joseph Retinger on the organization continued until his death in 1960. The first American secretary general was Joseph Johnson, the Carnegie Foundation scion, succeeded in 1974 by William Bundy, another Bonesman from Yale (described by David Halberstam as "a shadowy figure on the outside center of power"). In 1979, Bundy's chair was passed to Paul Finney, an editor of Fortune. Henry Kissinger was appointed to the steering committee years before he was asked to serve in the Nixon administration.

In the 1980s, participants included:

George Ball: Former undersecretary of state and an author of the National Security Act of 1947, the carte blanche charter of the CIA.
Paul Volcker: Federal Reserve.
Giovanni Agnelli: The Italian fascist, president of Fiat.
David Kearns: Chairman of Xerox.
Arnold Horelick: Director of the Rand/UCLA Center for the Study of Soviet International Behavior.
Jack Bennett: A senior VP at Exxon.
David Daustresme: A partner at Lazard Frere.
Charles Mathias: U.S. senator.
Robert Reid: Chairman of Shell UK, Ltd.
Robert Jecker: Executive board president of Credit Suisse.

... and a midnight colonade of "conservative" government leaders.

And what are they up to? Ultraconservative Phyllis Schlafly once called the "Bergers" "a little clique of powerful men who meet secretly and plan world events that appear to just happen."

JOY

William Donovan

We have nothing with the outcast and the unfit: let them die in their misery. For they feel not. Compassion is the vice of kings: stamp down on the wretched and the weak: this is the law of the strong: this is our law and the joy of the world.

—Aleister Crowley, Book of the Law

All of this empire-building took its toll on the sanity of two of the most powerful aspiring bureaucrat-soldiers in the intelligence netherworld, William Donovan and James Jesus Angleton. After the war, Donovan was stricken with severe "brain atrophy" and unceasing, violent hallucinations. Donovan, his mind wheeling with paranoid aberrations, once saw a swarm of Soviet troops marching across Washington's 59th Street Bridge. The visions hounded him until his death in 1959, appearing for all the world to be caused by massive drug overdoses, suspicious given his close association with Allen Dulles, Albert Hoffmann of Sandoz, Aldous Huxley and other Knights of the Holy Order of LSD.

Both sides of the Second World War had undertaken a quest for the ideal truth drug. OSS Director Donovan assembled a team of psychologists and drug researchers to create chemicals capable of altering and controlling behavior. This coalition included Drs. Winifred Overhulser, Harry J. Anslinger, Edward Strecker and George White. At the same time, in Germany, Nazi doctors at Dachau pursued the same ends by experimenting on Jews, Slavs and other genetic "inferiors."

Forrestal was generally high-strung, but on the day of his resignation as secretary of war, he was found frozen in place at his desk. An aide whisked him to his home in Georgetown. Forrestal, like Donovan, claimed that "Communists and Jews" were conspiring against him, and was obsessed with a coming invasion of Communist hordes. He attempted suicide and was admitted to Bethesda

Naval Hospital. Jacob Heilbrun, a Georgetown University scholar of postwar European history, wrote in the October 5, 1992 issue of the New Republic that George Kennan exercised a decisive influence on Forrestal: "Writing to Forrestal in October 1947, he proposed the creation of what he called a 'guerilla warfare corps' trained by the American military, which could 'fight fire with fire.' Forrestal agreed, but he felt that such an effort should be established under the auspices of the CIA. On December 13, 1947, the NSC approved a program of covert propaganda under CIA direction. More than likely he approved the recruitment of Ukranian Nazi collaborators for 'Operation Nightingale.' The guerillas were trained in the United States and sent to certain deaths in the Ukraine."

Forrestal was in the midst of transcribing Winthrop Mackworth Praed's translation of Ajax, whereupon he stood up, strolled to a kitchen storeroom, looped his pajama cord around his neck, secured it to a sill and leapt out the window. The cord broke.

James Forrestal, secretary of defense, the man who designed the postwar Navy, went out in the classic Sophoclean manner: "worn by the waste of time—comfortless, nameless, hopeless save in the dark prospect of the yawning grave."

If the minds of Donovan and Forrestal were broken by drug overdosing, a likely medium would have been a critical dose of BZ, a chemical sibling of LSD and an offshoot of Albert Hoffmann's labors for Sandoz, a subsidiary of Warburg and Farben. The CIA's Arnold Rothman, known as "Mr. Death" inside the Agency, discussed his leery flirtation with the potent hallucinogen in his capacity as a gadgeteer, as he explained in the January, 1977 issue of Playboy:

> Playboy: Were you ever asked to work with drugs?
> Mr Death: Only twice that I remember. My contact brought me a half gram of LSD, sealed in 27 different bottles inside of each other.... This was in the 50s and I had no idea what LSD was.... That specific job gave me the very distinct, creepy feeling that it was under the counter even for [the CIA]. I had a whole box of Neo-Synephrine spray bottles that I loaded.
>
> Playboy: What dosages were you using.
>
> Mr. Death: Enormous dosage. Probably wipe you out forever.
>
> Playboy: You mentioned two instances. What was the other drug you worked with?
> Mr. Death: The other was called BZ, and I wouldn't ever want to get dosed with that. It was something like LSD, but the dosage was much lower and you had to > work with it in a glove box, because it was administered by breathing. I saw some very frightening films of soldiers who had been given BZ. The guys were reduced to catatonics. They would just sit there, drooling, with no control over their bodily functions unless they were given commands, like "get up," or "put your helmet on."

There was a panting interest in the human brain in some intelligence circles. Maclean's reported on March 13, 1991 that mind control experimentation is still a "touchy" subject, that the silence of the government on this lost chapter of military history persists: "The Mulroney government appointed a one-lawyer commission to look into the pleas of nine broken victims" of the CIA's ranking Black Psychiatrist, Dr. E. Ewen Cameron.

And who should be entrusted with this most sensitive political investigation? "A defeated Conservative MP, George Cooper of Halifax, who, loyal to the regime that held the answer to his future, concluded that the government bears no 'legal or moral responsibilities' for the experiments. Odd. Deep within the report is buried evidence that Ottawa in fact funded Cameron and his experiments with five times the financing contributed by the CIA. Cooper did meekly suggest a $100,000 payment to each survivor, not because the government was guilty of wrongdoing, but as an expression of 'a collective sense of accountability for events that took place in good faith with ill effect.'"

An FOIA document bearing the signature of the Sidney Gottlieb of the CIA's Chemical Division charts a few early forays into hypnotic mind control:

> 11 May 1953
> MEMORANDUM FOR THE RECORD
> SUBJECT: Visit to Project [deleted]
> 1. On this day the writer spent the day observing experiments with Mr. [deleted] on project [deleted] and in planning next year's work on the project (Mr. [deleted] has already submitted his proposal to the [deleted]).
> 2. The general picture of the present status of the project is one of a carefully planned series of five major experiments. Most of the year has been spent in screening and standardizing a large group of subjects (approximately 100) and the months between now and September 1 should yield much data, so that these five experiments should be completed by September 1. The five experiments are: (N stands for the total number of subjects involved in the experiment.)

Experiment 1—N-18 Hypnotically induced anxieties to be completed by September 1.
Experiment 2—N-24 Hypnotically increasing the ability to learn and recall complex written matter.
Experiment 3—N-30 Polygraph response under hypnosis....
Experiment 4—N-24 Hypnotically increasing ability to observe and recall a complex arrangement of physical objects.
Experiment 5—N-100 Relationship of personality to susceptibility to hypnosis....

The chemical companies had long engaged in secret political subterfuge. "The DuPont's fascistic behavior" Charles Higham wrote in Trading with the Enemy, "was evident in 1936, when Irenee du Pont used General Motors money to finance the notorious Black Legion." The DuPonts' Legionnaires, sporting black robes garnished with the skull and crossbones, killed labor organizers, bombed union halls and plotted to rid the earth of Jews and Communists. They enlisted Klansmen, ex-convicts, rapists, psychopaths, murderers and thugs. This coalition of ne'er-do-wells were the muscle of the notorious Wolverine Republican League of Detroit.

Journalist John Roy Carlson infiltrated the Legion in the 1930s, and received a baptism in organized violence: "Vigilantés pledged an oath of secrecy. Its multiple units bore such names as Black Guards, Bullet Club, Silent Legion, Modern Patriots. Its regiments were divided into squads for special duty: death squads, arson squads, flogging squads." Each squad received special "patriotic" assignments. Charles Poole, a Black factory worker, was beaten to death by the Legion, which boasted 100,000 strong. During the Poole trial it emerged that the Legion had beaten and mutilated 50 Blacks, Jews and "Communist-influenced" union organizers.

After WWII, the American military machine locked onto the Bolsheviks as the ranking dire threat to freedom and democracy and raised the roof over "Soviet expansionism." The fact that Winston Churchill had signed an agreement with Stalin recognizing Soviet domain over Rumania and Bulgaria in exchange for British control of Greece was scarcely mentioned. Poland was an open question—Britain maintained bases there and a schism of loyalties had emerged in the Polish government. Negotiations collapsed. Russia moved prematurely, ruthlessly, to assure that neighboring governments were politically compatible, providing a buffer from the West. Kennen and Acheson scapegoated Communist aggression and the secret war was underway.

In Thy Will Be Done, a Rockefeller biography that rakes up entire strata of muck where business and politics meet in Latin America, Gerard Colby tracked the CIA's initial steps into mind control as a strategic weapon: "Nelson Rockefeller merged the Federal Security Agency and its $4.6 million operating budget," Colby writes ... > and the operating units of three federal corporations, into a single, new cabinet-level department, Health, Education & Welfare.... HEW became involved in intelligence matters ... and became the first conduit for the CIA's mind control experiments. Project Artichoke and consequently MK-ULTRA ... was given cover by both HEW and its sub-agency, the National Institute of Mental Health (NIMH). Nelson needed little introduction to MK-ULTRA. The CIA's use of HEW for mind control experiments had been initiated during his tenure as under-secretary. The Rockefeller Foundation was also no stranger to this type of research.

Adolph Berle, a key New Dealer, agreed to sit on the board of the Society for the Investigation of Human Ecology, a foundation established at Cornell University by Nelson Rockefeller and Allen Dulles to conceal the funding of more illicit CIA mind control experimentation.

"I am frightened of this one," Berle wrote in his journal. "If scientists knew what they had laid out for themselves—men will become manageable ants."

Colby:

> The CIA received a startling proposal to "provide for Agency-sponsored research involving covert biological and chemical warfare." During Nelson's chairmanship of the Special Group, the CIA also searched for the means to program assassins. The CIA had discovered that a man "could be surreptitiously drugged through the medium of an alcoholic cocktail at a social party ... and the subject induced to perform the attempted assassination" of an official in the government in which he was "well-established socially and politically." The CIA officer in charge of the operation was Sheffield Edwards. Edwards later worked with Edward Lansdale in Operation Mongoose, the assassination attempt against Cuba's Fidel Castro.

Mind control experimentation took place behind the private fences of university campuses across the country, secretly transacted by the CIA's Sidney Gottlieb, director of the chemical section of the CIA's Technical Services Division. Gottlieb hailed from an old boy intelligence cell that had at its nucleus Nelson Rockefeller's former CIA sidekick in Brazil, J.C. King of the Directorate of Plans, late of the United Fruit Company's overthrow of Guatemala, then presiding over all clandestine activities in the western hemisphere.

Two pivotal figures in the early cold war cemented forces shortly after the fall of Berlin: Fritz Kramer, schooled in Nazi Germany, and young Henry Kissinger. It was Kramer who convinced Kissinger to study at Harvard and introduced the basso-vocé intellectual to Nelson Rockefeller. Kramer became a key strategist at the Pentagon. His son Sven studied under Kissinger and joined the National Security Council under Ronald Reagan.

John Foster Dulles was named Secretary of State after the war. According to CIA historian John Ranelagh, Dulles didn't condescend to to mingle with other federal officials, preferring to work secretly, "depending upon his close personal relationships with America's governing elite."

In 1945, Nicolae Malaxa, the key financier and arms supplier to the Iron Guard (an SS advance unit in Austria), signed a confidential contract with Grady McClaussen of the OSS, agreeing to a generous payoff in exchange for entry into the U.S. And so, in September, 1946, Malaxa disembarked with a trade mission for New York. Upon his arrival, Malaxa headed for the Chase National Bank and withdrew several million dollars waiting for him in a firm

"CHE GUEVERA ONCE TOLD I.F. Stone in an interview that the U.S. embassy in Mexico had bought up and junked all the copies it could lay its hands on of the Spanish translation of Hidden History. In the United States, on its original appearance in 1952, the book met with an almost complete press blackout and boycott. Though its analysis was extremely damaging to the State Department line on the war, no effort was made to answer it. It achieved better treatment when it appeared in England, as did the translations in Spanish, Italian and Japanese. Two chapters were published in Jean Paul Sartre's Les Temps Modernes. In the U.S., the book has almost entirely disappeared, even from public libraries."

An introductory note to The Hidden History of the Korean War, by I.F. Stone, published in 1952. Stone's detailed chronology of the confrontation's early stages found General Douglas MacArthur's intelligence chief, Charles (Adolph) Willoughby (Weidenbach), a Nazi spy, to be a manipulator of events in Korea and reports from the front to draw the United States into a "police action" that strongly resembled a war.

account. For political pull, Malaxa enlisted the aid of Dulles and a young senator from California, Richard Nixon. In May, Malaxa set up a dummy corporation, Western Tube, and proposed to build the plant in Nixon's hometown, Whittier, California. The company's address happened to be the same as Nixon's law firm. Herman Perry, who convinced Nixon to run for the Senate, was now "vice president" of the corporation. The application was approved.

Malaxa was soon flying off to meet with Argentina's Juan Peron, Otto Skorzeny and other principals in the reconstruction of the Reich. Nixon and Malaxa remained bosom allies.

But the U.S. had its own Iron Guard, an underground fascist terrorist cell fronted by the Midtown Sporting Club in New York City, bankrolled by the Morgan family, several Wall Street investment firms and the German General Staff.

"The penalty for betraying our secrets is death," was the warning John Roy Carlson received upon infiltrating the group, echoing the charter found at Vogelsburg Castle. "We have men watching every one of you, men without mercy. Men who don't give a damn. They are the guardians of the Iron Guard. You are the soldiers of Christ.... We are the trained body of Christian citizens who must give aid and defense to all Christian groups."

After swearing never to divulge information regarding the secrets of the Iron Guard, he was permitted to attend a "ritual war" ceremony: "A half dozen straight-backed chairs, several armchairs and a small round table with an open Bible laying on it composed the furniture. Across the pages of the Bible lay a bayonet. Several rifles leaned against the wall. I sat down facing the emblem of the Iron Guard, a large black circle and an inner circle of white. Within the circles was a red arm holding in its fist a flash of lightning."

Hermann Schmitt, the leader of the Guard, stood in the circle and blurted, "We are FASCISTS, American fascists! Democracy is a tool to do away with Christianity. The time is ripe for something entirely new—fascism!"

The lunacy, seeded by the oligarchy, was spreading. A U.S. War Department release to the armed services in 1945 schooled soldiers on the malignancy of fascism:

> Fascism is government by the few and for the few. The objective is seizure and control of the economic, political, social and cultural life of the state. The democratic way of life intervenes with their methods and desire for conducting business, living with their fellow men and having the final say in matters concerning others.... They maintain themselves in power by use of force combined with propaganda based on primitive ideas ... by skillful manipulation of fear and hate and by false promise of security.

There are, declared the War Department, "Three Ways to Spot U.S. Fascists":

> Fascists deny the need for international cooperation. These ideas contradict the fascist theory of the "master race." The brotherhood of man implies that all people have rights. International cooperation runs counter to the fascist program of war and world domination.
> Many fascists make the spurious claim that the world has but two choices ... fascism or Communism, and they label as "Communist" everyone who refuses to support them.

In France, few conformed to the fascist mold like Francois Genoud, a Nazi collaborator who joined the National Socialist Party at 21 and rose to prominence in Switzerland. His National Front for Switzerland was funded by the Oltramaire family, owners of the Lobard-Oldier Bank of Geneva, the secret pocket of OSS Station Chief Allen Dulles and his German contacts.

Many of the most powerful Nazis, of course, settled in the U.S.

Edward Fleckenstein, a Weehawken, New Jersey lawyer, published an open letter in Germany to Dr. Konrad Adenauer, offering "observations regarding U.S.-German affairs." The letter circulated widely in Germany. The American government, Fleckenstein said, was "corrupt at every level ... a quasi-dictatorship ruled by the hidden tyranny of money and satanic special interest groups. Well-meaning bourgeois are still in the majority here but they get nowhere [as] the U.S. administration is dominated by a secret, invisible government." This "secret government and its conspirators," Fleckenstein wrote, "put Eisenhower in office."

THE CIA

The Birth of Operation MOCKINGBIRD, the Takeover of the Corporate Press & the Programming of Public Opinion

"My lips have been kind of buttoned for almost twenty years ..."
—Walter Cronkite

Little has been written about the CIA's hidden relationship with the media. John Ranelagh's The Agency—an officially-sanctioned, Bible-length history—mentions few occasions of meddling. One of them was exposed at the oversight level in 1973 when Vernon Walters, then acting director, asked William Colby to draw up a list of "skeletons" in the CIA's burial ground of a history to submit at a closed Congressional hearing...

The list was single-spaced. It was 693 pages long.

Among the confessed abuses of power was a Project Mockingbird: "During the period from March 12, 1963 to June 15, 1963, the Office of Security installed telephone taps on two prominent Washington-based newsmen suspected of disclosing classified information obtained from a variety of governmental and congressional sources."[1]

A routine wiretap. Not a particularly damning disclosure. But this Mockingbird is not to be confused with the wholesale political and cultural pollution of the media known to the ink-stained wretches who study the CIA's international underground as Operation MOCKINGBIRD.

In the early gusts of the Cold War, the American intelligence services competed with Communist activists to influence European labor unions. With or without the cooperation of local embassies, Frank Wisner, an undercover State Department official assigned to the Foreign Service, hired students abroad to enter the Cold War as agents of his Office of Policy Coordination. Philip Graham, an alumnus of the Army Intelligence School in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, publisher of the Washington Post, signed on to direct the propaganda program.[2]

The following decade, Wisner and Graham would both resign their CIA commissions by committing "suicide."

In the early 1950s, former Village Voice reporter Deborah Davis wrote in her biography of Katharine Graham, "Wisner had implemented his plan and 'owned' respected members of the New York Times, Newsweek, CBS and other communications vehicles, plus stringers, four to six hundred in all, according to a former CIA analyst."[3] The partnership was overseen by Allen Dulles, the ultimate insider, a virtual government templar for German and American corporations who wanted their point of views represented in the media. Early MOCKINGBIRD swelled to influence some 25 newspapers and wire agencies by 1955, consenting, in the most frigid period of the Cold War, to act as founts of right-wing propaganda.[4] Many of these were already operated by men with highly reactionary views, among them William Paley (CBS), C.D. Jackson (Fortune), Henry Luce (Time) and Arthur Hays Sulzberger (N.Y. Times).

Curious activists nosing into the dense mysteries of MOCKINGBIRD have been shocked to find, in heavily-redacted FOIA documents, agents boasting of their pride at having placed "important assets" inside every major news outlet in the country.[5] It was not until 1982 that the Agency openly admitted for the first time that journalists on the CIA dole have acted as case officers to agents in the field.[6]

I. MOCKINGBIRDGATE

> So the muckrakers were suppressed, the newspapers were reduced, brought into safe hands, writers were controlled, books privately censored, publishing houses bought into and influenced, peace societies and philanthropic and educational foundations linked up with financial houses and the universities by interlocking directorates, our university teachers kept looking forward to pensions, young recalcitrants dismissed or set in their places ...
> —Porter Sargent, "What Makes Lives"

The seeding of public opinion, often explained (when the straining dams of secrecy leak) as a necessary reaction to Communism, has since served to conceal the criminalization of the intelligence agencies. The CIA's early forays into mind control experimentation on unconsenting subjects, for example, were justified by an ersatz cover story that POWs of the Korean War had been "brainwashed" by their captors. In fact, the Army investigation was unable to document a single case of "brainwashing" among the prisoners released by the North Koreans. The word was coined by Edward Hunter, a veteran OSS propagandist recruited by Dulles, the Nazi-collaborating oligarch who, in fact, conceived of MOCKINGBIRD as a mass mind control operation.

The Korean War itself was urged along by propaganda oozing from the front pages of the country's leading newspapers. A detailed study of the disinformation assault, I.F. Stone's Hidden History of the Korean War, first appeared in 1952. The book sold well overseas, but in the States, as explained in a note from the publisher in later editions, it "met with an almost complete press blackout and boycott. The book has almost entirely disappeared, even from public libraries, and it rarely turns up in the second-hand book market."

The muckracking era was yesterday's coffee grounds—corporate franchising of the print media saw to it. "When it began," lamented George Seldes in 1000 Americans, a survey of American corporate power published in 1947, muckraking journalism had advocates in "all people who had the general welfare at heart, but as the probes went deeper and further, and seemed to spare none of the hidden powers, the politicians as well as other spokesmen for money, business and profiteering turned savagely upon the really free press and destroyed it.... Trash may indeed be the opium of the people, but it was not the real aim of the magazines to stupefy the public, merely to suppress the facts, merely to pullify, to create a wasteland."

A Niagara of pro-American propaganda sponsored by the U.S. Information Agency (USIA), a CIA symbiont, shaped domestic and foreign political sensibilities beginning in the early 1950s. In this period, a niagara of books with USIA funding were disseminated by Praeger, Inc., the Franklin Press and other publishing houses bearing, of course, no indication of their actual origin.

By the mid-Reagan era, the USIA would spend nearly a billion dollars per anum to export propagandizing magazines, books (an average of three million a year) and exhibitions. The Agency sponsored ten magazines and commercial bulletins in twenty languages, including Topic (South Africa) and a radio teletype network that disseminated propaganda to 159 outlets overseas. Some 200 films acquired from private domestic studios were distributed, and a television program entitled Worldnet.[7]

The CIA came to dominate the Monopoly board of the corporate press, and drew a card from the stack marked with that monocled millionaire in the top hat (bearing a curious resemblance to Allen Dulles) calling for a strategy of psychological warfare, the art of calculated deceit, often with catastrophic results.

Cord Meyer, Jr., the ranking Mockingbird in Europe, then a Newsweek correspondent, swung widely throughout Europe inciting student and union protests. "This localized psychological warfare is ultimately, of course, warfare against the Russians," Davis emphasized, "who are presumed to be the source of every leftist political sentiment in Italy, France, the entire theater of Meyer's operations. In Eastern Europe his aim [was] to foment rebellion."

In 1956, "the CIA learns that the Soviets will indeed kill 60,000 MOCKINGBIRD-roused Hungarians with armored tanks."[8] Nevertheless, Radio Free Europe urged the people of Hungary to resist the Kremlin, the conclusion of an investigative committee of the UN: Many Hungarians "had the feeling that Radio Free Europe promised help." They believed military aid from the West would arrive to back an uprising. On November 5, a year later, a dry, unsteady voice crackled through the static of a Hungarian radio station:

> Attention: Radio Free Europe, hello. Attention. This is Roka speaking. The radio of revolutionary youth.... Continual bombing. Help. help. help ... Radio Free Europe ... forward our request. Forward our news. Help ...

And on November 6, another broadcast:

> We appeal to the conscience of the world. Why cannot you hear the call for help of our murdered women and children? Have you received our transmission?
>
> Attention! Attention! Munich! Munich! Take immediate action. In the Dunapentele area we urgently need medicine, bandages, arms, food and ammunition.

The final transmission, 24 hours later:

> Must we appeal once again? We have wounded ... who have given their blood for the sacred cause of liberty, but we have no bandages ... no medicine. The last piece of bread has been eaten.
> Those who have died for liberty ... accuse you who are able to help and who have not helped. We have read an appeal to the UN and every honest man. Radio Free Europe, Munich! Radio Free Europe, Munich ...[9]

Operation MOCKINGBIRD was an immense financial undertaking. Funds flowed from the CIA largely through the Congress for Cultural Freedom (CCF), founded by Tom Braden, a "liberal" who would make his mark as a syndicated columnist and co-host of CNN's Crossfire opposite Ultracon Pat Buchanon. The CCF was founded in June, 1950 by prominent academics assembled in Berlin's U.S. zone at the Titania Palace Theater. The CCF, directed by Denis de Rougemont, was formed to "defend freedom and democracy against the new tyranny sweeping the world." About 20 periodicals were financed by the front, including Encounter in the UK, The New Leader, Africa Report and El Mundo Nuevo in Latin America.[10]

The hidden source of CCF's income—and the influence the CIA had been exercising over the intellectual life of Europe—erupted in a wave of scandal that filled a page of the England's Observer in 1967. The Sunday Times also drew down on "CIA Culture," exposing a "Literary Bay of Pigs." Encounter, the epicenter of the scandal, was presided over by Melvin Lasky, a former Army captain. Lasky negotiated with the CIA for funding from the start, and he edited the journal for 32 years.

Most literati embroiled in the scandal denied any role in it, including co-editors Stephen Spender and Frank Kermode, who immediately resigned in a huff. Editor Lasky claimed to have "learned" of the true source of funding in 1963. However, Tom Braden, in disclosures that appeared in The Saturday Evening Post, acknowledged that he'd constructed the "front" program for the Central Intelligence Agency, and had appointed one agent to preside over the CCF and another to edit Encounter.[11]

Lasky shaped the reputations of some of the UK's most respected anti-Communist "scholars," including Hugh Trevor-Roper, a military intelligence officer, and George Urban, previously director of Radio Free America and later adviser to Margaret Thatcher on German affairs. From the Lasky crowd emerged historian and poet Robert Conquest, whose The Great Terror, an account of the Stalin purge, is widely considered a minor classic (gratis the CIA).[12]

The Nation reported a major stink over the subsidies to Encounter, noting: "The journal, with a circulation of 42,000, put a number of journals not funded by the CIA out of business." Lasky was unruffled, even though the British press found an "agonizing debate" raging in academia "around the question of what a free thinker should do when he finds out that his free thought has been subsidized by a ruthlessly aggressive intelligence agency as part of the international cold war."[13]

In 1965 the CCF was renamed Forum World Features and purchased by Kern House Enterprises—a CIA front directed by Mockingbird John Hay Whitney, publisher of the International Herald Tribune and formerly ambassador to England.[14]

Without a rumble, even a quiver, the cold war propaganda machine rolled into the book publishing business. Deals were struck with a host of writers, commercial publishers and distributors. The CIA, in collaboration with the USIA, financed the publication of well over a thousand books of anti-Soviet propaganda by 1967.

The CIA publication list included The Communist Front and Political Warfare by James D. Atkinson, In Pursuit of World Order by Richard N. Gardner and The Dynamics of Soviet Society by Walt Rostow. Langley also financed the worldwide distribution of an animated version of George Orwell's Animal Farm.[15]

The book business still pumps out radically "conservative" propaganda for mass consumption. In an unpublished proposal for a book on the life of Joe Coors, Delaware writer S.T. Shields reports that the brewer determined the economic policy of Ronald Reagan in his first run for the presidency. To hammer out the details of Reagan's economic plank, Coors, who maintained close ties to the intelligence sector, "recruited his friend and financial mentor, University of Chicago economist Milton Friedman, well-known but controversial. Friedman's 1976 Nobel Prize for economics had offended many prior laureates who protested in a letter to the Swedish academy that following the overthrow and assassination of Chilean president Salvador Allendé, Friedman had been invited by the Pinochet-headed junta to help the new regime formulate a conservative economic policy."

With backing from MOCKINGBIRD's Richard Scaife, publisher of the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review and a leading financier of Accuracy in Media (AIM, a military-industrial propaganda mill), Joe Coors paid a conservative Erie, Pennsylvania television station, WQLN, to make a ten-part series, Free to Choose, starring Friedman and his "monetarist" theories. Widely aired on public television in 1980 and anywhere else its sponsors could find audiences, the series was an effective propaganda tool, convincing millions of Americans that the Reagan economic policies could work. Issued as a book, Free to Choose was a non-fiction bestseller.

The building of corporate media empires by the CIA occurred throughout the western hemisphere. In the early 1950s, the CIA gave $7 million to press baron Axel Springer toward the formation of an immense media conglomerate. The Berlin mogul's holdings came to include a daily newspaper with 11 million readers, Bild Zeitung, an arch-conservative tabloid spiced with sex and violence, several popular magazines and the Ullstein publishing house. Rudolph Augstein, a competitor, publisher of Der Spiegel, laments: "No single man in Germany, before or after Hitler, with the possible exception of Bismarck or the two emperors, has had so much power as Springer."

When the CIA came along, Herr Springer was well known for his liberal views. As he gained power, however, the MOCKINGBIRD publisher espoused increasingly conservative political opinions. Within 20 years his dailies were snatched up by about 35% of the German readership and his Sunday papers exceeded 80% of the market. His star was still rising when he launched an aggressive editorial campaign against German liberals. In the Spring of 1968, students marched against his media monopoly in Hamburg, Berlin and Munich and stormed the editorial offices.

One CIA official told reporter Murray Waas that some at the Agency felt they'd played the role of Dr. Frankenstein: "We had in the long run helped create something that served neither American interests nor West German ones."[16]

By the time MOCKINGBIRD's ties to Springer were exposed, outlays for global propaganda climbed to a full third of the CIA's covert operations budget. Some 3,000 salaried and contract CIA employees were engaged in propaganda efforts. The cost of disinforming the world cost American taxpayers an estimated $265 million a year by 1978, a budget larger than the combined expenditures of Reuters, UPI and the AP news syndicates. In 1977, the New York Times ran a front-page story detailing a worldwide propaganda effort, with direct CIA ownership of some 50 newspapers in the U.S. and elsewhere.[17] In 1977, the Copely News Service admitted that it worked closely with the Company—to be sure, 23 employees at Copley alone were full-time employees of the Agency.[18]

And the corporate media was no potted plant in the Agency's secret garden of political subterfuge. One CIA dispatch, dated April 1, 1967, declassified nine years later under FOIA, advised planted "assets" in the media on "Countering Criticism of the Warren Report." Features and book reviews "are particularly appropriate for this purpose," the CIA dispatch observed. Strategies to "answer and refute" critics of the government's investigation of the JFK murder included accusations that they were "financially interested," "hasty and inaccurate in their research," "infatuated with their own theories," and "wedded to theories adopted before the evidence was in," The CIA's mouthpieces in the press were directed to emphasize: "No significant new evidence has emerged," "there is no agreement among the critics," or the ever-popular, "Conspiracy on the large scale often suggested would be impossible to conceal."

Most consumers of "CIA culture" were—and are—widely unaware of the scale the Mockingbirds have granted themselves in the coloring of public opinion. There is no way to gauge the political and cultural damage done by censorship and politically-contrived reporting. But the brute finances of CIA propaganda are another story. Sean Gervasi, a visiting professor of economics at the University of Paris, audited the CIA books in 1978. "Some $270 million, or 60 percent of the sum, is allocatable to covert action support. One-third of the $270 million, or $90 million, could be considered the indirect cost of covert propaganda."

But some sensed there was something very, well, odd about the folksy editors over at Reader's Digest. For one thing, the magazine appealed to a political fringe group. Throughout the war, the Nazi party made reference to articles in the Digest because they proved to be stirring propaganda. The Digest was often cited in a magazine distributed to American POWs. Stars & Stripes reported that Germany's 805th Tank Destroyer Battalion went so far as to blast canisters stuffed full of Digest reprints from 105mm cannons at American troops.[19]

On December 2, 1996, Newsday staffer Dan Cryer described the crafting of an American end-table fixture and identified the Promethean Rockefeller who dismembered the dream of founder DeWitt Wallace:

> Wallace fashioned the Digest into an American original, a mighty instrument for global education and uplift. Meanwhile, his wife, Lila Acheson Wallace, not only stood by her man but periodically stepped inside the organization to wield a stiletto against her "enemies." Alas, the ambitions of the Wallaces were "sabotaged and destroyed." Their magazine was cheapened, their formerly pampered employees fired, and their six billion dollar empire "overrun by salesmen and profiteers." The orchestrator of this outrage was Laurance Rockefeller, a wolf wearing sheep's clothing, who had been brought in by the Wallaces to protect their legacy.

Dr. Goebbels was an avid reader, as he admitted in a January, 1942 journal entry: "The Reader's Digest ... has published a sensational article that asserts that the United States in the last analysis is unable to undertake anything against the armed force of the Axis. America's war was a hopeless undertaking and could only result in bleeding the nation white. At last one voice in the wilderness."[20]

Stateside, the Digest was publicly pullified when a 1944 release from the Field News Syndicate reported that the Air Force distributed the strange little magazine around the word, opened foreign Digest editorial offices, even supplied the magazine's paper.

In the Eisenhower decade, a brood of MOCKINGBIRD propagandists contributed regularly to the Digest, including Allen Dulles, Carl Rowan, James Burnham, Brian Crozier, Stewart Alsop—a great-nephew of Teddy Roosevelt (who once explained in correspondence to the magazine's readers that in Africa, "female posteriors have the same symbolic significance as bosoms in this country") and Claire Sterling.[21]

"World War III has begun," Henry's Luce's Life declared in March, 1947. "It is in the opening skirmish stage already." The issue featured an excerpt of a book by the CIA's James Burnham, who called for the creation of no less than an "American Empire": "world-dominating in political power, set up at least in part through coercion (probably including war, but certainly the threat of war) and in which one group of people ... would hold more than its equal share of power."

The same vision was captured a shade more bluntly by Baroness Ella van Heemstra, the mother of Audrey Hepburn, according to Alexander Walker in Audrey—Her Real Story. The Baroness opined in a newspaper published by the English Fascist Party that "a new world" should be built on fascist principles.

The presiding power broker at Langley, Allen Dulles, was the source of much of the news gathered in the formative years of the Cold War. His key political operative was Thomas E. Dewey. Allen Dulles and the mob's Meyer Lansky contributed handsomely to Dewey's political campaigns, including his 1948 presidential bid, and his firebrand reactionary protégé, Richard Nixon.[22]

Cap Cities/ABC rose like Mothra from this Republican social cocoon. Dewey's neighbor, newsman Lowell Thomas, purchased a stake to launch the company's direct forerunner, the notorious Resorts International, said to be the corporate front for Meyer Lansky's branch of the Mafia crime family. Another of the original investors was one James Crosby, who donated $100,000 to Nixon's 1968 presidential campaign. In 1965, James Crosby's Mary Carter Paint Company purchased the Paradise Island resort across the bay from Nassau, and opened a casino through Wallace Groves, founder of the Grand Bahama Port Authority and an "advisor and possible officer" of the CIA, according to an internal "Covert Security Approval" memorandum dated December 30, 1965.[23] The casino was registered in the name of Groves's wife.[24] Crosby hired Ed Cellini, the brother of Dino Cellini, one of Lansky's closest business associates, to manage the casino.[25] In 1968, the company chiselled into casino interests in Atlantic City. Police in New Jersey attempted, without success, to block the issuance of a gambling license to the company, basing their opposition on its Mafia ties.

In 1954, this same circle of investors, all Catholics, founded Cap Cities. The company's chief counsel was OSS veteran William Casey, who clung to his shares by concealing them in a blind trust even after he was appointed CIA director by Ronald Reagan in 1981.[26]

"Black Radio" was the phrase CIA critic David Wise coined in The Invisible Government to describe the CIA's intertwining interests in the emergence of the transistor radio with the entrepreneurs who took to the airwaves. "Daily, East and West beam hundreds of propaganda broadcasts at each other in an unrelenting babble of competition for the minds of their listeners. The low-price transistor has given the hidden war a new importance."[27] By 1958, the UPI could report: "A second mysterious Arab radio station went on the air yesterday calling itself the 'Voice of Justice' and claiming to be broadcasting from Syria.

Earlier, the 'Voice of Iraq' went on the air with attacks against the Iraqi revolutionary government. The 'Voice of Justice' called Kruschev the 'Hangman of Hungary.'"[28]

On the domestic front, a lasting relationship was struck between the CIA and William Paley, a wartime colonel and the founder of CBS. A staunch believer in "all forms of propaganda" to foster loyalty to the military, Paley hired CIA agents to work undercover at the behest of his close friend Allen Dulles. Paley's designated liaison in dealings with the CIA was Sig Mickelson, president of CBS News from 1954 to 1961.[29] Mickelson was also the reigning official at Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty in the 1970s.

The domestic counterpart to these bulwarks of conservative propaganda was the Crusade for Freedom, a lavishly-funded public relations effort employing media celebrities to weave a spell of Cold War hysteria. Another was the so-called National Committee for a Free Europe, directed by MOCKINGBIRD'S Allen Dulles, "Wild Bill" Donovan, Henry Luce, C.D. Jackson and Reader's Digest editor Eugene Lyons. Both organizations martinized CIA funds to finance the emigration of European Nazis to the U.S. Ultimately, some 90% of the Crusade's funding came from Langley, passing briefly through the accounts of RCA among other major corporations, and such well-heeled charitable fronts as the Carnegie Fund and Ford Foundation.[30]

The ratings for the most popular political radio personalities of 1950 were a barometer of the political climate[31]:

COMMENTATOR	ESTIMATED AUDIENCE	SALARY
Walter Winchell	25 Million	$650,000
Drew Pearson	15 Million	$400,000
Fulton Lewis, Jr.	10 Million	$350,000
Westbrook Pegler	45 Million	$90,000

Of the four, Walter Winchell was the closest to political moderation. Pearson wrote scathing exposés of McCarthy's backstair dealings. But two of the most popular pulpit bullies in America, Nazi agents Fulton Lewis and Westbrook Pegler, pandered to McCarthy, voluntarily slanted news stories for him and ignored unfavorable press reports to enhance the senator's public image.[32]

Another political discussion program, Longine's Chronoscope, aired from 1950 to 1955 on television stations with a CBS franchise. Chronoscope borrowed from the news magazine format. Interviewers (or "co-editors") with granitic foreheads steered the discussion along, including William Bradford Huie, publisher and editor of the ultra-right American Mercury magazine; Henry Hazlitt, a political economist and contributing editor of Newsweek, the publisher of Freeman magazine; and Larry Lesueur, a reporter for CBS News. Guests on Chronoscope included:

Adm. William H. P. Blandy (June 11, 1951): Former Commander-in-Chief of the Atlantic Fleet, oversaw the nuking of the Bikini Atoll.

Paul G. Hoffman (July 30, 1951): President of the Ford Foundation, a funding source for the Nazi migration from Germany.

William C. Bullitt (September 24, 1951): The pro-fascist former U.S. Ambassador to the Soviet Union and France.

Brig. Gen. Bonner F. Fellers (October 3, 1951): Strategist and psychological warfare expert.

Lt. Gen. Albert C. Wedemeyer-Weidenbach (June 18, 1952): National chairman, Citizens for Taft Committee, director of the U.S. Liberty Lobby, Nazi operative.

Senator Joseph R. McCarthy (R-WI) (June 25, 1952).

Robert Morris (July 2, 1952:): Special counsel, "Senate Internal Security Subcommittee," otherwise known as the McCarran Committee.

Thomas E. Dewey (October 15, 1952): Former Governor of New York with hidden ties to the Mafia, and 1948 Republican nominee for President. A founding investor in Cap Cities.[33]

Listen to the MOCKINGBIRD

The technology of early radio leap-frogged with the reverse engineering of sound equipment designed by the Nazis. In 1945, Col. John T. Mullin of the U.S. Signal Corps, assigned to a team investigating German electronics, was informed by a British officer of a tape-recorder discovered at a Frankfort, Germany radio station with unprecedented musical quality. The "Magnetophone" audio tape recorder/player was a vast improvement over the then current American counterpart. Professor Marvin Bensman, a historian at the University of Memphis, notes that the machine used "plastic tape impregnated or coated with iron oxide and the employment of a very high frequency mixed with the audio signal to provide 'bias.'"

"Hi-Fi" was born in Hitler's Germany.

As Dr. Bensman fine-tunes early radio history ...

The first two machines acquired were turned over to the Signal Corps and Col. Mullin disassembled two other machines and shipped them to his home in San Francisco. In 1946, Mullin re-wired and reassembled the Magnetophone machines and went into a partnership with Bill Palmer for movie sound-track work, using those machines and the 50 reels of tape he had acquired. In October of 1946, Mullin and his partner Palmer attended the annual convention of the Society of Motion Picture Engineers. He demonstrated the machine to the sound heads of MGM, 20th Century Fox and the chief engineer of Altec Lansing. Mr. Mullin was then invited to an Institute of Radio Engineers meeting in May of 1947 to demonstrate the German Magnetophone. It was there employees of Ampex saw and heard the tape recorder. Shortly thereafter, Ampex began its own developmental project.

In 1947, the technical staff of the Bing Crosby Show on ABC arranged to have Mullin re-record original disk recordings of the Bing Crosby Show on ABC onto tape and then edit them. Crosby had been with NBC until 1944, doing the Kraft Music Hall live but did not like the regimen imposed by live shows.

Since NBC would not permit recorded programs, Crosby took a year off and returned on the newly formed ABC network when his new sponsor, Philco, and ABC agreed to let him record on electrical transcriptions as long as his ratings did not fall below a certain mark.... In July of 1947, after the initial demonstration of editing, John Mullin was invited to give a demonstration of his equipment for Bing Crosby's producers by taping live side-by-side with transcription equipment the first show for the 1947–48 season in August at the ABC-NBC studios in Hollywood.

Bing Crosby Enterprises then negotiated financing for Ampex for exclusive distribution rights and Mullin was employed to record the Crosby show on his original German equipment until the Ampex machines would become available.

With the original German tape-recorders and 50 rolls of BASF tape, Mullin's first recorded demonstration show of August, 1947, was broadcast over ABC on October 1, 1947. In April of 1948, Alexander Poniatov and his team of engineers at Ampex in Redwood City, CA, introduced the first commercial audio tape recorder based on the Magnetaphone as Ampex Model 200. The first two, serial numbers 1 and 2, were initially presented to John Mullin and numbers 3–12 went into service at ABC. To meet the contract requirements, Mullin gave his machines to ABC and later received Nos. 13–14 for his contribution. Mullin joined Bing Crosby Enterprises in 1948 and recorded his shows and others at ABC until 1951. Bing Crosby Enterprises, as the exclusive distributor for Ampex products, sold hundreds of recorders to radio stations and master recording studios.

> In 1951, Mullin and other engineers were spun off as the Bing Crosby Electronic Division to handle development of audio instrumentation and video recording. In 1956, the Electronic Division became the Minicom Division of 3M where Mullin served as head of engineering and Professional Recorder Development Manager until his retirement. [34]

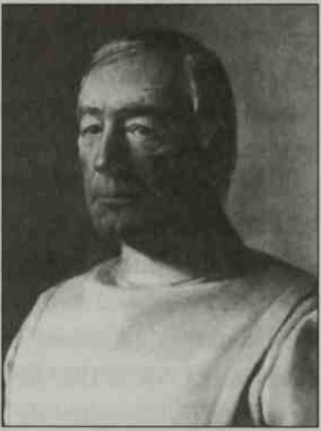
The propagandists at Langley's House of Secrets proceeded to shape collective opinion with invisible chisels. The CIA's assimilation of old guard Nazis was overseen by the CIA's Operations Coordination Board, directed by Mockingbird C.D. Jackson. During World War II, Jackson had represented the Office of War Information, served as deputy chief, Psychological Warfare Branch of the Allied Forces HQ, 1943, and deputy chief, Psychological Warfare Division, Supreme HQ, Expeditionary Force, 1944–45. Jackson was also a former executive of Time magazine and Eisenhower's special assistant for Cold War strategy. In 1954, he was succeeded by the ubiquitous Nelson Rockefeller, who quit a year later, repulsed, he sneered, by the administration's political infighting.

Vice President Nixon succeeded Rockefeller as key Cold War strategist. "Nixon," writes John Loftus, at one time an attorney for the Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations, took "a small boy's delight in the arcane tools of the intelligence craft—the hidden microphones, the 'black' propaganda." Nixon especially enjoyed his visit to a Virginia training camp to observe Nazis in the "special forces" learning the arts of "spycraft" he so admired.[35]

One of the fugitives recruited by the American intelligence establishment was heroin smuggler Hubert von Blücher, the son of a German ambassador. Hubert often bragged that he'd been trained by the Abwehr, the German military intelligence division, while still a civilian in his twenties. He served in a reconnaissance unit of the German Army's 2nd Battalion until forced out for medical reasons in 1944. He worked briefly as an assistant director for Berlin Film on a movie entitled One Day, and finished out the war flying with the Luftwaffe—not to engage the enemy, but to smuggle Nazi gold bullion out of the country.[36] In 1948, he flew the coop to Argentina. Posing as a photographer, he immediately paid court to Eva Peron, presenting her with an invaluable Gobelin tapestry (doubtless a sample from the wealth of artifacts confiscated by SS from their victims). Hubert then met with Martin Bormann at Argentina's Hotel Plaza and turned over German marks amounting to $80 million. He later told investigators the loot financed the formation of the National Socialist Party in Argentina.

Three years later Hubert migrated to El Norte. The Nazi landed a position with the Color Corporation of America in California, and eked out a living writing scripts for Hollywood's thriving movie industry. His voice graces a film set in the Amazon, produced by Walt Disney. In 1951 he returned to Buenos Aires, then Düsseldorf, West Germany. He established a firm that developed not movie scripts, but anti-chemical warfare agents for the German government.[37] At the stately Industrie Club in Düsseldorf in 1982, Von Blücher crowed to journalists: "I am chief share-holder of Pan American Airways. I am the best friend of Howard Hughes. The Beach Hotel in Las Vegas is 45 percent financed by me. I am thus the biggest financier ever to appear in the Arabian Nights tales dreamed up by these people over their second bottle of brandy."[38]

Not exactly. Two of the biggest financiers to stumble from the drunken dreams of world-moving affluence were, in their time, Moses Annenberg, publisher of The Philadelphia Inquirer, and his son Walter, the CIA/mob-anchored publisher of the TV Guide. Like most American high-rollers, Annenberg lived a double life. Moses, his father, was a scion of the Capone mob. Both Moses and Walter were indicted in 1939 for tax evasions totalling many millions of dollars—the biggest case in the history of the Justice Department. Moses pled guilty and agreed to pay the government $8 million and settle $9 million in assorted tax claims, penalties and interest debts. Moses received a three-year sentence. He died in Lewisburg Penitentiary. Johnny Rosselli, years before he was an intelligence asset, worked the gambling wire service operated by Annenberg, and remained in Hollywood, mingling with the most illustrious names in the business, after Moses died.



The Imperious Walter Annenberg, by Andrew Wyeth.

He once told another California Mafioso, Jimmy Fratianno: "I knew half the people in this town on a first-name basis. Jack Warner, Harry Cohn, Clark Gable, George Raft, Jean Harlow, Gary Cooper, I knew them all and enjoyed their company."[39]

Walter Annenberg, the TV Guide magnate, rose to the loftiest ranks of the Republican Party. On the campaign trail in April, 1988, George Bush flew into Los Angeles to woo Reagan's "kitchen cabinet." "This is the topping on the cake," Bush's regional campaign director told the Los Angeles Times. The Bush team met at Annenberg's plush Rancho Mirage estate at Sunnylands, California.

It was at the Annenberg mansion that Nixon's cabinet was chosen, and the state's social and contributor registers built over a quarter-century of state political dominance by Ronald Reagan, whose acting career was greatly enhanced by Operation MOCKINGBIRD.

Another trans-Atlantic student of Goebbels was Liz Noelle-Neumann-Maier-Leibnitz, whose presence as a visiting scholar at the University of Chicago caused a furor on campus in 1991 when her Nazi past was aired in the conservative Jewish quarterly Commentary.[40] At the outbreak of WWII, Noelle—a "visiting" scholar since 1978—claimed in her 1940 dissertation that Jews, "who have monopolized a large part of America's intellectual life, have concentrated their demagogic capacities on anti-German agitation.... the treatment of the Jews in Germany is portrayed by the American press in a completely distorted manner."

The dissertation was passed off in the U.S. under the title The Spiral of Silence as a contemporary study of "bandwagon" theory—based largely on the laboratory experiments of Solomon Asch, a social scientist who posited that people will often revise their own perceptions to agree with status quo opinions. "Mobs," Noelle claims, "are typically aroused by instinctive reactions.... It is on this basis that the Nazi minister of propaganda Goebbels was able to mobilize a full stadium with the rallying call, 'Do you want to have Total War?'"

In the 1930s, she'd been an activist and Hitler Youth leader. Noelle ran a series of Nazi student organizations, managed to survive arrest by the Army's Counter-Intelligence Corps in 1947 for her wartime propaganda efforts, and founded a public opinion polling agency, the Institut fuer Demoskopie. As late as 1991, a poll conducted by the agency asked Germans whether the Jews have "too much influence in this country."

She went on to become an adviser to Helmut Kohl and the 1990 recipient of the Helen Dinerman Award for "outstanding contributions of scholarship" to the World Association for Public Opinion Research.

In 1949, MOCKINGBIRD's Phil Graham and John Hayes, vice president of the Post's electronic media division, bought into CBS radio, an arrangement approved by FCC chairman Wayne Coy. It was Coy who negotiated the establishment of the CIA-anchored Radio Free Europe in Germany earlier in the year. Walter Cronkite, a former military intelligence officer, and in the postwar period UPI's Moscow correspondent, was lured to CBS by Phil Graham.[41]

The script for the charade of the CIA's propaganda war was written in 1955 by David Sarnoff, RCA's chairman of the board. Media historian Shawn Parry-Giles writes in the Western Journal of Communication that the 42-page plan, entitled "Program for a Political Offensive Against World Communism," recommended: "America's propaganda could be proliferated overseas via television and other media sources. Sarnoff argued that 'no means of communication should be ignored in America's propaganda efforts,' including official and private channels. Sarnoff's underlying assumption was that the 'best and surest way to prevent a Hot War [was] to win the Cold War,' [with] propaganda as the primary 'weapon.'"[42]

Television presented the intelligence world with unprecedented potential for propagandizing, even prying, in the age of Big Brother.

George Orwell glimpsed the possibilities when he installed omniscient surveillance technology in 1948, a dystopian novel re-christened 1984 for the first edition published in the U.S. by Harcourt, Brace.

Operation Octopus was in full swing by 1948, a surveillance program that turned any television set with tubes into a transmitter with a range of 25 miles. Agents of Octopus could pick up audio and visual images with the equipment. Hale Boggs was investigating Operation Octopus at the time of his disappearance in the midst of the Watergate probe.[43]

The idea was revived in a Nixon administration study prepared by its Office of Science and Technology recommending the use of "telescreens" for surveillance purposes. The proposal was discovered by Congressman William Moorhead, who decried the plan to "manufacture and installation of special FM receivers in every home radio and television set, boat and automobile, which could be automatically turned on by the government to contact every citizen, whether awake or asleep." The drawback with existing surveillance devices, administration technocrats complained, was the lack of an essential "wake-up capability."[44]

Orwellian, obviously—but the programming of minds steeped in the "CIA culture" was equally intrusive, if a bit more subtle. A Hydra of private foundations sprang up to finance the propaganda push. One of them, Operations and Policy Research, Inc. (OPR), received hundreds of thousands of dollars from the CIA through private foundations and trusts. OPR research was the basis of a television series broadcast by public television stations in New York and Washington, D.C. in 1964, Of People and Politics, a "study" of the American political system in 21 weekly installments.[45]

Meanwhile, in Hollywood, the visual cortex of the Beast, the same CIA/Mafia combination that formed Cap Cities sank its claws into film studios and labor unions. Johnny Rosselli had been pulled out of the Army during the war by a criminal investigation of Chicago mobsters in the film industry. The CIA mob functionary, murdered shortly after his testimony at a closed

Watergate hearing, played sidekick to Harry Cohn, the Columbia Pictures mogul. Cohn visited Italy's Benito Mussolini in 1933, and upon his return to Hollywood remodeled his office after the dictator's.[46] The only honest job his pal Rosselli ever held was assistant purchasing agent (and a secret investor) at Eagle Lion productions, run by Bryan Foy, a former producer for 20th Century Fox. Rosselli, Capone's man in California, passed a fortune in Mafia investments to Cohn.[47]

Other Mafia dons found lifelong friends in Hollywood. Bugsy Siegel pooled gambling investments with Billy Wilkerson, publisher of Hollywood Reporter.[48] And in 1952, at MCA, Actors' Guild president Ronald Reagan—a movie idol recruited by MOCKINGBIRD's Crusade for Freedom to raise funds for the resettlement of East European Nazi Quislings in the U.S.—signed a secret waiver of the conflict-of-interest rule with the mob-controlled studio, in effect granting it a labor monopoly on early television programming.[49] In exchange, executives of MCA made Reagan a part owner of the company. The political bonds were tight. MCA Chairman Lew Wasserman was Reagan's agent in Hollywood and the studio's board of directors has been represented by politicians from both parties.

In 1987, historian C. Vann Woodward, writing in the New York Times, reported that Reagan "fed the names of suspect people in his organization to the FBI secretly and regularly enough to be assigned 'an informer's code number, T-10.' His FBI file indicates intense collaboration with producers to 'purge' the industry of subversives."[50]

The Mafia's hold on Hollywood periodically burst into headlines with politically-embarrassing results. In December of 1988, the president of MCA's Home Video Division, Eugene Giaquinto, was accused by the FBI of funneling corporate payoffs to Ed "The Conductor" Sciandra, believed to be Giaquinto's uncle and the alleged underboss of Pennsylvania's Buffalino crime family. FBI agents reported in sworn affidavits, based on wiretaps of the company's executive offices, that the money was laundered by North Star Graphics in Clifton, New Jersey, a company that held a $12–15 million a year contract to package MCA video cassettes. The FBI investigation centered on Giaquinto, Martin Bacow, a Hollywood labor consultant, and retired Los Angeles Police Detective John St. John, formerly an icon of the LAPDs organized crime intelligence section. A second connection to the LAPD was Giaquinto's attorney, Richard Crane, former chief of the department's Organized Crime Strike Force. Today, Crane is full or part owner of five gambling casinos in Nevada and Colorado.[51]

The wiretaps led the FBI to a self-described CIA asset, Robert Booth Nichols, a suspect in the murder of journalist Danny Casolaro, found slashed to death with a broken beer bottle in the bathtub of a West Virginia Sheraton hotel in 1991. Nichols, under oath, has described himself as an eccentric entrepreneur and intelligence genius. In March, 1993, in a civil suit waged against the L.A. Police Department, Nichols charged the cops with interfering in a huge overseas arms sale. From the witness stand he waved correspondence on White House stationery and photographs of himself in the company of foreign political and military dignitaries. He informed the jury that he had operated for nearly 20 years in the service of the CIA. The FBI affidavit alleges that during a July 15, 1987 stakeout on Sunset Strip, agents saw Giaquinto, then under investigation, hand a box to Robert Booth Nichols. The affidavit also mentioned that "Nichols may have been associated with the Gambino LCN [La Cosa Nostra] family in New York City."

The Justice Department inquiry set out to determine whether Giaquinto, Nichols and others were "buying or selling stocks by the use of manipulative or deceptive practices." In 1988, after Giaquinto resigned from the board of Meridian International Logistics, Inc., a firm controlled by Nichols, he took a sudden "leave of absence" from MCA, never to return.[52]

The name Robert Booth Nichols, reported the Los Angeles Times on March 21, 1993, also "surfaced in a House Judiciary Committee report on possible malfeasance in the Justice Department during the Reagan era. The report also linked Nichols to an aborted business venture at the Cabazon Indian Reservation in Indio which, he declared on the witness stand, dealt with the manufacture of machine guns to sell to the Nicaraguan Contras." To underscore his client's credibility,

> Nichols' lawyer introduced in court a flood of paper indicating that he had worked on numerous ventures with prominent individuals. They included Robert Maheu, Howard Hughes' former right-hand man; Michael McManus, an aide to President Reagan; Clint Murchison, then the owner of the Dallas Cowboys, and George Pender, an executive with a worldwide engineering company. Nichols testified about discussions he had with a White House aide on the rebuilding of Lebanon while he was affiliated with Meridian's predecessor, Santa Monica-based First Intercontinental Development Corp., [a firm that] supposedly specialized in secret foreign construction projects for the U.S. government. Nichols also testified that he had no visible income for more than 15 years except for the living expenses he claimed he was receiving from unnamed CIA keepers.[53]

In 1988, the Justice Department assigned a seasoned criminal investigator to the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles. A year later he charged Hollywood spell-weaver Joseph Isgro, a record promoter and the executive producer of Hoffa, with fraud, among other charges. The trial got underway with the usual courtroom disputes and appeals, then stopped dead. There were no further developments in the case because, without a word of explanation to the press, a prosecutor in the case was quietly suspended in the Summer of 1995 and made the target of a criminal investigation himself. Isgro's attorney, Donald Re, an organized crime specialist, filed for dismissal, protesting that his client had a right to a speedy trial. The government countered that the delays were caused by the prosecutor's suspension. His office was sealed by dictate of the court.

The federal petition also claimed, somewhat lamely, that the probe of the prosecutor's own organized crime activity excluded the possibility of consulting directly with him about the Isgro case.[54] In fact, the Justice Department proved too soaked in its own corrupt practices to try Isgro. Six volumes of testimony from a government witness, Dennis DiRicco, conflicted with statements he'd made at his own trial a year before. Prosecutors withheld DiRicco's testimony from Isgro's defense attorneys. With the trial at an indefinite standoff, Judge James Ideman was forced to grant the motion for dismissal—"with prejudice" against the federal prosecutors for "outrageous government misconduct."[55]

Hollywood still crawls with operatives, not to mention organized crime. When Italian financier Ginacarlo Parretti set out to fund his purchase of MGM in October 1990, the deal was brokered by Joe Kelso, a self-styled financier with reported ties to the CIA (he appears in Oliver North's notebooks), and members of the Knights of Malta, O.S.J. in New York (a fraternal order unrelated to the eleventh-century Knights affiliated with the Vatican).[56]

Fox television has its roots in Metromedia Co., founded by German-born John Kluge, an Army intelligence officer in the Second World War. Kluge bought his first radio station in 1946 and went on to become one of the world's richest man with a personal fortune of $5.6 billion.[57]

In the print media, to quote former Newsweek editor Malcolm Muir to Carl Bernstein in 1977: "I do think in those days the CIA kept pretty close touch with all responsible reporters."

They continued to "keep in touch," throughout and beyond the Cold War, and so did their publishers. No one in the industry was more comfortable in the world of black bag jobs and foreign intrigues than Franklin Murphy, CEO of Times Mirror Square, the parent of the Los Angeles Times. Murphy was also the chancellor of UCLA throughout the 1960s, and he was a director of four multinationals—BankAmerica, Ford Motor Co., Hallmark Cards and Norton Simon, Inc.. He was also the president of the Ahmanson Foundation, chairman of the J. Paul Getty Trust, a trustee of the University of Pennsylvania (like UCLA, a haunt of mind control research in the 1960s) and the Carnegie Institution. There was a decided editorial conflict-of-interest in his ties to the CIA and the Pentagon: The newspaper's ranking executive was a member of the Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board, the Federal Commission on Government Security, and served on the board of consultants of the National War College and the board of visitors of the U.S. Air Force Air University.[57]

The editorial pages were planted with "scholars" picking solemnly through national security issues in the "think tanks," propaganda machines that crank out pre-fab opinions to program public opinion for military-industrial clients. The American Enterprise Institute (AEI), a spook clearing-house, draws heavily on "scholars" from the intelligence pool. The current director of Asian studies at the AEI is James Lilly, a former assistant secretary of defense for security affairs, a veteran of the NSC and director of operations at the CIA with a total of 27 years under his belt. William Colby of the Phoenix Program was "an old friend."

In January 1996, Lilly told a Senate committee: "Journalists, I think, you don't recruit them. We can't do that. They've told us not to do that. But you certainly sit down with your journalists, and I've done this and the Station Chief has done it, others have done it—it's a wonderful way of finding out what's happening in a country, whether it's Steve Muffson or Patrick Tyler of the Times or Debbie Wong of ABC, you've got to keep in touch with these people."[59]

At the time of MOCKINGBIRD's conception by Allen Dulles, a bastion of social conditioning and disinformation was set up at Marquette University, the Interuniversity Consortium for Political and Social Research. The Consortium was an appendage of the Institute for Social Research at Michigan University. Early projects were funded by the military, including one Air Force study of the most effective approaches to propagandizing the Soviet Union.[60]

Newsweek, an early MOCKINGBIRD publication, was—and is—on cozy terms with the intelligence sector. In the 1950s, Dulles appointed an agent to deal regularly with the magazine's reporters. Muir declared, "I had a number of friends in the Allen Dulles organization."

The weekly dropped into MOCKINGBIRD's roost in 1961. The magazine was purchased from the Astor Foundation and New York Governor Harriman for a song. David Halberstam called it "one of the great steals of contemporary journalism." Newsweek was worth an estimated $15 million at the time, but ultimately no more than $75,000 actually changed hands.[61] As it happened, financier Gates W. McGarrah, the grandfather of Dick Helms, the Agency's director in the 60s, sat on the board of directors of the Astor Foundation. The Post's Ben Bradlee had been tipped that the magazine was to be placed on the block by his friend Helms—who'd heard of the sale from his grandfather.[62]

Any illusion that Newsweek exercises journalistic independence from the fetters of corporate and governmental influence is easily dispelled by a glance at the boardroom. Washington Post/Newsweek director Richard Simmons sits on the board of Union Pacific Railroad. James Burke, a director of IBM and the Prudential Insurance Co., recently sat on the board of Newsweek's parent company. In 1985, Cap Cities purchased ABC for $3.5 billion. Eighteen percent of the Cap Cities stock was transferred to the portfolio of Warren Buffett, a major investor in the Post. Barbara Scott Preiskel, Post/Newsweek's media conglomerate director, has been a director of Textron, General Electric and the Mutual Life Insurance Co.. The Post company and Cap Cities are both currently represented by the Wilmer, Cutler and Pickering law firm run by Lloyd Cutler, a Nixon crony, attorney to the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association and the mentor of Clinton appointee Zoé Baird, whose bid to run the Justice Department was spiked by Congress to hoots of indignation over a minor tax violation.[63]

The CIA's infiltration of the media was such a stunning success that the executive branch established a propaganda machine of its own, Operation Candor, based on C.D. Jackson's recommendations for creating a "national will" in support of military objectives, created to perform what James M. Lambie, Jr., special assistant in the White House office, referred to as "a job of persuasion or indoctrination or propaganda." Shawn Parry-Giles, a professor of communications at Monmouth College in Illinois, combed through correspondence archived at the Dwight Eisenhower Library in 1996 and cobbled together the hidden history of a propaganda machine from its inception in the imagination of C.D. Jackson—a well-oiled machine that still thrums softly behind the headlines of the present day:

> [A] primary tactic of Operation Candor involved the domestic news media. A July 8, 1953 White House central files plan advised that the scope of Operation Candor be "extended to include ... support by newspaper and magazine publishers, editors, columnists and writers." In fact, the first initiative of this expansive campaign involved the "immediate exploitation [of] U.S. domestic press, radio, television, and newsreels." In order to achieve such exploitation, Abbott Washburn [deputy director of America's propaganda program at the time] requested that "top opinion molders [be] contacted." Those earmarked for inclusion were the heads of > national organizations, top journalists, columnists, commentators, educators. To further insure the requisite coverage, the campaign organizers planned a "confidential briefing at [the] White House of top media executives of TV and radio network presidents ... magazine publishers, etc." The media could provide what the organizers of the propaganda campaign refer to as a "multiplying effort" insuring the massive distribution of the administration's message.[64]

The shaping of a "public will" was undertaken by Eisenhower's contacts in the media, among them familiar publishers, advertising executives and network CEOs, including Henry Luce of Time, Helen Rogers Reid, owner of the New York Herald Tribune, William Robinson, publisher of the Herald Tribune and Arthur Sulzberger, publisher of the New York Times."[65]

Over the years, Operation MOCKINGBIRD and its spin-off efforts have left a maze of tracks across the corporate media's Monopoly board. A quarter-century after the program was conceived, Representative Otis Pike (D-NY), chairman of the House Select Committee on Intelligence, pried open the lid on one of Langley's most sensitive black boxes—the takeover of the American press by the virtual government—in public hearings. The committee's findings proved so incendiary that the House voted down its release until the White House could censor it. Pike reports that the CIA's special counsel, outraged by the Pike Committee's to approval of the report, threatened to gutter his career. The counsel told one of Pike's principal investigators: "Pike will pay for this—you wait and see. I'm serious. There will be political retaliation. Any political ambitions in New York that Pike had are through. We will destroy him for this."[66] Both Pike and his fellow CIA inquisitor Frank Church were defeated in their bids for re-election, due largely to adverse publicity from MOCKINGBIRD's Op-Ed branch.

And with their defeat a republic rose from the window dressing of the "American Century." Then and now, most consumers of the corporate media were totally unaware of the influence the CIA has on their own beliefs. A network anchorman in time of national crisis is an instrument of psychological warfare in the CIA culture. He is a creature from the national security sector's chamber of horrors. For this reason, consumers of the corporate press have reason to examine their basic beliefs and attitudes about government and life in the parallel universe of these United States.

Addendum: MOCKINGBIRD UK, the Rise of Margaret Thatcher & the CIA's London Operations

England's answer to Operation MOCKINGBIRD was as ambitious an experiment in social conditioning as the original—and the stench of the CIA rose in England when the can of worms was peeled open by The New Statesman in March 1995:

> The political playing field of the postwar world was tipped to the right by the secret support of Whitehall's cold warriors for "politically correct" writers, academics and politicians. And, scandalously, the government is still refusing to reveal the extent of these operations. Key files are held back from the Public Records Office, long after they should have been released under the 30-year rule.
> The key agency in all this was the Foreign Office's Information Research Department (IRD), set up in 1948 as a secret anti-Communist propaganda department [with] 400 staff based at Riverwalk House on the South Bank, with an annual budget of £1 million.... It was also involved in various covert operations—attempting to influence the choice of leadership in the former colonial countries, interfering in domestic trade unions and mounting other black propaganda exercises that could in no way be described as anti-Communist.
> This continued well into the 1970s. For example, Colin Wallace, the former British army information officer in Belfast, has told how IRD officers planted anti-IRA stories in the British and foreign press. These were straightforward disinformation, for example claiming that the KGB was running the IRA.

IRD was very much a creature of MI6. Many of its staff were intelligence officers. The last head of IRD was Ray Whitney, who later became a very dry Tory MP. (Within a few months of leaving Whitehall, Whitney was attacking the West's 'sell out to Marxists in southern Africa' in an article in Free Nation, an organ of the far-right National Association for Freedom.)

John Ogilvy Rennie, head of IRD from 1953 to 1958, later became head of MI6. IRD operations in Malaya during the crisis of the 1950s were run by Maurice Oldfield, then MI6 station chief in Singapore.

One of the most useful pieces of new evidence about IRD's activities is the recently published autobiography of Brian Crozier, Free Agent—The Unseen War, 1941–1991. Crozier, a journalist from the 1940s onwards, during the 1960s ran a London-based news agency, Forum World Features, which was later exposed as a CIA front. In his book, he describes how, after he left the Economist in 1964, he was also approached by 'Ronald Franks', an old friend from MI6. After lunch at Frank's club, the Athenaeum, Crozier was taken to MI6's then HQ at Century House.

Crozier: "Franks escorted me to the upper floor, where he introduced me to the head of his department, which dealt with Sino-Soviet questions. This was my first shock. I had met the man, Noel Cunningham (not his real name), several times. That day and on future days, I met a number of people whom I had talked to, in the Travellers and elsewhere, in the belief that they were 'Foreign Office' ... Later on, at Century House, I met a number of non-officials whom I had known for years, whose 'contact' with MI6 was similar to mine. They included academic friends of mine specializing in matters of interest to me, including Vietnam and the Soviet Union." Crozier was hired by MI6 as a part-time consultant for IRD.

IRD's roots lay in the wartime Special Operations Executive (SOE) launched by Winston Churchill to "set Europe ablaze." The great lesson SOE learnt about disinformation was that it worked only if it could be dropped into normally accurate news. Listeners and readers have to believe the output for the carefully placed lie to work. IRD set up a worldwide network of news agencies and radio stations, often connected to apparently independent news media.

One of the first agents recruited by the IRD was Soviet spy Guy Burgess, later fired for drunkenness, but not before he was able to pass on a full account of IRD's operations to Moscow.

Cord Meyer

Family and Personal History: Owned a fortune in sugar interests and real estate. Cord graduated from Yale in December 1942, and joined the Marines with the rank of lieutenant. A Japanese grenade took his sight in one eye while stationed in Guam. (Source: Philip Agee, Dirty Work)

In 1945, he attended the charter conference of the United Nations in San Francisco. Two years later he joined the United World Federalists. He was selected one of the ten most outstanding men in America in 1947. (Another was Richard Nixon.) Allen Dulles persuaded him to join the CIA in 1951. Meyer was assigned to the office of the Deputy Director for Plans and reported to Tom Braden (later a "liberal counterbalance" to Pat Buchanon on PBS's CrossFire).

Meyer was sent to London in 1973 and ran all CIA operations in Europe.

From Ralph McGehee's CIABase:

> Labor Infiltration: 1960–69. Cord Meyer's International Organizations Division assisted labor ops via AFL-CIO.
>
> Funds to European Labor Unions: CIA opened mail of George Meany, Irving Brown and Jay Lovestone to ensure they were sending CIA funds to European labor contacts.

From Robert Moss, "Arnaud de Borchgrave, Robert Moss and Right-Wing Disinformation," Covert Action Information Bulletin, No. 10, pp. 40–41:

> THE CIA & THE RISE OF MARGARET THATCHER
> On his return to Britain, Moss became a speech-writer for a then little-known member of Parliament, Margaret Thatcher. Moss [a propagandist on the CIA payroll] wrote her speech attacking the "Sovietization of Britain," which gave Mrs. Thatcher the nickname "the Iron Lady." Moss became the leading light in the Institute for the Study of Conflict, [which] served as a way of bringing CIA journalists and military intelligence officers together.
> Moss founded and became the president of a British version of the Chilean Comando de Accion Gremial, the National Association of Freedom. According to the Guardian (December 21, 1976), Moss organized the NAFF under the banner of halting the "Sovietization" of Britain through the Labour Government and the influence of the trade unions." It was this ISC that issued the disinformation (57 Labour MPs are Marxists, Soviet plan to Communize Britain, etc.) that provided the catalyst for the formation of the NAFF. The leaders of the NAFF then formed themselves into a Conservative shadow government that is today the Conservative Government.

In 1977, Moss and friends set up a would-be British Intelligence Station for Capitol Hill, a think-tank calling itself the Heritage Foundation....

The New York Times (December 1977) and former FWF writer Russell Warren Howe (More Magazine, May 1978) have identified Brian Crozier as a CIA contract agent, and Moss as his protégé. During the time Crozier was working for CIA, he used the journalistic covers of: defense correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, director of Forum World Features, founder of the Institute for the Study of Conflict, correspondent for National Review, publisher of the London Economist "Foreign Report," and correspondent for Soviet Analysis. As Crozier retired from many of these positions they were all taken over by Moss....

This propaganda was used as cover for two actual crises manufactured at this time—a series of insoluble strikes, and escalating terrorism and counter-terrorism in northern Ireland. From Moss's own handwriting we know that he had two mentors in fomenting these crises, Miles Copeland and Cord Meyer, Jr. Meyer was CIA Station Chief in London at the time and for many years the main figure in charge of the Agency's covert operations; Copeland was formerly head of the Gaming Room on the fourth floor at CIA headquarters, where simulations of strikes were acted out before being implemented in Chile.

NAFF's main activity was to turn strikes from symbolic ritual into covert war. It did so by turning each strike into a traditional testing ground of the ability to resist—not the normal economic demands of unions but "Communist encroachment."

Coordination with military intelligence was facilitated by a leading figure at ISC, Sir Peter Wilkinson who, according to the Guardian (July 16, 1976), "was recently the coordinator of intelligence on the Cabinet Office and formerly head of administration at the Ministry of Defense."

Through such contacts Crozier and Moss became instructors in military intelligence training schools.

Brian Crozier's CIA-funded Institute for the Study of Conflict and the British Labor Unions (Source: Philip Agee, Dirty Work):

The Institute prepared a special manual on counterinsurgency for the British police and regularly participated in training programs at the National Defense College and the Police College. The Institute's line appears to encourage preemptive surveillance and other measures against a broad range of 'subversives,' a term which could easily include law-abiding trade union militants and anti-establishment intellectuals.

Robert Moss, CIA/NET Propagandist

A sampling of Robert Moss's "conservative" propaganda for National Educational Television (Source NET Programming Press Release): Washington, DC March 17, 1996

> AMERICA THE BANKRUPT?
> (Commentary by NET President Paul M. Weyrich on Dateline: Washington) During NET's Eighth Wonder program this week, the thorny issue of entitlements was the subject of the entire program. Underwritten by the Vernon K. Krieble Foundation, producer ROBERT MOSS explored the explosive growth of entitlements over the past several decades as part of a three part special entitled "America the Bankrupt?"
>
> Among the issues aired on this special broadcast is how the Social Security Trust Fund is handled. Currently that trust fund has a surplus. But that surplus is not invested on behalf of future recipients of Social Security. Rather, that surplus money is used to offset deficit spending in other federal government programs. Therefore, the so-called Trust Fund simply has some IOU notes from the federal government which may or may not be able to pay up when the time comes.
>
> The way the United States handles Social Security is contrasted with the way the same issue is handled in Chile. In that country, where Social Security has been semi-privatized, real money is put aside and invested on behalf of each individual recipient. Needless to say, Chile's Social Security system is on a much sounder basis than our own.
> The issue is very relevant to the moment because, as House Appropriations Committee Chairman Bob Livingston told us on Direct Line last week, great progress has been made in getting the non-entitlement portion of the budget under control. But not a thing has been done about the majority of the budget which consists of entitlements. And the growth of entitlements is what has put this nation on the road to bankruptcy.
> President Clinton's own Medicare trustees have told the nation that Medicare needs reformation because it is headed for bankruptcy. Yet, President Clinton has refused to budge on any reformation of the system. He portrays himself as the savior of Medicare. But in truth it is quite the opposite. His refusal to even meet the Republican reformers half way on the issue is driving this nation ever closer to insolvency. Clinton is practicing politics of the moment, while some Republicans, at least, have sought to put the system back on a sound basis.

The issue of Social Security itself hasn't even been touched yet by either political party. But in a few years those surpluses, which have been used to hide the real size of the federal deficit, will end. At that point, payments to all Social Security recipients will be in grave danger.

Unless this President and the Congress tackle the issue of entitlements, the other cuts they may make in federal spending will be meaningless. In a few short years entitlements will overwhelm the entire federal budget.

The Vernon K. Krieble Foundation, under the able leadership of Helen Fuscuss, has done the nation a great service by putting the issue of entitlements front and center where it ought to be.

Now we can only hope that those in high office who can see beyond the next election will pay attention. Failure to do so will make these United States into a third world style nation in a very few years.

Re: Moss, Crozier and CIA propaganda in Chile (from Donald Freed, Death in Washington, Lawrence Hill & Co, 1980, p. 167):

The CSIS [Center for Strategic and International Studies] published ... The Stability of the Caribbean, edited by the British journalist Robert Moss. Moss's book was published jointly with the London-based Institute for the Study of Conflict, with financial support from the Tinker Foundation. Contributors to the book included James Theberge, Brian Crozier, head of the institute, and Moss himself, who was identified as the author of "the forthcoming book, Chile's Marxist Experiment.

In January 1977, The Guardian (London) and the New York Times identified Chile's Marxist Experiment as one of the propaganda books produced by the CIA. These articles also revealed that the entire second printing of Moss's book had been purchased by the Chilean military junta at a cost of £55,000, to be given away as part of a propaganda package.

VIRTUAL GOVERNMENT

Alien Abduction, Psychic Warfare and Cult Programming

Military-Corporate, Academic and Quasi-Religious Fronts for Mind Control Operations in America

Vipers and Daydreams

He looses his hounds on us
Grants us a grave in the air plays with his vipers and daydreams
—Paul Celan, "Death Fugue"

Ed Dames, a proprietor of Psi-Tech—a "remote viewing" service in Beverly Hills, California founded by a clique of former intelligence officers—explains to late night radio talk show host Art Bell how the company's sole product—psi—works: "This is a very structured technique, the remote viewer sitting at a desk with a ream of white paper and a pen. Using [remote viewing] protocols, they first perceive a target. They're not told what the target is, only given a random number. Their unconscious minds are taught to do all the work, viewing the target first as sort of a 'thought-ball,' if you will ...."[1]

"The next stage is sensory perceptions. They elaborate, download and objectify in words and sketches the colors, textures, the smells and taste, the sounds, the temperatures and the dimensions present at the site."

Dames lets on that his psychics constructed clay models of the Unabomber's bombs, "that sort of thing," for a "federal agency." It doesn't come to him that all of this may sound a bit far-fetched, grandiose, the paranormal hard-wired to the trappings of computer science—not to mention blatant disinformation. His firm built clay models when "remote viewing" could, if the "protocols" worked as advertised, have pinpointed the killer's location, supplied the "colors, textures," and so on, of the Unabomber's hutch, even his name. After all, insists Dames, "if the 'target' is a terrorist—Saddam Hussein or Abu Nidal—we go in through the back door. We can be in their minds, in their dreams."

A company brochure reports that Psi-Tech was founded in 1989, employing "a select, technically-qualified group of professional analysts who provide a unique data collection capability not available anywhere else in the world. We are a team of highly-trained remote viewing specialists [who've] developed applied remote viewing into a powerful investigative tool." The FBI and National Security Council have drawn upon the company's services.

Dames delivers a metaphysical Marvel Comics narrative, but assures us this is serious business. During the Gulf Crisis, one Psi-Tech client, "a large company with strategic oil interests in the Mid-East," called on Dames and his telepaths "to provide data and analysis on Saddam himself, his mind (intent, motivation, emotional and behavioral states), to penetrate his war room for information concerning battle plans, operations, force strengths and possible deception schemes, and to provide a six-month general outlook for the Gulf region."

Major Dames claims that human abductees are ferried to Mars for use as slave labor. He has "seen" all of this, of course, by remote viewing "alien" activity. But then, Dames is schooled in intelligence, the former commanding officer of the Army's "Psychic Espionage Unit," a cadré that operated under DIA and Army INSCOM charter.[2]

He is also a chronic confabulator, the chief Plumber of the "Stargate" psychic spying "scandal." He draws his intelligence background from the shadows like the priest's robes Jim Garrison recovered from the closet of David Ferrie. In the past, he acknowledges, "I have been involved in a lot of very, very deep, dark black occult projects." And he admits, "I have never been assigned to a unit that has suffered more ostracism, been looked upon with more fear."

He is on familiar terms with "aliens" and the "occult," but his resumé, published in Psi-Tech sales literature, qualifies him for covert military operations spiked with classified psychotronics:

> Edward Arthur Dames joined the United States Army in 1967, enlisting as a paratrooper at the age of seventeen. After serving one year as an Airborne Infantryman, Mr. Dames transferred to the Army Security Agency, and was assigned to the Far East to support National Security Agency missions in that part of the world. In 1974, Mr. Dames returned home to attend college, quickly earning a four-year scholarship for academic excellence. After three years as an undergraduate at the University of California, Berkeley, where he double-majored in bioelectronics and Chinese, Mr. Dames joined Berkeley's ROTC program, becoming a Distinguished Military Graduate in 1978.
> Newly commissioned as a second lieutenant in Military Intelligence, Dames was sent to be trained as a tactical electronic warfare officer and, for three years, was assigned to Germany to intercept and jam Soviet and Czech communications. From there he was recruited by a scientific and technical military intelligence "black unit," ultimately to direct clandestine operations against high-value foreign targets. He remained in deep cover, travelling worldwide under assumed identities....

Dames explains that he served with three "elite units." His familiarity with advanced technology includes highly-advanced espionage hardware, "boxes in the sky that look down and through buildings," precisely the sort used in certain covert operations, and quite possibly in "remote viewing" exercises as well:

> The first [unit], beginning in ... 1980, had me as a targeting officer at the secretary of defense level, at the national agency level. My job there was to choose among America's intelligence collection priorities, mostly—those were weapons of mass destruction—and to select targets, and to engineer penetration missions using any means at my disposal. And carte blanche, when it came to funding, orchestrate the successful penetration of those targets—that is, facilities, programs, people, those kinds of things.... I'm talking about intelligence targeting.... They involved boxes in the sky that look down and through buildings, they involved agents underground and training case officers to manage those agents, they involved extremely sophisticated technologies.

But before all of this, in the late 1970s, Dames acknowledges, he served with a unit "associated with the occult. It gave the unit a bad name."[3]

And Dames as well. Wherever one stands in the ESP debate, Psi-Tech was formed in the caul of the intelligence underground's "occult" projects, a world of flying disks, cosmic telepathy, teleportation, out-of-body sojurns and communication with house plants. The "psychic spying" unit, Dames intones with pride (ignoring the compulsory secrecy oath?), has provided services to the CIA, NSA, DIA, DEA, Navy and Air Force under the watch of a board chaired by Army General Stan Hyman, one of several paranormal divisions run by the DIA and the Secretary of the Army, code-named Sun Streak, Grill Flame, Center Lane, Scanate and Stargate.[4]

Dames's allies in the military-metaphysical complex included General Albert Stubblebine, the retired director of Army intelligence (INSCOM), and a Psi-Tech co-founder. Another is David Morehouse, Ph.D, an executive officer of the Second Battalion and deputy of the 82nd Airborne Division until 1994, when he resigned. Morehouse is the author of Comes the Watcher: The True Story of a Military Psychic Spy, and Peace Quest: Visions of Future War, a glorification of advanced weapons. He is also the producer of a Hanna-Barbara cartoon series, Peace Force: The Avalon Odyssey, about aliens defending the galaxy with, again, advanced weapons. Morehouse is also a vice president at Paraview, a television production company with headquarters in Manhattan.[5]

Jim Schnabel, in a feature story about Morehouse commissioned but ultimately rejected by Esquire, notes that in the early 1980s the "psychic warrior" was a first lieutenant, [and] served briefly in Panama as the aide de camp to Brigadier General Kenneth Leuer. By 1986, Morehouse was a captain in command of a Ranger company. The following year, "apparently thirsting for a sexier assignment, he joined the Army's Intelligence Support Activity (ISA), a hush-hush unit that specialized in quick-reaction intelligence-gathering, covert action, and counter-terrorist missions." At least this is the account pedelled to the public. The ISA is the most secret unit in the Army, and reports of mind control activity have surfaced in connection with it (there is, for instance, a letter to me from a survivor in Atlanta, who reports that the ISA operatives handled her "more gently" than the CIA in a "Manchurian Candidate"-type mind control assignment. She may be disappointed to learn of the CIA watchers who insisted that the ISA was secretly run by the Agency all along, despite the usual denials to Congressional inquiries).

Morehouse is a graduate of the Army's Command and General Staff College. He moved on in 1992 to Fort Bragg—a base of military mind control operations with a long history of participation in projects that would make the Waffen SS pause (such as the Jeffrey MacDonald case, in which the physician's wife and children were butchered after he threatened to turn in members of a mind control cult engaged in heroin smuggling at Fort Bragg, according to his friends and supporters).

The wife of a subordinate, a driver, accused Morehouse at his dishonorable discharge hearing of aggravated sexual harassment. Schnabel writes that Angela Connor (a pseudonym) complained at the tribunal of Morehouse's "strange behavior." She testified that Morehouse slipped into blood-curdling moods. At the dinner table, "he liked to cut her food for her, and 'sometimes asked if he could feed me.'" On a few occasions, he bragged that he could kill her. Once during sex: "He was squeezing my neck with my jugular vein or something and I asked him, 'What are you doing.' He said, 'Oh, I was just rying to find your jugular vein. How does that feel? Do you know how easy it would be for me to kill you right now' " He was acting very strange that night and was kind of quiet, too. He kept looking around. I asked him, I said, 'What are you looking for? Why do you keep looking around?" He said, 'I'm looking for a good area, a good set of woods, so I can take you out and tie you up to a tree and murder you.'" A few minutes later, he "started laughing."

Schnabel tracked down witnesses to the sources of claims made in Psychic Warrior and found the book to be heavily "fictionalized":

> The book begins with Morehouse, guided by another remote viewer ... psychically visiting a friend who died in a helicopter crash. The anecdote, along with its description of remote viewing as a kind of vivid virtual reality game, is fictional, but it contains a grain of truth: A similar helicopter crash was targeted by Fort Meade remote viewers in the late 1970s. Morehouse presumably heard about the story and decided to make it his own....

> To tag every piece of fiction in the Morehouse book would mean commenting on virtually every page. Indeed, both Mel Riley and Lyn Buchanan remember Morehouse telling them that they were not to worry, the whole thing was going to be a novel anyway. Or perhaps, as Ed Dames says, a screenplay, for there is lengthy screenplayish dialogue throughout, and the entire thing seems calculated to push all the New Age and X-Files conspiracy buttons in the Hollywood version of reality, from the repeated appearance of an angel to the cynical falsehood that the DIA was using remote viewers to monitor US troops' chemical weapons exposure in the Gulf War...
> As I sifted back and forth through all this garbage the other day, with a borrowed copy of Psychic Warrior, the final thing to catch my eye was Morehouse's dedication: "To my darling wife Debbie, whose love has nourished and sustained me for longer than I can remember. We are together eternally." I have no doubt that Americans will buy that, in droves, not only at bookstores but in cinemas. Word on the street is that Sylvester Stallone wants to do the movie. People are talking about a budget of $70 million. I can already see Stallone's head trembling with paranormal effort as he tries to psychically scramble the mind of Saddam Hussein or some unlucky cocaine cartel boss. Perhaps blood will run from Stallone's nose, or his ears. And the audience will gape up at the screen, feeding themselves with popcorn, and somewhere Morehouse will be laughing, all the way to the bank.

Morehouse claims he was drafted as a "psychic spy" after he took a bullet in the head: "The son and grandson of military officers, Morehouse had been a straight-up-and-down soldier on a fast-track career in the elite infantry and had reached the rank of captain when he was hit by a stray bullet during a hush-hush training mission in Jordan. His Rangers helmet saved his life: he was knocked out cold, but the bullet did not enter his skull."

> We are to believe that the injury endowed Morehouse with profound mental capabilities: "He came to, shook his head and carried on with the mock attack. By evening he had a headache. Later that night he awoke to a vision of dark souls wandering through the rocks, and spoke to an angel. He has been plagued with nightmares and spontaneous 'visions' ever since. His soldier's reaction was to tell nobody. He would scream and thrash about on his bed and would wake up on the lawn panting from fights with strange, demonic creatures. It was only after he was posted to a DIA unit dealing with dirty-trick spying that he let slip his torment to its psychiatrist. The psychiatrist seemed more intrigued than alarmed, and within weeks Morehouse found himself recruited to the ranks of the psychic spies."

I Rode a Flying Saucer

> I get these messages from other planets. I'm apparently some kind of agent from another planet, but I haven't got my orders clearly decoded yet.
> William S. Burroughs

In Psychic Warrior there is discussion of the accident, but Schnabel learned that this story, too, is a fantasy. "Morehouse told colleagues about the incident," he found, "but mentioned that it had only given him a headache afterwards. In Psychic Warrior, the incident has been transformed into a turning point in Morehouse's life. The trauma from the bullet, we are now told, destabilized his brain and caused him to have a variety of psychic and transcendental experiences, including meetings with an angel."

The occult is a recurring theme in this milieu. "They have no idea what they're dealing with," complains Rod Lewis, a spokesman for the American Federation of Scientists. "Of course, the immediate speculation is that they're dealing with the demonic realm." Demonic? "It's a Greek word for 'disembodied intelligence.' Apparently it's something they take very seriously."

But the spirit realm takes a back seat to the technological marvels of the military-intelligence core of virtual government.

One corporation took part in coordination with the CIA, Scientific Applications International Corporation (SAIC), with corporate headquarters in San Diego. SAIC is directed by some of the highest ranking oligarchs of the DoD and intelligence groups: former NSA Director Bobby Ray Inman, former CIA director John Deutch, William Perry, Clinton's secretary of defense from ESL, Inc. (the corporate co-owner of Area 51), Melvin Laird, defense secretary under Nixon, and Donald Kerr, former director of Los Alamos National Laboratory. These men have in common a maudlin interest in advanced technology with military applications, not ESP.

The CIA "covets" remote viewing as a source of intelligence, Dames boasts.[6] In real life, the Agency covets his metaphysical cover stories, schizoid tall tales that direct attention from blatant human rights violations. The Taos Hum, he confides, is a 17 hz. "time beacon" that pumps pulses of gravity into space, an invisible lighthouse for time-travelling ETs. Psi-Tech's remote viewers, he says, have located and drawn diagrams of the "alien beacon" of Taos (and all along residents thought it was a classified electromagnetic device attuned to the brain's auditory frequencies). Mars is "super-important"—Psi-Tech's telepaths have supposedly discovered a breed of "alien" from Mars, ferried to earth by wayfarers from a remote civilization known as "The Federation." The time-travelling aliens store their mind control gear in "parking garages" on the moon's surface. Since Psi-Tech has "confirmed" that Bug-Eyes are abducting human beings, out goes the thesis that human scientists are conducting illicit biological experiments and dropping off the subjects with hypnotic/virtual-reality enhanced memories of "aliens" ...

Not to mention mental communication with "aliens" and—many abductees and mind control subjects, even ritual abuse survivors, report it—an awakened "remote viewing" ability. Are they "psychic?" Are "aliens," CIA researchers and cultists somehow stimulating the brain's "third eye?"

They are if the technology makes it possible. The mind control fraternity has had devices that broadcast images to the brain for some time, and the linkage of pulsed EM signals with digital "remote viewing" equipment produces this common symptom of "alien" abduction.

Basic components are current in emergent military technology. In England, the Army and RAF are working on a surveillance rig, mentioned briefly in the Daily Telegraph on October 9, 1996, that can peer far beyond enemy lines. The surveillance device "uses advances in digital imaging to provide standard and infrared images of the battlefield. It is capable of providing clear pictures from 20 miles and should replace reconnaissance cameras that use film"—and military technology in its class is primitive in comparison with classified exotica. "Remote viewing" devices exist that would make a true "psychic" queasy.

"Oscillatori Telegrafica"

Almost halfway through the Decade of the Brain, an interdisciplinary team of neurobiologists, computer scientists, physicists, and electronics engineers has devised an electronic version of the hippocampus—the brain's center for memory and learning. The research group, led by Theodore Berger, a professor of biomedical engineering at the University of Southern California, first created a computer program whose behavior is identical to the intricate neuronal firings of a rabbit's dentate gyrus, a region of the hippocampus. Next, they hardwired the program into a computer chip.

In principle, we have the ability to create an artificial hippocampus, one that might actually function in a living animal or replace a hippocampus damaged by trauma or disease in a human," explains Berger. Now, using neuron cell cultures, the team is working on ways to connect the electronics to living tissue.

—N. Sankaran, The Scientist, June 27, 1994

The paranormal fantasies spun by Dames, a veteran of the CIA's UFO "Working Group," could be interpreted as a blind for illegal mind control experimentation and the harassment of subjects or anyone falling into disfavor with the intelligence community. In fact, the deep history of Psi-Tech is a story of a much larger movement, one that thrives on the spread of religious programming, "alien" invasions and other forms of irrational belief. The surface of the underground movement swarms with seemingly delusional quasi-mystical savants. Beneath, a hidden world of terror—with origins in the waste of warstruck Europe and the beating hearts of some of Nazi Germany's most ruthless military scientists. From these cold chambers exploded many of the mysteries that have since riddled the postwar world.

One sector of the virtual government, the mind control and biocybernetics group, was born in academia. The goal of the research: to gain "control of an individual to the point where he will do our bidding against his will and even against such fundamental laws of human nature as self-preservation."[7]

The Agency's scientific contracts were first handed around by Barnaby Keeney, president of Brown University. In 1951, Keeney took a sabbatical to design a CIA trainee program and a system of fronts to finance covert operations. In 1962 he was named chairman of the Human Ecology Fund, the financial hub of MK-ULTRA.[8]

From "The Modern Era," a chronology of Brown University presidents issued by the school's public relations department:

> Brown President Barnaby C. Keeney was [an] "insider": He had joined the faculty in 1946 as assistant professor of medieval history, then became dean of the Graduate School in 1949 and dean of the College in 1953. But Keeney, a much-decorated combat veteran, [was] blunt and outspoken, and ... ambitious for Brown....
> President Barnaby Keeney got the equivalent of a standing ovation at his last Commencement exercises in 1966. The success of the building campaign was a testament to Keeney's skills as a fund-raiser (Wriston said that his "gift for charm> ing money from flint-like men of substance ... is awe-inspiring") and to Brown's stature, which made it easier to attract large gifts. Citing its potential to "become one of the most important university centers in the country," the Ford Foundation twice honored Brown with major grants during the Keeney years, the first for $7.5 million and the second for $5 million.... Not all the money went into buildings, of course.... Plans for a medical school began to be discussed, and a six-year program leading to a Master of Medical Science degree was established in 1963. He went on to head the newly established National Endowment for the Humanities....

In Black Issues in Higher Education (January 11, 1996), former presidential contender Julian Bond discussed Keeney's role in defusing the civil rights movement—in concert with a covert state agency known as the Sovereignty Commission, a coalition of spies that kept files on thousands of civil rights activists—sweeping through Tougaloo College in Mississippi, an African-American academic sanctuary, in the mid-1960s:

> Tougaloo was a movement center ... a safe haven that housed an interracial faculty.... Brown and Tougaloo had a cooperative arrangement which proved profitable for the small Mississippi school, securing support from Northern philanthropists. But Brown could not tolerate Tougaloo's involvement in the civil rights movement. Brown's president, Barnaby Keeney, managed to arrange the firing of Tougaloo President Daniel Beittel, who had encouraged students to take an interest in the world beyond their campus. Keeney also ended Tougaloo's association with a movement-inspired literacy project and its involvement in Mississippi's anti-poverty agency, which had long been a thorn in the side of the state's congressional delegation and local white leadership. The Brown president was also on the Central Intelligence Agency payroll, [and] the CIA connection is illustrative of the tangled web of government/academic/philanthropic connections and the Black struggle which remain largely unexplored today.

The newly-christened mind control initiative tended to attract academics of Keeney's caliber (and bigoted sensibilities, a reminder that one of four Nazi doctors participating in terminal experiments in the concentration camps hailed from leading universities).

The prospects for electronic control of the brain were explored in the laboratory sixty years ago, according to Popular Electronics (July, 1973), with the invention of a crude "brain-wave detector." In the 1930s, Professor F.

Cazzamalli published a series of papers on "radiations from the mind." Dr. Cazzamalli situated his subjects in a shielded room and shot VHF radio waves through their heads. He claimed to have picked up 'beat frequencies' using an untuned receiver equipped with a diode tube, a fixed capacitor, an antennae and a sensitive light-beam galvanometer: "He told an astounded world that his subjects would hallucinate when under the influence of his 'oscillatori telegrafica.'"

Tom Jaski, a highly-respected engineer of the 1930s, duplicated Dr. Cazzamalli's experiment with a low-power oscillator sweeping at 300–600 MHz: "His subjects could not see the dial. They were told to sound off as soon as they felt something unusual. At a certain frequency range—varying between 380MHz to 500 MHz—the subjects repeatedly indicated points with exact accuracy in as many as 14 out of 15 trials. At these 'individual' frequencies, the same subjects announced having experienced pulsing sensations in the brain, ringing in the ears and an odd desire to bite the experimenters."

Forty years later, the Department of the Army sanctioned the torture of civilians in a 1972 report entitled Controlled Offensive Behavior—U.S.S.R., a review of Russian scientific literature based upon 500 studies on the biological effects of "Super-high frequency electromagnetic oscillations": "SHF may be used as a technique for altering human behavior. Lethal and non-lethal effects have been shown to exist. In certain non-lethal exposures, definite behavioral changes have occurred. There also appears to be a change in mammals when exposed to SHF in sensitivity to sound, light and olfactory stimuli."

The purpose of invasive electromagnetic brain experimentation, according to the report—which seems on hindsight to have cleared the way for experiments on unconsenting subjects—was perceived by the Pentagon as the creation of "one or more of several possible [mental] states in the conscious or unconscious areas of the brain. The ultimate goal of controlled offensive behavior might well be the total submission of one's will to some outside force."

Two years later, Michael Shapiro, a professor of law at the University of Southern California, reported in the Southern California Law Review: "Psychotropic drugs, electrical stimulation of the brain (ESB) by electrodes, psychosurgery and organic conditioning techniques are now available for use by the state in controlling criminal, sick or otherwise aberrant or unwanted behavior."[9]

One 1982 Air Force study mustered then current data on bio-technology and EMR brain experimentation, predicting that "specially generated radiofrequency radiation (RFR) fields may pose powerful and revolutionary military threats. Electroshock therapy indicates the ability of induced electric current to completely interrupt mental functioning for short periods of time ... and to restructure emotional response."

Air Force officials warmed to the idea that "a rapidly scanning RFR system could provide an effective stun or kill capability over a large area," and cooed that low-level radio frequencies could be used to "sensitize large military groups to extremely dispersed amounts of biological or chemical agents to which the unradiated population would be immune."

The mind control syndicate has long been fascinated with the effects of extremely low frequencies (ELF) on human biology. Jack Anderson's column for July 31, 1986 notes: "For years, ELF research suffered under the cloud of 'parapsychology,' into which it was lumped with such cockamamie concepts as time-warp machines and intercontinental mind-reading. Unfortunately for the human race, there's nothing silly about the potential effects of very low-level electromagnetic radiation on the nervous system."

Most studies of mind control focus on experiments conducted 20–40 years ago—as if the CIA abandoned mind machines because a few loose secrets tumbled out in Congressional testimony. The clandestine operations branches are, in fact, very interested in EM brain manipulation. A 30-year lag yawns between declassified projects and the most advanced technology known to the American proletariat.

Contemporary military cybernetics dwarfs Orwell's most totalistic techno-fantasies.

Suddenly, as though machined from thin air, "dual-use" spin-offs from the mind control lab appear in the hands of law enforcement. One such device is the Passive Millimeter Wave Imager, an instrument with a range of 90 feet that can peer into clothing to find a concealed weapon or contraband. Two models of the Imager, a creation of the Millimetrix Corporation of Massachusetts, are under development. The large model, roughly the size of a shoebox, is mounted on a patrol car and pointed at an unsuspecting target. The gadget does not use X-rays; it collects electromagnetic waves emitted by human flesh. Anything that blocks the EM radiation—a pistol or knife—or emits an attenuated signal—a bag of cocaine or plastic explosive—is highlighted on a small screen in the patrol car. Walls do not block the signal.

Headlines like this one from the AP newswire on October 2, 1996 are increasingly common: "The Department of Health and Human Services awarded $1.9 million to the University of Pennsylvania this week to begin clinical trials of imaging processes developed to spot missiles. The federally funded trials will analyze at least 2,000 breast cancer cases, comparing standard mammograms to the digitally-enhanced pictures produced by the new technology."

Readers of Physical Science Letters for August 21, 1995 were treated to the latest plan for "a silicon implant with a lot of nerve," concerning the work of Drs. Peter Fromherz and Alfred Stett at the Max Planck Institute of Biochemistry in Munich, Germany. Fromhertz and Stett have developed a silicon chip that directly stimulates a single nerve cell without damaging it. By propagating a voltage pulse from.a tiny spot on the cell membrane, a neuronal impulse can be triggered. Information flow in the opposite direction, from cell to chip, is accomplished using "neuron transistors" which pick up nerve impulses and transform them to electrical impulses on a silicon chip.

Victims of quasi-military EM experimentation report the transmission of crystal clear images and auditory effects.

From the Pentagon's classified psycho-technological arsenal came a "soft kill solution" promoted by Paul Evancoe, formerly deputy director of the State Department's counterterrorism division. The Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists reported in March, 1994 that Evancoe is eager to put non-lethals in the hands of SWAT teams and local police departments, although he warns their use could create legal complications: "Several 'disabling technologies' employ high-intensity strobe lights that flash at or near human brain-wave frequency, causing disorientation and nausea." Bystanders, of course, are not immune from the effects of the strobe.

The Yerkes Primate Center at Emory University has long been a busy hive for CIA mind control activity. In its heyday, the center was run by Dr. Geoffrey Bourne.

Bourne's family pedigree, from the notes of late political researcher Mae Brussell: "Trained at Oxford. Long career in intelligence related activities. Peter [his son] spent two years in Vietnam profiling U.S. special forces under stress, then set up counseling programs for turning veterans into Manchurian Candidate-type assassins á la John Hinckley. (Califano, partner of E.B. [Edward Bennett] Williams, Hinckley atty. [twice offered the position of CIA director; the mentor of Michael Tigar, an attorney in the Oklahoma City bombing case].)"

Dr. Peter G. Bourne, his son, was brought into the center by his father. Peter was a "special adviser on drug abuse" to the presidential administrations of Nixon, Ford and Carter. Dr. Bourne was forced to resign the office in 1979 when he was caught prescribing Quaalude prescriptions for Carter's staffers.

The timeline resumes: "Bourne met Carter, 1969: Carter, conservative, running for governor. Bourne directed mental health center in Atlanta ghetto. 1971: Asked Carter if he would 'run for president.' ... Bourne goes to Washington to work for Nixon on 'drug abuse' (Rebozo, Hunt, Liddy, Vegas, Sindona, Marcinkus, Nixon, Italian mob). Mary King Bourne, $50,000 for ACTION, a director of Peace Corps. 1977: George Bush CIA director. Grenada, Medical school. 1978: Rep. Leo Ryan went to Guyana.... April, Prime Minister Bishop, elected in Grenada. London Attorney. CIA death plot on Bishop. Geoffrey Bourne, his father: Vice-chancellor, previously primatologist, expert on apes. Studying effects of drugs, sensory deprivation, behavioral modification on apes, surrogates for human beings. Bourne retained his affiliation to Yerkes Division of Pathology and Immunology even after he transferred to St. George's. Bourne views the black population of Caribbean as animals, equivalent to the apes he studied."

In 1978, Peter Bourne was accused by liberal activists in New York with the mystery murder of a physician-activist at the Lincoln Hospital drug detoxification program. The doctor had opposed Nelson Rockefeller's methadone maintenance proposals. Bourne was the last person to see the doctor alive, yet his possible involvement was never investigated. In 1977, Peter Bourne provided debriefing reports to the CIA after a trip to Southeast Asia and Pakistan. Details of the story appeared in the Chicago Sun-Times on July 23, 1978.

Peter Bourne ran the psychiatry division at the Grenada medical school at the time of the invasion—as it happens, the hospital was the only building on the island that was bombed (to destroy evidence of mind control experimentation?). Dr. Bourne advised the State Department and CIA at the time. He and Eric Gairy (voodoo practitioner, UFO watcher and petty despot) were close chums.

Press reports of the October, 1983 incursion were heavily censored. The American Air Force killed many of the inmates of the Grenada mental hospital. "It's hard to believe the bombing was accidental, given the technical sophistication of present day military targeting," writes Lenny Lapon, an independent reporter on psychiatric abuses, in Mass Killers in White Coats: "The Reagan government then sought $40 million in aid to Grenada—$360 per inhabitant—to rebuild the psychiatric institution. By comparison, the gross national product, counting the value of all goods and services produced in that tiny island country, was only $100 million in 1981, or $850 per person. Was the Grenada 'hospital' the scene of another Jonestown-style mind control experiment?"

Right-wing criminologists Barton Ingraham and Gerald Smith drew a timeline of their own: "The technique employed in electrophysiology in studying the brain of animals and man by stimulating its different areas electrically is nothing new.... [The technique has advanced] during the last twenty years ... as a result of equipment which allows the implantation of electrodes deep in the subcortical regions of the brain and the brain stem by stereotaxic instruments."[10]

The development of implants that interact with the brain and body was already underway in the academic haunts of the microwave mafia by the mid 60s. The Guiness world record for the most implants may go to Terry P., a subject in Toronto, Ontario left permanently disabled by dozens of foreign objects packed into his 42-year-old body. Terry, in a letter to Stone Angels, a Canadian network of mind control survivors, recalls forced psychosurgical vicimization at the age of fourteen:

> The pathology report reveals brain tissue removal. My mother was not informed of this. She was advised prior to the surgery that by 'removing scar tissue' they would lessen seizure disorder. In short, psychiatric brain mutilation was carried out under the guise of treating epilepsy. What I find confusing is the X-rays from Toronto General Hospital and St. Michael's Hospital, which reveal 43 metallic implants. Toronto Epilepsy Association states to my girlfriend that they can find no literature where metallic implants are used in surgical procedure [for] epilepsy.

The Kugelblitz Conundrum

It should be evident by now that those who deny that the spacecraft and space people are in our skies are agents of the Anti-Christ.

—George W. Van Tassel

The phenomenon reported is something real and not visionary or fictitious. There are objects approximating the shape of a disc, of such appreciable size as to appear as large as a man-made aircraft.

—Lt General Nathan Twining, Preliminary Report to USAF Commander, Air Materiél Command, Sept 23, 1947

The winged airfoil is not the only aerodynamic design in aviation history. An unpolled number of witnesses have observed flying disks performing wingless acrobatics, but they have not come bolting across time and space to torture humanity with genetic, biological and mind control experiments. The Federation has not arrived bearing brain implants. They are not "alien" in origin.

In 1917, a Dr. Nipher reported that the weight of a substance could be lightened by loading it with a powerful electrostatic charge.[11] One theory advanced by UFOlogists holds that the disks float on this principle—DoD documentation, however, only goes so far as to confirm positively that the EM propulsion has been an interest of the military since WWII.

Twenty years ago, Dr. Mason Rose of the University for Social Research published a monograph on the experiments of Dr. Paul Biefeld, a physicist at the California Institute for Advanced Studies in Pasadena, and his assistant, Thomas Townsend Brown. In 1923, Biefeld found that a high-voltage condensor is drawn to the positive pole when suspended in a gravitational field. The results of the Biefeld study were assigned to Brown, and a series of experiments led him to conclude that the field-propelled condensor opertated best when balanced in a disk-shaped housing. Three years after Biefeld's discovery, Brown published a paper detailing the design characteristics of his flying saucer.[12]

In 1930, he joined the Naval Research Laboratory and served as an officer in the Reserves, rising to Lt. Commander. Ten years later, he was hired as a radar consultant in the advanced design section at Lockheed. Yet he was unable to scare up funding to develop the electrostatic disk drive until 1952, after the Naval Research Labs conducted an exhaustive study of the propulsion system. Brown filed a report in 1956 on the USAF's Project Winterhaven, a joint undertaking of the Air Force and British military establishments to develop the Mach-3 Combat Disk, an aircraft with the classic design characteristics of a UFO.[13] At roughly the same time, he founded the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena (NICAP). His classified experiments continued into the 1970s at the Stanford Research Institute (SRI) (simultaneously the site of "remote viewing" experiments funded by the CIA, and as will become evident, the core of much of the chaos to come), in concert with the University of California at Berkeley and NASA's Ames Research Center.

Since the Biefeld-Brown experiments, the principle of electrogravitic propulsion has haunted the margins of establishment science. Townsend Brown fiddled with it until his death by lung cancer in 1985. Albert Einstein grappled with it.[14] Science fiction writers extrapolated its utilization in a multitude of bizarre forms. Theoretical possibilities gave rise to complex models for quantum EM wormholes, multi-dimensional gravity waves, space-time cross-currents, and some sought to wring from it a demonstration of Einstein's unified field.[15]

As late as 1990, SAIC, the corporate "remote viewing" folk, tinkered with electrogravitic propulsion for space travel on an Air Force contract.[16] A second study was conducted the following year at Phillips Laboratories in New Mexico, also for the Air Force, by Veritay Technology, Inc. entitled "Twenty-First Century Propulsion Concepts."[17]

Nazi scientists built similar electrostatic devices into German military prototypes. It is probably not the sole form of propulsion used in modern disks, but it was, at the very least, built into the Combat-13 and may still be an experimental engineering feature of the ubiquitous airborne vehicles.

Among the most avid American popularizers of Brown's theoretical work is Elizabeth Rauscher, a nuclear scientist and director of the Technic Research Lab in San Leandro, California. Dr. Rauscher is also champion of ELF for military applications. She has experimented with frequencies that induce nausea and play on the emotions. "Give me the money and three months," she boasts, "and I'll be able to affect the behavior of 80 per cent of the people in this town without their knowing it, make them happy (or at least they'll think they're happy) or aggressive."[18]

Rauscher appeared recently at a conference on Brown's theories with Harold Puthoff, formerly of the NSA and SRI, a parapsychologist and one of the principal hoaxers behind the promotion of Uri Geller. The ESP experiments at SRI were Puthoff's brainchild, and he pursued his quasi-academic interests with research partner Russell Targ. Both scientists engage in the R&D of advanced technology, while publicly engaged in zany forays on the paranormal. Like most of the merry pranksters of mind control, the SRI experimenters are not the addled occultists they appear. Puthoff designed a tunable laser. Targ is the inventor of a microwave-frequency plasma oscillator and an official of the International Association for Psychotronic Research.[19] As it happens, psychotronic devices that communicate directly with the brain are the hidden thrust of the current mind control program. Many survivors of the experimentation come to realize that psi and out-of-body experiences, like "alien" abductions, are hypnotic cover stories. Subjects are used against their will. They are often tortured in their own homes with advanced non-lethals of the type developed by the CIA's mind control crew.

In The Search for Superman, John Wilhelm mentions that Puthoff's psychics were funded by the Naval Electronics Systems Command in San Diego. These days, electronics are the beating heart of mind control because CIA scientists discovered years ago that any breakthroughs they may have enjoyed with hypnosis and drugs they could more easily and dependably reproduce with remote brain technology—and since the subject never lays eyes his tormentors, they need not fear exposure. EM stimulation of the brain and nervous system to control or punish a human guinea-pig is the perfect crime.

It is fitting that General Hans Kammler, the same Nazi who designed the Auschwitz concentration camp, should also have overseen the development of the "foo-fighter"—the predecessor of the flying disk and, later, a preferred kidnap and escape vehicle of the American mind control underground. The infamous Nazi compound and the disk have one thing in common: they are both used to conduct illicit medical experimentation.

Kammler, a protégé of Heinrich Himmler, was the highest ranking officer in Nazi Germany after the ministers in Hitler's cabinet, and he held more authority than any of them. "If Kammler had lived in ancient Egypt," British correspondent Tom Agoston wrote, "snobbish pharoahs, anxious to outshine previous dynasties, would undoubtedly have turned to him to build their pyramids."[20]

Kammler caught the eye of Hitler by pulling off construction projects considered impossible by many ranking Nazi engineers. Auschwitz, a state-of-the-art genocide machine, was his creation. A diplomat stationed in Berlin, shortly before the United States entered the war, described Hans Kammler as "always unpredictable. I have seen him soothe and tame a nervous unruly horse, using a magically gentle touch, and then minutes later order a negligent groom to be brutally horsewhipped."[21] The General was in command of the V-rocket campaign that terrorized London in 1944. He had the run of Germany's entire rocket program, the forerunner of NASA, and constructed the first bomb-proof underground aircraft factory in the world. One of them was the Nordhausen plant in the Harz mountains, a slave labor shop that turned out flying bombs, rockets and Messerschmitt motors.

Albert Speer distrusted and envied the man who built Auschwitz: "Himmler heaped assignments on him and brought him into Hitler's presence at every opportunity. Rumors were afloat that Himmler was trying to build up Kammler to be my successor. I had found Kammler absolutely brilliant, yet cold, a ruthless schemer, a fanatic in pursuit of his goal, as carefully calculating as he was unscrupulous."[22]

When the Reich was pummeled into defeat, Speer, technically the director of all new weapons development, watched the Nazi dream crumble. But work progressed in an underground factory deep within the Thuringian Forest.[23] It is well known that in the final months of WWII, Hitler promised his embattled troops that advanced weapons were on the way to turn the war around. To the Allies the boast seemed a last-ditch propaganda strategy. But the U.S. developed the A-Bomb in short order, and the scientists under Albert Speer were caught out at war's end with much more than a recipe for Buna rubber.

On January 2, 1945, the New York Herald Tribune blared: "Now, it seems, the Nazis have thrown something new into the night skies over Germany. It is the weird, mysterious 'Foo Fighter' balls which race alongside the wings of Beaufighters flying intruder missions over Germany. Pilots have been encountering this eerie weapon for more than a month in their night flights."

Most of the records of Nazi military science, advancements in nuclear, aeronautic and electronic warfare were removed to the Bavarian Alps or trashed. But intelligence reports describing a "circular German fighter without wings or rudder" survived, as did records of unusual test flights. One witness to carnage in the sky over Switzerland described "a strange flying machine, hemispherical or at any rate circular in shape." The machine overtook a formation of American airplanes, and "when it passed in front of the formation, it gave off a number of little bluish. clouds of smoke. A moment later the American bombers mysteriously caught fire, exploding in the air, while the German 'rocket' had already disappeared over the horizon."[24]

Renato Vesco, the foremost aerospace engineer in Italy in the 1960s, traced the history of the Nazi flirtation with the flying disk to the U.S.. Albert Speer and the SS Technical General Staff, Vesco learned, had equipped the disks with a "proximate radio interference" capability—the most widely-reported electronic effect in postwar domestic UFO abductions—to disable the sensitive electronics of American night fighters: "Thus a highly original flying machine was born. It was circular and armored, more or less flat and circular, whose principles of operation recalled the well-known aelipile of Hero, which generated a great halo of luminous flames." The "fireballs" reported by Allied pilots over Germany were illuminated by "chemical additives that interrupted the flow of electricity by overionizing the atmosphere in the vicinity of the plane, generally around the wing tips or tail surfaces, subjected the H2S radar on the plane to the action of powerful electrostatic fields."[25]

The unmanned experimental disks were guided by remote television controls designed by Telefunken, in coordination with the German Institute for High Frequency Studies and Blaupunkt. The micro-television camera fitted by Kammler's technicians to the nose of anti-aircraft rockets was installed on the experimental prototype, which had but to fly within a hundred yards of an Allied bomber to knock out the ignition with a powerful electrostatic surge and send it spinning to earth.

The technology dropped into American hands with the Nazi surrender.

In the Pentagon, Assistant Secretary of War John J. McCloy, formerly a Wall Street attorney, used his authority to intervene in the executions of convicted Nazi war criminals. McCloy arranged to have Klaus Barbie sheltered from prosecution by the 970th Counter-Intelligence Corps at Oberamergau. His interest in the Nazis was obvious: McCloy represented Standard Oil and Chase Manhattan, both high-handed investors in Nazi Germany. Before the war, McCloy had been a legal adviser to I.G. Farben, the German chemical conglomerate that financially hoisted many in the Hitler regime to power and prospered by Jewish slave labor at Auschwitz and elsehwere.[26]

After the fall of Berlin, the Allies launched "Operation Lusty" to gather scientific papers, blueprints and experimental models hidden away in abandoned mines, ancient castles, caves and vaults buried throughout occupied Europe. The confiscation of German scientific files and prototypes was the chore of Allied "T-Forces," OSS and military operatives assisted by "Paperclip" personnel, playing escort to the Nazi thirst for bloodshed. In his review of Nazi technology, Colonel Donald Putt, assistant commanding officer of the Allied Technical Information Service (soon to serve in Operation Paperclip with a promotion to Lt. General), stated in July 1946 that fleeing German scientists had left behind, at Peenemünde, Wiener Neustadt (home of the famed Nazi Foo Fighters) and elsewhere, prototypical marvels of future air warfare.[27]

After the occupation, Colonel Putt toured the once-bustling R&D complex at Volkenrode. Kamikazé journalist Tom Bower reported in 1987 that Putt was "amazed." Strolling though the Nazi laboratories, the colonel "realized he was in the midst of [the] most magnificent and lavish research facility ever constructed. The sheer abundance and extravagance of the instruments, subsidiary tools and testing equipment were awe-inspiring."

Theodore von Karmen, an American scientific adviser to the Air Force, was also struck by the show of German technical superiority. He was one of a small circle of military officials who, Bower reports, "forged the wartime marriage between the military and the scientists."[28] Von Karmen found employment after the war at Cal Tech, where he worked closely with Jack Parsons, the head of the Agape Lodge of the Ordo Templis Orientis (OTO), the occult lodge in Pasadena.[29]

A publicity release from Kelly Air Force Base touts Karman and Putt as originators of "a program to bring hundreds of Germany's best scientists and technicians to the United States."

Colonel Putt was a founder of the Air Force Scientific and Technical Intelligence Division. He was the deputy commanding general for intelligence in the Air Technical Service after the war. In 1995, the colonel was inducted into the Air Intelligence Agency's "Hall of Honor."[30]

Many were briefed on aspects of the Nazi migration, but two men knew all. The debriefing of Kammler and Speer took place in a pocket of history sealed and stricken from the record by the Pentagon. The fumigators converged on the moment. There survives no record that officials of the U.S. mission ever spoke to Herr Kammler—the man who built Auschwitz and Nordhousen—or even sought him out: an impossible oversight. Four entirely different accounts have been given of his disappearance on April 17, 1945.

Transcripts of the interrogation of Albert Speer by Allied officials are stored at the British Public Record Office. Their release has been denied until the year 2020, an exception to the standard 30-year rule.[31] A microfilm copy of the interrogation of Albert Speer is filed at the U.S. National Archives. Speer stubbornly denied knowledge of the Holocaust at Nuremberg, and Hollywood has depicted him as a blushing innocent, but a number of scholars have rejected his disavowals, including Matthias Schmidt in Albert Speer: The End of a Myth (1984), and Gitta Sereny in Albert Speer: His Battle with Truth (1995). He was denied a position in the postwar West German government because he was considered too tainted.[32]

Speer's memoirs (which briefly mention the development of flying disks) were best-sellers and made him millions.

Another welcome guest of the government was Dr. Hubertus Strughold, the "Father of American Space Medicine." When details of his past were declassified, the blowback was ferocious. On September 24, 1995, the Jewish Telegraphic Agency reported:

> The sadistic Nazi background of a late German scientist has resulted in plans to remove his name from a U.S. Air Force library. In 1993, soon after the scientist's background was first uncovered, his portrait was removed from a mural of medical heroes at Ohio State University.
> Scientist Hubertus Strughold, who died in 1986, was secretly brought to the United States in 1945 to work on the space program, even though he was sought for prosecution at Nuremberg. The library at the School of Aerospace Medicine at Brooks Air Force Base in Texas had been named to honor Strughold, who helped develop the pressure suits used by astronauts as well as the U.S. space capsule.
> As the head of Nazi Germany's Air Force Institute for Aviation Medicine, Strughold participated in a 1942 conference that discussed "experiments" on human beings. The experiments included subjecting Dachau concentration camp inmates to torture and death.
> Strughold had denied approving the experiments and said he learned of them only after World War II.

Among the first of the technical hunters and gatherers was Major Clay Shaw, OSS, a spy under William Donovan who went on to become general manager of New Orlean's International Trade Mart, an import-export concern with a clutch of European war criminals on the board of directors. Shaw was the wartime aide de camp to General Charles Thrasher. After the war he rose to deputy chief of staff at a detainment camp for Nazi POWs. In The Kennedy Conspiracy, Paris Flammonde describes a fateful meeting:

> Von Braun first met Clay Shaw in 1945 when he, Walter Dornberger [a Nazi, soon to become the CEO of Bell Helicopter] and about 150 other Nazi rocket scientists abandoned Peneemünde and traveled south to join the American forces in Germany close to the French border. The Nazis were brought to the Deputy Chief of Staff's headquarters where major Clay Shaw maintained their relationship over the years through their mutual connection with the Defense Industrial Security Command, or D.I.S.C., an operational arm of the counterespionage division of the FBI.

Shaw was arrested and tried for complicity in the murder of John Kennedy, acquitted on March 1, 1969, by a grand jury. When Shaw learned he was a suspect in the Garrison investigation, he immediately phoned Fred Lee Crisman, a veteran of Operation Paperclip and a covert contract "security" specialist for the ranking aerospace firms. In 1947, Shaw's contact supposedly found "metal slag" fragments dropped by a UFO over Maurey Island off Tacoma, Washington.[33] Crisman claimed to have given the fragments to two G-2 officers from Wright-

Patterson Air Force Base (a Paperclip stronghold run by General Twining) who'd witnessed the overflight. A few days later, The G-2 officers perished in a plane crash. The ensuing investigation concluded that the plane had been "sabotaged." Ever the good soldier, Crisman steered speculation over motive to the slag. Anthony Kimery, an investigative reporter in Washington, D.C., believes Crisman "knew a lot more about the aircraft [witnesses] saw than he acknowledged—aircraft some intelligence sources believe were hybrids of those designed early that decade by Nazi engineers who were brought to the U.S. under Project Paperclip."

Secret technology and mind control were themes in several lives close to the 1963 coup. Kerry Wendell Thornley, a Marine buddy of Lee Harvey Oswald, has alleged that while on active duty he was subjected to hellish electronic mind control transmissions. He maintains that a device planted without his knowledge in the base of his neck picked up the baleful "voices" of a "Nazi" covert operations unit toying with his head.

Another technological curiosity on the road to Dallas was the saucer found by Guy Banister, the FBI "counterterrorist" for Division Five who lurked at 544 Camp Street, a fierce anti-Communist alleged in conspiracy lore to have run patsy Lee Harvey Oswald through a self-implicating obstacle course on the periphery of the John Kennedy assassination. In 1947, Banister reported the discovery of a "flying disk" in Twin Falls, Idaho, according to a July 11, 1947, Associated Press report. The saucer measured roughly 30.5′ across, and "appeared to have been turned out by a machine," possibly as a prototype.

Suspects in the John Kennedy assassination had a pronounced knack for stumbling onto the "unexplained" flying disks.

It is a commentary on the UFO/mind control/intelligence connection that the counterterrorist unit of the FBI already tied to Shaw and Crisman, Division Five—the Nazi division—also employed Guy Banister, and has been largely responsible for the development of a form of remote brain manipulation known as Ultrasonic Intra-Cerebral Control.[34]

Enter America's imperial clan, the Rockefellers. Laurance, vetted by the U.S. Naval Reserve, rose to the rank of lieutenant commander during the war, assigned to the Bureau of Aeronautics as liaison between the Navy and aircraft production plants—despite huge financial investments in Hitler's Holocaust machine by family-owned businesses, as documented by George Seldes and Charles Higham—who dreamed of transforming the postwar world with advancements in communications, nuclear power, aviation and computers. The defense industry fostered experimentation with new technologies and they intrigued Laurance, especially those with the potential to significantly transform everyday life.[35]

When Hitler's Germany rolled out the armaments to flatten Europe, young Rockefeller launched into an intense study of military aviation. He joined the Institute of Aeronautical Sciences, was a director of Eastern Airlines and a trustee of Air Affairs, a quarterly international journal. Laurance and his brother Winthrop organized the Air Youth of America, an aviation training program.[36]

Laurance may have been less visible than his brothers, but he was equally steeped in the sordid world of covert intelligence and propaganda. In the 1950s, he served on a panel that released a report written by Henry Kissinger, International Security—The Military Aspect, calling for successive escalations in defense expenditures of $3 billion per anum to 1965. In 1973 he was named a director of Reader's Digest, a fount of CIA cold war black propaganda. (To indulge in a bit of necessary guilt by association, Melvin Laird, a Digest officer, is also a director of SAIC, the "remote viewing" sponsor.) Rockefeller is a trustee of M.I.T., a director of the Alfred P. Sloan Foundation, Olin Mathieson, and so on.[37]

Renato Vesco traced the immediate postwar development of the Nazi disks to the UK. Vesco, the Italian Werner von Braun, plodded through a detailed investigation of the technology transfer in Intercept,. but Don't Shoot, published in 1967. British defense officials, he discovered, hoped to barter advancements in saucer propulsion and design to the United States in exchange for classified nuclear research data. A priority was placed on making the aircraft faster, leading to experimentation with a number of rocket propulsion systems. Wind tunnel tests demonstrated the disks could easily slip through the sound barrier when the friction layer was drawn through a multitude of pinholes punched in the hull. Normally, the layer of air that builds along an aircraft's surface slows it. The air pulling on the craft, otherwise known as the buoyant layer, was eliminated in the saucer design with suction along the entire surface of the vehicle in place of the conventional jet design. The pinholes sucked away the buoyant layer and pumped the air through a jet thruster.

When the war ended, Laurance travelled to Europe, according to Alvin Moscow's martinized Rockefeller biography, "to examine the latest British experiments with jet propulsion for military aircraft. He looked into the technology of the German Rockets used in the blitz of London."[38] Moscow does not mention a visit to the British Air Force saucer section, but if developments were shared with anyone, it was surely Laurance Rockefeller, the wealthiest and most influential military aerospace scion in the world, gratis the spoils of war.

Laurance was a lavish godfather to UFO organizations that attributed saucer overflights and abductions to "alien" activity.

His business associates are familiar names in the security complex. Columbia, Missouri UFOlogist Val Germann writes in Big Money and UFOs:

> In 1947, there was talk of a Congressional investigation of Navy contracts vis-a-vis McDonnell during the period that Laurance was in the Navy. But, that investigation never seemed to get off the ground, no pun intended. Thus Laurance sailed on, later forming a consortium with family friends C. Douglas Dillon and Felix DuPont to make a fortune out of helicopter production during the Korean War. This consortium also owned Nuclear Development Associates, the original power behind civilian nuclear reactors, and a little company called ITEK, which would make the spy cameras for the U-2 and America's spy satellites. The capital for these ventures would come from brother David's Chase Bank, the very center of Rockefeller power.
> In 1950 Laurance hired Lewis Strauss, a former Kuhn, Loeb banker who had been an assistant to Herbert Hoover in World War I, an official in the 1930s of the company that later became UniRoyal, and the lawyer/banker who had helped Kodak market Kodachrome and later aided Dr. Land and his Polaroid. Strauss spent World War Two in the Navy and had been made an Admiral by his good friend James V. Forrestal. Funny how things like this worked out.
> In any event, in 1950 Strauss was overseeing the Rockefeller Brothers Fund and was heavily connected into the high-tech science world. He left Rockefeller employ to become the chairman of the AEC under Eisenhower, just as Laurance put together a company called United Nuclear which had the inside track on the development of civilian atomic power. Also at this time ITEK was created, begun when a Boston University scientist advised his good friend Laurance Rockefeller that Ike's Administration was going to liquidate Boston University's Physics Research Lab. Laurance bought the thing and put his good scientific friend in charge of it. It made millions out of the U-2 and the Discovery satellites, both of which were promoted relentlessly by Rockefeller operatives, including Nelson, inside the administration.
> Later on, Laurance would be a power behind LBJ's administration.

The number of aircraft defense firms swelled with an infusion of funds from Laurance Rockefeller. The most imposing is McDonnell-Douglas, founded in 1930 by a prodigy of aircraft design, James S. McDonnell of St. Louis.[39] McDonnell shares with Laurance Rockefeller the taint of war profiteering. Periodic postwar investigations of his aircraft company by the General

Accounting Office have exposed a deep, chronically over-funded well of fraud.[40] In 1967, the company merged with Douglas Aircraft, the primary subcontractor of Western Electric, an AT&T subsidiary.[41]

However cerebral, James McDonnell had one foot firmly planted in the occult. He was a principal donor to the famed J.B. Rhine psychic research center at Duke University, and supported psychic experimentation at Washington University in St. Louis.[42]

Professor Rhine and his wife Louisa joined the faculty of Duke University in 1927 to explore the paranormal with Dr. William McDougall, chairman of the psychology department. In a few years, according to Parapsychological Institute literature, "Dr. Rhine was conducting the groundbreaking research that demonstrated under rigorous, scientific conditions that certain persons could acquire information without the use of the known senses. He introduced the term extrasensory perception (ESP) to describe this ability and adopted the word parapsychology to distinguish his experimental approach from other methods of psychical research."[43]

Among the key early supporters of the Rhine ESP center was Medtronics, a medical technology firm in Minneapolis. The connection is chilling in the context of forced human experimentation. Bear in mind the horrors of the surgical table described by abductees, encircled by "alien" doctors, when paging through the Medtronics catalog: "The company's neurological business produces implantable systems for spinal cord stimulation and drug delivery.... The Itrel II spinal cord stimulation system is the most advanced and flexible implantable neuro-stimulation device on the market today."

Another financial supporter of the Rhine center was insurance magnate W. Clement Stone, whose name was the very first on Richard Nixon's list of presidential campaign contributors.[44]

The psi theme crops up repeatedly in abductee accounts. Dorothy Burdick, in her self-published study of electronic mind control, Such Things Are Known (1982), observed: "Recently, through TV and the news media, there has been an effort toward making parapsychology respectable.... The CIA has a program of 'disinformation' which may be a convenient cover for scientists working on programs which seem to the uninformed to border on the occult, such as bioplasma research and Kirlian photography."[45]

U.S. News & World Report recently featured a report on John Gittinger, a psychologist on a Human Ecology Fund contract, who admits to knowledge of ESP experiments in which subjects were given electric shocks when they responded to questions incorrectly.

The Agency had been interested in parapsychology well before ARTICHOKE, which grew out of the ESP experiments of the late 40s.[46] "Why," researcher Martin Cannon asks, "are paranormal phenomena always linked in governmental studies with mind control research? Why did the CIA study ESP as part of MK-ULTRA, and not as part of a separate program? Why are these two abilities—to read minds, and to commandeer minds—so closely linked?" [47]

Seymour Hersch, the acclaimed investigative reporter, was the first to expose in the public print classified bioelectromagnetic experimentation. He reported shortly thereafter that he began to receive long letters from subjects alleging to have participated in CIA mind control operations and telepathic links to "aliens."[48]

The paranormal is taken very seriously by many of the cults operating under the aegis of federal intelligence groups. Dr. Corydon Hammond's controversial "Greenbaum Speech" mentions a type of mind control subject called "Thetas," or "psychic killers," though much of his research remains unconfirmed.[49]

One abduction case has been traced by the subject herself directly to CIA operatives crouching behind a thinly-constructed "alien" blind. The woman had several contacts in the intelligence underground. She experienced the first of series of abductions after volunteering at an ESP testing laboratory. The experimenters advised her to join a local UFO organization, as were other test subjects. In the course of her abduction, two of her 'alien' kidnappers made the mistake of speaking to her—in English—and she recognized their voices. They belonged to her acquaintances in the CIA, one of whom had predicted the abduction. She confronted him. He explained that he'd known in advance because he had "ESP."[50]

Another abductee, identifying herself only as C.P., was so tortured by the microwave mafia that she sought asylum at a foreign embassy. Her experience, too, began with academic parapsychology experiments. There was nothing unusual about her life until 1983. C.P. had participated in the teaching of a parapsychology course at a West Berlin community college. Through students, she fell in with a circle of Americans with backgrounds in the intelligence field, among them Peggy Woolsey, former secretary to CIA director Richard Helms. Peggy was garrulous and often dwelt on her life in Iran.

One evening, at Peggy's apartment, C.P. noticed at least an inch of sediment at the bottom of her drink. Peggy explained it away as the residual sludge of "Berlin Water." On another occasion, Peggy took her along on a junket to East Berlin in a car with diplomatic plates. C.P. had crossed the border in the past to only to attend the opera and theater, or purchase books:

> I had the impression that something strange was transpiring. It was during this time that I was, on three occasions, at three different locations, talked to during my sleep by people I was acquainted with. On these occasions I had awakened abruptly during my sleep and became aware of what was transpiring. I went to the U.S. consulate and named names.
> After this I was harassed by a man in a white car who would drive by my apartment and when in close proximity, would zap me with an electrical field of some sort. He was very brazen. I would find my body pulsating during my sleep especially at the base of my spine, but my whole body would vibrate as well and I would see flashing lights on my wall. I had to go to the U.S. Consulate several times and they expressed disbelief in what I was saying, rudely stating: "Who would be interested in you—you have no important political or military contacts."
> Ultimately I decided to return to the U.S., and I had no idea what would be in store for me. I returned to a living hell and unbelievable torture, abuse and experimentation.
> In retrospect, the only conclusion that makes reasonable sense is that I must have exposed a CIA operation. I was then classified as a "write-off" or expendable as a human being. By some unfortunate decision I was designated for a constant monitoring, inhuman method of electronic incarceration utilizing intracerebral microwave induction of voices. This is one of several sadistic approaches they have used to destroy my life. So for 13 years now I have never known one moment of privacy or peace. My entire life has been stolen from me. My apartment serves them as the cage of a guinea pig. [51]

Kathleen S., an abductee in Atlanta, Georgia, described in personal correspondence the interplay of the politics and mind control in the Gingrich State:

"Several years ago, on an Atlanta talk radio station, I heard a very disturbing campaign advertisement. It promoted a candidate for the House of Representatives named Bob Barr. He was touted as the best candidate, since he already had experience in the government as an employee of the CIA. I did several double-takes. Did I hear correctly? Yes, he blatantly admitted, as if that made him more qualified to be a Georgia representative in D.C. The man won.

"Worse yet, he won AGAIN!"

"I saw the blurb about his background, etc. in the Chattanooga Times (November 6, 1996)":

> U.S. HOUSE DISTRICT SEVEN
> Counties: Bartow, Carroll, Chattooga, Cobb, Douglas, Floyd, Haralson, Heard, Paulding, Polk, Troup
> BOB BARR
> Hometown: Marietta
> Career: Barr is a lawyer and CIA analyst.
> Previous political involvement: He has served in the U.S. House since 1994.
> On the issues: Barr represents a district that has become increasingly conservative. He voted against the minimum-wage bill, opposes gun control. He's opposed to gay marriages.

"District Seven has a spooky fox guarding an underground, black-marketing hen-house," Kathleen complains.

Her abduction occurred in or near Cobb County.

"Illegal activities are rampant in that part of Georgia," she says. "The county owes its existence to Lockheed/Martin-Marietta. Lockheed shares boundaries with Dobbins Air Force Base. I was drugged and guided through a 'space travel' scrambling memory on Lockheed grounds at least once. Lockheed and Dobbins AFB are in Cobb County. God help any survivor who begins to break away and contacts Barr's office for assistance!"

In the postwar period, universities housed the scientific and propaganda branches of the Pentagon. Harvard, Yale, Cal Tech, MIT, Princeton, UCLA and most other ranking academies in the Western hemisphere played host to the foundations. And the intelligence cells buried within them. From Cambridge, for example, came Ivan Sanderson from the wartime Navy Counter-Intelligence Corps (CIC). Charles Berlitz, co-author of The Philadelphia Experiment, was a Yale graduate recruited by the wartime CIC. UFOlogist Jaques Vallee was a student of Allen Hynek (Johns Hopkins, University of Chicago), worked for Shell

Oil and since the 1960s and has been a familiar face at Stanford, where he was engaged in computer projects for the Defense Advance Research Projects Agency (DARPA), the Project Pandora people: developers of direct microwave communication with the brain.

Charles Tart, a subject of the CIA's mind control program, met his wife at Duke's parapsychology lab and went on to become one of the leading authorities around on "ESP." Tart was born in 1937 and reared a Lutheran with an intellectual drive. In Dr. Rhine's lab, Tart, now 22, was given a massive dose of mescaline. At a young age he developed an unquenchable fascination with science, particularly electronics. In high school he obtained a first-class radio telephone license, and silenced his urgings for spirituality with books on the occult. He was admitted to the engineering school at MIT in 1955. There, Tart organized a psychic research club, met some of the leading psychics of the period. His extracurricular interests led him to declare a major in psychology.[52]

The abrupt change in career ambitions was accomplished with the help of Dr. J.B. Rhine. In 1957, the parapsychologist pulled strings and ushered Tart to Duke University. At the parapsychology lab he met Judy Bamberger and married her. He dropped mescaline a few years later.

The experiment was run by Dr. Ivo Kohler, a visiting professor from the University of Vienna who'd tested the hallucinogen on human subjects in Austria since the 1930s. Dr. Kohler visited the lab one afternoon and struck up a conversation with Tart, an aficionado of the British hallucinatorian Aldous Huxley. Dr. Kohler mentioned he'd never given the drug to an American and the curious student volunteered. It so happened that Kohler had a massive dose of pure mescaline sulfate on his person. It tasted like "vomit," Tart recalls.

He attended graduate school at the University of North Carolina in Chapel Hill a few years later, volunteered for experiments with LSD and psilocybin mushrooms funded by a private foundation with CIA moorings. He has since collaborated with CIA hucksters Targ and Puthoff on books and monographs popularizing ESP. Their high-toned theories of "anomalous phenomena" spurn an ambitious year-long Air Force psi research program known as VERITAC (named for the computer that calculated the results). The VERITAC study found any measurable "anomalies" to be "insignificant."

And compared to the EM weapons hidden in the DoD/CIA vault, they truly were: advances in brain research at UCLA were soon to render the quest for psychic abilities obsolete. Dr. Ross Adey, a neuroscientist who'd worked beside the Paperclip Nazis, is currently a brain researcher at Loma Linda University. The New York Times reported on January 1, 1973 that Adey had been accused of gross disregard in the testing of animals for NASA. He testified on his own behalf in a federal courthouse—and stated under oath that "the brain is insensitive to pain." Dr. Adey has participated in hundreds of brain experiments involving animals and humans, some funded by the CIA. He has stuffed electrodes deep within cerebral tissue to measure minute electrical impulses.

His early success at inducing calcium efflux in the brain have given rise to the "confusion weaponry" in the military's "non-lethal" arsenal. Adey was among the first scientists recruited by the DoD's Project Pandora, the quest for a psychoactive microwave. His work, researcher Anna Keeler explains, is "precise in inducing specific behavior. He has correlated a wide variety of behavioral states with EEG including emotional states (e.g. stress in hostile questioning) increments of decision-making and conditioning, correct versus incorrect performance etc. and he has [used] electromagnetic fields that look like EEG which have resulted in altered EEG and behavior."

In his own published accounts, Adey has shown it is possible to design a radio frequency carrier modulated at specific brain frequencies. He demonstrated that "if the biological modulation on the carrier frequency is close to frequencies in the natural EEG of the subject, it will reinforce or increase the number of ... the imposed rhythms and modulate behavior."[53] "Modulate" is a roundabout way of discussing the remote control of a human brain.

Paperclip Nazi Herman Schwann conducted similar experiments with microwaves at the University of Pennsylvania. Schwann was able to map out the electrical properties of human tissue stimulated by varying frequencies of microwave emissions.[54] The work continues to the present day, almost always in secrecy, sometimes camouflaged by innocent-sounding titles, like the $30,000 CIA study published in 1976 entitled "Novel Biophysical Information Transfer Mechanisms (NBITM)."

The technology of "biophysical information transfer" is so advanced that it is often passed off as "alien." In a lawsuit filed against the National Security Agency in a Disctrict of Columbia federal courthouse (civil action 92-0449) a private citizen, John St. Clair Akwei, described the ultimate in electronic surveillance, Remote Neural Monitoring (RNM). This device sends coded signals to the brain's auditory cortex, he claims, communicates directly with the brain "to debilitate subjects by stimulating auditory hallucinations characteristic of paranoid schizophrenia. Without contact with the subject, Remote Neural Monitoring can map out electrical activity from the visual cortex of a subject's brain [on] a video monitor. NSA operatives see what the surveillance subject's eyes are seeing. Visual memory can also be seen. RNM can send images direct to the visual cortex, bypassing the eyes and optic nerves. NSA operatives can use this surreptitiously to put images into a surveillance subject's brain while in REM sleep for brain programming purposes."

Hard physics meets the paranormal in telekinesis researcher Dr. Robert G. Jahn, dean emeritus of the Princeton Engineering and Applied Science Department. He is the recipient of an award from the American Society of Engineering Education for an experimental study of high-powered plasma discharges for spacecraft propulsion, a fellow of the American Physical Society and the American Institute of Aeronautics and Astronautics (AIAA), and (recalling the Biefeld-Brown effect) chairman of the AIAA Electric Propulsion Technical Committee. Jahn serves on the NASA Space Science and Technology Advisory Committee. He is also a director of Hercules, Inc. and chairman of the private spaceflight company's technology committee.[55]

The dean's work in spaceship propulsion systems is as futuristic as any fantasy offered by Puthoff's paranormal Pranksters. Jahn's investigation of pulsed electromagnetic gas acceleration, funded by NASA and the Air Force, examined how "high-power electrical discharges can be used to accelerate a variety of working fluids to very high velocities. These intense discharges and the plasma streams they produce are configured into magnetoplasmadynamic (MPD) thrusters which offer a desirable combination of high specific impulse and high thrust density for advanced space propulsion."

High-energy plasma has apparent uses in UFO technology. Connect the Paperclip UFO/CIA mind control dots in this excerpt from Dr. Jahn's resumé:

> This program addresses the interaction of human operators with low-level information processing devices and systems. This program combines appropriate engineering facilities and techniques with a selection of protocols and insights drawn from modern cognitive science to explore certain aspects of human/machine interactions known to yield anomalous effects currently inexplicable on the basis of established physical concepts and statistical theory.

"Human/machine interaction" on a "cognitive" wavelength is a round-the-block euphemism for mind-linked cybernetics, with "ESP" supposedly acting up as a ghost in the works. Obviously, the ability of a psychic to jerk a molecule—Jahn claims it has been done in his laboratory—pales by comparison.

The hybrid of cybernetics and radio transmitters oscillating on the brain's frequencies has made possible horrific new forms of assault. Why allow this priceless technology to molder around the shop?

Princeton conducted its share of early experiments with psychoactive devices. The hoarding and reclassification of the university's scientific data on infrasound by the Pentagon led Eliot Handelman, a researcher at McGill University, to post his frustration on an academic computer bulletin board: "I'm trying to locate research on the biophysical effects of infrasound," Handleman complained. "A few years ago I collected a series of citations—about 25 from JASA, primarily from the late 50s and early 60s. Princeton cataloged several of these but they were all missing. It turned out that these papers were reclassified during the 1980s, and my efforts to get them through the DoD met with no success, supposedly because Princeton did not wish to comply with DoD's restricted materials protocol. Can anyone tell me what is so interesting about the biophysical effects of infrasound that merit classification?"[56]

Among the responses: "It's really a very powerful tool for mood manipulation ... you'll feel very giddy, your face will flush red ... if you're drunk you'll become much more drunk ... you'll lose about 20% of your IQ and about 15–20% of your ability to balance yourself ... it makes your chest vibrate ... it makes your eyes shake so much that you can't see clearly anymore."

Like most acoustic weapons, the effects of infrasound vary as a factor of frequency. The military potential is mind-boggling. In 1983, Russian scientists at the Leningrad Institute beamed rats with a scattering of infrasonic frequencies for three hours a day over a period of 45 days. The exposure produced spasms in the main blood vessels, resulting in lesions, especially in the range of 10–15 Hz.[57] The low-frequency, high-decibel sound resonates in body cavities, blurs vision and causes nausea. As the decibels rise, effects range from general discomfort to permanent damage and death.[58]

According to a brochure from a subsidiary of Mankind Research Unlimited (MRU) in Los Altos, California, a CIA proprietary, the company's psychoacoustical infrasound emissions invade the brain cells "and wipe them clean."[59]

The Power

In a 1975 speech, Leonid Brezhnev refers to novel weapons systems "more terrible than anything the world has known."

The Russian and U.S. governments fill the air with low-frequency sound waves meant to control us.

—Steve Carlton, Sports Illustrated, April 18, 1994

The work of the German aeronautical scientists was kept under wraps. If anyone knew the background of the UFO sightings of the early 1950s, it was American military personnel drawn into the Operation Overcast and Paperclip Nazi emigration projects. One of them, Brigadier John Samford, a graduate of West Point, was an eager participant. When Colonel Putt filed a memo with the Brigadier, pleading for measures to "improve the morale" of incoming Nazis, Samford tore off a letter to the DoD requesting "Immediate action in this situation." The German scientists, it seems, were a bit down in the mouth. Some of them were even suicidal, Samford lamented. It was the Pentagon's responsibility to make the fugitives comfortable, he pointed out, "if we are to divert the services of valuable scientists from France and Russia to the United States."[60]

Dissolve from Samford's collaboration with "valuable" Nazi scientists to the London Times, July 29, 1952:

> AERIAL OBJECTS OVER WASHINGTON AIR FORCE INQUIRY
> The Times reported: "a group of unidentified aerial objects [has been] observed on radar screens at Washington National Airport. This is the second time in a week that such objects have been reported in this area." The overflights squeezed the Democratic National Convention from the headlines (and this may well have been the intended aim since the Nazis who migrated to the U.S. were ensconced in the Republican Party). A pilot reported he'd been unable to intercept the "glowing lights" seen near Andrews Air Force Base. (Most residents of Washington chalked it up to experimental aircraft.) So who should step forward to brief the press but John Alexander Samford, fresh from a promotion to director of Air Force intelligence (and four years later to the highest office of the National Security Agency).[61]
> Major General Samford, with other officers, discussed the investigation of the reported phenomena for an hour and a half this afternoon and answered innu> merable questions. The result was largely "an explanation of an inability to explain," but General Samford did say definitely that Air Force inquiries made since 1947 had revealed "nothing constituting a danger." The radar blips, he said, were probably "phenomena associated with intellectual and scientific interests."

Pentagon spokesmen made no attempt to account for the report of one agitated woman in Oregon, according to Newsweek (April 17, 1950), that "she had seen a whole squadron of disks maneuvering in the sky. The hovering UFOs spelled out: P-E-P-S-I.

A detailed accounting was given by radio commentator Henry J. Taylor in a series of broadcasts. Taylor announced that the flying machines were "wonderful news," highly advanced "secret weapons." One of the aircraft was "roughly circular," a variation on the Phantom Jet with engine louvres arrayed across the aircraft's shell. The other vehicles sighted were saucer-shaped. The Pentagon, of course, denied the reports.[62]

But the lights of Peenemünde flitted in the sky from Seattle to Washington, D.C.

Pentagon spokesmen smoothed away any exposures of Operation Paperclip, not to mention saucers, for decades. It was therefore inevitable that the very first "investigative" panel assembled in 1953 to investigate UFO sightings was chaired by Dr. Howard P. Robertson, another Princeton physicist—wouldn't you know, the same intelligence officer charged with directing the Consolidated Advance Field Teams (C.A.F.T.s) assigned to locating Nazi Germany's technical secrets after WWII.[63]

Dr. Robertson was also instrumental in the transplanting of Werner von Braun and his fellow Nazi fugitives from Peenemünde to the United States.

For the next 20 years he designed weapons for the CIA and DoD. In the mid-1950s, he jumped ship to the California Institute of Technology and joined the science advisory board of the NSA under Director John Samford.[64] Another scientist from the Robertson Panel, Lloyd Berkner, was a technical adviser to the CIA for 20 years.[65]

J. Allen Hynek, an astronomer, had already found fame as an "authority" on the growing "saucer psychosis." His own 1947 UFO committee probe had, according to Vesco, an unstated objective: "to attribute the sightings either to nonexistent things or to mistakenly identified things that already existed: psychopathic hallucinations, hoaxes, optical illusions, weather balloons, perihelia, lenticular clouds, meteorites, ordinary planes flying at high altitudes ..."[66]

From the Robertson Panel's recommendations came a policy of "debunking" all flying saucer sighting reports: "The 'debunking' aim would result in reduction in public interest in 'flying saucers' which today evoke a strong psychological reaction," the panel concluded. "This education could be accomplished by mass media, [especially] television, motion pictures and popular articles." The panel advised that mental health professionals familiar with mob psychology should design the "education" program. It also recommended that UFO organizations should be surveilled "because of their potentially great influence on mass thinking if widespread sightings should occur. The apparent irresponsibility and the possible use of such groups for subversive purposes should be kept in mind."[67]

Ordo Templis Intelligentis

UFO mythology was launched in a big way in the 1950s, wrapped in gaudy pulp covers and flashed on the silver screen. Jack Parsons, the CalTech rocket pioneer and high priest of the Ordo Tempis Orientis Agape Lodge in Pasadena—and one of the first Americans to report sighting a UFO—was addicted to science fiction. He regularly attended meetings of the L.A. Fantasy and Science Fiction Society, where, in 1945, the adept (he took "the Oath of the Anti-Christ" in 1949) met Lt. Commander L. Ron Hubbard, who made "alien" visitations an integral part of a religious doctrine he called Scientology.[68]

The OTO was founded between 1895 and 1900 by a pair of powerful Freemasons, Karl Kellner and Theodor Reuss. Politically, the order was right-wing in the extreme, proposing the creation of a pan-German world based on pagan spiritual beliefs. Kellner died in 1905, and Reuss, a former spy for the Prussian Secret Service, assumed the office of High Caliph. While living in the UK, Reuss spied on German socialist expatriates. In 1912, he made the acquaintance of Aleister Crowley and appointed him head of the OTO's British chapter.[69]

But The Beast's political loyalties have always been an open question. While living in the States, he penned a series of pro-German diatribes for a pair of fascist publications, The Fatherland and The Internationalist. After the war there were calls for his head. Crowley offered that his pro-German stance was a ruse concocted by MI6, England's military intelligence apparatus. In 1912 he had informed the secret service of his correspondence with Reuss, the German spy. Throughout the 20s and 30s, Crowley gathered intelligence on European Communists, the Nazi movement and Germany's occult lodges.[70]

Crowley died in 1947, willing the copyright for his books and unpublished manuscripts to the OTO and leadership of the order to Karl Germer, otherwise known as Frater Saturnus X., formerly Crowley's Legate in the United States. Germer was born in Germany, served in WWI and was reportedly tossed in prison by the Nazis for his involvement in Freemasonry. (Crowley believed Germer to be a Nazi spy but admitted him to the OTO anyway.) He settled after the war in Dublin, California and died on October 25, 1962 "under horrifying circumstances," according to his wife in a letter to Marcelo Matta, an OTO official in Brazil. She informed him that Germer, on his death bed, had insisted Matta succeed the German as the Outer Head of the occult order.

However, the mantle did not pass to Karl Germer's chosen successor because the CIA orchestrated a coup. But not as one OTO spokesman tells it: "Recently the United States government has legalized our opinion.... [Outer Head Grady McMurty's] leadership of the Ordo Templi Orientis rests on several rather clear letters of authorization from Crowley himself. They met while McMurty was a young First Lieutenant during World War II. He had been admitted to the OTO in 1941 [by] Jack Parsons."[71] In fact, the choice of McMurty was not "clear" at all. Matta's advocates insist that the court decision was based on the perjured testimony of Grand Poo-Bah Grady McMurty and a clutch of attorneys on the CIA dole. And the cult's position is irrelevant since, according to charters signed on March 22, 1946 and April 11, 1946 by Crowley, The Beast had left it to Germer to veto or amend his choice of a successor.

As Matta saw it, no one had a legitimate claim to the title but he. Unfortunately, Herr Germer died during the period the CIA had chosen to move mind control experimentation from academic and military labs into the community. An inner circle of Heironymous scientists experimented on cult devotees, and sometimes collaborated in mass murder to silence the subjects (Jonestown, SLA, Solar Temple). It was a marriage of convenience. Occult societies are secretive. They follow direction. They exist in corners of a society that ignores them.

A number of intelligence agents with occult interests already had their hooks into the OTO. One of them was Gerald Yorke, a veteran British intelligence agent working, an advocate of Matta argues, "with American intelligence in an attempt to absorb the OTO into the ideological warfare network of the political right."[72]

Before the horns of Thelemite succession were bestowed upon Grady McMurty, Yorke the prelate spy "misinterpreted" Germer's will and named Joseph Metzger, a ranking Thelemite (and the son of a former Swiss intelligence chief), to the office of High Caliph. One order adept, Oskar Schlag, was an alleged "psychological warfare" specialist from Israel. Even McMurty (with his degree in political science) was a State Department bureaucrat on the day Herr Germer died.

The coup was sealed while Marcelo Matta, a writer for Brazilian television, fended off operatives of the CIA bent on destroying his sanity and leaving him financially crippled. It was a ritual that subjects of mind control conditioning would come to know well. Strangers approached his friends and filled their ears with lurid stories of debauchery. He was suddenly unable to find work. His mail was opened.

Matta took a job teaching English, studied self-defense.

"He had begun to doubt his sanity," the Matta advocate says. "He constantly suspected people who approached him. He saw in himself all the clinical symptoms of paranoia."

After a few years of harassment and squabbling over the leadership of the OTO, Motta came to the realization that the McMurty junta and "the American 'intelligence' network behind them had a worry, and a pressing one; "Motta's proposed New Manifesto [did] not mention ... Grady at all. Since their purpose was to create an American 'intelligence' tool at the expense of a religious organization, it was necessary to either bring Motta to concede Grady further authority or discredit Motta completely."

They did what they wilt. In 1967 Germer's entire occult library and manuscripts were stolen from the home of his widow. Without the royalties these raked in, Mrs. Germer was destitute and literally starved to death.

Matta was cast out of the OTO.

Trouble brewed in the cult's cauldron. At least one Son of Sam killer passed through a deviant offshoot.[73]

The OTO's Solar Lodge in San Bernardino was founded by Maury McCauley, a mortician, on his own property. McCauley was married to Barbara Newman, a former model and the daughter of a retired Air Force colonel from Vandenberg.

The group subscribed to a grim, apocalyptic view of the world precipitated by race wars, and the prophecy made a lasting impression on Charles Manson, who visited the lodge on occasion. In the L.A. underworld, the OTO spin-off was known for indulgence in sadomasochism, drug dealing, blood drinking, sexual child abuse and murder. The Riverside OTO, like the Manson Family, used drugs, sex, psycho-drama and fear to tear down the mind of the initiate and rebuild it according to the desires of the cult's inner-circle.[74]

On the East Coast, a series of murders created an atmosphere of fear in New York City. Before the world had ever heard of Son of Sam, an obscure Vietnam veteran named David Berkowitz moved into an apartment on Pine Street, a rotting gantlet of hovels in Yonkers. Like much of the bloodshed for which he is known, Berkowitz did not make the decision to live on Pine Street. Key decisions in his life were made by the leaders of a religious group based in Westchester, a hybrid of OTO members and acolytes from the Process Church of the Final Judgment. Members of the cult mingled with others in Manhattan and Brooklyn, and had contact with similar groups across the country. The leader of the Westchester "family" was a real estate attorney with a practice in White Plains. He was active in local politics. Balding, lean with years, the attorney directed Berkowitz and his "brothers" to kill in the name of an ancient cause.

The group's meeting place was an abandoned church, a decrepit hulk on the grounds of the abandoned Warburg-Rothschild estate. The church, partially eaten by fire, was the group's "eastern Headquarters." Most of the pews had been removed from the church long ago. On one wall was hung a large silver pentagram, festooned with silver insets in the shape of Waffen SS lightning bolts.[75]

MK-ULTRA and the Godfather

The interaction of the CIA with organized cult crime is a natural, and it's hardly unprecedented. Other, more traditional crime "families" also have connections in spyworld.

James "Whitey" Bulger, the most notorious gangster in Boston, has achieved mythic status in his hometown with the help of the the FBI. His past is a study of the national security underground insinuating itself into a typical metropolitan criminal network.

On January 1, 1994, the Boston Globe ran a story on Bulger's introduction to the CIA:

> James (Whitey) Bulger, the reputed gangland leader, is uniquely qualified to comment on the burgeoning scandal over the government-sponsored use of human guinea pigs." From 1956 to 1959, while serving a sentence at Atlanta federal penitentiary on a bank robbery conviction, Bulger received a reduction in sentence for volunteering to be a subject in LSD experiments sponsored by the CIA. In an interview with Globe reporters," Senate President William Bulger said he had discouraged his brother from participating in the experiments in letters the two siblings exchanged in the late 1950s. Those who know Whitey Bulger say he continues to suffer side effects from the experiments, including nightmares and insomnia.

"Who knew about LSD then?" recalls State Senator Bulger. "But I was very apprehensive about it. Imagine, three days a month [dropped from his sentence] for running that risk. There were only 8–10 of them and two guys went stark raving mad.... You couldn't go through something like that and come out improved."[76]

Whitey read voraciously in prison. The bank robber was especially fond of books on military history, strategy and intelligence operations. Whitey's reading contributed to his survival in the mob wars of the 1960s. His legendary ability to manipulate federal agents was, one local reporter noted years later, "a study in Cold War political strategy."

After his release from prison in 1965, Bulger rose to prominence in organized crime in Boston's south side. The 1986 President's Commission on Organized Crime declared him a killer. Bulger, the Globe reported on September 20, 1988, rose steadily in the past decade to the top of the underworld with 'nary a scratch': "I can't tell you that anybody I've worked with has any idea what kind of muscle he has," a former prosecutor says, "just that everybody's scared to death of him." In 1981, the bugging of the Angiulos Mafia family led to the discovery that they could call on Bulger and Flemmi, if need be, anytime, to kill for them.

"I'll tell you right now, if I called these guys ... they'd kill anybody we tell 'em to," underboss Gennaro Angiulo claimed. When Angiulo was placed under arrest in 1983, Bulger became the most powerful organized crime figure in Boston. It was rumored that Whitey fed leads to the FBI, resulting in Angiulo's downfall. With the competition scrubbed, Bulger became the ranking mobster in South Boston.

Whitey led the charmed life of a godfather with an uncanny intuition for evading arrest. Local police complained that he always seemed to know when there was a listening device in the room. Bulger was somehow aware of the sleuthing and either talked nonsense when monitored by FBI agents, or said nothing at all. On one occassion he unearthed $50,000 in electronic equipment and federal agents begged him to return it while Bulger drowned out their voices with a good-cop, bad-cop parody.

For thirty years, he managed to maintain an unblemished police record.

Bulger was a sensitive subject around city hall. Police Commissioner Francis

Roache refused to discuss him. There was internal dissension at the FBI over Bulger's untouchability, much of the protest arising from blowback over his relationship with John Connolly, an agent of the FBI's organized crime unit. But James Ahearn, the special agent in charge of the Boston office, flatly rejects any suggestion that the FBI was protecting Bulger. He also instructed Connolly not to talk to .reporters about his friendship with South Boston's most powerful mobster.

"It really made you think, why won't the FBI do this guy?" one high-ranking DEA official complains.

More chaos in local law enforcement ensued when state police discovered a small proviso tagged to state budget legislation in 1991, The attachment would have forced all supervisors of the department's intelligence division to "retire immediately." It was purged from the budget, but police were unable to determine exactly who in the state capital had slipped the item into the state budget. Many in law enforcement felt the proviso was a message to the state police officials who ordered the Lancaster Street investigation of Whitey Bulger.

The whole unexpurgated story of the mobster's federal connections leaked out slowly over a period of five years. The Globe took notice on March 5, 1995 of "ill will arising from Bulger's role as an informant and his uncanny ability to dodge electronic surveillance used by the Massachusetts State Police and US Drug Enforcement Agency."

The FBI "informant" had friends in high places, that much was clear. There was, in 1991, for example, Bulger's $1.9 million in state lottery winnings—the Justice Department discovered five years later that Bulger had obtained his share of the winning $14 million lottery ticket in a mob money-laundering scheme.

Charges that he received a "tribute" on all drug profits from the mobs of South Boston arose when 51 residents of the area, otherwise known as the Winter Hill Gang, were stung in a DEA investigation and indicted on drug charges. Bulger, their boss, quietly lit out of town and went into hiding. His partner in organized crime, 'Cadillac Frank' Salemme, escaped at about the same time. In August, 1995 the FBI caught up with Salemme, who had presided over the entire New England Mafia. The don was arrested in West Palm Beach, Florida and held without bail.

In 1996, the FBI completely reversed itself and formally acknowledged that since the 1960s (not the 80s, as FBI officials confessed a few years earlier), James Bulger had been a valued "informant." That is, while local, state and federal police—even the FBI's own agents—doggedly pursued him, the most feared man in Boston had friends in the Bureau. They granted him a license to run drug-trafficking operations in Boston, even to knock out competitors by turning state's evidence against them.

As of this writing, James Bulger remains at large.

The Mafia's Savona-Profaci family was drawn into the obscure world of intelligence and mind control when a young member of the clan became a guinea-pig in trauma-based mind control and covert radio-frequency brain experimentation. Thomas Savona was convicted after a two-day trial—in which the complainants, an uncle and aunt on his mother's side, were the only prosecution witnesses—by the New York State Supreme Court. The charge was the attempted murder of his uncle. Savona testified on his own behalf on the advice of his attorney. Three eyewitnesses for the defense were not called. Savona's attorney explained to him that his own testimony would be sufficient to win an acquittal. It wasn't. Thomas was sentenced on September 30, 1991.[77]

The question of exceptional circumstances was never addressed by the court: "Ever since my teenage years, I have been trying to prove that I am being victimized," wrote Savona from the Sullivan Correctional Facility to New York's City Sun on February 19, 1994, "by [the CIA's] brain wave frequency sector, twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week." Savona complained that parties unknown had tapped his "thoughts, vision, hearing and other sensory wave frequencies, detecting and tuning into them, modulating them."[78] His complaint was ignored by the court and examining psychiatrists, though he asked repeatedly for an MRI scan and medical tests to prove that he'd been implanted with a bio-chip.

Until the age of six, Thomas Savona was raised by black Muslims. He still does not eat meat or fish. He doesn't take drugs. One day, Savona recalls, the Muslims "disappeared," and his Uncle entered, or "infiltrated," the picture. The uncle was a cultist, Savona says. The boy suffered ritualized, trauma-based conditioning—in the course of a prolonged war waged against the Mafia family by local "blood cults" with ties to "the elite power structure and government."

Young Thomas turned to Carmela Profaci, his great aunt and the mother superior of Regina Pacis Church in Brooklyn, New York, to protect him from the abuse. She hid him when the cult attempted to subject him to further abuse.[79] In high school, he was generally considered to be honest and hard working. Dr. Adolph Goldman, a court-appointed doctor, noted in is 1988 report that the accused "had no history of psychiatric problems." Thomas's brother Philip entered the family business, organized crime. The first arrest came in 1979—although, according to parole officers, he spoke of occultism and electronic brain monitoring months before the police hauled him away. As he tells it, Thomas and his uncle, said to be a high priest in a local satanic cult, had a heated argument after the latter refused to ship heart medication to Thomas's father in Sicily, where it was unavailable. The uncle produced a gun and Thomas struggled with him. The gun went off while still in his uncle's hand. The weight of the testimony (from his aunt and uncle) heard by the jury was against him. Savona was convicted in 1979.

He was sent to Marcy State Hospital. Thomas had become "delusional," according to Dr. Goldman: "He [Thomas] remembered being at Marcy for 14 days, but he couldn't really give an explanation for this. 'I was trying to explain to people that my brain was monitored.' He has a theory that the brain gives electrical waves which can be picked up. "I know I'm monitored ... through biofeedback."[80] The patient was incarcerated at the mental hospital for 45 days and "refused any medication," insisting he was a target of electronic mind control and harassment. After his release in 1985, Savona fired a gun at his much-despised uncle on two occasions, "in self-defense," he says, and was again charged with attempted murder in 1988.

Court-appointed psychiatrists diagnosed Thomas as a "delusional psychotic," yet concluded he was "fit to stand trial and be sentenced." The diagnosis is questionable since Savona was verbally articulate, and while incarcerated maintained a 3.5+ grade point average at a local community college.[81] He has been consistently denied the MRI scan he has requested since the mid-80s. Like most victims of EM experimentation, Thomas has written letters to anyone who might help him prove that he is a target of electromagnetic attack, including Governor Mario Cuomo, the Martin Marietta Corp., the Brain Research Foundation, IBM Research Department, the Department of the Navy, and so on. None of the respondents have offered technical assistance. He is currently a prisoner at a the Fishkill high-security medical facility in Beacon, New York.

Occult Politics

> One can safely predict that techniques for controlling behavior and modifying personality will grow more efficient by the year 2000. Thousands of experts at conditioning are now trying out their behavior-changing technology on tens of thousands of people—in classrooms, prisons, mental hospitals, day-care centers, factories, nursing homes....

The CIA's s use of cult cut-outs was advanced by a visit to Elizabeth Kubler-Ross, whose knowledge of the occult underground served as the map for forging alliances. Cults sprang up and proliferated throughout the 1960s, many with links to the munitions and intelligence empires.

The cults were on the rise. In San Francisco, Anton LaVey's "Magic Circle," the forerunner of the Church of Satan, was an elite secret society comprised of assorted eccentrics. They enacted Egyptian rituals in celebration of Osiris, seances, black masses. LaVey's Magic Circle included, according to LaVey biographer Burton Wolfe:

> The heir of the Vickers munitions empire, a [crony] of arms dealer Basil "Death Merchant" Zaharoff in the days when the war profiteer had a mysterious black chapel in his chateau; Carin de Plessen, inaccurately called "the mad countess" by her neighbors in Marin County (she was an authentic baroness who grew up in the Royal Palace of Denmark) because she kept a compound of Great Danes at her rustic, isolated house on a knoll in Woodacre; novelist Stephen Schneck, author of The Night Clerk; anthropologist Mike Harner [headed for professorships at Columbia, Yale and Berkeley, also the chair of the New School for Social Research]; investment broker Donald Werby [a billionaire accused of pederasty in 1990] and his wife Willy, son-in-law and daughter of the man who owns Chock Full O' Nuts; underground filmmaker Kenneth Anger ....

And a gaggle of others, not to mention Shana Alexander (current director of the National Women's Political Caucus); a dildo manufacturer; the grandson of an American president; several popular science fiction writers and "various physicians, attorneys, artists, writers, policemen and policewomen."[82]

Like so many others in this inventory, the direction of LaVey's life took a drastic turn with exposure to the castrated Hitler regime. In the spring of 1945, LaVey's uncle took "Tony" along on a sojourn to Germany to rebuild blasted airstrips. On this junket, the impressionable youth stopped at a military post long enough to watch confiscated Nazi horror movies, thinly-veiled depictions of Nazi occultism. The gothic trappings of LaVey's postwar notoriety had their beginnings in rumors circulating in Germany, grim accounts of a Black Order operating within the Nazi Party.[83]

The shamanic beliefs of the cults were formed by national security gurus spinning capricious spiritual self-indulgence into blinds for CIA mind control operations. In 1961, Dr. Timothy Leary of Harvard directed a program that tested hallucinogens on prisoners in Massachusetts to determine whether the drugs had an effect on criminal tendencies.[84] State officials fired him for inciting inmates to rebellion, but in a tape-recorded interview in 1975, Leary admitted he was a "willing agent of the CIA." He refused to discuss how he was paid.[85]

In an unpublished manuscript, mind control researcher Walter Bowart invokes documents indicating that Leary "had received money channeled by the CIA through various government agencies. The files showed that, in all, there were eight government grants paid to Leary from 1953 to 1958, most of them paid through the National Institute of Mental Health, now known to have 'fronted' for the CIA."

Another psychedelic priest of the period was Charles Tart, the LSD-dropping protégé of Dr. J.B. Rhine. Tart received his Ph.D in psychology from the University of North Carolina. His academic interests included personality theory, dreams and hypnosis. Tart's Altered States of Consciousness, published in 1969, was widely considered a ground-breaking study of meditation, yoga, drugs, hypnosis and dreams. His work is greatly influenced by the philosophy of G.I. Gurdjieff, and he has mingled with cults founded on the teachings of the Russian mystic and spiritual guide of Karl Haushofer, the Nazi strategist. Professor Tart taught at the University of California at Davis for 30 years. (The Davis campus is a stone's throw from Vacaville Prison, where psychotropic drugs were tested on prisoners by the CIA, sometimes against their will and often as punishment. The adjacent town is Dixon—one of two sources, according to an FCC report, of the famous "Soviet" ELF hum that rumbled through Eugene, Oregon in 1978.[86] A second signal was detected with a source offshore. Who should step forth to "explain?" Pentagon spokesman William Perry, until recently secretary of defense, an SAIC board member, falsely blamed the Soviets for the ringing ears, nose-bleeds and head pains caused by the EM transmissions.)

One of the savants who did the most to fill the heads of credulous seekers with addled metascientific proselytizing was Andrija Puharich, the CIA mystic who discovered Uri Geller, the Cyprus-born Israeli "psychic." Puharich was born in 1918. He received a medical degree from Northwestern University in 1947. Upon graduation, Puharich developed a slavish interest in clairvoyance and dabbled in theories for electronically enhancing and synthesizing psychic abilities. He joined the Army and took part in certain "parapsychology" experiments.[87] The Washington Post reported in 1977 that Puharich also worked in the Army's Chemical and Biological Warfare Center at Fort Detrick, Maryland, and has "lectured the Army, Air Force and Navy on possibilities for mind warfare. Expert in hypnotism as well as microelectronics."

Puharich took a fatal fall down a flight of stairs in January 1995. Researcher

Terry Milner peeled away the cover stories and found that the true Puharich bore little resemblance to the hallucinatory shaman touted by his devotees:

> Throughout his life Andrija performed many outrages on four legged inhabitants of earth, slicing and dicing them as he saw the need to do so all in the name of science. Dogs were a favorite. One of life's little mysteries is why he belonged to the Kennel Club, but he did.
>
> It was while he was at Northwestern that Andrija put his mental-pedal to the mental-metal and came up with his Theory of Nerve Conduction. The theory proposed that the neuron units radiate and receive waves of energy which he calculated to be in the ultra-shortwave bands below infrared and above the radar spectrum. Therefore the basic nerve units—neurons—are a certain type of radio receiver-transmitter.
>
> The theory got passed around and glimpsed by various high personages of 1940's science. Among them was Paul Weiss, a neurophysiologist at the University of Chicago. José Delgado, the guy who tortured animals by putting electronic implants into their brains to influence their behaviour, liked Paul Weiss and you can find his grateful acknowledgment to the man in his "ve know vat's goot for you" book, Toward a Psychocivilized Society.
> While his nerve conduction manuscript was circulating, Puharich headed out for California to do his internship as a medical researcher. He spent a year or so at the Permanenté Research Foundation. During that time he carried out research into the effects of digatoid drugs, funded by Sandoz Chemical Works. Sandoz.
> Andrija's wife Virginia, who had been an editor at the Office of War Information during the war, came with him and worked at the same facility.

Puharich is the inventor of an implantable, "miniature tooth radio, sold to the CIA."[88] He admits to involvement in "LSD work for the CIA in 1954." (Biological warfare researcher Frank Olsen, injected with a massive dose of MDA, a potent hallucinogen, plummeted twelve stories and was killed in an operation run by agents from Ft. Detrick at New York's Statler Hotel a year before.) Immediately upon his ostensible release from the service, Puharich set up a laboratory to study clairvoyance. He was also the founder of the Intelectron Corporation, a medical electronics firm (recalling the J.B. Rhine/Medtronics combination).

The electronic wizardry of Dr. Puharich was the source of the unpleasantness experienced by David B., a mind control subject who had implants surgically removed ...

> X-rays revealed a metal object on the left side of my skull under the jaw in the soft tissue of my neck. In May 1996, I finally had it removed, I asked many doctors about the possibility of it falling there during an extraction—they said, "possible, but remote." Most of them thought it punctured my neck from the outside. I sent X-rays to Dr. Sims, and he arranged removal. The strange thing that came out of this was discovery of the small object in my shoulder. Dr. Leer called after receiving my X-rays and asked if I had ever broken my shoulder, if I had ever been in an explosion. I replied no. He said the reason was that the X-ray clearly showed a screw in my left shoulder. He said it looked like an operation for a broken shoulder. I have never broken a bone to my knowledge, and called my mother to ask. She said I'd had no operations as a child. This part is a complete mystery,
> During the first six months of torture (extreme at that time), I went to a dentist and reported pain under my new dental bridge, installed a few months before the assault. He removed it and I was still in contact. So I wrote off my teeth and concentrated on my throat, wrongly. In my X-rays and CAT scan, one tooth is very bright and in one frame of the catscan it shows rays of white emanating from it. People I asked said it was probably an interference effect with the metal.
> A researcher commented by mail recently: "The tooth implant I have followed was to be used as a send-receive unit or a hearing device. I have no idea what its current appearance would be. Back then it required using the tooth's nerve as a pathway. It was developed by Dr. Andrija Puharich and a dentist named Joe Lawrence." He also said there was a Government interest in the doctor's work.

In his books, Puharich echoed the schizy Blavatsky efflux of his fellow mind control operators. Uri Geller ("tested" and approved by Targ and Puthoff at SRI) had profound mental abilities "beamed to him," Puharich claimed, from "a distant galaxy." The source of the radio signal that allowed Geller to bend silverware was an "extraterrestrial race" known as "the Hoovians," under the command of a powerful alien council he called "The Nine." Most impressive was Geller's ability to "teleport" himself across great distances in the blink of an eye and "dematerialize" small objects. Puharich complained that the "E.T.s" buzzed him in flying saucers and left obnoxious messages on his answering machine. One summer, at his Ossning, New York complex, Puharich put together a cult of "Gellerings" called the "Space Kids," twenty adolescents from seven countries supposedly graced with the same abilities as Uri Geller. They claimed to be of "alien" origin. A 14-year-old participant reports his suspicions were aroused when he was asked to take part in a "remote viewing" exercise—to spy on the Kremlin, among other sensitive political targets.[89]

Russell Targ, an instigator of all this—the most unlikely cover story in history—affects the trappings of hard science in his books on the paranormal. But his work is laden with more fantastic tales that conceal his efforts on behalf of the CIA. Targ claims that the public is hobbled from an understanding of psychic functioning by a wide variety of religious cult leaders who "profit and flourish by attracting a continuous flow of recruits who believe their claims [of] enlightenment and power ... derived through special knowledge about the inner-workings of reality and the mind."[90]

In 1979, as director of the Human Freedom Center in Berkeley, Targ devoted several months 'interviewing and counseling' former cult members" (bear in mind that he is a physicist, not a therapist), and "I found that many individuals had joined cults as a result of their having either experienced or witnessed what they believed were psychic occurrences."[91] All well and good, but Targ somehow neglects to mention that the Human Foundation Center was a direct link to the CIA mind control operation known as People's Temple.

The UC Berkeley counseling center that employed Dr. Targ was founded by Elmer and Deanna Mertle, Jones's public relations officers. The Mertles changed their names to Al and Jeannie Mills after leaving the Temple in 1975.[92] The Mills clan pulled out of the Jones operation with a group of Caucasians who made up the inner-circle of People's Temple, lieutenants of Jim Jones reborn as Concerned Relatives, a support group. The core of the group had in fact conspired with Dr. Lawrence Laird Layton at UC Berkeley, the hidden hand of the CIA medical experimentation compound in Guyana, and "Minister" Jones in mass murder.[93]

Al and Jeannie were unwilling participants in People's Temple. Jones had forced their loyalty by reminding them of the confession of criminal acts they'd signed before the couple and their children were permitted into the fold. Eventually, Al and Jeannie came to like their positions of rank in the Temple. Once out of it, they were instrumental in luring Congressman Leo Ryan, who'd been investigating CIA ties to the cult, to Guyana, where he perished among the 1,200 murder-victims of Jonestown.[94]

Al and Jeannie Mills set up the Human Freedom Center in a ramshackle house in Berkeley. Russell Russell Targ joined the Center in March, 1979, four months after the People's Temple slaughter.[95] He counseled survivors for almost a year, then returned to his psi research position at Stanford Research Institute, from whence he had come.

On February 26, 1980, shortly after Targ resigned, an unidentified killer entered the Center and executed Al, Jeannie and their teen-aged daughter with gun shots to the head. The building was not burglarized. A friend of the Mills family arrived at the local police station a few days later to report that a psychiatrist once employed at the Center had committed the murders.[96]

Vipers and Daydreams (Reprised)

The California university system was a minor West Coast Pentagon of covert planning of psychological warfare programs that tended to overlap with CIA mind control operations. Experimentation on the People's Temple flock was directed by Dr. Layton, a Berkeley scientist. A decade earlier, in the winter of 1969 to be exact, Dr. Arthur A. Jensen, a professor of educational psychology at UC Berkeley, turned the science of eugenics on its ear with the publication an article in the Harvard Educational Review reviving discredited notions of race and IQ.

Almost instantly, Jensen became the darling of the corporate media. Jensen's position that the genetics of race determines intelligence was treated by the press, independent scholar Allan Chase recalls in The Malthus Legacy, "as the greatest scientific development since the first nuclear device was exploded at Los Alamos." Feature stories lauding Jensen's incarnation of Nazi-style eugenics were published in Newsweek, Time, Life and U.S. News & World Report and elsewhere.

On March 31, 1969, Newsweek summarized Jensen's "findings": "Dr. Jensen's view, put simply, is that blacks are born with less 'intelligence' than most whites.... The reason, he argues, is that intelligence is an inherited capacity and that since a prime characteristic of races is that they are 'inbred,' blacks are likely to remain lower in intelligence."

The notion that African-Americans were not as smart as Caucasians (and even engaged in "in-breeding") led Jensen to ask the rhetorical question, "Is there a danger that current welfare policies, unaided by eugenics foresight, could lead to the genetic enslavement of a substantial segment of our population?"

Welfare, Dr. Chase emphasizes, "was the basic point of the Jensen testament—not education. Nor intelligence. Jensen's article was nothing more, and nothing less, than a propaganda tract for eugenics."

The Pioneer Fund has made Jensen's theories the academic backbone of its anti-welfare campaign. The right-wing organization exerts unheard of influence on public policy for a political fringe group. Its platform—ending welfare, halting immigration, cutting funds to educational programs, scaling back entitlements and affirmative action—fuels federal and state ballot measures.

Marek Kohn, in The Race Gallery (1995), traced the history of the Pioneer Fund: founded in 1937 to promote higher reproduction by American whites and "research 'race betterment.'" The fund "disburses around a million dollars a year. In the second half of the 1980s, its main beneficiary was Thomas Bouchard's twin study project, which was given more than $500,000. .... Between 1971 and 1992, Arthur Jensen received more than one million dollars."

The Pioneer Fund was set up, according to IRS documents, to raise money to fund the study of racial purity. On December 14, 1995, El Sol Del Valle reported:

> Their literature was quoted by Nazi war criminals as the basis for the "Final Solution," that is, the extermination of the Jews. Yes, at the Nuremberg War Crimes trials, German war criminals actually quoted Americans and their study of "eugenics" as the basis for Nazi racial views and policy.
> The Pioneer Fund led American groups in advocating the use of German "eugenics." It still does. The Fund responded to Dr. Tanton's requests with over $700,000 in seed money to fund FAIR [an activist front that advocates population control]. FAIR is a group founded by ... Dr. John Tanton. For start-up money, Tanton went to the Pioneer Fund.... Dr. Tanton claims he knows nothing of the Pioneer Fund's pro-Nazi background. It has financed such racially charged and directed projects as the famous Dr. Shockley studies that tried to prove that "negroes" are inferior to white people and, more recently, it is reported, funded the infamous Bell Curve studies of Charles Murray.

The Pioneer Fund has granted liberal support to Roger Pearson ($787,400 by 1993), editor of two widely distributed journals advocating racial purity, Mankind Quarterly, repeatedly cited in The Bell Curve, and The Journal of Social, Political and Economic Studies, which publishes articles by Jensen and his fellow "conservative" eugenicists. Pearson was once an organizer for The Northern League, the UK neo-Nazi movement that recruited senile officers of Hitler's SS.

Pearson moved to the U.S. in 1965 to edit Western Destiny, a jorunal published by Willis Carto of the Liberty Lobby. The editorial board of the "academic" journal included Austin App, the pro-Nazi leader of the German American National Congress and a leading Holocaust revisionist. Pearson went on to become the editor of the American Security Council's Journal of International Relations and served on the board of the Council's American Foreign Policy Institute. The council is headed without exception by military-industrial hawks, and high on the council's agenda is the promotion of military spending, thus the molding of public opinion with Dr. Jensen's genetic IQ theories, a "scientific" rationale for stanching the welfare coffers and diverting tax revenue to the DoD. (It is a testament to the ASC's political clout that presidential candidate Robert Dole boasts Council credentials).

Thirty years after Arthur Jensen's revival of fascist eugenics hardened racial attitudes, he sits on the "Scientific Advisory Board" of BrainTainment Resources, Inc. (BTR) in Laguna Beach, California. BTR sales literature boasts that Dr. Jensen is the country's "most highly esteemed scientist in the field of IQ measurement and intelligence analysis." Incorporated in January 1995, BTR set up a core development team of cognitive scientists, computer technicians, teachers and psychologists. John H. Kranzler, PhD, formerly a research associate of Arthur Jensen's, is the company specialist in intelligence testing, or "cognitive chronometrics." Kranzler received his doctorate, also from the University of California at Berkeley, in 1990. He is currently an assistant professor of the School of Psychology at the University of Florida. His research turns on the "assessment and development of cognitive abilities."

BrainTainment, Inc. claims that ThinkFast, computer software advertised on the Internet, utilizes "the underlying technology of psycho-interactive intelligence to perk up tired brains, clear out foggy heads and focus in scattered minds." After all, "why not have fun while educating and empowering your brain?" The company suggests that "real brain power should be measured much like muscle-power, that is, with an 'ergometer' that dynamically challenges ('loads') the full capacity of the 'muscle.' We call it psycho-interactivity."

But the interaction of mind with computer, the essence of electronic brain manipulation, is not advertised on the Net. It is squandered by the "national security" underground. Chris Bird, a CIA psychological warfare specialist, and Peter Tomkins, an OSS veteran, authors of The Secret Life of Plants (Harper & Row, 1973), are also steeped in the moral wasteland of the CIA's mind control sector. The book was largely concerned with the experiments of Clive Backster, a lie detector operator who took galvanic readings of houseplants and claimed to have produced fluctuations that coincided with his thoughts. Cornell experimenters were unable to duplicate his results (although Paul Sauvin, a minister at the Psychic Science Temple of Metaphysics, claimed that the "Backster Effect" was easily evoked in his own lab). As usual, the technology behind the ruse is a dead give-away—Sauvin, according to Bird, was a "pacifist, abhorrent of the use of thought controlled weapons ... though he has taken out business certificates on such devices—which put him on record as the owner."[97]

Bird himself has bona fidés that scream EM mind control. After the Vietnam

War, he found employment as a representative of the Rand Development Corporation (a front similar to the Human Ecology Fund), chaired by H.J. Rand, the son of the CEO of Sperry-Rand, the munitions builder. Bird partook of an early exchange of advanced scientific information with the Soviets. He was also a "biocommunications"—cyber-clairvoyance—specialist at MRU, the CIA proprietary engaged in the development of "psycho-acoustical" biotechnology.[98]

The "New Age" (still dripping with occult beliefs reminiscent of the "New Age" in proto-Nazi Germany), saucer mythology and drugged clairvoyance are blinds for involvement in extreme human rights violations. The gamut of zany cover stories combine in the enigmatic C.B. Scott Jones, yet another military intelligence officer who, as a Navy pilot in the Korean War, happened to witness a UFO overflight.[99] It has long been suspected by abduction researchers that Jones is a veteran of electromagnetic mind control operations.

Angela Thompson, once a fixture at Jahn's psi research lab at Princeton, reports that Jones's primary metaphysical pursuit is "dream-projection" (á la John Alexander and his much ballyhooed "Jedi Project," the DoD's "New Age Army"), the supposed ability to entrain and manipulate the thoughts of others.

Thompson was a consenting target. Jones, then an aide to Senator Claiborne Pell, entered the picture in the late 1980s and linked "psychic" research to military intelligence brass, including Laurance Rockefeller. Pell's mentor was Averell Harriman. The Pell presence in American politics antedates the American revolution. "Clay" has long been a career politician. He attended the organizing session of the UN in San Francisco and spent seven years in the State Department, assigned to the Foreign Service. He has a strong interest in the paranormal.

He is also a closet homosexual. Attorney Robert Winter-Bergen, in The Washington Pay-Off, relates that he was summoned in June 1964 to release Senator Pell from jail after he'd been arrested in a Greenwich Village gay bar:

> If Senator Pell had had any identification with him, the police would have entered his name in their record of the raid [and] it would have become a matter of public information, available to anyone. In politics, the opposition will go to any lengths to obtain information that can be used to pressure, even to blackmail, a candidate, no matter how innocent the circumstances may be. I realized that only a person of influence would be able to resolve the problem without leaving any traceable evidence, and the only person I knew with such power was Carmine DeSapio, then the Democratic leader of Manhattan's First Assembly District South. I had come to know DeSapio through Julia Skouras. DeSapio had been a good friend of Pell's father, Herbert Pell, a prominent New York socialite and Democratic Party leader.

> Despite the hour, I telephoned DeSapio, whom I had known slightly for several years, and after I explained the situation to him he offered to meet me at the police station in an hour. We arrived at the same time. While I waited in the main room, DeSapio went down a hall and evidently talked to whoever is in charge.
> He returned in a few minutes and told me: 'Everything's okay.' Almost immediately, Pell came out of a large room at the back of the station. The moment was not conducive to chit-chat, so there were some embarrassed thank-you's and we all went our separate ways.

Scott Jones is founder of the Human Potential Foundation (HPF), a UFO "watchdog" organization in Washington, D.C. In October 1995, Common Cause reported that Laurance Rockefeller donated some $700,000 to the Foundation.[100]

Scott Jones was recruited by the Navy in 1946, trained as an aviation midshipman and rose to officer rank as a pilot in Korea. He has degrees from George Washington University, the University of Maryland and American University. He was with Naval intelligence for 15 years, assigned as an "assistant attaché" in New Delhi and Katmandu. And while still an intelligence officer, Jones worked at Kaman Tempo, Inc., a subsidiary of the Kaman Sciences Corporation. In 1983, a branch of the company, Kaman Tempo, a "think tank" that performs intelligence analysis for the virtual government, hosted a seminar on "applications of parapsychology." The minutes of the seminar were edited and published by Jones. In them, he mentions a network of intelligence contacts.[101]

Dr. Cecil Jones "retired" from Naval Intelligence in 1976. Turn down the volume when he talks. Like his fellow psyop agents, emergent neuro-cybernetic technology lurks behind the shaggy-dog "aliens" and psychic excursions.

The Kaman Corporation is a sprawling, diversified military contractor. Company officials include Admiral Huntington Hardisty (ret.), former commander-in-chief of the U.S. Pacific Command and director of operations for the Joint Chiefs of Staff.[102] Former Secretary of Defense Frank Carlucci, a Kaman director, also sits on the boards of several companies known to have built radio-frequency "mind control" weapons (Westinghouse and Bell Atlantic). He is chairman of the Carlyle Corporation, former secretary of defense (1987 to 1989), a director of Texas Biotechnology and other founts of advanced military technology. Among other things, Kaman manufactures airborne laser electro-optical imaging systems for military operations, and provides "advanced technology services to a number of customers, including all branches of the armed forces and various government agencies." Kaman's technical services include "various types of artificial intelligence systems," the heart of modern mind control.[103]

The company Jones keeps reveals, a social register of oily political operatives:

Congressman Charlie Rose (D-N.C.): Best remembered for his investigation of Banco Nationale Lavorro (BNL) and American companies that conspired to stock Saddam Hussein's $100-billion armaments base—ironic, since Rose was himself tarred by the scandal. In August 1989, the congressman from North Carolina threw his weight behind a lobbying group, led by the Bush administration, that pressured Eximbank—chaired by William Draper III, a friend of George Bush at Yale and the son of a Dillon, Read executive who advanced the Nazi rearmament effort between the wars[104]—to relax restrictions on military exports to Iraq. The lobbyists, including Representative Rose, convinced Draper to stretch Iraq's line of credit against the advice of the bank's own analysts, who pointed out that Hussein was the world's worst credit risk.

On April 15, 1991, Rep. Henry Gonzales of the House Banking Committee wrote in a memo, "at present, the U.S. government owes various U.S. and foreign companies over $2 billion because of Iraqi default."[105] Rose chaired a House committee investigation of the Bush administration's role in Iraqgate, a gross deception since he was among the scandal's key participants.[106]

The Congressman has long been an advocate of the Pentagon's "parapsychological" pursuits.

"Some people think this is the work of the Devil," he observes, "other people think it's the work of the Holy Spirit." The comment prompted James Mills, author of a novel about the DoD's "psychic warriors," to complain: "I think it's very dangerous for even an individual to be toying around with the occult. When you see nations doing it as a matter of national policy, that really gets scary."[107]

Rose moves in the Pentagon's mind control underground like an old hand. His friend Ira Einhorn, a counter-cultural Jabberwocky, was forced to flee the country after police in Philadelphia discovered his girlfriend's cadaver stuffed in a trunk. Jack Sarfatti of the Esalen Institute caught a glimpse of the underground on a visit to Einhorn, then "very concerned about what he called 'Soviet breakthroughs in psychotropic weapons of mind control at a distance using ELF and sound waves.'" This is just the sort of rationale that leads to classified domestic weapons development. Einhorn was attempting to pull together a study group to meet the Soviet threat. "He said he had support from the local telephone company and from the Bronfmans [the Canadian liquor Family that held an interest in Clay Shaw's Trade Mart] to link up visionary scientists like myself.... Ira mentioned that he was working with Congressman Charlie Rose of the House Select Committee on Intelligence. Rose confirmed his connection to Einhorn in a telephone conversation."[108]

Hill & Knowlton: An intelligence clearinghouse, the most frequently exposed CIA proprietary in the District of Columbia.

Dick Farley, formerly an assistant to Jones at HPF, informs us ...

> Here is a 'Jones link' to Hill & Knowlton that I can confirm. In 1990–93 or so, a former Capitol Hill staffer by name of Janet Smith (well, she said that's her name) was one of those receiving money passed through the Human Potential Foundation. Janet would visit Jones for a few hours from time to time, with office door closed and locked (according to Jones's secretary at the time), and then Janet would emerge with a nice check in the $5K or more range to tide her own little non-profit group over for a while. Janet was "into" alternative medicine, and she had a "donated" office at Hill & Knowlton. I was there a few times, as H&K also hosted some "alternative medicine" kinds of meetings, filled with cultists of the New Age sort, both the true and the gullible, as well as the manipulators.
> Janet Smith is a devotee of Indian mystic Sai Baba, and she visited him regularly in India. Jones also is a scholar of India and particularly its military (subject of his doctoral thesis at American University), and of course Jones served in India.

Theodore Rockwell: Scott Jones has conducted "ESP" studies with Rockwell, a nuclear engineer from the Oak Ridge Lab (home of radiation experiments on children, etc.) and vice president of the U.S. Psychotronics Association, an organization that passes off absurd cover stories as legitimate science—the Association's 1989 conference in New York on the "Cosmicgate Conspiracy" explored the following "topics": how UFO abductions are permitted by government "in exchange for extraterrestrial technology," inter-dimensional warfare, astrological weather forecasting, the Illuminati, CFR, the world "super government" and "the prophecy of Americas economic collapse in 1989."[109]

Prince Hans Adam of Liechtenstein II: In pursuit of "aliens" and the paranormal, C.B. Scott Jones has a kindred spirit in Prince Hans Adam of Liechtenstein II, the most autocratic ruler in Europe and one of the last of ruling princes. One conservative German magazine opined that the Prince governs the tiny principality of Liechtenstein, wedged between Austria and Switzerland, "according to his wishes." He lives in imperial style: the prince once proposed dismantling the government and reigning like a monarch from his medieval castle. When he inherited power in 1989, Hans Adam went so far as to dissolve the parliament because it balked at giving him a museum for his famous art collection. His Highness owns a lion's share of the richest bank in Germany, the Bank of Liechtenstein, and his assets are valued at an estimated $2.5 billion.[110]

Hans Adam's fascination with UFOs may seem plebeian, but he has bankrolled some of the dizziest operatives in UFOlogy to fan a smokescreen for abductions by the mind control underground. In this context, traipsing after flying saucers is as imperious and arrogant as one might expect. In 1995, Prince Hans Adam was an "anonymous donor" to a conference on "alien" abductions at MIT. The conference drew about 100 abductees, scientists, doctors, psychiatrists and a pair of admitted intelligence agents.[111] The itinerary featured a lecture by John Mack, the Harvard psychiatrist Pulitzer Prized for his biography of Lawrence of Arabia, famed for his work with "alien" abductees. Less well-known is his deep background in psychoanalyzing fear and trauma in children, leadership in political organizations with CIA ties, an obsession with Werner Erhard's mind control techniques, and a $200,000 donation from Laurance Rockefeller, channeled through C.B. Scott Jones's Human Potential Foundation to fund his therapeutic work with "alien" abductees.[112]

John Alexander: Connect the Metaphysical-Industrial dots—UFOlogist Robert Durant mentions names and cover stories already examined in connection with "non-lethal" EM technology:

> Scott's friend, Colonel John Alexander, was Jones's fellow researcher on anomalies in the Bahamas, and has displayed a long term interest in the paranormal. Alexander has actively promoted psychic metal bending among government personnel using the techniques pioneered by Jack Houck of McDonnell-Douglas.
> Alexander is a former president of the International Association for Near-Death Studies, and he worked with Elizabeth Kubler-Ross. Alexander also served as the military liaison to the National Research Council's panel evaluating parapsychological applications.
> Reportedly, he had access to classified government material on parapsychology. Alexander had a 32-year career in the Army, including a stint as director of the Advanced Systems Concept Office, U.S. Army Laboratory Command. Alexander

also was chief of the Advanced Human Technology Office of the Intelligence & Security Command (INSCOM)."[113]

Alexander and Janet Morris, research director of the U.S. Global Strategy Council, teamed up with Newt Gingrich on his first book, Window of Opportunity, released in 1984. "Gingrich acknowledges in the book that Janet Morris, research director of the U. S. Global Strategy Council, coached the congressman through the book and gave form to his ideas. Former Jones staffer Richard Farley offers: "It was Janet's more recent 'nemesis,' her once friend and colleague John Alexander in 'non-lethal' weapons R & D, who helped Newt get his 'thinking cap' straightened out. Alexander taught them NLP (neuro-linguistic programming)." NLP, of course, is a form of hypnotic behavior modification.

Alexander ran the "non-lethal" weapons lab at Los Alamos in New Mexico. Non-lethals are a scientific bull market for virtual government technocrats. A monograph from Los Alamos ponders the bioeffects of EM radiation, or "friendly force":

> PHYSIOLOGICAL RESPONSES APPLICABLE TO DEVELOPMENT OF LESS-THAN-LETHAL WEAPONS
> Sponsored by National Institute of Justice, Oak Ridge National Laboratory
> Less-than-lethal weapons have a variety of applications in law enforcement, including rescuing hostages, stopping fleeing felons and quelling prison disturbances. The National Institute of Justice is sponsoring a broad program to develop new techniques for "friendly force" as an alternative to the use of deadly force. As part of this program, Oak Ridge National Laboratory (ORNL) is examining approaches based on known physiological responses to certain types of stimuli. These "weapons" would temporarily incapacitate an individual or a group with no lasting physiological damage. These concepts are based on ORNL's experience and expertise in biological-based systems and biophysical responses, particularly in evaluating the physical responses of humans to a variety of chemical, physical and radiological agents....
> ORNL has already examined several possible concepts for less-than-lethal weapons based on known physiological responses to energetic stimuli, including a thermal gun, a seizure gun, and a magnetophosphene gun. A thermal gun would have the operational effect of heating the body to 105 to 107°F, thereby incapacitating any threat, based on the fact that even a slight fever can affect the ability of a person to perform even simple tasks. This approach is built on four decades of research relating radio frequency exposure to body heating. A seizure gun would > use electromagnetic energy to induce epileptic-like seizures in persons within the range of a particular electromagnetic field. The magnetophosphene gun is designed around a biophysical mechanism which evokes a visual response and is thought to be centered in the retina, known as magnetophosphenes. This effect is experienced when a person receives a blow to the head and sees "stars." This same effect can be produced with electromagnetic energy.

British reporter Armen Victorian concluded that Alexander is an active operative assigned to a covert military group "specializing in dissemination of disinformation," collectively known as the "Aviary." [114] ("Remote viewers" Ed Dames, Hal Puthoff, David Morehouse and Courtney Brown are also Avarians.)

The Albuquerque Journal reported on March 10, 1993 that Alexander had organized a national conference in Santa Fe devoted to research reports of "ritual abuse, near-death experiences, human contacts with extraterrestrial aliens (sic) and other so-called 'anomalous experiences.'"

"Something's happening that's impacting on the psyché of America," Alexander told the Journal. "That's for sure."

Nomenclature of a Brain Trust

> There is no doubt that the original Laurance Rockefeller, now 85 years old, is the power behind much UFO research in the United States. This man, one of two surviving grandsons of the first John D. Rockefeller, has been a true major league player in the affairs of the United States since the 1930s. If he is interested in UFOs, then they are indeed very, very important.

You couldn't miss it. Brightly-lit saucers barreled across the sky and folks periodically disappeared to pop up again with horrific tales of "alien" abduction, mental telepathy and macabre experimentation. Cults, many distributing narcotics, roamed the cities. And then there were the "zombie killers."

A typical example was Tyrone Mitchell, who mowed down a group of young children in a school-yard across the street from his L.A. home on February 24, 1984. He managed to murder one ten-year-old girl and wound thirteen other children before killing himself. His rampage was attributed to drugs and the torment he suffered after his parents, a brother and four sisters were killed at Jonestown, the cloistered CIA concentration camp conceived by U of C

Berkeley's Dr. Lawrence L. Layton. Mitchell had been at Jonestown, too. But the press did not speculate that the cause of his murderous tantrum may have been related to mind control programming conducted in Guyana, or rage-inducing brain stimulation back home.

Mitchell was a bodyguard at the People's Temple for Beatrice Grubbs, formerly a legal secretary for the Internal Revenue Service. She was also one of Jim Jones' most trusted sidekicks. Grubbs narrowly escaped the carnage of Peoples' Temple because she'd been in nearby Georgetown for a dental appointment, accompanied by her bodyguard.

Tom Grubbs, her husband, a psychologist from the University of California, allegedly died in the massacre—but his body was not identified among the dead. Grubbs had been the principal of the People's Temple school.

He also designed Jones's personal sensory deprivation chamber, an implement of torture known as the "box." Experimental subjects (children) were forced inside the chamber, and lowered into a root cellar to simulate the effect of being buried alive. Jones appreciated Grubb's traumatizing "box" so much he ordered a complete set of coffin-shaped models.[115]

Jones researcher Michael Meiers: "Early Temple experiments in sensory deprivation are not well documented, but it is known that Jones imparted his expertise to Donald DeFreeze, who utilized the technique to brainwash Patricia Hearst." Subjects "interred in the boxes were totally deprived of all sensory input." Sans input, the subject emerges from the ordeal in a receptive state for mind control conditioning.

The Peoples' Temple arrived in Ukiah, California in 1965. The Psychic World of California, a paranormal handbook by David St. Clair published seven years later, highly recommended Jim Jones's "psychic healing" abilities to all New Age seekers.[116] The Peoples' Temple flock believed in them as well, but then most were patients from Mendocino State Mental Hospital. (The hospital had been systematically infiltrated by the cult until every employee of the institution was also a parishioner of the Temple. When Governor Reagan scaled back funding for state psychiatric institutions, most of the patients were released to the supervision of the Jones commune—so many, in fact, that the hospital was nearly emptied. It was the first mental hospital in California closed by order of Governor Reagan as a "cost-cutting" measure.

Familiar behavior modification techniques were applied in Guyana. Children were subjected to electric shocks to keep them in line. University of Miami psychologist José Lasaga described Jones's hold on his followers as "mass hypnosis at a social level ... a unique process of group regression that led to a full acceptance of the leader's delusional system."[117] Drug experimentation was conducted with a surfeit of supplies from leading chemical companies, offshoots of I.G. Farben, the German drug conglomerate fused by a complex series of patents and investments with the Rockefeller family's Standard Oil. Jonestown was built on land leased by an attorney for Farben, once the landlord of Auschwitz, like its successor in Guyana a center of inhumane medical experimentation with a mass murder queüe.

In 1978, People's Temple became People's Tomb. Among the public figures to release statements concerning the massacre was Albert Speer, resurfacing in Bonn, West Germany. Speer stated flatly that ODESSA was playing out a strategy to "take control of the U.S."[118]

Keith Harary, a research associate in psychiatry at Maimonides Medical Center in Brooklyn, abruptly resigned and relocated to San Francisco to "investigate" the workings of the cult and direct a year-long counseling program for former cultists. He was employed by leading experimental laboratories for 25 years before he was, by his own account, suddenly gripped by an urge to become a clinical psychologist. A year later, he signed on to the CIA's Stargate "psychic spying" project at SRI, Russell and Targ's stomping grounds, funded by SAIC. Harary holds a Ph.D. in psychology and has published eight books on altered states of consciousness, perception and "coercive influence" (or practical mind control techniques to influence a subject short of violence. Many CIA mind control propagandists focus on "persuasive coercion technology" as a diversion from the advanced methods and machines perfected by the Agency and commonly employed by the intelligence cults.) He is known in occult circles for his contributions to a Duke University study of out-of-body flights. In 1982, Harary founded Delphi Associates with Russell Targ to sell "clairvoyance" to the private sector.[119]

Harary has extensive laboratory experience in the physiology of altered states of consciousness and has developed techniques for inducing them. He is the co-author of a book, Who Do You Think You Are? Explore the Many-Sided Self, which has sold 100,000 copies since its release in November, 1995. He has lectured to the International Association of Law Enforcement Intelligence Analysts, the UN, Stanford University, UC Berkeley, the University of Edinburgh, drawn audiences in Europe, Canada and Russia. He is the research director of the Institute for Advanced Psychology in Tiburon, California.[120]

The media, late in 1995, strained public credulity to the breaking point by reporting Stargate's far-fetched cover stories without a smirk. In a shower of CIA disinformation, all objectivity eroded at the San Francisco Examiner:

> Keith Harary, alone in the white room, had been given an assignment: "Describe the condition of Subject X." Given no other details, he began to concentrate, striving to clear his mind of everything save making "a connection" with this unseen stranger.
> Soon, Harary was describing an "extremely ill person" who had a "physical disease that was affecting his mental state." The subject, he said, may be suffering from multiple sclerosis. In any case, he predicted, the person "would be on a plane in the next two to three days."
> Two days later, in July 1980, American diplomat Richard Queen, one of 53 Americans being held hostage in Iran, was released from captivity. He was flown to a military hospital in West Germany—where he was treated for neurological problems later diagnosed as multiple sclerosis.[121]

From top to bottom of the virtual government's paranormal corps, invasive mind control weapons are bound to lurk nearby. The SRI's "psychic" experiments were duplicated at the Navy Electronics Laboratory in San Diego, not in a tarot parlor—the test runs may well hve been technological, not paranormal. This much is strongly suggested by declassified, internal SRI documents identifying Puthoff and Targ as experimenters in "perceptual augmentation techniques" for the Institute's Electronics and Bioengineering Laboratory.[122]

Concrete evidence that electronic mind control was an object of study at SRI was exposed by the Washington Post on August 7, 1977. When the Navy awarded a contract to the Institute ...

> The scientific assistant to the Secretary of the Navy, Dr. Sam Koslov, received a routine briefing on various research projects, including SRI's.
> As the briefer flashed his chart onto the screen and began to speak, Koslov stormily interrupted, "What the hell is that about?" Among the glowing words on the projected chart, the section describing SRI's work was labeled,
> ELF AND MIND CONTROL
> "ELF" stands for "extremely [low] frequency" electromagnetic waves, from the very slow brain frequencies up to about 100 cycles per second.... But the "Mind Control" label really upset Koslov. He ordered the SRI investigations for the Navy stopped, and canceled another $35,000 in Navy funds slated for more remote viewing work.

Contrary to Koslov's attempt to kill the research, the Navy quietly continued to fork out $100,000 for a two-year project directed by a bionics specialist.[123]

Mind control is not a humanitarian pastime: it is military. As a rule, test subjects are treated with the same thorough disregard for human rights as the radiation tests conducted at the height of the Cold War.

The treatment subjects have received at the hands of their own government would be considered atrocities if practiced in wartime.

Mind control was also used in domestic covert operations designed to further the CIA's heady ambitions, and during the Vietnam War period SRI was a fount of covert political subterfuge.

The Symbionese Liberation Army, like the People's Temple, was a creation of the CIA. The SLA had at its core a clique of black ex-convicts from Vacaville Prison. Donald DeFreeze, otherwise known as "Cinque," led the SLA. He was formerly an informant for the LAPD's Criminal Conspiracy Section and the director of Vacaville's Black Cultural Association (BCA), a covert mind control unit with funding from the CIA channeled through SRI. The Menlo Park behavior modification specialists experimented with psychoactive drugs administered to members of the BCA. Black prisoners were programmed to murder selected black leaders once on the outside. The CIA/SRI zombie killer hit-list included Oakland school superintendent Dr. Marcus Foster and Panthers Huey Newton and Bobby Seale, among others.[124] DeFreeze stated that at Vacaville in 1971–72, he was the subject of a CIA mind control experiment. He described his incarceration on the prison's third floor, where he was corralled by CIA agents who drugged him and predicted that he would become "the leader of a radical movement and kidnap a wealthy person."[125] After his escape from Vacaville (an exit door was left unlocked), that's exactly what he did.

EM mind machines were championed at SRI by Dr. Karl Pribram, director of the Neuropsychology Research Laboratory: "I certainly could educate a child by putting an electrode in the lateral hypothalmus and then selecting the situations at which I stimulate it. In this was I can grossly change his behavior." Psychology Today hailed Pribram as "The Magellan of Brain Science." He obtained his B.S. and M.D. degrees from the University of Chicago and at SRI studied how the brain processes and stores sensory imagery.[126] He is credited with discovering that mental imaging bears a close resemblance to hologram projection (the basis for transmitting images to the brains of experimental subjects under the misnomer "remote viewing"?).

The Institute is joined incestuously to military-industrial sponsors. Former SRI Chairman E. Hornsby Wasson, for example, was a director of several major companies, including Standard Oil of California; he went on to become chairman of the Chamber of Commerce, and CEO of Pacific Telephone & Telegraph.

The SRI/SAIC psi experiments were supervised at Langley by John McMahon, second in command under William Casey, succeeding Bobby Ray Inman, the SAIC director. McMahon has, according to Philip Agee, the CIA whistle-blowing exile, an affinity for "technological exotics for CIA covert actions."[127] He was recruited by the Agency after his graduation from Holy Cross College (also the alma mater of CIA contractees Edward Bennett Williams, attorney, and Robert Maheu, hit man). He is a former director of the Technical Services Division, deputy director for Operations, and in 1982, McMahon was appointed deputy director of Central Intelligence. He left the Agency six years later to take the position of president of the Lockheed Missiles and Space Systems Group. In 1994, he moved on to Draper Laboratories. McMahon is a director of the Defense Enterprise Fund and an adviser to congressional committees.[128] This is not exactly the resumé of an eccentric spiritualist.

Many of the SRI "empaths" were mustered from L. Ron Hubbard's Church of Scientology. Harold Puthoff, the Institute's senior researcher, was once a leading Scientologist. Two "remote viewers" from SRI have also held rank in the Church: Ingo Swann, a Class VII Operating Thetan, a founder of the Scientology Center in Los Angeles, and the late Pat Price. Puthoff and Targ's lab assistant was a Scientologist married to a minister of the church. When Swann joined SRI, he stated openly that fourteen "Clears" participated in the experiments."[129] At the time, he denied CIA involvement, but now acknowledges, "it was rather common knowledge all along who the sponsor was, although in documents the identity of the Agency was concealed behind the sobriquet of 'an east-coast scientist.' The Agency's interest was quite extensive. A number of agents of the CIA came themselves ultimately to SRI to act as subjects in remote viewing experiments, as did some members of Congress."[130]

"If you recall," astronaut Edgar Mitchell, another participant in the experiments, reminded radio disinformation broker Art Bell on April 30, 1996, "back in the early 70s, I did work at SRI with Harold Puthoff and Russell Targ and Uri Geller, and I was invited to brief the CIA on our results. George Bush was head of the CIA at that time." (Mitchell was preaching to the choir—Bell's own background is strongly suggestive of military intelligence and advanced weapons involvement: his mother was a Marine drill instructor, his father a Marine officer. Bell served in the Air Force for a dozen years as a microwave electronics technician. He has also been employed by ITT in Nutley, NJ, a manufacturer of sophisticated radar and navigational devices for the military. The participation of ITT in cloaked CIA misadventures is widely documented.)

Mitchell spins a cocoon of metaphysical yarns as outrageously far-fetched as any of his SRI cronies. He claims to have traced the brain's center of ESP to native creativity, a "relationship that exists in nature, it's responsible for our inner-experience.... It involves the zero-point field, quantum physics, mystical experience, para-psychological functioning." The ubiquitous "aliens," he insists, are at the heart of the federal UFO cover-up, visitors from a civilization "a few million, or even a few billion years older than we are." His book The Way of the Explorer is chock-a-block with the astronaut's rambling metaphysical cover stories.

The Agency was reportedly so taken with the SRI experiments that the bankroll for "human augmentation" research swelled. Millions of dollars were thrown at "Grill Flame" under (DIA) and Navy auspices. The projects at SRI were augmented by a parapsychology team at Fort Meade in Maryland under INSCOM and the NSA. Military intelligence personnel were recruited, including Major Ed Dames. General Stubblebine ran the project and broadened it to include tarot cards and the channeling of "spirits." By this time, Puthoff and Swann left the Church of Scientology to join a spin-off religious movement. The DIA inherited Project Grill Flame.

A reporter for the BBC (requesting anonymity) offered a glimpse of the Army's remote viewing project at Fort Meade. He declares that he was given the "Official Line"—that is, "we were about to be used for disinformation. As soon as I started asking hard questions, the project was taken away from us and [given] to a far more docile broadcaster."

The British correspondent learned on the tour that medical oversight for the "remote viewing" experiments was provided by Dr. Louis Jolyon West, a retired professor of psychiatry at UCLA, one of the most notorious CIA mind control specialists in the country. Apart from monitoring the health of subjects, according to SRI spokesmen, Dr. West conducted his own experimental studies of the "phenomenology of dissociative states," or multiple personalities, at SRI. Dr. Colin Ross, a specialist in dissociative disorders, confirms that Dr. West's work for the CIA centered on the biology or personality of dissociated states.[131]

In "Pseudo-Identity and the Treatment of Personality Change in Victims of Captivity and Cults," "Jolly" West details the creation of "changelings," or dissociative personalities. "Prolonged environmental stress," UCLA's own CIA mind control specialist observes, "or life situations profoundly different from the usual, can disrupt the normally integrative functions of personality. Individuals subjected to such forces may adapt through dissociation by generating an altered persona, or pseudo-identity."

Patricia Hearst (examined by Dr. West for trial) hosted an alternate personality named "Pearl," he reports. The newspaper heiress was subjected to a corpus of trauma-based programmimg of a sort developed by CIA specialists (e.g. Dr. West):

> [Patricia], violently abducted by members of the [CIA-mustered] Symbionese Liberation Army in February of 1974, [was] brutalized, raped, tortured and forced to participate in illegal acts beginning with the bank robbery for which she was later (in our view wrongly) convicted. The traumatic kidnapping and subsequent two months of torture produced in her a state of emotional regression and fearful compliance with the demands and expectations of her captors.
> This was quickly followed by the coerced transformation of Patty into Tania and subsequently (less well known to the public) into Pearl, after additional trauma over a period of many months (Hearst & Moscow, 1988; The Trial of Patty Hearst, 1976). Tania was merely a role coerced on pain of death; it was Pearl who later represented the pseudo-identity which was found on psychiatric examination by one of us (West) shortly after Hearst's arrest by the FBI. Chronic symptoms of PTSD were also prominent in this case.[132]

Many survivors of CIA-sponsored experimentation have been left with multiple personalities induced at a tender age, and it is reported by subjects that the CIA can trigger electronically from a remote source to commit any act on cue—the ultimate Manchurian Candidate.

In Such Things are Known, electronic mind control subject Dorothy Burdick discusses one of Dr. West's writing partners, Dr. Jerome Siegal, another UCLA psychiatrist—the creator of FOCUS (the Flexible Optical Control Unit Simulator), a machine that projects images directly on the retina, rendering the image indistinguishable from reality. In 1968, Siegal published a monograph, "A Device for Chronically Controlled Visual Input," which describes a device that broadcasts visual images to the brain via the optic nerve.

Dr. William Sweet of Massachussetts General Hospital, another psychiatrist from the Louis J. West mind control circle, implanted four electrode strands in the brain of Leonard Kille, a referral misdinagnosed by Sweet and his colleagues as "epileptic" after losing his temper at his wife after learning that she'd been carrying on an affair with a boarder.

Dr. Sweet didn't lack credentials. He is the co-inventor of the PET scan, and he lists among the many accomplishments in his vitae the development of "the most frequently used procedure for the treatment of trigeminal neuralgia (radiofrequency lesioning of the trigeminal ganglion)." But Kille didn't know he'd been selected as a mind control test subject in Sweet's radio-frequency experiments, or that his doctor had no intention of treating his "disorder." The subject was partially paralyzed for life.

Oblivious to the destruction he'd visited upon Leonard Kille, Dr. Sweet crowed in medical journals that the procedure was a stunning success.

In 1995, Dr. Sweet's morbid medical curiosity caught the attention of the corporate media. Reporting was spotty. Dr. Sweet was not identified as a CIA asset.

> RELATIVES PREPARE SUIT OVER BRAIN TUMOR TREATMENT
> (New York Beacon, October 4, 1995)
>
> Cancer patients who underwent experimental radiation therapy blamed for killing at least 10 of them were unwitting pigs for doctors who knew it was useless, according to suit prepared on their behalf.
> Relatives of two patients who died in 1961 after brain tumor treatment at Massachusetts General Hospital and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology prepared the suit for filing today in U.S. District Court in New York.... The idea was to destroy tumors by injecting them with boron and exposing the chemical to a beam of neutrons, but the treatment was found to also kill brain tissue and blood vessels.
> "The early experiences were very unfortunate," Dr. Victor Bond, head of the medical department at Brookhaven, said in a 1982 interview cited in the suit.
>
> The suit maintains that none of the patients was told enough about the procedures to give consent....
> "It is a monstrous crime that Dr. William Sweet did, and I'm glad that he is still living so that he can be exposed, not as a great scientist, but as the monster that he is," Evelyn Heinrich [said].

Sweet's patients were treated to cancer-eating streams of boron radiation at the Brookhaven reactor. They were stretched out in a coffin-like trench in the concrete floor, their heads positioned over a hole and a nuclear reactor that blasted neutrons through their brains.

In his current resumé, Dr. Sweet boasts that he is a "major proponent of Boron Neutron Capture Therapy for brain tumors."

"We were really completely in the dark," Sweet told journalist Pete Carey from U.S. News & World Report (September 18, 1995), "as to what was going to happen." He is still in the dark, but that hasn't stopped Massachussetts General from reviving the experiments more than 30 years later. "Last September," Carey discovered, "researchers at Brookhaven National Laboratory in New York began treating 28 cancer patients with the procedure. Scientists there have developed an improved boron compound and a new neutron energy beam, reviving hopes for the treatment. More recently, a consortium of physicians leased an idled government nuclear reactor in Idaho. Their plan: to use the reactor [for] treatment of brain tumors. Despite those developments, critics say, [the] treatment is as useless now as it was 30 years ago."

Dr. Sweet's theories of brain surgery are not exactly geared toward healing, either, according to Peter Schrag in Mind Control 1978):

> Between 1968 and 1972, Vernon Mark, William Sweet and Frank Ervin reported on a series of cases purporting to show the effectiveness of psychosurgical procedures. One of them was a woman who, after two such operations, became enraged and refused any further psychosurgery. The doctors dismissed the rage as "paranoid," but they removed the electrodes and, noting her good mood and "high spirits," released her from the hospital to go shopping. She went directly to a phone booth, called her mother to say good-bye, took poison and killed herself. The doctors interpreted the suicide as an indication that she was functioning and therefore getting well, a "gratifying result of the operation."

Vernon Mark, Dr. Sweet's partner in psychosurgical crime, is currently the director of the Center for Memory Impairment and Neuro-Behavioral Disorders in Brookline, Massachussetts, and author of Brain Power: A Neurosurgeon's Complete Program to Maintain and Enhance Brain Fitness Throughout Your Life (Houghton Mifflin, 1989).

Under Dr. West's tutelage at UCLA, parapsychology experimentation of a sort was conducted by Kirlian aura researcher Thelma Moss, a writer for television and a human guinea-pig herself in LSD experiments conducted by the CIA in 1957. Three years later, as a UCLA psychology student, she designed protocols for her own LSD experiments under the supervision of Dr. Oscar Janiger.[133]

The CIA, of course, could not be far away. Dr. Janiger's supplier of the drug was the legendary Captain Al Hubbard, the "Johnny Appleseed of LSD." "Nothing of substance has been written about Al Hubbard," Janiger once said, "and probably nothing ever should."[134] Hubbard, a convicted rum-runner, had a knack for electronic communications. He was recruited by the OSS by agents of Allen Dulles and almost certainly reported to the CIA thereafter. Hubbard, an arch-conservative, joined SRI at the urging of Willis Harman, director of the Institute's Educational Policy Research Center, ostensibly as a "security guard." Harman, an LSD experimenter himself, admits, "Al never did anything resembling security work." Hubbard was employed on the Alternative Futures Project, a "corporate strategy program."

"Al had a grandiose idea," a co-worker recalls, "that if he could give the psychedelic experience to the major executives of the Fortune 500 companies, he could change the whole of society."[135] Hubbard was a major supplier to universities sponsoring experimentation, and flooded the youth subculture he despised with LSD in the 1960s. The massive drug-dealing operation—at least as large as the government's—had Harmon's full support.

Among the labs closed in 1966 with the criminalization of LSD was Dr. Janiger's.[136] His protégé, Thelma Moss, continued to experiment with the hallucinogen as a psychotherapeutic tool, and later an ESP trigger and for experiments in "behavior modification."[136] Her increasingly bizarre interests led her to Kirlian photography and she christened a lab at UCLA under Dr. West.[137]

At least one volunteer in Moss's experiments alleges to have been led down a blind alley to lifelong torture. D.S. (requesting anonymity) appeared on Moss's doorstep in 1978. After the experiments, she was stricken by "back-to-back psychic experiences"—not true ones, she realized, but precognitive dreams "that had to be fed to me." (Subjects of EM assault frequently complain that their dreams are commandeered.) For fifteen years she walked through a barrage of novelty effects. The "psychic" episodes gradually gave way to torture, including head pains and endless hours of "persuasive coercion," the art of psychological paralysis honed by the CIA in the prison system. In 1994 she began to receive non-stop audio transmissions that still torment her, cybernetic "voices" registering on her brain's "primary frequency allocation," her own mental "channel."

The resident "psychic" at Moss's parapsychology lab was graduate student Barry Taff. Moss recalls that Taff had "the special gift" of falling into a trance at will. He is also a certified hypnotist.[138]

Israeli Schlomo Arnon, an electrical engineer on loan to Moss from the UCLA Physics Department, suggests on hindsight that Taff was familiar with the development of "non-lethal" weapons of the sort used in CIA mind control operations—decades before they were popularized by John Alexander and the military-intelligence "alien"-touting Aviary.

"In all the conversations with Taff, he and I were always on the same 'frequency,'" Arnon recalls. "Except for one occasion: He told me a story I will never forget, because it was so unusual. He said he was present in a military experiment, where a tank had been blown out by a laser beam at a distance of a few hundred yards. And this is in the mid-seventies! Now, I have never known him to lie to me. He did not have to tell me anything. I was never interested in anything else outside of the paranormal. If he really saw it, this is a technology that even today we don't admit that we have."[139]

The cryptic Barry Taff has gone on to become a noted UFOlogist, parapsychologist and screenwriter (UFO Cover Up, Live!).

Val Bankston, an abductee, met Taff in the course of seeking answers to her abuse by the ubiquitous "aliens."

"You may recognize the name Barry Taff," she says. "He consulted on a movie called The Entity. Shortly after we met, I was assaulted by a disembodied 'entity' during broad daylight [a "novelty effect' of electromagnetic harassment], who engaged in sexual acts with me. At the time, I believed that it was an incubus. Now, knowing what I do about Barry—the fact that he is a certified hypnotist, for one—I believe that Barry hypnotized both me and the other subject of his research leading to the movie The Entity into having these experiences. I believe that this woman and I may have been sexually assaulted, and caused to remember the sensations at a later date than the activities actually occurred. He probably did several women this way, and picked the one that was the best at bolstering his book and movie scheme."[140]

Another indication that military biotechnology, cyber-psi, was focal in Stargate research was the Agency's choice of the American Institutes of Research (AIR) in Washington, D.C. to evaluate the validity of "remote viewing." AIR could be counted on to keep the secrets. In the 1970s, the Army's Office of the Inspector General released declassified files disclosing a series of CIA-DoD behavior modification experiments conducted in prisons, mental hospitals and campuses from 1950 through 1971. The documents identified 44 laboratories enriched with public tax funds for secret, inhumane brain research. The first on the list was AIR.[141] SRI also received funding. An in-house "study" ensured CIA personnel would not be dragged in from the "cold."

Some of the aims of the research:

- Inducing toxic psychosis, terminal cancer, stress, sleep, headaches and chemical lobotomies.
- Developing foods that taste normal but stimulate fear and anxiety.
- The concoction of drugs to facilitate the brainwashing of civilians.
- Using LSD-25 and electrodes in the brain to pinpoint pain centers.

A number of SRI spin-offs have taken "remote viewing" into the private sector. A brochure for the Farsight Institute promotes the "alien" diversion:

> The Farsight Institute (TFI) was founded by Courtney Brown, Ph.D, in 1995, evolving from a research program that he conducted in the early 1990s, described in his book Cosmic Voyage: A Scientific Discovery of Extraterrestrials Visiting Earth (Dutton 1996). Dr. Brown's investigations began with his training in a remote viewing technology that had previously been used by the U.S. military during highly classified operations in the 1980s and 90s.
> Historically, the principal breakthroughs with this technology were made at Stanford Research Institute in the 1970s and 1980s by the gifted artist and natural psychic, Ingo Swann. The vision of The Farsight Institute is to promote the continued research and development of the most modern and effective forms of this continually evolving technology.

Other "remote viewing" gurus from the SRI program have sprung up like poison mushrooms around the country, ranting about the paranormal, scapegoating "aliens." The rhetoric is a serious development in mind control—cult programming for mass consumption. The populace is now subjected to the same crazed systems used to indoctrinate recruits of the mind control cults. Psi-Tech founder Ed Dames claimed on Art Bell's syndicated radio program that his company can comb the "collective unconscious" for answers to such mysteries as the origins of the AIDS virus. By scanning the "Global Mind," Dames claims, "we perceived massive global weather changes that preclude growing crops, a tremendous problem with epidemics and pandemics in Third World countries because it appears the ozone problem is increasing the mutation rate. We're perceiving a bovine AIDS that kills a lot of babies.

The future "gets grimmer after that."[142] It certainly did for the Rancho Santa Fe cult believing in Dames's "remote viewing" of the "Hale-Bopp spaceship"—"fantastic proof" of the group's far-fetched religious cosmology—they suicided.

Parapsychology, E.T.s and the "End Times" are not just for the tabloids anymore—the intelligence community wants you to believe ... believe ...

Like so many Cold War propagandists. In fact, current mind control disinformation has its foundations in anti-Communist propaganda. Lt. Col Thomas Beardon, an Army Reservist, was made to order in magazines published by the "Committee to Restore the Constitution" and other ultra-conservative organizations. Beardon had a loyal following. He made a career of writing about emergent Soviet EM mind control technology, but somehow it rarely seemed to cross his mind that the U.S. might be pursuing the same initiative. Beardon warned that the Soviets were developing weapons that generate "time-reversed (TR) electromagnetic waves," and were capable of launching a "TR Blitzkrieg War" of awful proportions. He warned grimly that the black-hearted Communists had their hands on "time-reversal" weapons that could "take Europe." A single flying Soviet "TR wave weapon," he claimed, was capable of knocking out all British and American radars. It could "kill personnel wholesale."[143]

Return of The Cabalistic Reich

There is a growth industry in electromagnetic assaults on the brain. "Some of the people trained for this computer science type of control," concludes San Francisco mind control researcher Elizabeth Russell-Manning, "are Werner Erhard graduates (EST), as well as students from many of the ivy league schools (University of California, Stanford M.I.T., etc.)."[144]

Jack Sarfatti, a physicist with a degree from Cornell—home of the CIA's Human Ecology Fund, the mind control funding pool—class of 1960: "I did graduate from an Ivy League school, where CIA finds many of its 'academics,'" Sarfatti says. "Couple that with the fact that my former professors at Cornell are the guys who built the bomb in the Manhattan project and that I was a National Defense Fellow. Just put two and two together and read between the lines the remark of British agent, Dennis Bardens, to me in 1974 at the Blue Boar Inn in Cambridge, England: 'Doctor Sarfatti, it is my duty to inform you of a psychic war raging across the continents between the Soviet Union and your country.'"

Connect the dots in Jack Sarfatti's recent journey through an Oz of mind control "mystics" and old-guard Nazis:

> I was back in Paris several weeks later [at] the swank Ritz Hotel. We waited in the lobby and a guy who looked like Richard Gere in a jump suit walks in with a woman. He says: 'Hi, I'm Werner Erhard.'... We flew to New York. Sharon and I spent a few days with Uri Geller, Ira Einhorn, Bob Toben, Sir John Whitmore and Andrija Puharich at Puharich's large house in Ossining.

Sarfatti stayed with his "literary agent," Ira Einhorn, and his "doomed girlfriend Holly Maddux." Einhorn took him on a junket to Arthur Young's mansion. Young, the inventor of the Bell Helicopter, had been a close friend of Charles Lindbergh, the pro-Nazi aviator. Young landed Paine a position at Bell Aircraft under former Nazi General Walter Dornberger, who oversaw V-2 development for the Nazis and was snatched from a death sentence at Nuremberg by the United States Air Force.[145]

Young was married to an heiress of the Forbes Steel fortune. He was also the sugar daddy of the Institute for the Study of Consciousness in Berkeley, California. The melange of cultists at Young's mansion was rife with intelligence intrigues and Nazi plots. Sarfatti:

> The estoids all seemed to be glassy-eyed and very creepy. I was not at all subservient to Werner in his presence like most of the academics that surrounded and apparently adored him.... Werner had fifteen loyal estoids in the Carter White House. [He] was very active with trainings of government people in Washington D.C.... Werner used remote-viewing in his training and he also contributed money to SRI for that project....
> Werner had me meet with several Stanford and U.C. faculty before he set up the Physics Consciousness Research Group at Esalen with me and Michael Murphy as co-directors. Michael arranged for Jean Lanier to supply me with money. Jean was a close friend of Laurance Rockefeller who would telephone the Nob Hill flat looking for her....
> I attended the est April Celebrity Training of 1975.... Sterling Hayden quickly walked out calling Werner a "Nazi" as he pushed away some estoids who tried to block his passage.... I was getting suspicious of Werner, especially after I heard the rumor that he said he changed his name from Jack Rosenberg to Werner Erhard to "give up Jewish weakness for German strength."
>
> I received a phone call from a man named George Koopman during one of our Esalen seminars in 1976.... He provided money through military contracts with the Air Force and the U.S. Army Tank Command funneled through his company Insgroup in Irvine, California.... I found out through one of my girlfriends that Koopman succeeded in spying on the Arica organization.... Arica was started in Chile by high ranking fugitives from the Third Reich who were masters of the occult. Many of the regulars at Esalen including some of our group like Dr. John Lilly and Claudio Naranjo had been in the first Arica training in Chile. Timothy Leary was released from prison. Leary became part of my group at Esalen. Leary was a close friend of Michael Murphy....
> I walked into the Caffe Trieste one day in 1979. A young girl Maiti said she had written a poem about me. We soon started dating. She said her father [Robert Dickson Crane] was a "senior policy planner" in the government.... She showed me a photograph of her grandfather who was German [Nazi] General Hans Rudel during World War Two [and an ODESSA leader]. Her father had > met her mother while on Army duty after the war.... Her father was an Arabic-speaking expert in Middle-East affairs with high level contacts... She also said that her father was a close friend of conservative Pat Buchanan....

> My adventures with two more women during this period are worth mentioning.... One named Crystal picked me up in the Caffe Trieste. She was a statuesque blonde in a low cut green evening dress. Crystal said she belonged to a Coven of Beautiful Witches who wanted me to be their Warlock. I later found out that Crystal knew another girl friend of mine from Esalen named Betty Andreason. I have since heard of a woman by that name who claims to have been abducted by UFOs....
> Was Jan telling the truth about the Fourth Reich using Arica to influence the New Age? Brewer was part of the original Esalen group of forty that went to Chile for the first Arica training.[146]

Sarfatti makes no bones about the involvement of the CIA in his "occult" projects. He has identified the late Harold Chipman, a former CIA station chief, as the middle-man in funding to SRI's remote viewing lab and even Uri Geller.[147] Chipman served in Laos in the mid-1960s. In Vietnam, he was the director of all CIA operations in Nha Trang. After the war, he was assigned to Moscow, Berlin and Miami.[148]

Sarfatti looks back on his involvement with the mind control sector as if he has severed all bonds. "I was then simply a young, inexperienced, naive 'useful idiot' in a very very sophisticated and successful covert psychological warfare operation run by the late Brendan O. Regan of the Institute of Noetic Sciences and the late Harold Chipman, who was the CIA station chief responsible for all mind-control research in the Bay Area in the 70s. Chipman (aka 'Orwell') funded me openly for awhile in 1985 when he was allegedly no longer in the CIA, and covertly before that, and told me much of the story. In fact, he even introduced me to a beautiful woman adventurer-agent who was one of his RV subjects who later became my live-in 'significant other.'"

In fact, Chipman was one of Sarfatti's numerous contacts in the murky intelligence world. His resumé boasts that he was "consulted" on the physics of "remote-viewing," Strategic Defense Initiative, and other classified matters for several U.S. intelligence agencies and policy think tanks (e.g., A.L. Chickering of the Institute for Contemporary Studies in San Francisco, and CIA propagandist Robert Conquest of the Hoover Institution at Stanford on the new paperback edition of Special Tasks by former KGB officer Sudoplatov)." Conquest was exposed in 1967 as a CIA disinformation agent for Melvin Lasky's Congress for Cultural Freedom, the publisher of Encounter, a pasty academic loaf of white-bread political commentary, during the Cold War. Conquest currently grinds out slippery pro-business tirades disparaging Soviet Communism and the American Left,[149] a genré of opinion-shaping that went out with the Wooly Mammoth but has been resurected with the "conservative" propaganda onslaught of the 1990s.

The Arica Institute bills itself as "a mystical school" for "spiritual transformation" through meditation, gymnastic "psychocalisthenics" (sic), nonverbal communication and group theater.[150] Oscar Ichazo, the institute's founder, teaches a hodge-podge of Zen, Sufism, Yoga, I Ching and Buddhism. The symbol adopted by Ichazo for Arica resembles a top-heavy pentagram, known as the Enneagon, representing "a body of practical and theoretical knowledge in the form of a nine-level hierarchy of training programs aimed at the total development of the human being."[151] Ichazo held his first Arica seminar in Chile in 1971. It was attended by Charles Tart, LSD experimenter Lilly (then studying on a fellowship at the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences in Palo Alto), Naranjo and about 45 Sufi poseurs. Since, some 40 training centers have surfaced in the U.S., South America, Europe and Australia.

Arica is a small cloud in a big sky. But as the Pentagon's psychotronic arsenal proliferates, so do the victims of illicit experimentation and harassment.

Meanwhile, back in the USSR, Georgey Georgyevich Rogozin, a former Soviet undercover officer and occultist, was named a ranking general in May, 1995 by Boris Yeltsin. It was said that Rogozin "terrorized" Kremlin bureaucrats. He was given free reign in his occult studies, which included 'reading thoughts at a distance, obtaining information by way of analyzing man's biological electric field.'" The CIA has followed these developments closely ...[152]

The Search for the MANCHURIAN Preschooler

In September 1995, a psychology conference held in Los Angeles explored the treatment of children subjected to experiments by the CIA's mind control fraternity. Topics on the conference itinerary included discussions of torture-based programming, the treatment of multiplicity and the remote control of human automata ...

Time Machine: Singed Synapses, Muffled Scream

The debris of Berlin smoldered. The American intelligence "services" quietly courted Nazis and their Quislings in the Soviet satellites. Some 5,000 European "anti-Communists," according to the Washington Post for June 9, 1982, quietly emigrated to the United States. In the early days of television, young Ronald Reagan's fund-raising acumen was tapped by the "Crusade for Freedom," a CIA front. The then "liberal" celluloid cut-out and FBI informant appeared in a cameo spot to talk viewers out of their hard-earned dollars to fund the migration of East European "freedom fighters" to the United States—these paragons were really diehard Nazis. The CIA, Pentagon and an army of Nazi recruits have since consummated an ideological bond that has held in sickness and in stealth.

In 1950, the Agency tooled up for a battery of mind control experiments on human guinea pigs, underwritten by a network of scientific foundations and academic fronts. Neuropsychiatrists at Tulane, McGill, Yale, UCLA and Harvard, some of them laboring beside the Nazi imports, researched the use of brain implants to control behavior. Dozens of books and articles have since appeared describing grim laboratory experiments—none chronicle the use of children in The Firm's mind control initiative (in part, presumably, because journalists never imagined children could be used in such a bloodthirsty way).

An article written in the 1960s by Dr. José Delgado, a Yale psychiatrist hailing from Franco's Spain, detailed his experiments on an 11-year-old boy with electrodes implanted in his brain. Dr. Delgado stimulated his young subject's synapses with a radio transmitter at a range of 100 feet. The boy was immediately stripped of his sexual identity, reporting that he wasn't sure if he was a boy or a girl.

One survivor recalls that she'd been instructed to address her CIA programmer as "Herr Doctor."

Some of the children subjected to the experimentation, according to New Orleans psychologist Valerie Wolf, were fragmented by trauma-based programming into a spate of alternate personalities. "Most of these patients responded to certain sounds," Wolf reported in testimony to the President's Advisory Committee on Radiation Experiments on March 15, 1995, "clickers, metronomes or just clicking the tongue or hand clapping. Patients would vacillate from calm to robotically asking, 'Who do you want me to kill?'"

They were triggered to attempt suicide and attack the therapist, or march out of the office in a fugue state to assassinate somebody.

Claudia Mullens, a survivor of the experiments, testified at the Advisory Committee hearings about a trip in 1959 to the Deer Creek camp in Maryland, then used to train child prostitutes for sexual blackmail operations. At the camp, she was the "guest" of a Mr. Sheiber, an alias of the CIA's notorious LSD*meister* Dr. Sidney Gottleib:

> Most of the men I came to know well were either there as observers or volunteer targets. We were taught different ways to please men and at the same time ask questions to get them to talk about themselves. Then we had to recall everything about them....
> After this trip, I mainly went to hospitals, Army or Air Force bases or universities or the hotels in New Orleans and a place called the TRIMS facility in Texas.

The sole CIA official not briefed on the cabin and Dr. Gottlieb's child prostitution ring was John McCone, a former director who might have objected to the use of seven-year-old girls to gather information and ply their training in sexually "coercive techniques."

Weeping in the Playtime of Others, by former Princeton scholar Ken Wooden, describes a mental institution near Dallas, Texas that conducted freakish sensory deprivation experiments on retarded children of military personnel:

> On the grounds I noticed a strange structure with heavy, black plastic covering all the windows. That evening, a former house parent told me it was the private domain of a Dr. Snapp, who believes that the children are not retarded, but that their intellectual development has been aborted by birth.
> Dr. Snapp believes he has restructured the mother's womb with totally darkened rooms, and he places the child there to grow.
>
> Donna Parrish came close to dying in her "womb." When her parents removed her after four weeks in this atmosphere, they found her body covered with sores.

"Most patients," Wolf testified at the Advisory Committee hearings, "reported neo-Nazi alter personalities who believed in the coming of the next Reich."

Other symptoms of survivors include grand mal epileptic seizures with a temporary cessation of breathing. Doctors managed to strap one survivor to an EEG machine in the midst of a seizure—his brain waves registered normal—in other words, the fit was not a true grand mal, but a body memory of electric shocks years after the torture occurred.

ECT, the invention of Dr. Ugo Cerletti, another Spanish fascist, was often applied to various parts of the body, Wolf says, "usually the physical places that do not readily show or in tissue that heals quickly." High technology was combined with drugs, hypnosis and torture to create alter personalities. Years before Silicon Valley introduced virtual-reality computerware, children by the score told psychotherapists they'd been forced to wear goggles that flashed 3-D images of horror and death.

Cult Abuse of Children and Mind Control Programming

In the mid-1960s, Langley's spychologists feared exposure. Newspaper reporters had caught wind of Auschwitzian behavioral modification research funded by the government. Congress was asking questions. The thugs at Langley scratched their heads. It was only a matter of time before an inquisitive reporter exposed the rot of mind control.

The solution: CIA scientists bugged out of the laboratory. The experiments were moved into the community, hidden, like the flying saucers, in plain sight. Eccentric religious groups were organized or co-opted by intelligence operatives, including the People's Temple, the Symbionese Liberation Army, Ordo Templis Orientis (OTO), Finders, Solar Temple and the Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh Movement, among others.

In 1966 Charles Buckey built a preschool in Manhattan Beach, California. Buckey was an engineer at Hughes Aircraft (a household crack of the period: "Hughes is the CIA").

The McMartin mind control operation was reportedly the work of an intelligence cult.

The sect is said to be a cut-out of the American security elite's mind control fraternity. It isn't unique. There is much intermingling. Janet Morris, for instance, a science fiction writer and charter member of the Association for Electronic Defense, is a member of the Subud sect, an interdemonational group with roots in Indonesia. She is also research director of the U.S. Global Strategy Council, a Washington "think tank" founded by ultra-conservatives Claire Booth Luce, Gen. Maxwell Taylor, Gen. Richard Stillwell, former CIA Deputy Director Ray Cline and the abrasive Jeanne Kirkpatrick, among other representatives of virtual government. In 1991, Morris traveled to Russia to study a technological marvel that transmits subliminal command messages over the low frequency infrasound band. Political researcher Armen Victorian discovered that with·the Russian "psycho-correction" transmitter, "subliminal messages bypass the conscious level and are effective almost immediately." Another prominent member of the Subud sect, according to informants, is an executive of Mattell—a leading maker of virtual reality computer games for children, similar to the ones used by CIA scientists to traumatize young subjects. Children at the school mentioned balloon rides, elephants and clowns—were these virtual reality episodes, like the ones reported by Valerie Wolf? Other Subudians include executives of TRW and Hanna-Barbara, a cartoon company founded by OSS agents.

The CIA's hired guns in the media, and front groups like the False Memory Syndrome Foundation (with its shadow chairman Martin Orne, a veteran of the Agency's pedophile/blackmail ring, according to Claudia Mullens), have mustered support for the defendants in the McMartin case by distorting the children's testimony in the press.

It is conveniently forgotten that after the hung jury verdict was delivered in the second trial of Ray Buckey, all jurors at a press conference raised their hands when asked by reporters if they believed children had been abused at McMartin. It had simply not been proven that Buckey was the perpetrator, they said.

Tunnels unearthed beneath the preschool in 1990—60 feet of them, according to five independent scientists from local universities—corroborate the testimony of the children.

The McMartin disclosures to parents and psychologists are identical to those of children victimized in the formative years of the CIA's mind-splintering laboratory experiments.

Oliver Stone was drawn into producing a film, Indictment, conceived by screenwriter Abby Mann and aired by HBO earlier this year. Mann, the Emmy-winner, is also credited with the writing of Judgment at Nuremberg—unfortunately, there was no justice at the Nazi war crimes tribunal. Mann's specialty as a manipulator of public opinion is damage control of blowback from the Nazi diaspora. One of the best-selling Hollywood biographers in the country offers that Abby Mann does not really write screenplays but employs ghostwriters to produce the scripts in his name, an allegation confirmed by researcher Donald Freed.

Indictment conceals the fact that ritual child abuse is a legacy of The Firm's work in torture-based programming.

Treating Mind Controlled Children

On September 30, about 100 psychologists, mostly from the western states, convened at the Biltmore Hotel in Los Angeles for a three-day conference on "Mind Control, Multiplicity and Ritual Abuse." Each of the therapists have patients who have been tormented by cult cut-outs. Conference organizer Catherine Gould, a child psychologist from Encino, California, gave the keynote tour of a programmed multiple's "landscape of alters."

"In most instances," she said, "the alters are cult aligned. They are caught up in the underworld of mind control and know no other life. It isn't unusual for a patient to have an alter who reports to the cult everything said in the last therapy session."

But programmed alters are not the enemy. "They have experienced horror. Sexual abuse may be only one part of the traumatization pattern. Mind control is originally established when the victim is a child under six years old. During this formative stage of development, the perpetrator systematically combines dissociation-enhancing drugs, pain, sexual assault, terror and other forms of psychological abuse in such a way that the child dissociates the intolerable traumatic experience. The exception is the child who cannot dissociate and has been exposed to horror, disintegration and psychological death. The worst perpetrator is rage-based, disconnected from the core personality, and in the course of programming disdain for the victim is instilled in the alter personality. The mother herself may be a cult multiple and an amnestic. "

Mind control programming is deeply embedded, triggered by code words and sounds, sometimes inaudible ones. The alter personalities frequently "live" in the part of the body that has been traumatized. If a child was tortured in the shoulder, this is where an alter will reside. "The psychologist's job," Gould said, "is to map the alters and neutralize 'booby traps'—including suicidal impulses—left by the programmer as a monkey trap in the therapeutic process. The patient is ready to work with conscious memories of the trauma and begins healing when he can move around freely in the system of alters."

Vicki Graham-Costain, Ph.D., a clinical child psychologist, discussed the treatment of character pathologies that accompany mind control conditioning, and the sudden "flooding" of memories of childhood torture lurking behind post-hypnotic obstacles to recall, and in some cases, repression. Dr. David Neswald took up programming neutralization strategies, and common roadblocks to overcoming mind control conditioning. "Survivors are told they will be shunned by 'decent' people," Neswald says, "that people will be repulsed by and never accept them."

The treatment of mind controlled kids is a growing field, despite the call for public denial from the corporate press. Cult abuse of children, Gould wrote in The Journal of Psychohistory in the Spring of 1995, "is considerable in scope and extremely grave in its consequences. Among 2,709 members of the American Psychological Association who responded to a poll, 2,292 cases of ritual abuse were reported. In 1992 alone, ChildHelp USA logged 1,741 calls pertaining to ritual abuse; Monarch Resources of Los Angeles logged 5,000; Real Active Survivors tallied nearly 3,600; Justus Unlimited of Colorado received almost 7,000; and Looking Up Maine handled around 6,000."

Leading scientists in the Company's mind control academy have all at one time or another spoken of creating a "psycho-civilized" society. If this is the grand design, it is built on a bed of torture. Civilization is not the idea.

The Captains of Industry want our heads.

McMartin Preschool

REVISITED

PART I.
Welcome to Manhattan Beach

Paul Bynum graduated from college in 1972 and joined the Hermosa Beach police department a year later. At 31 he was promoted to the rank of chief detective. He was not a typical investigator—a fellow detective observes that Bynum was "too bright to be a cop." Off duty, he drove an MG and mixed with the 60s survivors at the Sweetwater Café. In 1976, Bynum was assigned the investigation of the Karen Klaas murder. Klaas was the divorced wife of Bill Medley, a vocalist for the Righteous Brothers. She was raped and murdered one morning about an hour after dropping her five-year-old son off at the McMartin preschool in Manhattan Beach.

Neighbors told police they'd been alarmed at of a menacing stranger spotted before the murder wandering through the neighborhood. Police later entertained speculation that Klaas had been stalked. Throughout the week her body was found, this same stranger had popped up several times on her street corner. A neighbor phoned Karen to warn her. She didn't answer the phone. When friends entered the back door of the house, concerned for her safety, they found a Caucasian male with a beard, about 5′ 7″, about 28-years-old, dressed in a long olive green coat with a tunic collar and boots, exiting through the front door. Klaas was found naked and unconscious. She died five days later.

Nothing was stolen. Police had no indication that Klaas knew her killer.

In 1984, shortly after indictments were handed down to defendants in the McMartin child molestation case, Gerald Klaas, her husband, drove off a cliff in Oregon and was killed. Children alleged in a grand jury hearing that teachers at the preschool had threatened to kill family members if they disclosed abuse. It was rumored that the Klaas deaths and the McMartin case may have been related.

But police insisted there was no connection. "We have no leads, no suspects and we're not coordinating with Manhattan Beach," Hermosa Beach Lt. Mike Lavin told reporters.[1]

In 1979, Paul Bynum was forced out of the police department without an explanation despite an unblemished record. After the detective completed an investigation of a series of murders of teenage girls in nearby Redondo Beach—culminating in the arrest and conviction of serial killers Roy Norris and Lawrence Bittaker—police chief Frank Beeson pressured him to take a stress leave. Bynum was still haunted by the serial murder investigation, but he remained confident in his emotional stability and refused the leave. The chief obtained an order from the city manager, and Bynum was forced out on indefinite disability leave.

He chalked it up to internal politics, "paranoia," a purging of all potential detractors in the police department.

Bynum told local reporter Kevin Cody: "When the papers reported that Beeson had shown up apparently drunk at his first Hermosa [city] council meeting and dropped his revolver on the floor, he thought we had tipped reporters." Beeson was apparently unaware that reporters routinely attended meetings of the city council.[2]

Bynum found a new career as a private investigator. In March 1984, he was retained by the Buckeys' defense attorney, Danny Davis, and in the course of his investigation came to the conclusion that children had been abused at the preschool. Bynum found the videotaped interviews of the children by child therapists "credible." One afternoon, outside the courtroom, Cody mentioned to Bynum that hundreds of children had alleged abuse took place at the preschool. A dark cloud of distress passed over Bynum's face. He stammered that he had no idea so many children were involved.

In 1986, Bynum was called to testify at the trial of Ray Buckey by prosecutor Lael Rubin. The morning he was to appear, a juror's home was burglarized and the private investigator's testimony was rescheduled for the following morning.

"Neither side is going to like what I have to say," he confided to Cody.

For one thing, there was the matter of Bynum's lost citation books, records he'd kept as a detective in Hermosa Beach. When the police arrested Ray Buckey on child molestation charges, the "lost" books were discovered on the preschool attendant's desk.

What were official police records doing in Buckey's home?

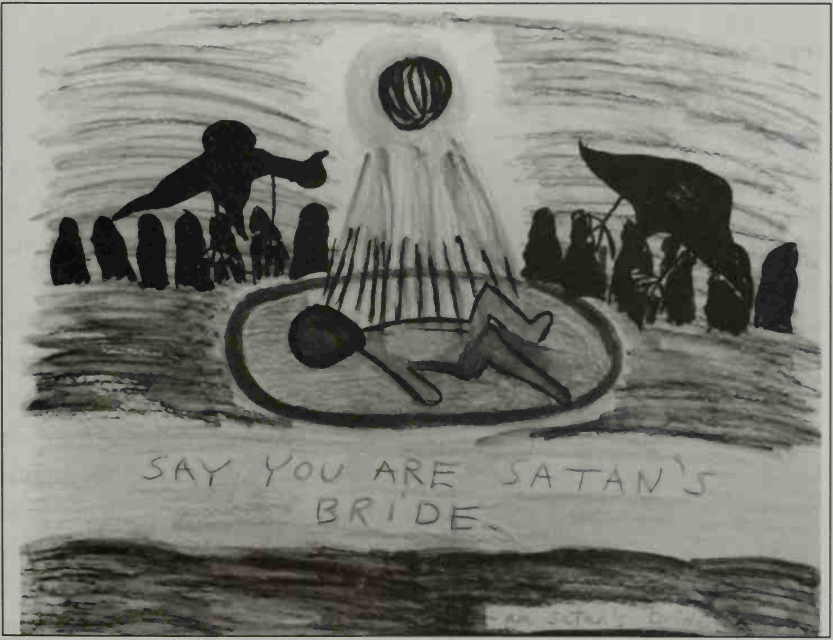
Rubin meant to ask Bynum about a map turned up by investigators from the District Attorney's office in March 1986, pin-pointing the location of turtle shells Bynum had unearthed at the lot adjacent to the McMartin preschool. (The children claimed teachers had killed turtles to demonstrate what would happen to them and their families if they talked about the molestations. Bynum, while retained by the defense, had managed to corroborate a key point in the testimony of the children.)

Bynum's court appearance was pre-empted by his "suicide," although the timing left some parents in the case convinced he'd been murdered.[3] His body was discovered by his wife at 5:45 in the morning. Bynum died of a head shot from a .38 caliber pistol.

"None of the half dozen people questioned who were close to Bynum could think of any reason why his involvement in the case might have driven him to suicide," reported Kevin Cody in the Easy Reader in Manhattan Beach. "Paul was kind of a worrier," said Stephen Kay, a deputy district attorney and friend of the Bynum family, "but there was no hint of suicide. He was very upbeat about his wife and new daughter, both of whom he adored."[4]

The belief that Bynum had been murdered was fueled by the memory of another odd death, the alcohol toxicity that claimed the life of Judy Johnson, the first mother to speak publicly about child molestation at McMartin. Sympathizers of the Buckeys in the press have gone to great lengths to portray Johnson as "crazy." There is no indication that her life was inverted the day her son returned home from the McMartin school, bleeding from the anus. Threatening strangers entered her life. She believed she'd been poisoned. (In 1992, therapists at the L.A. Commission for Women's Ritual Abuse Task Force also insisted they'd been poisoned, and corroborated their allegations with medical reports—the Los Angeles Times was given the reports but shunned them, alleging the therapists were paranoid fantasists with "hysterical" delusions.[5]) She lived in fear and felt it necessary to keep a gun in the house. Her estranged husband appeared to have joined in the harassment campaign. Johnson took to alcohol. She was allergic to alcohol.

It poisoned her.



SAY YOU ARE SATAN'S BRIDE.

Wendy Hoffman, "Child's Drawing," 1990

The death of Judy Johnson was met with howls of laughter in greater Los Angeles. She will be remembered as the delusional paranoiac who set in motion an implacable wave of child abuse "hysteria" carried through southern California by a sensational press and out across the mountains and plains, contaminating lives and decimating families everywhere, a groundless "witch-hunt." This was the explanation given by "experts" from leading universities.

Nevertheless, children who attended the preschool still insist they were abused. And the detailed memories of their parents are sharply at odds with the simple caricature of the case repeated endlessly in the press. They recall the long hours of testimony by dozens of children, the telephoned death threats, how some of the children suffered deep emotional problems requiring hospitalization. Knowing child pornography to be a highly lucrative business, they frown at the snickering over the children's disclosures that they were forced to play "naked movie star" games. They haven't put aside as anomalous accident the first exhibit in the case: a physician's report that one of the children suffered "blunt force trauma" of sexual areas.[6] The parents were left to ponder why some of the toddlers in the care of the McMartins had chlamydia, a sexually-transmitted infection.[7]

Where was the humor in all of this?

Open Season

The parents questioned, like everyone else, the incredibility of the charges'—some said the children were lying— yet had to wonder about Peggy McMartin's testimony that she had only worked at the school for a few weeks, when payroll records revealed that she had been employed there for years. To the families, the final verdict of Ray Buckey meant it was now "open season on children."

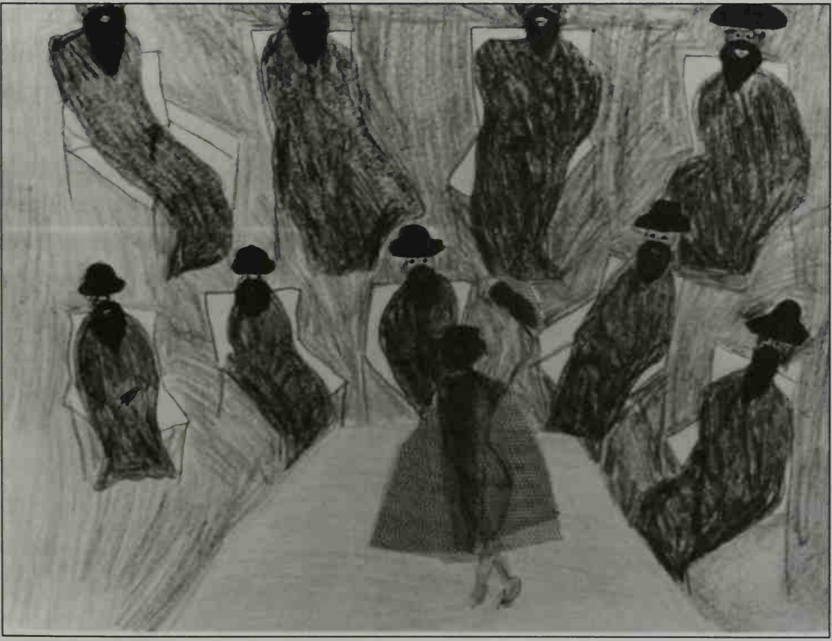
The world was told repeatedly that ABC's Wayne Satz, the reporter who broke the case (felled by a heart attack in December, 1992 at age 47), and therapist Kee MacFarlane, had had an affair—as if this had any bearing on the children's allegations. Even Oliver Stone took to the bandwagon with a film made for HBO, written by Abby Mann, reinforcing the already widespread belief that "hysteria" in Manhattan Beach was kindled when a child returned home from school one afternoon with "a red bottom"—this would be the son of Judy Johnson, and he hadn't been spanked—he was bleeding. This hardly constitutes a little media "spin." It is conscious participation in a felony. The account of the case pounded into collective memory by media repetition goes that far to distort the facts. The widespread media coverage was, according to Los Angeles Times editor Noel Greenwood, "a mean-spirited campaign" organized to discredit the children and their therapists.[8]

But why should certain members of the corporate press and segments of the legal and psychiatric professions go to such lengths to suppress evidence of organized child abuse at McMartin preschool? Because the traumatic crimes reported by the children bear an uncanny resemblance to mind control programming, a specialty of certain classified federal agencies and cultists on the black budget payroll.[9]

The children are often ridiculed because some of their charges are thought to be impossible. Tunnels under the preschool? Too far-fetched to consider. But, in fact, there were tunnels, confirmed in 1993 by a coalition of five earth scientists from leading universities.

The unearthing of the tunnels, like much of the critical evidence, never made it to the courtroom. They have been discreetly filtered from newspaper accounts.

To fill the void, Debbie Nathan, a widely published skeptic of ritual abuse, heaped scorn on the tunnel allegations in the Village Voice in June 1990. She maintained the McMartin site had been "painstakingly probed for tunnels" once before. "None were found."[10] Nathan's account is a fabrication. In fact, recalls Dr.



Wendy Hoffman, "Child's Drawing," 1990

Roland Summit, who contributed to the final report on the tunnel excavation, parents started digging and prosecutors, reluctantly forced to a showdown, "commissioned a superficial search of open terrain." District Attorney Ira Reiner then declared the tunnel stories unfounded "without going under the concrete floor of the preschool." Once the tunnels were officially discounted, attempts to explore for an underground reality were instant targets for ridicule.[11] Archeologist Gary Stickel was retained to lead the excavation on the recommendation of Dr. Rainier Berger, chairman of UCLA's Interdisciplinary Archeology Program, by parents of McMartin children.[12] Initially Stickel sided with the Buckeys, believing the abuse allegations to be so much moonlight for hysterics. However, he'd heard of late homicide detective Paul Bynum, the first to dig at the site:

> "Bynum apparently conducted his informal digging in February," 1984 (Daily Breeze, 1987). "It is significant to note he did unearth some buried animal remains, 'numerous pieces of tortoise shells and bones'" (Daily Breeze, 1987). "There was keen interest at the time since it was reported that the children testified that tortoises, rabbits, and other small animals were mutilated to terrorize the children into keeping silent" (Daily Breeze, 1987).[13]

But "authorities" courted by the press snaffled at the suggestion that animals were killed to frighten children at McMartin and other preschools around the country. It was not until 1993 that a study by the National Center for Child Abuse and Neglect confirmed that children are not only threatened in day care settings, but most threats are "specific in terms of what the consequence of disclosure will be and how the threat will be carried out.... The use of such severe threats is obviously quite frightening to young children and is effective in preventing disclosure. In fact, it appears that threats used in day care center cases may go beyond what is usually needed to silence victims, and may in some instances be made for purposes of psychological terror in and of itself."[14]

Into the Grotto

Most reporters in Southern California pooh-poohed the notion that the children had been threatened into silence, but there was a great, gaping silence in the media when the tunnels were found.

"I asked my daughter," recalls Jackie MacGauley, a mother of two children who attended the preschool, "'how could they have taken you to these places without being seen?' And she answered me as though I was silly to ask such a question. She said, 'through the tunnels, of course.'"

For a month, the Los Angeles Times ran a spate of feature stories ridiculing the excavation team—until actual evidence of tunnels was discovered. Then the Times ran a one-paragraph news item, dryly noting that "evidence" of tunnels had been found. The Times never mentioned the subject again.

Only the local Beach Reporter covered the story without an embarrassed grin.

Parents began to dig with shovels in an area pointed out by a nine-year-old former charge of the McMartin preschool, who told them to dig behind a cement planter in the northeast corner. When parents unearthed several broken turtle shells and a few bones, they stopped digging and notified the District Attorney's office.

Once the entrance was exposed, Stickel used remote ground sensing equipment to read the terrain conductivity of the empty lot next to the preschool. The survey was conducted by a respected geophysicist, Robert Beer, working with an electromagnetic scanner. The tunnel opening was found precisely where children said it would be.

Stickel: "Some of the children had stated there had been animal cages placed along that wall and that they had entered a tunnel under the cages." A foreign soil deposit was found near the foundation. Clearing the anomaly with a backhoe, they found the roots of an avocado tree cut to clear a path for the tunnel. The roots had been cut with a hand saw and torn away, and shreds dangled on either wall of the tunnel.

This is precisely the moment editors at the Los Angeles Times chose to pull reporters off the story: once "evidence" of tunnels was found, the story was no longer deemed newsworthy. All other news outlets rapidly followed suit.

But the excavators cleared the foreign soil and followed the tunnel anyway. The passage "meandered under Classroom No. 4 and then most of Classroom No. 3.... There is no other scenario that fits all of the facts except that the feature was indeed a tunnel," they concluded. "The date of the construction and use of the tunnel was not absolutely established, but an assessment of seven factors of data all indicate that it was probably constructed, used and completely filled back in sometime after 1966 (the construction date of the preschool)."[15]

Dr. E. Michael, a specialist in forensic geology in Malibu, was called to examine a cavity in the underground passage. Together with Dr. Herbert Adams of the geology department at Cal State University, a ground resistivity reading of the tunnel was followed from the preschool to a triplex next door, a traversing section parallel to the north wall of the school, 5 feet away, extending 20 feet eastward, 10 to 15 feet beneath the surface.[16]

Gerald Hobbs, a local tree surgeon for 25 years, did much of the actual digging. Hobbs reports that the children told two different stories about the tunnels:

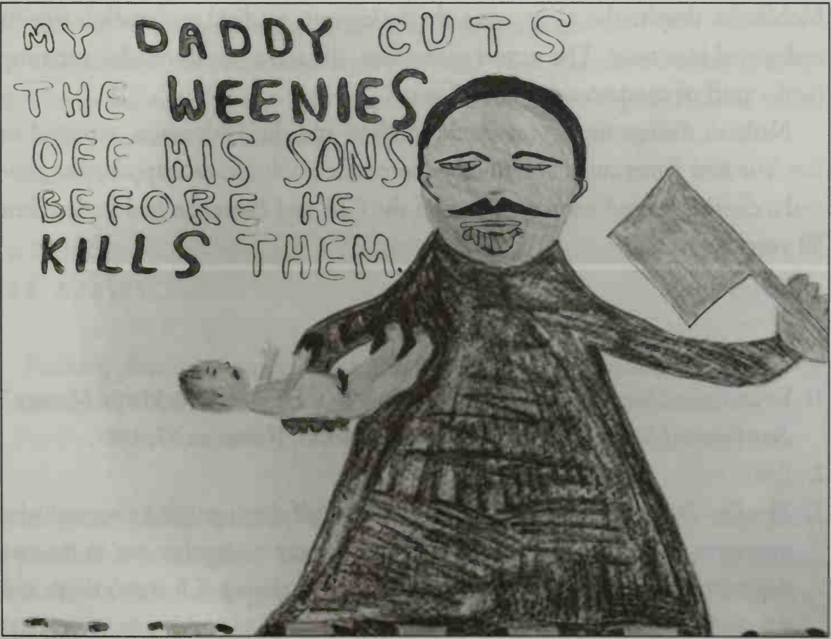
> One, that they had gone through the tunnel and came up in the house next door, and two, they had come up in the garage, which blocked the house from the street. At any rate, the tunnel went in that direction.... That evening I went to the house next door and followed the walk between the school and the house, only about 4 1/2 feet apart. I went about 30 feet down between the buildings and found a crawl space under the house. I bellied my way toward the southwest corner of the house. After going about 20 feet, I found an area inside the west wall of the house where the floor was cut out. If I remember correctly, the area of floor that was missing was 36″ x 38″ x 41″ [17]

The use of tunnels to conceal criminal activity is not unprecedented. One SRA/mind control survivor in Atlanta, Georgia (identified as Kathleen H. in Daniel Ryder's Cycle of Abuse), grew agitated when asked to comment on the above account of the McMartin dig. As it happens, an organized kidnap ring in Cobb County, GA, she recalls, had

> … caged and killed and sold children in underground systems of tunnels, some under their own neighborhoods. They had also used the tunnels to conceal drug laboratories and for munitions storage. Such people will most likely never be caught, because [their] activities are literally underground. One of them was a retired Presbyterian minister who owned a house where I and his grandchildren independently showed adults where the tunnel access was, but he'd had time by then to seal off the entrance from behind a wall—in the grandchildren's playroom.

Police, Kathleen says, "scratch their heads after doing searches above-ground. More law enforcement officials should be informed of the widespread usage of underground tunnels, old bomb shelters, abandoned S.A.M. missile sites, and more sophisticated equipment could be made available to law enforcement personnel to help them to detect such tunnels."[18]

But there is still much snickering in Los Angeles over the tunnel allegations—even after a subterranean complex of passageways was discovered in Brooklyn, an underground arms caché that linked the safe houses of a political sect that conditioned recruits with sleep and sensory deprivation, rudimentary forms of mind control, in its indoctrination sessions. On November 13, 1996,



MY DADDY CUTS THE WEENIES OFF HIS SONS BEFORE HE KILLS THEM.

Wendy Hoffman, "Child's Drawing," 1990

the Times of London described the "MAZE of tunnels and underground 'dungeons' containing rifles, machineguns and explosives [found] in a residential district of New York. Police said the bizarre find in Brooklyn's Crown Heights area could indicate the presence of an urban militia which may have been using three adjoining houses."[19]

A total of 77 animal bones were found buried at the McMartin site, a assortment of the osteo-remains of domestic cattle, chickens, dogs and a single rabbit.[20]

However, Debbie Nathan, the hide-bound "skeptic" of ritual abuse and a widely published advocate of the False Memory Syndrome Foundation, tells another story: "[The McMartin] parents have invested years believing in demonic conspiracies and underground nursery tunnels. (Until recently, the parents were still digging. They came up with Indian artifacts)." No mention of Bynum's independent findings. No mention of the dig as it happened in the real world. She reserves much of her ridicule for former FBI agent Ted Gunderson and Jackie MacGauley. In fact, these two brought in Stickel and his geological team to defuse accusations they were directly engaged in the dig. They weren't. The search for the tunnels was independent, and scores of volunteers pitched in.

Nathan's refrain of "no evidence" is hollow. She has been known to contort the facts of ritual abuse in a grotesque parody of journalism and is frequently blind to critical evidence. Nathan continues to find "no evidence" of abuse at McMartin, despite the nightmares, the acting-out, medical molestation reports and sexual infections. The tunnel excavation, she assures with psychic certainty (and a sniff of condescension), is a "hoax."

Nathan's disingenuous attacks on children and their advocates, repeated in the New York Times and a host of other corporate publications, happened to conceal a classified mind control operation the CIA and Pentagon had undertaken 30 years before....

PART II.
Bad Apples

> Federally funded biomedical and behavioral research has resulted in major advances in health care and improved the quality of life for all Americans.
> —Bill Clinton, February 17, 1994

Intelligence officials contort through hard questions so gracefully that their appearance at investigative hearings is always lively with outraged congressmen bellowing in disbelief. A spy is a liar by definition, so no one listened in 1964 when CIA director Richard Helms, in a letter to the Warren Commission, made reference to Langley's interest in a cyborgean form of "biological communication."

"Cybernetics," Helms explained, "can be used in molding of a child's character ... the amassing of experience, the establishment of social behavior patterns..."—What was that? Machines? Molding character? No one at the Warren Commission thought to ask the CIA official what he was talking about—"... control of the growth processes of the individual ..."[1]

Helms wasn't exagerrating. At McGill University, Georgetown, Cornell and some 40 other upper-crust academic institutions around the country, psychiatrists and engineers on the CIA payroll R&D'd the technology of remote "biological communication." But the breathtaking potential of the devices has been marred by the bloodthirsty protocol of CIA-military experimentation.

One subject of the experiments in the 1960s, a psychologist living in Germany today, recalled in a letter to the Freedom of Thought Foundation, an organization of researchers and survivors of CIA-DoD mind control experiments, his grim history as a guinea pig. The experience was horrifyingly similar to the abuse later described by hundreds of toddlers in southern California. He suggests that far-fetched cover stories (ritual abuse, "psychic" spying experiments, "alien" abductions, poltergeists, etc.) routinely conceal EM assaults on mind and personality, as detailed by one subject of nonconsentual mind control experimentation:

> The functions of torture ... associate the original personality of the victim with pain, panic and horror—the desired personality is conditioned with pleasure afterwards, to function as aversive conditioning to establish new behavior patterns, establish a panic-controlled mechanism of amnesia ("If you remember, you will try to betray us, but we will be informed before you succeed in managing this, because we are everywhere, then you will be tortured again, so you will not remember."), produce an artificial, controlled multiple personality disorder (which is, under natural conditions, a result of traumatization).
> And by the way, torture itself, even if not combined with mind control techniques, elicits amnestic disorders or memory blocks.... With heavy electroshocks the victim is regressed to a state of an infant. Then the torture resembles psychologically the ill-treatment in childhood. Rape is common, too, as an equivalent of sexual abuse in infancy.
>
> Being a human robot means to be mentally ill, means to be a person suffering from Multiple Personality Disorder (MPD). The difference between a "natural" MPD and a artificial, mind controlled MPD is that the latter was consciously tailored by the controllers to whom the victim is tied by invisible unconscious chains.
> Many students in the field of psychology and psychiatry don't believe that mind control is possible ... and that is probably because they haven't understood the basic concept: MPD produced by a stimulation of the natural conditions of its causes. This is very important: Only if the natural conditions of the causes of MPD are reproduced [will] a human robot work reliably. And that is a "must" in all clandestine actions.

You may ask why I can be so sure. There are two reasons: As a psychologist I know a little bit about the mechanisms of mind and behavior, and I am a victim.

As far as I can remember, I was the victim of a program with the aim to delete my personality—literally to dissolve my personality and extract it from my nervous system. They told me that I was sentenced to death and that they have found a method to execute me, but leave my body alive. In short: They tried to make a human robot or a slave out of me [with]:

- Classical hypnosis, drugs and so on.
- Electrical torture of my genitals. They used a device which I call a torture trouser. This is a sort of loin-cloth made of leather and steel bonds by which an electrode is fastened to the genitals of the victim. For electric supply they use a cable or a battery so that you can freely move and if the torturer wants to torture you he sends an electric signal to the battery using a transmitter. This is a very practical device for aversive behavior modification....
- They gave me a drug that induces near-death experiences. When I was clinically dead a voice suggested to me that he was God and that he had decided that I have to be born again as a slave. Then I was reanimated.
- They used electromagnetic fields to induce panic, fear, depression and pleasure. By this means they conditioned me very effectively. They used ESB too, but it was not so effective. They conditioned my EEG.
- They obviously have found a wavelength with hypnotic effects so that they could give me post-hypnotic orders. I wasn't able not to obey.
- My memory was erased by electroshocks, radiation and the described torture mechanism.

As far as I can remember all this happened between 1972 and 1982. There are some reminiscences making me believe that the first manipulations started earlier, 1967.

Some other reminiscences furnish evidence that they began to dissociate my mind when I was a little child living in an orphanage, younger than three years old.

I am not a mad man. I am 43 years old. I am a psychologist and a doctor of the > economic and social sciences. I am working for a network of facilities treating drug addicts, and I am responsible for public relations. I am strongly convinced that I am out of danger now. I don't know whether they used modern electronic mind control methods. I can't believe that they implanted brain transmitters into my skull, but who knows.

> I don't know why they chose me for this program. There are lots of more or less nonsensical cover stories ... being a man from outer space, having dangerous paranormal (psi) faculties, being able to unmask spies by using these methods....[2]

"Averse conditioning ... electric shocks ... rape is common"—years later, the McMartin children would also testify they were" tied by invisible unconscious chains" to morbidly cruel adults engaged in traumatic "clandestine actions." Another survivor of the experiments of the 1960s has memories nearly identical to those of the McMartin children: "hypnosis, electroshock, sensory deprivation, by isolation—in closets, in underground dirt rooms, in graves, underwater, death threats to self, others and animals, use of drugs ... seduction and blackmail...."[3]

At the preliminary McMartin hearing, 14 children testified for 88 days. They described 45 threats to them and their parents.[4] The tactic is debated. One psychologist will frown at threatening children. Another will dismiss the very mention of death threats as a hysterical aberration or a "false memory."

Guess which psychologist has a security clearance.

Virtual Hell

Walter Urban, a defense attorney for the Buckeys, told New York Times reporter David Hechler in 1988 that the "stories" of children at McMartin were impossible to believe, "such as: 'I was molested.' Where did it occur? 'In a hot-air balloon over the desert.' 'In a speed boat, where sharks were all around, and they told us that we were going to be thrown to the sharks if we didn't agree to be molested.' That kind of stuff."[5] Other children swore they'd witnessed teachers at the preschool "flying."

Kids do say the darnedest things. Anyone with a grain of sense rejects these claims out of hand. Then again ...

Chris de Nicola would keep Amnesty International's entire staff occupied for a year. Born in July, 1962, Nicola was used at the age of four in federally-sponsored hypnotic imaging experiments at Kansas City University. "I was strapped down," she recalls. A doctor festooned her head and body with electrodes, "used what looked like an overhead projector and repeatedly said he was burning different images into my brain while a red light flashed, aimed at my forehead." Electric shocks and drugs were applied in each sequence, "and [he] told me to go deeper and deeper, each image would go deeper into my brain, and I would do whatever he told me to do.... When it was over, he gave me another shot. The next thing I remember I was with my grandparents again in Tucson."[6] The McMartin children also spoke of adults slipping them drugs, and electric-convulsive shocks are a recurrent theme of cult abuse claims. The "doctor" in this instance was L. Wilson Greene. With a little research, the girl's therapist discovered that a man with this name was the scientific director of the Chemical and Radiological Lab at the Army Chemical Center.[7]

Children forced into participation in the experiments have spoken of wearing virtual-reality goggles. Thirty years after the inhumane treatment Nicola received, the beaming of images to the visual cortex is stock-and-trade stuff in the mind control underground. The virtual-reality goggles were described by young mind control subjects years before they were commercialized. In the CIA experiments, the children reported they were made to view threatening images, or convinced they'd participated in murder, cannibalism and other horrific crimes.[8]

In January 1996, the full-grown director of a support group for ritually abused children in Los Angeles (she has worked closely with the families in the McMartin case) experienced first-hand the same virtual-reality episodes induced at the preschool when local mind control technicians targeted her for torture from a remote source. The experience began with a splitting headache, "like needles" boring into her cranium. The pain was not stationary, like the average headache, but moved around in her head. The attack continued for seven or eight hours. She was reduced to screaming and crying and took to bed. When she closed her eyes, her head teemed with technicolor images of figures in robes moving in a circle. She opened her eyes and the figures still swarmed in the darkness in front of her. She switched on the light. The images were still there.[9]

She wasn't hallucinating. And the McMartin children weren't suffering "false memories." These days, the images—frequently combined with an electronic form of hypnosis—are projected to the brain's visual pathways, received with perfect clarity.

There are innumerable examples of helpless private citizens who've had the misfortune to fall prey to the whims of the radionics crews.

One of them was Patrick Warden, a high-potential high-achiever who scored in the 98th percentile of his high school intelligence test in 1969, an accomplishment repeated in his graduate record exam at the University of California at Berkeley. In 1980, a CIA recruiter approached him. In short order, invasive "voices" spoke to him. They told him that the Agency wanted him to become a public relations officer for the Agency's "mental telepathy system." The "system," he discovered by scouring obscure journals and the few books on CIA mind control available, is "operational," employing "technology that operates apparently by radio and microwaves, and can broadcast voices, visual images and somatic sensations, and affect the autonomic nervous system across distances.... Though in its primitive form the MTS mimics psychic phenomena, it involves man-made technology."[10]

There are innumerable instances of ritual abuse accompanied by exotic "psychic" images, voices, sensations, special effects of the type generated by technology described in case histories of CIA mind control.

There is the case of Chad Ingram, the son of confessed ritual abuser Paul Ingram of Olympia, Washington. Lawrence Wright, in a 1993 New Yorker story attempted to dismiss ritual abuse as a therapeutic aberration and exonerate Ingram based on opinions of psychologists from the False Memory Syndrome Foundation. The CIA shrinks dismissed the boy's memories of abuse out-of-hand because "he had heard voices in his head."[11]

A doctor at one of Stockholm's most prestigious hospitals states that young children were used for experiments involving advanced mind control technology to evaluate their "thought activity and reactions."[12] This line of R&D quite naturally evolved into tinkering with the transmission of virtual-reality images and voices to the brain.

The devices have been around for decades. And they weren't produced in the dog-star cluster, shipped by flying saucer to earth, though the CIA, military intelligence sector and certain psychologists (with a CIA pedigree) have convinced hundreds of millions that "aliens" travel from untold light-years away to stick CIA implants in human heads, the most transparent cover story ever told—one passionately defended by many of the very same skeptics who drown allegations of ritual abuse in condescending snorts of laughter.

Richard Helms was acknowledging his own deepest ambitions when he told the Warren Commission of the Agency's experiments in "molding a child's character" with cybernetics.

It's not uncommon for a subject to resort to self-mutilation, an impulse that is programmed in by hypnotic command, when recalling blocked memories of childhood abuse in therapy sessions. Similar programming could explain the sudden comatose state of Chad Ingram when confronting certain memories: "Chad produced a memory of being assaulted by Ray Risch [a mechanic for the Washington state police and a drinking buddy of the boy's father] in the basement of Ingrams' house when he was ten or twelve years old. At this point, Chad leaned forward in a trance-like state.' Sometimes he would go off for 5–10 minutes without saying anything." Wright, p. 77.

PART III.
The Wall

One much-maligned school of psychology holds that a day-care center operated by a mind control cult specializes in dissociative conditioning, a regimen of physical and psychological beatings that give rise to a cluster of pseudo-identities. The first stage of conditioning, they maintain, insults the child's most primitive reflexes, a repetition of torture that overloads the child's neurological complex and forces the adoption of protective alters. Most very young children rapidly learn to dissociate, a learned reflex that the group exploits as the child grows—often into adulthood—by accessing the alters. They can be called upon at any time and used in criminal enterprises. Dissociative programming is sort of a psychological hard drive: it occurs when the victim is very young and is the bed of future programming.[1]

But the study of dissociative conditioning in traumatized preschool children did not reach these conclusions until 1990 (with the work of Dr. Steven Ray, Frank Putnam and others)—nearly a decade after the first charges of abuse at McMartin were filed.

Before techniques for multiplicity programming were understood by psychologists treating survivors of ritual abuse, a lively debate of distinguished, smartly-groomed psychologists was kindled by the McMartin trial. An early champion for the defense was the late Dr. Nahman Greenberg, a prominent psychiatric consultant on child abuse. With a grant from the National Institute of Mental Health in 1971, Dr. Greenberg once designed a psychological profile to identify the personality characteristics of abused children. For twenty years, while still an associate professor at the University of Illinois's psychiatry department, he was director of child development in the clinical and research unit. In 1975, he founded CAUSES (Child Abuse Unit for Studies, Education and Services) at Illinois Masonic Hospital. His office glittered with numerous honors from federal and state government agencies.[2]

Dr. Greenberg was retained to make sense of the McMartin allegations. He studied the questioning techniques of therapist Kee MacFarlane and generally seemed to agree with her findings. But in public pronouncements Greenberg later stated that MacFarlane coerced accusations of abuse from the children, goaded them into making slanderous allegations. The argument, endlessly repeated by the media, has since tainted McFarlane's credibility.[3]

But Greenberg's subsequent career is revealing. His next ritual abuse case came shortly after his consultation on McMartin. Beth Vargo joined Believe the Children shortly after witnessing it.

In April 1984, Vargo suspected that her four-year-old daughter had been sexually abused at the Jewish Community Center (JCC) preschool in Chicago. Several other children detailed abuse. They described "strangers" engaging in sexual escapades at the center and elsewhere. But this time it wasn't only children who spoke of sexual abuse. Adult staff members of JCC stepped forward to fill gaps in the children's allegations with their own testimony.

Vargo was referred to Dr. Greenberg by the local Department of Child and Family Services.[4] The name rang a bell, and after a moment of reflection she recalled where she had heard the name before—the family doctor had warned her to steer clear of him.

Dr. Greenberg did not believe in "involving" the "police or prosecutors in child abuse cases, but preferred to work with the child victims and adult perpetrators to repair relationships damaged by sexual abuse," she recalls. "Since our case involved extra-familial abuse, not incest, my husband and I made other therapy arrangements for our daughter."

At a meeting called by the center to address parents' concerns about the investigation, Greenberg recommended that they and the teachers attend a retreat to "share their feelings." The psychiatrist empathized primarily with the teachers' "stress," not the children's trauma, and engaged in heated arguments with therapists treating them. He refused to accept the word of the JCC's own staff that the toddlers had been abused at the school, and when asked, refused to cooperate with police.[5]

The case was a repetition of McMartin. During questioning, two mothers reported that their daughters had told them the teachers had threatened to kill their families if they talked. The children insisted that they'd been beaten, stuck with needles and screwdrivers. In fact, parents reported unexplained scratches and bruises. The preschoolers also said that teachers at the center organized "naked games."

"This will be with us forever," one mother lamented. "It will never be wiped away."[6]

In 1987, Dr. Greenberg's consultation in another aborted child abuse investigation—the child pornography operation run by the Finders cult—exposed an unshakable bias in favor of ritual abuse perpetrators—and his role in a CIA cover-up. The Finders, as most cult observers are aware, was a CIA-anchored circle of ritual abusers engaged in operant mind control conditioning, child pornography and kidnap. At first, Langley officials admitted to custom agents in Tallahassee, Florida that the CIA "owned the Finders."[7]

Marion David Pettie, who retired from the Air Force in 1956 and defined himself as a "political powerhouse," was the guiding light of the cult. He denied any connection to the CIA—yet his late wife was an employee of the agency and his son a veteran of Air America, the opiate courier. Confidential sources told police the Finders conducted "brainwashing" sessions and "explored satanism."[8]

Police in Tallahassee were called off the case after Dr. Greenberg examined the children and found "no evidence of recent physical harm." Nonetheless, two Florida policemen stood by their statement that they'd found visible evidence of sexual abuse. The original arrest file, as one investigating Treasury agent complained in an internal report, was "classified secret and not available for review." Customs service agents in Washington discovered on the group's premises directions for kidnapping children and photographing them. Yet the case was guttered, largely due to Dr. Greenberg's denials that children could possibly be used by an occult group with an active interest in mind control programming.

Another ritual abuse "expert," an oft-cited debunker, has FBI credentials. Agent Ken Lanning of the Quantico Behavioral Science Laboratory has provided "skeptics"—mostly pedophiles, CIA propagandists and mind control operatives in academia and the press—with an illusory pillar of debate. (The unit had three founders hailing from the Justice Department, among them Mark Richard, who went on to become a key advisor to Janet Reno in the Branch Davidian stand-off. According to Lanny Sinkin, writing in the Portland Free Press: "In a recent interview, Daniel Sheehan, general counsel for the Christic Institute, noted that Mr. Richard has a long history of [closing] down investigations [that] might expose covert operations," among them, "assassinations, drug smuggling and other criminal activity, pursued under the guise of combatting terrorism.")

Fatal flaws in Lanning's "research report," a denial that the cult abuse of children exists, were exposed as a cover-up by a fellow law enforcement "insider":

> I have spoken to Ken Lanning, I know others who have spoken to him and we all take issue with Ken's "opinion" and how this report is being used.
>
> It should also be stated that I work within the System in some capacity and have some experience in investigations. Neither am I too pleased by what I have been learning about the atrocities that are occurring, the reasons for it, and the artful skewing of perceptions....
> Ken Lanning is an armchair analyst and he has "not" personally investigated many cases of RA. Law enforcement and others sometimes "consult" with him about cases and how to proceed. He is not aware of all RA cases. The FBI,

> Children's Services and law enforcement do not keep statistics on ritual crime. No one is keeping track; therefore no one can say with authority how prevalent ritual abuse is. The DAs are not bringing evidence of RA into cases unless they really have to because of freedom of religion issues and reports like Lanning's.
> He has a confusing, difficult time defining RA. He has told others that he prefers to categorize RA under "sex rings" or "gang violence." Someone like him cannot deal with or understand metaphysical intent. Few people can. Nor can he officially acknowledge ritual abuse because of various governmental entities which have been implicated.
>
> There are mechanisms being put in place to make the RA claims "incredible." The FBI has been implicated in at least "botching" some RA case investigations and in some instances covering up the evidence. The CIA has been implicated in far worse fashion.... There are many cases of ritual murder and brainwashing.
> Lanning professes not to know of any.[9]

The science of mind control has benefited enormously from experiments on young children. The horror stories told by toddlers at McMartin did not arise in a historical vacuum. Comparable outrages, foreshadowing McMartin by thirty years, filled Lynne Moss-Sharman's childhood as an unconsenting guinea-pig:

> I am a survivor of military torture and experimentation as a young child in the 1950s. It is very difficult to write about my experiences because of the military's use of electricity and binding on my right hand to assure I could or would not communicate through printing, writing or drawing for decades. One of the sessions involved huge amounts of electricity applied to my right hand; then it was tied to my back, and I was made to walk around on my knees, using my left hand for support, "like a dog." Their other torture techniques and devices took care of the possibility of talking.[10]

The preschoolers in Manhattan Beach provoked scorn and giggles when they claimed they'd been whisked off to military bases. But numerous examples from classified federal files could confirm that children have been tortured in biomedical and behavior control research since the prime of D. Ewen Cameron. Military bases are a common theme.

One mother of children attending McMartin alleged that employees of TRW, a local defense contractor based in Southern California, paid regular afternoon visits to the school.[11]

In 1989, nearly a year before the verdict of the second trial was delivered, a

McMartin mother took note of a van parked in front of her home. Two strangers sat inside the van. A few hours later, they were still there. When two of the mother's strapping male friends arrived, she complained of the surveillance. Her friends strolled out to the van. They couldn't help noticing that the walls of the vehicle were lined with advanced electronic surveillance equipment. The stake-out team was dragged out of the van and questioned—but not by police. More than one child in the household had attended McMartin. A compromised justice system and a hostile media had forced the families to find answers anywhere they could. And this pair of snoops with their high-tech gear would do fine.

But they refused to answer questions. One of the interrogators hit on an idea frowned upon by most law enforcement authorities—sodium amytal. The drug was administered. In a few minutes, the pair gazed blankly and began to answer questions. Who were they? Members of a religious cult. Where did they call home? San Diego. Who else belonged to this cult? They named several prominent officials in the defense establishment.[12] The pair were released after questioning.

Of course, none of this reached the jury.

Lee Coleman, a California psychologist who delivered the keynote address at the Second National Conference of VOCAL (Victims of Child Abuse Laws)—a now-defunct organization notorious for recurring scandals among its leadership involving pedophilia—testified that the McMartin children had indeed been abused—not by teachers at the preschool, but by unnamed law enforcement "officials" who'd "brainwashed" the children into "believing" abuse had occurred at McMartin.[13] Coleman's theory has evolved into a combative branch of psychology based on "false memories" a "syndrome" that lends its name to an organization of accused child abusers directed by veterans of the CIA's mind control fraternity, the False Memory Syndrome Foundation.

The "syndrome" is widely accepted as fact. But at Carleton University, a group of graduate researchers recently concluded a study of the so-called "false memory syndrome," a theory promoted by psychologists who appear frequently on talk shows to denounce therapists for filling the heads of children with recollections of horrific abuse. One of the most prominent figures on the board of the False Memory Syndrome Foundation (FMSF) was Dr. Ralph Underwager, formerly a director of VOCAL, a clinical psychologist and minister who once insisted that it was "God's will" adults have sex with children and suggested to a group of British reporters in 1994 that most women who are raped "enjoy the experience."

The researchers at Carleton were unable to find any evidence that an insidious pathology, the "confabulation" of memories, exists, a charge the FMSF has been making about ritual abuse for years—to conceal the participation of CIA psychiatrists in the torture of young children, a regime of trauma used to condition the minds of young children to mind control programming.

The Ottawa Survivors' Study searched for evidence of the false memory syndrome in 113 adult women who, as children, reported they'd been sexually molested. Four sets of questions concerning symptoms of false memory were drawn up. The women were asked about the type of therapy they received, problems with personal relationships and subsequent patterns of stress. A detailed evaluation of their responses also sought the presence of pseudo-memories, the core of false memory theory.

The study was headed by Connie Kristiansen, a professor of psychology at Carleton who proposed that the university examine statistical claims of the Foundation widely repeated in the press. The FMSF claims that 25 percent to all recovered memories of child abuse are completely false, in contrast to the results of the Ottawa study. About half of the subjects remembered abuse. The other half had, as adults, eventually recalled buried memories of abuse. The responses of the two groups were evaluated—only two of the 51 women with recovered memories had symptoms that met the false memory criteria, leading the researchers to conclude that the syndrome does not exist as defined by the Foundation, and may not exist at all.

They advised that false memory "syndrome" should not be used in the courtroom to discredit recovered memories of abuse until the validity of false memory theory can be demonstrated.

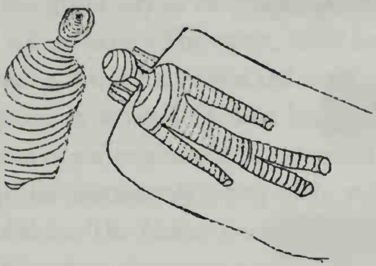
The Notebooks of Lynn Moss-Sharman: In a book of drawings recalling a childhood of experimentation in the 1950s, predating McMartin by thirty years, the allegations are strikingly similar:



"First we make you. Then we break you." A series of techniques. They dislocated my arms at the shoulders, then wrapped me up in bandages. It is a portable sensory deprivation unit. You know who is boss after this. Most of the other "breaking" techniques involved electricity, boxes and other containers.

There were always sacrifices and rituals involving children. The small angel is my internal "observer." Whenever the "angel" showed up, somebody usually got killed. The same man who did the experiments in the hospitals and at the military bases were part of the group of men who went to the rituals and pedophiles.

Sexual bait to blackmail men: I was used for sexual purposes as part of the programming as a little girl. The robotic quality of "I can walk, I can talk" is a result of a series of torture-programming techniques utilizing sensory deprivation, electricity, drugging.

Acclaimed 1991–92 San Diego Grand Jury Child Abuse Report Demonstrated to be Fraudulent by Subsequent Grand Jury

An Organized Child Abuse Cover-Up

In 1992 some 2,300 copies of a report on child abuse were mailed by a San Diego County grand jury to congressmen, newspaper reporters, social service agencies and college faculty. The report, Child Sexual Abuse, Assault and Molest Issues, was touted on network television and in the public print. Even the liberal Mother Jones magazine, in its July 1996 issue, lauded the efforts of Carol Hopkins, deputy forewoman of the original San Diego grand jury and organizer of the mailing campaign, for courageously taking on the sensitive issue of "unfounded allegations" of child abuse. The Mother Jones story, written by Judith Levine, was typical of the publicity given the report, which claimed that mindless "panic" over child abuse "seems to sprout from the desert soil of San Diego as abundantly as neon fuchsia succulents and bougainvillea":

> The county has been the scene of a string of highly publicized false allegations of molestation, including satanic ritual abuse, going back to the 1980s. In 1992, a major grand jury investigation found the county's child welfare agencies and juvenile courts to be "a system out of control," so keen on protecting children from predation that it took hundreds of them away from their parents on what turned out to be false charges. The report called for "profound change" throughout the system.

Verbatim copies of the report are available from men's rights organizations and legal advocacy groups on the Internet promoting the "false memory" bromide of ritual child abuse. Defense attorneys representing accused pedophiles and ritual abusers have quoted from it in the courtroom.

And much of the report is a hoax, sheared from whole cloth and sewn into a legal parachute for child abuse defendants facing conviction. In a second, unpublicized grand jury inquiry into claims made in the 1991–92 report. it was discovered that the first grand jury, chaired by retired Navy Captain Richard Macfie, had blatantly misrepresented case histories, cooked courtroom testimony and ignored physical evidence of sexual abuse to arrive at the erroneous conclusion that a "family crisis" exists in the justice system, that a break-up of families is endemic, aggravated by overzealous social workers and a profusion of unfounded accusations.

The 91–92 "Families in Crisis" report concluded that the issue of child molestation has "suffered from excessive, sometimes bordering on hysterical, media attention, reporting of inaccurate or questionable statistics, and the failure to define and identify child sexual abuse accurately." And the panel's own handling of facts and statistics can, ironically enough, be interpreted as an attempt to generate hysteria, to arouse parental fear of child protective services and reinforce the ongoing backlash against ritually abused children and their advocates.

The April 1993 report of the San Diego County Commission on Children conflicts flatly with the original grand jury's argument that "children lie about these issues." On the contrary, the commission's study, cited in the second grand jury's review, refutes the "false memory" argument and the original panel's suggestion that children frequently "lie" about sexual predation :

> Goodman (1986, 1989) and Saywitz (1989) on children's memory and on the reliability of children's allegations of sexual abuse ... demonstrate:
> 1. It is uncommon for children to make false allegations about being molested.
> 2. Children's memories are relatively good when compared to adult's memories.
> 3. Errors by children in the recall of events are usually those of omission, rather than commission.
> 4. While children may be more suggestible with respect to their memory of peripheral details, their recall of significant events that they have experienced, rather than things they have merely observed, cannot be easily changed or manipulated.

The second grand jury protested that its investigation was "hampered by missing 1991–92 files." The files, they discovered, "had been removed from the grand jury offices" by members of the original jury. A total of "fourteen files were returned on June 14, 1993 following a court hearing." The review panel's report, completed in 1993, details serious "flaws" in the 91–92 findings, and uncovers an unmistakable pattern of gross misrepresentation, arriving at the false impression that families are routinely torn asunder by groundless accusations of abuse.

A review of the original report found more falsifications in the presentation of abuse histories from county files, obvious in the following excerpts:

> THE 1991–92 GRAND JURY REPORT
> "[A] school teacher was tried for child abuse after pushing a child. A jury found her not guilty. It was acknowledged by the supervising Deputy D.A. that this was a weak case, prosecuted "'to teach a lesson, test the parameter of the law, educate the public.'"

REVIEW FINDINGS

"The 1992–93 Grand Jury found there were seven victims [not one]. The defendant was not charged at all due to technical complications (statute of limitations and lack of witness availability). One child had been lifted by one arm and thrown into his desk, another was slapped hard on the head. She also had her hair pulled. A third child was slapped twice on the head and a fourth was hit on top of the head during a school assembly.

"The children said that the defendant called them such names as 'stupid' or 'idiot.' This teacher's personnel file showed that she had received ten notices complaining about her inappropriate use of physical discipline on 8-year-old children. One of [the complainants] suggested termination."

THE 1991-92 GRAND JURY REPORT

"A teenager was prosecuted for felony child molestation upon an allegation by a foster child in his mother's home. There was no physical evidence. The D.A.'s office prosecuted despite its awareness that this child's DSS file contained references to previous unfounded allegations as well as psychological evaluations of the child as a pathological liar."

REVIEW FINDINGS

"The case was based on a report by a 12-year-old boy to his social worker. He said that the defendant had molested him numerous times during a two-year period by oral copulation, sodomy and masturbation/fondling. The abuse began about one month after the victim was placed in foster care at the defendant's mother's house. The victim described weapons the defendant had either used or threatened to use, including a whip, a knife, brass knuckles and a rifle. These weapons were found in a subsequent police search of the defendant's living quarters. The examining physician detailed physical findings which supported the victim's claim of having been sodomized.

"The victim was borderline retarded, had sociopathic behaviors and psychological problems, but no reference to a report that the victim was a pathological liar was found.

"The defendant pled guilty to Penal Code 647.6 (child molestation). The 1991–92 report makes additional comments about this case ... and alleges that the District Attorney's "decision to prosecute was based solely on the child's accusation." The files that were reviewed contained references to far more physical evidence, and in a civil suit brought by the victim against the County of San Diego, an award of over $1 million was made. This fact is a positive indication that the County felt their the case was valid, and that the victim was truly a victim."

THE 1991–92 GRAND JURY REPORT

"A step-grandfather was prosecuted for the felony child molestation of his 11-year-old granddaughter. He and the family adamantly denied the allegations. Again, DSS files available to the D.A. contained contradictory information and evaluations of the child as a pathological liar. There was also a child molest report involving the natural father and the child. None of this information was revealed to the defense. The child testified at the preliminary hearing but was not cross-examined. At the time of trial, the D.A. stated that the child could not be located. The preliminary hearing testimony of the child was entered. The step-grandfather was convicted. Between conviction and sentencing the defense became aware that the child's whereabouts were known, and had been known, by the D.A. The defense asked for a retrial. It has been granted."

REVIEW FINDINGS

"This case involves the molest of a nine-year-old girl by the boyfriend of the girl's grandmother. After trial, he was convicted of eight counts of violating Penal code 288(a) and he was sentenced to six years in a state prison. His motion for a new trial was denied. No reference in the reports contained in the dependency file contained any reference to the victim as a 'pathological liar.' The girl's grandmother did accuse the girl of being a pathological liar. No police report was ever made regarding a molest of the victim by her father, after a report by the brother of an ex-landlord who said that he once saw some "messing around" between the father and the victim, but the incident was written up by the San Diego Police Department and referred to Child Protective Services.

"The statement that the victim was not cross-examined at the preliminary hearing is untrue, and the preliminary hearing transcript shows such cross-examination. The prosecution found out where the victim was after the trial, when the victim's grandmother told the deputy where she was. Prior to this time, the prosecution had no information on the whereabouts of the girl. The defense did ask for a new trial, but the motion was denied and the defendant was sentenced to prison."

Among other many "flaws" in the 1991–92 child abuse report, the grand jury cited the statement that a chief deputy county counsel pressed subordinates to file charges in cases based on false allegations. The counselor in question, however, states that she had overruled deputies on only four petitions of child abuse, and all four petitions were in fact sustained by the court.

The initial San Diego grand jury report also quoted the director of Child Protection Services in San Diego, who denied that he had ever made the statement, "I don't think I'm as good as some doctors at maintaining an objective outlook, but I do the best I can." This was based on a misquote in a newspaper story. He emphasizes that errors in "non-intervention" far outnumber "intervention" errors. The 92–93 grand jury review confirmed the observation with statistical analysis demonstrating that, if anything, the system is far from "out of control," but errs most often in favor of abusive parents:

> Of the current annual level of 68,000 plus calls entering the San Diego Child protection system, most are closed without action, many result in children being referred to "diversion" or left at home relying on "family preservation" programs, with only 1,500 (at current rates) resulting in removal of the child and dependency court petitions, less than half the number three years ago.... Complaints may be expected from adults who feel deeply offended, regardless of the merits of the removal from the viewpoint of the best interests of the child. The adults may be articulate, or at least have articulate counsel. Adults can organize politically, contribute to campaigns, issue press releases, grant interviews to the media, testify before the legislature and attempt to persuade the grand jury. In fact, adults have done so—particularly those accused of sexual abuse of their children.

And who speaks for the 64,000 cases of reported child abuse in which no action is taken?

> Here, there is no articulate spokesperson. Even where there is counsel for the child, that counsel is circumscribed by rules of confidentiality, meant to protect the child. In addition, no civil remedy for the child exists where the state fails to remove—even where failure to do is gross negligence by the state."

The result of the original jury's "investigation" has been, according to the subsequent grand jury report, that San Diego Children's Services Bureau employees "were caused unneeded difficulty in performing their jobs." Morale was "seriously affected." Prosecutors and social workers identified by job title in the original report and "accused of misconduct or worse have suffered greatly. And, because of the prestige associated with the imprimatur of the grand jury, the reports are now held up as authoritative proof of a malaise in child protection services generally, and by implication, those associated with the process."

The review panel also blamed the 91–92 child abuse report and attendant media coverage for creating an atmosphere in which "errors are more likely to be made in the failure to remove children than in their inappropriate removal," rendering abused kids defenseless. Contrary to the widely reported findings of the original panel, the most significant flaw in the system was determined to be a failure to "adequately investigate and intervene where there is an indication of serious child abuse." The intransigence of child services was found to contribute to "substantial numbers of errors in failure to remove, failure to intervene, failure to treat," with the result that many children are "condemned to years of suffering."

Failure to separate a child from parents suspected of abuse can culminate in tragic circumstances:

> There has been a great deal of attention placed on voluntary diversion {family agrees to CSB contract terms in return for having children left at home} in the last few months. The family of Tiffany C. was offered a voluntary contract, which the father signed, agreeing that he would move out of the house, attend anger management classes, and never be alone with the children (Tiffany and her sibling). Two months after the contract was signed, Tiffany was dead of injuries sustained in her home.
> Natasha B.'s mother has borne six children. The youngest, and the only one still in the mother's custody is Natasha, now six months old. When Natasha was 11-days old, her mother signed a voluntary services case plan. On two separate occasions since, Natasha has suffered head injuries inflicted during her parents' domestic disputes.

The original jury detailed the handling of one child, Alicia Wade, which has since become something of a cause celebré in the "men's rights" movement. The review panel acknowledged that errors were made in the deputy D.A.s investigation—but as a result of statements made by Alicia and her parents themselves, and by confusion in verifying the identity of the true perpetrator, not an inquisitional campaign of persecution waged by the San Diego D.A.'s office, as the 91–92 report claimed. There was no question that Alicia had been sexually abused. She sustained serious injuries, conclusively. But the first grand jury report neglected to mention this fact and treated the molestation charge as frivolous:

1991–92 GRAND JURY REPORT

"In the case of Alicia W., the father persisted in denying allegations of molest, but the mother was repeatedly told by her attorney and social worker that her only chance to reunite with Alicia was to say that she believed her husband did it. The child, who persistently described a strange perpetrator, was not believed. In order to allow her 'the freedom" to remember' without trauma, visits with her parents were terminated until she could come up with 'a more believable story.' This child was kept in court ordered therapy for two and a half years, twice a week, 'dealing with the molest.'"

REVIEW FINDINGS

"Albert Carder [ultimately determined to be Alicia's abuser] was charged with [four] child molests ... in July 1989. The deputy district attorney assigned to the case filed charges against Carder alleging molestations of these children. Carder pled guilty just before his preliminary hearing. Although the deputy D.A. had heard of the incident involving Alicia, which had occurred in May 1989, no evidence had been presented to her requesting additional charges against Carder since no evidence was known to the police connecting Carder to that case at that time.

"In the case of the four victims mentioned above, the deputy D.A. learned that Carder knew the victims and their mothers. The attacks did not result in serious injury as they did with Alicia.... The explanation given by Alicia's parents for her injuries was odd. Mr. W. told police that if he had done it, he did not recall it. The detective assigned to the case had received a report that Mrs. W. had told another person that her husband had committed the molest.

"The grand jury report on Alicia W. unleashed an attack on the deputy district attorney, accusing her of ethical violations. She was threatened with criminal prosecution. This harmed her professionally, socially and emotionally. "

It is a cutting irony, in light of the many sexually-abused children neglected by the legal system, that the false findings of the original grand jury report have been gleefully aired by the media, while the critical grand jury examination issued in 1993 has been widely overlooked.

It is serious enough that the 1991–92 "Families in Crisis" jury report defrauded San Diego's legal system into adopting policies inimical to the lives of abused children. Equally outrageous was the plagiarizing of the report by a grand jury in Merced County, a farming community in California's central valley. The San Diego Union-Tribune reported on July 9, 1992 that the original hoax was revisited in the Merced report, "uncannily similar—virtually word-for-word in most sections—to the San Diego jury's report. Even some of the testimony quoted by the San Diego panel appears in the Merced jury's report." The pirating was discovered when officials of Merced's Human Services Agency compared the documents, and concluded that at least three-fourths of the Merced report had been cribbed from the deception cobbled together under the watch of Captain MacFie in San Diego.

BLEAK HOUSE

A Case of Nazi-Style Experimental Psychiatry in Canada

by Steve Smith and Alex Constantine

After 20 years of frustrated efforts to do anything whatsoever about the nightmarish "treatment" Steve Smith received in a Canadian mental institution, the paperwork began to in.

In 1991, Smith requested his clinical records from the archive of the Oak Ridge Mental Hospital and received a grand total of 15 pages. Predicated on these, Smith filed a complaint with the College of Physicians and Surgeons about an illicit, sadistic regimen of psychiatric "treatment," euphemized by his handlers as "Defense Disrupting Therapy." The College investigated and bluntly denied that Oak Ridge had ever conducted experimental studies on Smith or anyone else.

Smith appealed to Canada's Health Professions Board and submitted the hospital records to support his complaint. The Board ordered the College of Physicians and Surgeons to open the investigation. In a 19-page letter, the Health Board demanded a thorough investigation. "I have copies of the correspondence between the Board and the College," Smith says, "and they have become quite critical, applying to the former such terms as 'not serving the public interest.'"

It can only serve the public interest to report Smith's submergence in a horrifying world of brutal psychiatric experimentation and the men who presided over it, particularly Dr. Elliot T. Barker, the psychiatrist who supervised Smith's "treatment" at Oak Ridge. The selection of experimental psychiatric subjects is often arbitrary when sanctions are handed around by secret bureaucracies, and the involvement of the CIA is suggested by Dr. Barker's experimental psychiatric method and sponsorship of a patient cum Rhodesian mercenary. Experimentation on human subjects in violation of the Nuremberg agreement is ongoing. Like Steve Smith, subjects may struggle for decades to assemble a case documenting their exploitation. His account is not unique. Anyone is a prospective subject to a scientific underground founded on absolute disregard for human rights.

Steve Smith's Story

In the winter of 1968 I left high school, and no one seemed bothered by that. An adolescent urge to wander set me on the road to California. At that time I was learning to drive and getting a driver's license was the most important thing in my life. I'd sometimes swipe my mother's keys and drive around the back streets of my neighborhood. My parents were divorced when I was ten. My brother and I lived with my father in Sudbury, Ontario. My mother ran off with a tough, good-looking bartender, and my father's life was rapidly overtaken by alcohol and self-destruction. My brother and I were left to fend for ourselves in a house that was neglected and often without food. The decimation of my father took about a year, and we were sent to live with my mother and Bill. These were years of physical and emotional abuse. We were all victims of Bill's drunken rages. He committed suicide in 1987. My mother lives out the declining years of her life alone with her dogs and cats.

After a few brushes with the Sault Ste. Marie police, and a system of justice that dealt with the local counter-culture in a heavy-handed way, I headed for the west coast.

My friend Ben and I hit the road in the dead of winter, no funds, no plans. The first hitch took us to WaWa, Ontario. We spent the night in the basement of a church. The next morning was freezing cold and hitching a ride was punishment. We hitched on to White River, the "coldest spot in Canada."

Our choice was to walk or die. We reached Marathon sometime in the night, desperately cold. Everything in town was closed. There was no point in looking for an open restaurant. We didn't have enough money between us for a cup of coffee. Ben and I found a small used car lot on the outskirts of town and stole a car. We drove to the next town and arrived just before dawn, abandoned the car at a service station. As we were climbing out, the police pulled in behind us. Five minutes earlier or later, and the course of my life would have been entirely different.

A child of the times, I had in my shirt pocket two tablets of LSD I'd planned on taking when we reached Vancouver. The tabs were about the size of a match head. The trip to Vancouver was ended by our arrest, so I swallowed the tablets and thus began my trip into a hell that was to last eight months and haunt me the rest of my life. My recollection of the next 24 hours is fuzzy, but much is unforgettable:

I am in a black steel cell covered with lurid graffiti, handcuffed, standing in front of a doctor. The floor is rolling like a wave.

In a hospital emergency room large men hold me down, dodging and maneuvering to insert a plastic tube in my nose. I am struggling. A glass of what looks like red wine. I drink and within seconds I am violently throwing up. I am overdosing, very sick, more frightened than I have ever been in my life.

The next several hours are a blank. I remember standing in a court room full of skeletons in black robes. The judge took one glance at me and I was bundled off to 30 days of observation at the local psychiatric hospital.

The first day I was confined to bed with little or no contact with anyone. The next week was uneventful. I was interviewed a few times but I don't remember if I told anyone about the LSD. I had the impression they either believed me to be faking or drugged. Within a short time I was given my clothes and permitted to wander about the hospital. I was not locked in, and I suppose I could have walked out. I met a girl from another ward and she invited me to a dance that evening. I was leaving my ward for this rendévouz when I was stopped by an attendant who objected to the way I was dressed, very 1960s counter-culture, beads, the usual accoutrements. The attendant was hostile. He pushed me against the wall and pawed at my jeans, blustering something about proper dress.

I made another big mistake. I fought back. He dragged me to the floor in short order. Reinforcements came running, and in an instant my pants were around my ankles and I was injected with something painful. I was dragged down the hall, tossed into an empty room and locked inside. I was furious. The girl was waiting for me and here I was, naked, locked in this little room. I pounded on the door and screamed until my lungs were aching.

There is an entry in my clinical record, dated April 26, 1968, a few days after this incident: Steve Smith "... tends to become resentful, hostile and uncooperative when he is not able to have his own way...." Of course, I didn't realize how dangerous an outburst of defiance could be. Never get mad in a mad house. The next day I was informed that I was to be sent to Penetang Hospital for the criminally insane. I have no words to express the fear that swept over me at that moment. Penetang was notorious. It's the end of the line, you never get out. I was in big trouble, but not insane. The next day I was dragged onto a train in handcuffs by two burly guards who made it clear that they would take no nonsense from me. They showed me a billy club and a large syringe. We traveled in a private berth. Neither of my traveling companions shifted their gaze from me.

We reached Midland, Ontario. There was a car waiting for us. A short drive later, I was at the front gate of Oak Ridge Hospital, which resembled a prison. The iron gate rang behind me and I was not to see the outside world again for eight months. I was struck by the size of the guards. I have never in my life seen such a collection of oversized homosimians. As far as I knew, no one knew that I was there. I had disappeared off the face of the earth, and never felt more alone and helpless. No one said a word to me. I was treated like a slab of meat. Stripped naked. My hair, mouth and armpits were probed for concealed weapons or contraband. My head was shaved. I was sprayed with a disinfectant that burned, given a heavy canvas gown and locked in a cement cell with nothing but a blanket. Not a word from anyone. The door slammed shut.

I don't know how many days passed. It occurred to me that I could be incarcerated for the remainder of my life. If there was anything in that cell I could have used to kill myself, I believe I would have done so.

The light was on 24 hours a day. I ate from paper plates. No utensils, not even a plastic spoon. The only escape was sleep, and I forced myself to do as much of it as possible. Men strolled past my cell dressed in street cloths. I thought they were doctors or hospital staff, and tried to talk to them, find out what the hell was going to happen to me. No one even looked my way. I was completely ignored. I don't know how many days this went on.

One day the door slid open and a Dr. Elliot T. Barker entered. He was charming, soothing, smiling, his arm around my shoulder. He addressed me by my first name. It seemed I'd never known contact with another human being. I fell for it, not knowing what this man had in store for me, the torture and degradation I was to suffer.

"Do you think you are mentally ill?"

"No, I do not."

He grinned, his arm around my shoulder.

"Why do you think you are here?"

"I don't know."

"Well, I'll tell you. You are a very sick boy," Barker told me. "I think you are a very slick psychopath, and I want you to know that there are people just like you in here who have been locked up more than 20 years. But we have a program here that can help you get over your illness. If you volunteer for this treatment, it will improve your chances of release—but you must cooperate fully with the program."

He told me that being a psychopath was essentially an inability to communicate with others, and that beneath the reinforced surface was a deeply rooted psychosis. What he proposed to do, through the use of LSD, methedrine and other drugs, was to bring out this "hidden psychosis" and treat it. In other words, to cure you I must first drive you mad.

I was locked in a cold, brightly-lit cell, numb with cold, clutching a blanket. Anything would be better than this. I agreed to cooperate.

The "consent" form that I signed on the 27th of December, 1967, obtained under freedom of information, proposed an unusual approach to "psychotherapy":

REQUEST FOR COMPRESSED ENCOUNTER THERAPY

Realizing that my chances of recovery and release are improved considerably by intensive treatment, I request admission to the Compressed Encounter Therapy Unit on "F" ward. I am ready to meet the conditions of treatment specified below:

1. Commitment to an indefinite period of group interaction under conditions of the most stringent security.
2. Agreement to take such medications as the ward psychiatrist may judge likely to hasten or otherwise assist in my treatment. Such medications might include scopolamine, methedrine, mescalin, psilocybin, sodium amytal, dexedrine, etc....

I was released from my cell, given a shower, khaki pants and shirt, escorted to the "Sun Room," an unfurnished vestibule occupied by six or seven men (boys) about the same age as myself. They had all been in this room for a week or more. Dr. Barker informed me that he was locking me in with them without prior "conditioning" to "shake things up a bit." I watched them for a few days without saying much. Nothing they did was rational. The patients seemed to be playing some kind of psychotic game, talking like doctors. When their attention shifted to me, I was forced by ringleaders to concede that I was mentally ill. The pressure was intense, unrelenting. Here I was imprisoned in this snake pit of a hospital, encircled by rapists and killers determined to convince me that I was insane.

I was the only character in this equation who wasn't deluded. My sole possession in the world at this stage was my sanity, and I wasn't about to give it up. I was soon to discover that these mental patients had more resources at their command than group pressure. After a few days of silent resistance, the other patients concluded that I needed some drugs to "loosen" me up—THE PATIENTS PRESCRIBED THEM. They recommended I be given methamphetamines. Dr. Barker signed his approval. Two attendants and a nurse entered and chased me around the room until I was cornered and dragged to the floor. I put up a good fight but they finally managed to slip the needle into my arm. The drug hit me within seconds. I lived for that drug for the next five years. I would do anything to have it.

Dr. Barker's program was run by the inmates. The staff observed and approved their decisions. What followed was a systematic bombardment of drugs intended to break my resistance and to bring out the so-called "hidden psychosis." I suggest that these potent drugs did not reveal something that was already there, but in fact created a drug-induced psychotic state. In his published papers, Dr. Barker describes the drugs he used and the results that he hoped to obtain, but reports nothing about the horrors suffered by the victims of these experiments.

I will try to relate some of the effects of the drugs forced on me over a sustained period. During the drug treatments, it was standard practice to handcuff patients together with seatbelts and padlocks. It was also common for any patient resisting the injections to be choked into unconsciousness by twisting a towel around his neck. This was done to me a few times before I realized that I was more likely to stay alive if I submitted to the drugs. I remember a direction that I was to be an "observer," that I must stay awake all night to watch the other patients sleep. To aid me in this task I was given as much Benzedrine as I wanted. I was supplied with a log book and a pencil stub and told to record everything that happened. I wrote all night.

The hallucinations began after a few days of sleep deprivation, smoke at the edge of my peripheral vision, and eventually thousands of bugs crawling on my skin. I tried to show these bugs to other patients and the attendant who brought us our our meals. Everyone would take a close look and start laughing. Two attendants came in and without a word put me in handcuffs and leg restraints.

Then paranoia, not the generalized anxiety that is so common in current language, but the real thing, full-blown psychotic paranoia. I thought everyone just out of my range of hearing was conspiring to kill me. I remember laying on a mattress on the floor with a blanket pulled over my head. I assumed the two patients next to me were prying a staple out of the log book to impale my eye.

I lifted a corner of my mattress. The floor was seething with bugs and worms. That was it. I jumped up in a panic, attacked the two patients next to me. I tried to wrench my arm around one of them, and with the seatbelt straps locked around my wrists strangle him before anyone could stop me. This outburst was the result of chemical torture and sleep deprivation, otherwise known as "Defense Disrupting Therapy."

A series of drugs was forced on me. I remember something called scopolamine, a so-called truth serum. I was told that it was used by the Nazis as an effective means of chemical interrogation. The effects of this drug are so overwhelmingly horrifying that I am at a loss to describe them. It was administered in three injections, about an hour apart. After the first, my mouth dried up completely. The throat constricts to the size of a pinhole. When you try to swallow you hear a dry, clicking sound. One side-effect is a very high pulse-rate (160 sitting down) and a sense of suffocation and anxiety. After the second injection you begin to slip in and out of delirium. Time sense and continuity are disrupted. The third injection is followed by an 8 to 12 hour period of complete delirium, incoherence, restlessness, hyperventilating.

Patients undergoing this study in medieval degradation were handcuffed to two other patients throughout the ordeal. It was the job of these observers to stop the subject from bashing himself into walls and hyperventilating to death. No training was provided. The life of another patient could be in the hands of people who themselves were on the same drugs a few days before. I think I was given scopolamine three times during my stay in the "sun room" and a continuous diet of methamphetamines and "goofballs."

I don't recall much about the months that followed. I slipped further into a drug-soaked existence, punctuated by incidents of extreme brutality. Dr. Barker came into the sun room with a small can of something. He flipped it from one hand to the other and described a wonderful new invention he called "mace." With no justification but a as test of its effectiveness, he let loose with this spray and blasted us all to the floor. That's the kind of man he was: very curious and always willing to try a little hands-on experiment. I think I was in the sun room for about two weeks when Dr. Barker moved me into the regular program.

At this point I was resisting everything, and fought Barker's attempts to morph my mind with drugs so he could reshape it to his own idea of normalcy. I was moved to a cell with a real bed and my own sink and toilet.

Shortly thereafter, a patient-teacher came to my cell with a stack of psychological tests and insisted I take them. He was dressed in street cloths and conducted himself like hospital staff. I'd had enough of this. I told him to take his tests and shove off. He came back with two attendants who strangled me with a towel and injected me. My clothes were peeled off. I was thrust into an empty cell.

My inmate-instructor returned with the tests and said with a smile, "are you ready to do this or do you need a little more prompting?" I was so drugged I could not keep my eyes open. I started to write and fell asleep, face down on the paper. I woke up with someone squeezing a nerve point on my heel. I started to write again. It was impossible to concentrate. Math questions, logic questions. What's wrong with this picture? I fell asleep again and came to under an ice-cold shower, locked in place by attendants at each arm. This was torture and I screamed. Back into the cell, dripping wet and turning blue.

Do the tests or submit to more torture. I turned to the tests.

Hospital records claim that my IQ is roughly equivalent to my shoe size. I don't remember completing these tests, but eventually I was permitted to sleep.

The next day a formal brainwashing program was underway. Every minute of the day was structured. The basic idea was to force patients to memorize long papers dealing with defense mechanisms and some kind of twisted logic. A rule of silence was strictly enforced. Inmates were not permitted to talk to one another outside the groups. No warnings were given. Any breach of the rules was met with immediate punishment. This could be anything from having your cell stripped, leaving nothing but a blanket on the floor, to strapped incarceration and drugging that went on for days. An infraction of the rules could be something as simple as turning your eyes to the ceiling in a gesture of disbelief. After a week of this discipline I was a whipped animal, docile and cooperative. I followed Dr. Barker's dictates like a robot.

We were forced to perform military exercises three times a day. When the whistle blew, we dropped for push-ups. Put your heart into it or take punishment. I never knew what the next phase was going to be, but throughout the ordeal of drugs, handcuffs and humiliation came authoritarian "psychic driving." I gave the answer expected of me when asked if I was mentally ill.

I suppose I had truly been driven mad.

I had seen LSD used in massive doses on selected patients. There were beatings and murders. I remember the names Matt Lamb, Peter Woodcock and others.

All of this under the direct control of inmates. This in itself makes this story all the more difficult to write. It sounds so absurd. That's how it was. And I couldn't request a review of my case by hospital administrators—this required the approval of a panel of mental patients.

Dr. Barker's "treatment" program was devised to drive young men into a drug-induced psychosis, and through fear and discipline from within the group, create a self-sustaining system of docile mental patients. How any doctor could view this as a benefit to the mentally ill is beyond me.

But in light of what I have since learned of CIA-sponsored LSD experiments, and the part Canada played in the Agency's MK-ULTRA program, my story is placed in a context that is far from outrageous. Much of what occurred in Oak Ridge was comprehensible only after I began to fit it with pieces of the CIA mind control puzzle.

For example: a cut-throat world of covert operations lurks in the subtext of this report from the Toronto Globe & Mail on the premature release and death of the homicidal Matt Lamb, a "rehabilitated" Oak Ridge patient:

> ARMY CLASH WITH GUERRILLAS
> TWO KILLED IN ONTARIO, CANADIAN SLAIN IN RHODESIA
> A Windsor man who spent seven years in an Ontario mental hospital after killing two people has been slain in action with the Rhodesian army. Lance Corporal

Matthew Charles Lamb, 28, died in a clash with black nationalist guerrillas seeking to oust Rhodesia's white minority government.

Dr. Elliott Barker, a psychiatrist who treated Lamb for several years in the hospital and befriended him, said he was not recruited but traveled to Rhodesia about two years ago with the purpose of joining the army. Lamb was released in 1973 from the maximum security section of the Penetanguishene Mental Health Center, where he had been sent after the shotgun slaying of two young people walking with friends on a Windsor street. Lamb visited relatives and went to see Dr. Barker at his farm near Penetanguishene while on leave last summer. "He knew when he went back he probably would be killed," Dr. Barker said yesterday.

A communiqué issued by the Rhodesian security forces yesterday said that the Canadian and eight blacks identified as guerrillas were killed in clashes during the past 48 hours. Dr. Barker said he was advised that Lamb was killed on Sunday.

Last month another Canadian serving with the Rhodesian forces, Trooper Michael McKeown of Dartmouth, N.S., was sentenced to a year in prison for refusing to fight. He said he was recruited in Canada. Lamb was 19 in January, 1967 when he was found not guilty by reason of insanity on a charge of murdering 20-year-old Edith Chaykoski. She was in a group of young people walking toward a bus stop when a man stepped out from behind a tree and began shooting. Three other people were wounded, and one of them a 21-year-old man, died later.

During court proceedings in his case, Lamb made two unsuccessful attempts to escape.

In 1965, when he was 16, Lamb served 14 months in the penitentiary after he robbed a suburban store and exchanged shots with a policeman. After his 1967 committal to Penetanguishene, Lamb was treated by Barker, who was then head of the therapeutic unit at the hospital's maximum-security division.

He was released in 1973 by order of the Ontario Cabinet, acting on a recommendation of an advisory review board. "He was given a clean bill of health," Dr. Barker said in an interview. "The advisory review board felt he was no longer dangerous. He had been sick and he was no longer sick."

During his two to three years in the hospital, he was one of the patient therapists, and they looked up to him.

After he was freed, Lamb lived with Dr. Barker and the psychiatrist's family for a year on their 200-acre farm near the hospital, earning his keep as a laborer....

Fortunately for me, the laws governing committal to hospitals were changed during my stay at Oak Ridge. A review board was created to give patients an avenue of appeal.

I remember sitting in a chair before five or six bureaucrats. They were my last chance at reclaiming my life. The interview lasted less than half an hour, and in the end they told me that I would be released as soon as arrangements could be made. It was out of Barker's hands. Within days I was on a bus to Toronto. It ended as suddenly as it began, but the consequences of my months as Dr. Barker's guinea pig were to affect the direction of my life for years to come. I had tried LSD twice, and the second time precipitated my forced incarceration. Like most people my age in the 1960s, I experimented with drugs. But after Oak Ridge I was addicted to amphetamines, my slide into self-destruction revisiting my father's decline.

Before Oak Ridge, the thought of sticking a needle into my arm was repulsive. But when you want amphetamine, the quickest way is the only way. It came to living in the back of an abandoned car, using a refill from a ball-point pen for a fix. Barker left me shipwrecked on the shore.

But there came a time when I was able to reclaim control of my life and determine my own direction, because that's who I am. Today I have my own business. I have a little sailboat and I go skiing when I can.

Many others were left incurably wounded. I have found some of them. Dr. Barker devastated our lives. I saw murder in Oak Ridge. I saw torture that one would only expect to see in the most squalid Third World country. I have been over this for years, and it seems that every question inevitably leads to more questions. I want answers from Oak Ridge and Dr. Barker.

The shadow of Joey Ippolito falls across the courtroom floor, seeps into every crack in the Simpson case. Yet his name is seldom mentioned.

His father, Joseph Ippolito, Sr., was in the pay of the syndicate's Meyer Lansky and a soldier of Sam "the Plumber" DeCalvacante, who brought Joey into the league. "Little Man" Lansky, of course, was no homunculus. He led the mob into an alliance with the intelligence sector of government in WWII and loomed above the Combination until his death in 1983. Today, Meyer Lansky's foot soldiers march in step with Langley. CIA denials have been scuffed by too many tongues over the years to be taken seriously (Campbell, Hoch, Pizzo, et. al.).

Joey Ip's Murder, Inc.

Joey Ippolito is second generation Mafia, one of several powerful successors of Meyer Lansky. He was born to a brood of nine children. Joey's brother Frankie perished of a heart attack unloading a crate of marijuana from an Eastern Airlines plane in New Jersey. His brother Louie is a convict (Burdick).

Ippolito's influence in the Mafia is felt from Philadelphia to Dade County, Florida to Southern California. Joey received a medical discharge from the U.S. Marines in 1968, and went to work for his father, the proprietor of Ippolito Construction in New Jersey. A few years later he was charged with counterfeiting federal reserve notes and served a single year, hard time (Medvene). Joey, a one-time U.S. Powerboat Champion, was forced out of racing after a competing boat veered out of control and hurtled across his own, crushing one hand and killing Ippolito's best friend. In 1988, after completing a 40-month prison sentence for marijuana smuggling, he spent a year rebuilding his family's motel in New Jersey, then headed for California. Ippolito's brothers purchased a restaurant in Malibu, the PCH Bar & Grill, and Joey undertook its renovation and management (Medvene; Anastasia & Jennings).

For at least eight years, he retained a burly African-American bodyguard, one Allen C. Cowlings, then an assistant to the president of Jonathon Martin Dress Company in L.A. On August 24, 1994, the Boston Herald reported that O.J. Simpson's chum was a "close associate" of the mobster when he "was running a popular restaurant—and a thriving cocaine-dealing business—until last year. Telephone records from the restaurant, confiscated by federal prosecutors and the FBI in Los Angeles, also show calls from Ippolito's restaurant to O.J. Simpson's Brentwood estate, where the tense freeway drama ended."

Los Angeles law enforcement enjoys publicizing its efforts to frustrate the attempts of organized crime to gain "a foothold" in Los Angeles (a Hooverism, since the Mafia established roots in Southern California decades ago). The Organized Crime Intelligence Division (OCID) boasts that it maintains a squad of operatives at L.A. International Airport to intercept incoming mob figures at the turnstile and send them packing (Lieberman). Presumably, Ippolito slipped into town and opened a restaurant in an exclusive area without drawing the attention of the OCID's watchdogs.

Another explanation, of course, is that certain Mafia figures are permitted to flourish in Los Angeles. There is even a question as to whether the OCID gives a fig about organized crime. The division evolved from a unit called the Public Disorder Intelligence Division, a highly political unit, and retired OCID detective Mike Rothmiller maintains that the priority is still politics, not the Mafia. After resigning from the department, Rothmiller gave a deposition to the ACLU and six lawsuits were promptly filed charging the PDID's subversives squad with illegal spying and undercover political provocations. In his deposition, Rothmiller charged that OCID officials had instructed him to find "dirt" on "at least a half-dozen" public officials. One source to the department recalls: "They had files on almost everybody. They were interested in people who could hurt the government, publishing companies, media people, show business people, people like that" (Lieberman & Berger). The division kept no files on organized crime at the time of Rothmiller's resignation, but did target liberal activists for surveillance, spied on police in rival departments, harassed opponents of former police chief Daryl Gates and performed local services for the CIA (Rothmiller & Goldman).

Among the notables to emerge from the OCID into the headlines:

- In 1988, one OCID detective agreed to take an early retirement after he was questioned by police upon receiving information that he had tipped the Mob's labor negotiator to a federal investigation. The detective's OCID partner was suspended for thirty days for failing to inform department heads of the impropriety (Lieberman & Berger).

- Former police detective Michael D. Brambles, an acclaimed mob investigator, convicted to 102 years in state prison for a string of stickups and sexual assaults in 1994. The 47-year-old OCID veteran exhibited "no remorse whatsoever," Superior Court Judge John W. Ouderkirk observed from the bench (Abrahamson & Lieberman).

Among Ippolito's narco-goons was bodybuilder Rod Columbo, his life ended with three shots to the back of the head on January 7, 1992. Columbo himself had been the leading suspect in the murder of cocaine dealer Rene Vega in 1989. Columbo worked at Cent'Anni's, a restaurant owned by Ippolito until it folded in 1991. At this time Columbo began to travel extensively. His body was found slumped over the wheel of a 1984 Cadillac in southern New Jersey. LAPD Detective Lee Kingsford told reporters that it was the West Coast consensus the murder had been "drug related."

A few months before to the Columbo killing, Ippolito fell under the scrutiny of Los Angeles police and the FBI. The timely death of a leading distributor eased his legal difficulties considerably.

Dante's Circle of Ippolito associates is not a lonely place.

Another ranking member of the Ippolito syndicate on this plane of existence was John Steele, formerly the mayor of Hallendale, Florida. Mayor Steele once placed a police station at the sub-division where Meyer Lansky lived, at the gangster's request (Burdick). Joey Ippolito, who also lived in the high-security subdivision, was arrested in Long Island in the early 1980s with a dozen other marijuana smugglers running eight tons of cannabis from a ship anchored offshore (Burdick).

Yet another cog in Joey's dope machine was Donald Aronow, a friend of George Bush and designer of the famous Cigarette speed boat, a high-speed favorite of cocaine runners everywhere. Aronow, a wealthy Casanova with more testosterone in his blood than Earnest Hemingway, built racing boats for numerous financial outlaws, including the Shah of Iran, Robert Vesco and Charles Keating. (Convicted of securities fraud in 1991 by Judge Lance Ito.) Keating's extensive CIA ties were never mentioned by prosecuting attorney William Hodgman, who incidentally, acted as a trial strategist in the Simpson case.

Aronow was gunned down in his parking lot on February 3, 1987. Throughout the week prior to the fatal ambush, he held a series of lengthy telephone conversations with Vice President George Bush (Burdick). It was rumored about Miami that Aronow, who'd been questioned by police about cocaine trafficking a few days before, intended to turn state's evidence. A subpoena was to be served on him the day after the shooting.

Ippolito once broke parole after an eight-year prison term to visit actor James Caan of Godfather fame in Los Angeles. The actor was also friendly with Ben Kramer, the convicted Bell Gardens, California casino owner and marijuana smuggler. Kramer is married to Meyer Lansky's niece (Burdick).

The syndicate lurking behind the O.J. Simpson case is a closed circle. Actor James Caan was a regular at the exclusive Turnberry Island resort, twelve miles south of Fort Lauderdale, Florida's Bacchanalian playground for wealthy men (daily rates for a suite range from $275 to $2,100) with teeming hormones.

Turnberry Isle is the Floridian stomping ground of Robert Evans, once Denise Brown's paramour. (He still dotes fondly on erotic memories elicited by the photo of Denise that hangs on his wall.)

Bill Mentzer and Alex Marti—the convicted killers of fledgling Hollywood producer Roy Radin (the godson of Johnny Stoppelli, a soldier in the Genovese crime family)—accused Evans from the witness stand of complicity in the murder. Evans was subpoenaed. He pled the Fifth and went home.

Alex Marti hails from an Argentine death squad. Newsday's Steve Wick writes that Marti "loved guns, had a fascination with violence, craved money and hated lots of people, but particularly Jews. A watercolor portrait of Adolph Hitler adorned one wall of his Los Angeles home, and he was a collector of books and writings about the Third Reich.... His most quoted remark was that to really put someone away, you had to shoot him in the back of the head. That was the way the Nazis did it" (Wick).

CIA mind control operations overlap with the activities of this family of cocaine distributors and contract killers.

Tally Rogers, a coke courier who had the misfortune of falling in briefly with the Mentzer/Marti circle, is currently serving a prison sentence for child molestation. He claims: "They are frying my brain with microwaves. It's some kind of government plot, and I don't understand it" (Wick).

In the early 70s, Robert Evans, according to author Maury Terry in The Ultimate Evil, gave orders to the "Son of Sam cult" in New York, a heavily-armed death squad that recruited Bill Mentzer, Marti's co-conspirator in the Radin murder, to participate in the contract killings.

Evans, cut his teeth in syndicated crime at the gaming tables of Batista's Cuba. He boasts in his autobiography of his friendship with Henry Kissinger. Bill Mentzer, a cocaine courier, bodybuilder and hit man, belonged to the Sams and took part in the killings attributed to David Berkowitz, according to Maury Terry. His neo-Nazi partner, Alex Marti, opened a private investigative service in Los Angeles and hired the late Rod Columbo before the cocaine distributor found employment with Joey Ippolito, another regular at Turnberry Island, James Caan's friend and the employer of Al Cowlings.

Other regulars at Turnberry Isle: Jack Nicholson and Tommy Lasorda. Statuesque hostesses, employed by Don Soffer, the resort's developer—the "Don" who received a fond farewell in O.J. Simpson's suicide letter (Ruiz)—have included model Donna Rice, Lyn Armandt (the wife of a Miami drug dealer alleged to be a friend of Lansky's great-nephew Ben Kramer; her phone call to the Miami Herald finished Gary Hart's presidential ambitions), and a clutch of heart-breakingly beautiful hookers with pasts in CIA sex trap operations.

On the afternoon Donald Aronow was gunned down, his chum Soffer received a telephone call at Turnberry's central office, informing him: "You're next" (Burdick).

Chris Darden's book tells the tale of one Beth Reed, who phoned the Simpson trial prosecutor from the Bahamas to volunteer that a store clerk had informed her O.J. Simpson was due, shortly after the Brentwood murders, to arrive in the Bahamas for a rendévous with a yacht dubbed the "Miss Turnberry." Darden writes that he checked Simpson's address book and found a reference to "Turnberry Associates" and the name, "Don Soffer." Darden flew to the Bahamas to check into the story, and met the boat's captain, who adamantly denied the story despite the insistence of several witnesses that Simpson had planned to meet there with Soffer's subordinates.

Parenthetically, the resort is the home of the Wolfsonian Museum, named for Miami business tycoon Mitchell Wolfson, Jr. The museum opened in 1995 with an exhibition titled, "The Arts of Reform and Persuasion," drawn from Wolfson's permanent collection, an endless labyrinth stuffed full of historical objects promoting ideas of modernism. "There were," wrote a reporter for the Nashville Business Journal on February 12, 1996, "Norwegian tapestries celebrating romantic nationalism ... and posters from Germany and Italy exploring how the Nazi and fascist propaganda machines there penetrated all aspects of life and art."

PART II:
Meyer Lansky's Migratory Birds of Prey

> "It seems like all the LCN [La Cosa Nostra] drug interests are interconnected," I suggest. "I'm thinking that you just chopped off one arm of an enormous octopus."
>
> [Assistant U.S. Attorney Bill Norris] nods. "That's usually what we do," he says in a somewhat resigned tone. "And it turns out to be more like one arm of a starfish, so it regenerates."
> —Thomas Burdick, Blue Thunder

Meyer Lansky's attorney Mel Kessler was a suspect in the investigation of Joe Ippolito's drug smuggling venture. Kessler was suspected of being the brains of the operation (Burdick). Hollywood, Florida vice squad officials suspect that Kessler arranged the shipment of 200 kilos of cocaine from Bolivia and was involved in a smuggling operation based in San Juan, Puerto Rico with stopovers in the Caribbean. Telephone records revealed that Ippolito's fellow mobster, Ben Kramer, an investor in the Bicycle Club in Southern California, consulted with Kessler almost daily (Burdick). Kessler has also been linked with "Little Ray" Thompson, another Lansky associate, indicted for drug smuggling with Steadman Stahl, a Dade County judge groomed for the post by state prosecutor Richard "One Eye" Gerstein, a former Watergate investigator who doubled as Kramer's attorney and a business partner of F. Lee Bailey.

He lived in Meyer Lansky's back pocket. Gerstein was elected in 1956 to the first of six terms as state attorney, generally considered to be the second most powerful office in Florida, after the Governor's (Myers). He was also the most popular prosecutor in Dade County history.

PART 1:
F. Lee Bailey, "Bad Eye" Gerstein and BCCI

In 1982, stormy Dick Gerstein was investigated, but not indicted, after accepting drug money intended for laundering in Panama.

He has long been a crony of F. Lee Bailey. In fact, O.J. Simpson's celebrated attorney hung a shingle in Florida with him: Bailey, Gerstein, Carhart, Rushkind, Dreskick & Rippingille.

At the time of Bailey's migration to Florida, he represented the families of the passengers of Korean Airlines Flight 007, downed by the Soviets in 1983, in a wrongful death suit. A few years later, the families' steering committee sued Bailey himself for misrepresentation after making "a personal pledge" in his letter of acceptance to "work full-time as required" on the case. In five years, Bailey clocked only 97 hours on pretrial preparation, compared with 6,311 hours put in by the two other law firms retained by the families. In a court brief, Bailey cited the move to Florida, allowing his wife Patricia to be near her "ailing parents," as his rationale for not assisting the families he'd been hired to represent—although he had no qualms about charging full-time legal fees. In 1993 a federal court in Washington ordered Bailey to return a share of his ill-gotten fees to the families (Felsenthal).

Bailey and Gerstein were the directors of CenTrust Federal Savings Bank, a failed satellite of the Bank of Credit and Commerce International (BCCI), the CIA's preferred money laundering franchise (Truell & Gurwin; Bender suit). A major share in CenTrust was secretly owned by BCCI—in fact, a full quarter of the bank's shares were snapped up by Saudi tycoon Ghaith Pharaon, a BCCI front man who maintained daily contact with CenTrust President David Paul between 1984 and 1988, when the S&L was declared insolvent (Truell & Gurwin), and Paul was convicted on 68 charges of bank fraud to a maximum prison term of five years. Paul's financial strategies included illegal bond deals with Charles Keating and false entries in the S&L's accounting books (New York Times, November 25, 1993).

CenTrust Savings, the largest thrift in Florida, made handsome contributions to the campaign funds of several Congressmen, including Joseph Biden (Truell and Gurwin) and Newt Gingrich (FEC Report). When it defaulted, taxpayers were saddled with $2 billion in debts (Truell & Gurwin). The co-trustee named in lawsuits filed against CenTrust was Citibank and its president John Reed, a banker with extensive ties to the CIA (Thompson & Kanigher).

Bailey was Dick Gerstein's legal and business partner. The prosecutor's Family chum, Joey Ippolito, never wanders far from the Simpson case. Nor do his mob associates. Simpson's well-connected attorney brought in retired New York investigator John E. McNally to look into the Brentwood murders. McNally, the Los Angeles Times reported, was, in 1989, accused by federal investigators "of being part of the 'security department' of Gene Gotti, the younger brother of notorious mobster John Gotti." Prosecutors in New York believe McNally screened prospective employees for the Mafia (Newton). Also hired to investigate on behalf of Simpson was Pat McKenna, a Palm Beach gumshoe, and a veteran of the William Kennedy Smith rape case.

Attorneys on both sides of the case have been an odd assortment. Robert Baker, Simpson's attorney in the civil trial, specializes in wrongful death suits with an emphasis on medical malpractice and product liability. "He has fought on behalf of doctors accused of killing or injuring patients," reported Stephanie Simon in the L.A. Times on September 10, 1996, "manufacturers blamed for dangerous products and corporations suspected of producing toxic waste. In a tribute to his top-notch reputation, Baker has also defended some of L.A.'s most powerful lawyers against clients claiming malpractice." His fuse is short: under questioning about drug use, O.J. Simpson repeatedly spurned Baker's advice to stop talking. Baker snapped out: "Am I a potted plant?"

Of the original "Dream Team," Simpson chose to bring along to his civil trial F. Lee Bailey.

The plaintiff's attorneys had little experience trying murder cases. Daniel Petrocelli, an attorney from Mitchell, Silberberg & Knupp, represents Occidental Petroleum. Arthur Groman, a Yale graduate and a senior partner in the same firm, is a director, with Al Gore and John Kluge, of Occidental (1995 company FEC report). The Petrocelli team boasted two former New York prosecutors and an appeals consultant. Also, a criminal defense attorney whose client list includes Radovan Karadzic, the Serb leader accused of orchestrating genocide in Bosnia (Simon, September 9, 1996). The latter attorney would be Petrocelli's law partner, Edward Medvene, who has also represented Marlon Brando and Ruben Zunoi Arce, the Mexican businessman who spear-headed the 1985 kidnap and murder of DEA agent Enriqué Camarena (Weinstein).

Again, the CIA and drugs enter the Simpson orbit. Scripps Howard reported on October 4, 1990 that the CIA "trained guerrillas at a ranch owned by a Mexican drug lord" convicted of killing Camerena:

> A DEA report filed in a Los Angeles federal court quotes informant Lawrence Harrison, 45, as saying representatives of Mexico's now disbanded Federal Security Directorate were at the ranch to give the CIA "cover." According to the report, Harrison said the directorate was working with drug traffickers to move narcotics from Mexico to the United States. The House Government Operations Information Subcommittee has held two closed-door hearings on the matter and plans to question Justice Department officials at another private hearing (Bennett).

The CIA's Mark Mansfield bluntly denied any connection. "The whole story is nonsense," he swore. "We have not trained Guatemalan guerrillas on that ranch or anywhere else." Naturally, the Agency's interaction with Guatemalan death squads has since turned up with nauseating regularity in the "mainstream" press.

So, in this tale, does Joey Ippolito. In his 1992 court battle on cocaine distribution charges in Los Angeles, Joey retained Edward Medvene—two years later an attorney for Fred Goldman in the wrongful death trial—and his partners Robert DiNicola and Scott Bauman, to represent him (U.S. v Lorenzo et.al.). On November 16, Ippolito fired the Medvene team and hired Cowlings attorney Donald Re. But the conflict-of-interest in Medvene's role as a forensics specialist in Simpson's civil trial is staggering: The plaintiffs hired an attorney for a mobbed-up cohort of O.J. Simpson, the employer of Al Cowlings, a suspect in a score of murders.

PART 2:
Joey Ip's Nubian Wiseguys and Denise Brown, the Grieving Gunsel

> "Fred Goldman's lawyer said Wednesday that there is 'not a single shred of evidence' linking the murders of Ronald Goldman and Nicole Brown Simpson to ... drug activity, as O.J. Simpson has alleged."
> —Los Angeles Times, February 18, 1996

Nicole Simpson's sister, Denise Brown, was squired about L.A. for several years by an Ippolito recruit. When Joey was arrested, police questioned his bodyguard and chauffeur, Allen Cowlings, who was visiting the mobster when police entered his residence to make the arrest (Harrell). In a sworn declaration submitted to the federal district court of Los Angeles in September 1992 on behalf of Ippolito, Cowlings claimed that he'd met the drug dealer "four or five years" earlier (US v Lorenzo et al). However, the AP reported in August, 1994 that Joey knew Cowlings "for up to 20 years, [and] that Cowlings was once a bodyguard and driver for Ippolito" (Deutch).

Organized crime investigator Steve Bertellucci told ABC News that Ippolito was a "principal player in major narcotics trafficking." Yet Al Cowlings maintained in his sworn declaration that Ippolito was "opposed" to cocaine use: "Joe became very upset when he learned that I was a free-base cocaine addict," he wrote. After years in the public spotlight as a professional football player, Cowling confessed: "I was having difficulty adjusting to life in the real world. I had entered a drug rehabilitation center a couple of years before, but I couldn't kick my habit. When Joe moved to Los Angeles, he took it upon himself to help me overcome my addiction." The situation was "so dismal that I know if it were not for Joe, I probably would have died" (Cowlings deposition).

Ippolito's roommate, Ronnie Lorenzo, was the owner of Splash, a chic Malibu restaurant, and a fraternal member of the Bonnano crime family, a perennial target of organized crime probes.

In 1987, LAPD detectives investigating Lorenzo found themselves on a dizzying trail when they discovered that Splash had recently changed ownership in a sale handled by an Encino company, Richman Financial Services, and that Lorenzo's Pontiac had been registered by the firm's president, Maurice Rind, a principal shareholder with Barry Minkow in L.A.'s ZZZZ Best Carpet stock fraud scandal—once described by LAPD officers, in congressional testimony, as an organized crime figure with ties to all five Mafia families (Lieberman). (As a New York stockbroker, Rind was sentenced twice on fraud charges. In the ZZZZ Best case, however, only one of nine suspects, some of them felons with lengthy rap sheets, was indicted, namely Barry Minkow, though Police Chief Daryl Gates had, in a press conference, accused all nine of stock fraud and the laundering of Mafia proceeds. Minkow made the Mafia the main thrust of his defense, testifying that he had had been "a puppet" under "duress." Maurice Rind, called to testify for the defense, pled the Fifth no less than 92 times and went home. Stockbroker Donald A. Johnson refused to testify because Rind had "threatened" him. He pled the Fifth as well.)

Kidnap and extortion were two of many charges filed against Lorenzo. James Caan offered his home as collateral toward the $2 million bail and appeared as a character witness for his "dear friend" (Lieberman, Connolly). The government case centered on Lorenzo's obscenity-strewn comments, captured on tape as he and Robert Franchi, an FBI informant, bought five kilograms of cocaine in Brentwood and Santa Monica from a source arranged by Lorenzo: Joey Ippolito. The narco-restaurateurs were both sentenced to ten years hard time for distributing cocaine in Santa Monica and Brentwood (Lieberman, February 27, 1993).

Joey escaped from the minimum security prison to which he was sentenced three weeks before the brutal murders in Brentwood. The prison was located on a MILITARY BASE in Pensacola, Florida (Harrell). The Mafioso was seen escaping in an automobile driven by an African-American male, according to news reports.

Bullish Bostonian Robert Franchi, the aforementioned FBI informant turned to the Bureau's investigation of organized crime in L.A., learned of Ippolito's stroll to freedom at Eglin Air Force Base and immediately ran to the FBI, demanding to know why the mobster had been interred at a minimum security prison. Franchi was convinced that Joey would attempt to kill him in retaliation for turning state's evidence. The feds told Franchi that they had "allowed Ippolito to escape," and "tracked his movements" to "learn who his contacts might be." The FBI claimed to have known of Ippolito's whereabouts at all times, traced all telephone calls and learned of an ex-girlfriend, who claimed to have been physically abused by the mobster and agreed to cooperate with investigators. As a fugitive, the agents told Franchi, Ippolito made numerous calls to O.J. Simpson. What's more, Franchi reports that, Ippolito had a "sit-down meeting" with Simpson two weeks before the carnage on Bundy Drive. The nature of the meeting is not known. On August 24, 1995, Ippolito was recaptured and placed in the custody of U.S. marshals in New York City. He has since been released from custody and turned as an "informant" for the FBI (Bosco).

What does Ippolito know of the killings? A source in the LAPD confirmed for Donald Freed, the author of Killing Time, an examination of the evidence untainted by courtroom strategy, that an organized crime figure had ordered the killings.

Someone besides Nicole's estranged husband took an intense interest in her.

O.J. Simpson consort Paula Barbieri's Toyota 4 X 4 was stolen from a Beverly Hills parking lot on January 24, 1994. The Toyota was used to follow Nicole. Police in Newport Beach recovered the car after it was involved in a traffic accident a week later and arrested one William Wasz, who insisted when questioned by police that he was unaware Barbieri owned the vehicle.

Simpson, said the miscreant, did not hire him. He refused to divulge the identity of the mystery man who did.

Inside the vehicle was found a 3″ x 5″ notebook with scribbled references to two weapons, including a 9mm pistol. The first page mentions "Nicole's sched." The notations make reference to "the Gym ... Westwood," and at "11:00," Nicole's stop at "Litchfield Toys, Westwood." At "12:00 noon," she eats at "Tony Roma's, Ventura Blvd. Encino." The note ends with "9 PM Viper Room" (Tinney).

A gun and a crack pipe were also found in the stolen Toyota. Nicole Simpson had apparently been someone's obsession. Allegations have also been made that Anthony Pellicano, a veteran military-intelligence officer, the so-called "Gumshoe to the Stars," had staked out Nicole's house. Pellicano has more mob connections than J. Edgar Hoover. He was hired by Howard Weitzman in the John DeLorean case, his first assignment upon moving to Los Angeles in 1983.

In 1976 he resigned under fire from the Illinois Law Enforcement Commission after local newspapers publicized the $30,000 loan he'd received from Paul "the Waiter" Ricca, the son of mob boss Paul de Lucia—the godfather of Pellicano's daughter. He was credited as technical adviser in the making of The Firm (Hubler & Bates). Pellicano also provided an inventive but ultimately unconvincing alibi for singer Michael Jackson (of child molestation and Nazi video fame) with his "frame-up" plea.

Since the start of the Simpson trial, the busy Denise Brown was the smiling paramour of Tony "the Animal" Fiato, a marmoset-eyed mob enforcer and FBI informant in a probe of the murder of Hollywood's Frank Cristi, another actor with a Godfather credit. The lead investigator of the Cristi murder case was Detective Tom Lange, a Florida veteran of the Marine Corps and Vietnam, assigned to the "elite" LAPD Homicide Special Section (Van Derbeken and Hardy). Lange was also assigned, with Detective Phillip Vanatter, to the Simpson case. Tony Fiato's testimony was directed at Norman Freeberg, who attempted to hire Fiato on the contract. The "Animal" rejected the offer. Two alleged collaborators were indicted.

On March 23, 1995, the San Francisco Examiner broke ranks with the press gang and noticed Ms. Brown's latest love interest:

> Two convicted murderers filed for retrial Wednesday because Anthony Fiato, a key prosecution witness and shadowy mob informer, emerged from hiding in a public relationship with Nicole Brown-Simpson's sister. The Superior Court retrial motion was filed by attorney Barry Levin on behalf of Ronald Coe and Alan Betts, who were convicted Feb. 3 of killing tough-guy actor Frank Christi in a murder-for-hire scheme.... Prosecutors told jurors that Norman Freedberg hired Coe, Betts and Harvey Rosenberg to kill Cristi because of a dispute over a woman.
> Defense lawyers were blocked from delving into Fiato's background because prosecutors said revealing his whereabouts would endanger the federally protected witness. Photographs of Fiato and Denise Brown have appeared recently in newspapers and supermarket tabloids.

Denise Brown's ties to ne'er-do-wells surfaced again with her much-ballyhooed domestic abuse "charity," run by Jeff Noebel, a 40-year-old S&L swindler from Dallas, Texas.

Noebel was a convicted con artist and accused spousal batterer, described in a restraining order filed by his wife as presenting a very uncharitable "clear and present danger to his estranged wife and two children." The polyamorous Denise Brown met the convicted felon by way of her contact with Randall England, an actor in "General Hopsital." She'd met England at their mutual modelling agency on L.A.'s west side. They dated and England became a close friend of the Brown family. He was a pall-bearer at Nicole's funeral.

On July 10, 1995, the Los Angeles Times reported that Noebel, the "dapper, smooth-talking" president of the Nicole Brown-Simpson Charitable Foundation, had blazed a trail of white-collar crime from Texas to California. Dreading a conviction, he agreed to cooperate with police. Noebel pled guilty to one count of making a false statement to federal banking regulators. In exchange, he was granted a reduction in a maximum two-year prison term.

Despite all of this, Randall England, a longtime cohort of Noebel's, claimed to have "no knowledge" of his legal or domestic problems:

> Denise Brown, the organization's spokeswoman and chief executive officer, did not respond to repeated requests for an interview.
>
> Noebel's life was complicated by ... matters that seemed at odds with his charitable work. While he was busy strategizing with the Browns—who he contends knew about his troubles—Noebel was under federal indictment in Texas for a scam that allegedly bilked 14 investors out of $875,000.
>
> According to court records, Noebel and several cohorts were accused of duping the investors into buying dubious shares of a Florida savings and loan....
>
> Court documents also show that Noebel's estranged wife has accused him of a pattern of stalking and abuse that came to head in June, 1994, just days after Nicole Brown Simpson was killed.
>
> Under his guidance, by all appearances, the organization got off to a rollicking start. A news conference was called at the swank Rainbow Room, high atop New York's Rockefeller Center.
> Speaking for the family was Denise Brown, 37, a near mirror-image of her slain sister, whose portrait was blown up on one wall. After reading a brief statement, which Noebel says he co-authored, she held up a giant-sized check for $50,000, courtesy of jeans-maker No Excuses.
>
> No Excuses had snatched up Donna Rice as a spokesmodel after her rendezvous with then-presidential candidate Gary Hart, then anointed Marla Maples as its pitchwoman after her tryst with Donald Trump (Lopez and Katz).

In defense of the Foundation, Denise responded to reporters on July 19, 1995 that media reports were "overblown" (Reyes).

This is one accusation that will never be leveled at Ippolito's camaraderie with Al Cowlings and another long-suffering Buffalo Bill.

The mobster considered O.J. a sterling source for inside information on the football industry, enhancing his stake in the gambling pools, according to tabloid profiles.

That Simpson and Cowlings had formed an alliance in the black market and had more in common with Joey Ippolito than point spreads became evident with the arrest of Tracey Alice Hill, alias Amanda Armstrong, a 32-year-old stripper from Santa Monica. in February, 1995. Hill was seized by police in Dunsmuir, a small town in northern California, with 40 pounds of cocaine stuffed in her suitcase. Police also found a vial of pills prescribed to one Al Cowlings in her purse. Hill's computerized address book listed the telephone numbers of both Cowlings and Simpson.

She was booked in Eureka and flown to Sacramento. During the fight, she twice attempted to leap out of the plane while it was airborne. (Simpson, during the Bronco "chase," also attempted suicide, according to Robert Kardashian.) On March 3, Ms. Hill was indicted by a grand jury on a single count of possessing cocaine with intent to distribute.

The Associated Press reported that Donald Re, Cowling's attorney—and Joey Ippolito's, also a former law partner of Howard Weitzman— denied any connection whatsoever to Ms. Hill (March 25, 1995). In fact, the denial is a direct contradiction to the snappy admission issued by Cowlings' attorney to the Contra Costa Times that "Ms. Hill is a friend of Al Cowlings. He is upset she was arrested" (Ginley & Porterfield).

Moreover, Cowlings visited the stripper's apartment on Pier Avenue, a stone's throw from the beach, after her arrest, a few days before federal agents searched it, according to a neighbor. Within two days of Cowling's visit, a moving van arrived. The movers were still crating and hauling Hill's belongings when the police pulled up, cordoned off the apartment and conducted the search. But it is likely any evidence that might connect Ms. Hill and her cocaine to Cowlings and Simpson had vanished by this time.

The Contra Costa Times reported on the 24th that police "refused to say what they found. Patrick Hanley, an assistant U.S. attorney assigned to the case in Sacramento, would not discuss the matter, saying he couldn't confirm or deny Cowling's involvement."

Robin Meiss, the neighbor, told the Times that Ms. Hill "was a quiet tenant whom Cowlings visited often." Meiss's husband offered: "He [Cowlings] was dating her."

Simpson has been involved with the mob since his glory days as running back for the Buffalo Bills. In his prime, local police accused him of selling cocaine. Simpson also ran with a real estate swindler in Florida with mob affiliations.

One of Simpson's Mafia friends back in Buffalo, Casimir "Butch Casey" Sucharski, visited O.J. in Brentwood a few weeks before the Brentwood murders. Sucharski himself and two women in his company were shot repeatedly in the head and neck in Miramar, Florida two weeks after Nicole Brown-Simpson and Ron Goldman were murdered.

Eerily enough, other Southern California murder cases are linked to the Simpson case, including the March 19, 1995 murder of O.J.'s friend, record company promoter Charles Minor in Malibu, California, Ippolito's stomping grounds. Suzette McClure, one of Minor's many paramours, was charged with the murder. Simpson's attorney Robert Shapiro attended the wake (Haring).

Bobby Chandler, another chum of O.J.'s, was in blooming health in the summer of 1994. By the end of the year, he contracted lung cancer and was dead (Ruiz).

Yet another muffled death scream resonating with Nicole's belonged to Brett Cantor, the proprietor of the Dragonfly, a Hollywood nightclub. Nicole and Ron Goldman were regulars at the Dragonfly. Cantor was murdered on July 30, 1993, in a vicious knife attack nearly identical to the one that took the lives of Ron Goldman and Nicole Simpson. The club owner had been cut from behind. The killer started on the lower left side of the neck, drew upward and away to the right. Both Goldman and Cantor were stabbed repeatedly on the arms and chest. In both cases, the knife had a long, thin blade. At one point, Shapiro planned to argue that the same killer was responsible for the bloody melée on Bundy Drive, but the LAPD announced (with psychic certainty) that there was "no connection" between the two cases (La Fontaine). A close friend of the Cantor family reports that the club owner's parents believe firmly that the cases are linked.

The Syndicate has been a quiet participant in the Simpson case since the opening knock of the gavel. Howard Weitzman, the first attorney to speak for Simpson, studied white-collar crime in law school. He represented Tom Dragna, a racketeer, in 1980. Three years later he lost a vigorous defense of Barbara Mouzin, currently serving a 25-year prison term for her role in the Grandma Mafia cocaine-trafficking case. Weitzman's client roster includes "conservative" S&L stinkbug Charles Keating, John DeLorean, Marvin Mitchelson, Michael Jackson (who once quit a party attended by Robert Shapiro after receiving word that his brother Tito's ex-wife, who loathed swimming, had been found dead at the bottom of a pool with numerous bruises on her body—the coroner ruled that she'd drowned to death), and rock geek Ozzy Osbourne (West). The grizzled Hollywood lawyer's bona fidés also include a stint as lecturer at Georgetown Law Center, long a haunt of the CIA.

As the first Simpson trial wrapped up, Weitzman took an executive position at the Music Corporation of America (MCA), the Mafia-ridden black tower that looms above much of the entertainment industry in North Hollywood (Moldea). MCA also employed Simpson's crony and parttime counsel Robert Kardashian as president of the Radio Network at Universal Studios from 1987 to 1990 (Karabian).

Johnny Cochran's post-trial legal career also entered familiar territory: Murderville, USA. A particularly well-heeled, politically-connected client of Johnny Cochran's, in the aftermath of the "Trial of the Century," was Calvin Grigsby, founder of Grigsby Brandford & Co., the largest minority-owned bond underwriting firm in the country. His investment company sank $200 million into returning the Raiders to Oakland. For more than ten years, Grigsby Brandford handled all municipal financing for Alameda County, California. Grigsby drew the interest of federal investigators in Miami when they looked into his incursions in local municipal bond markets. Also under investigation was Dade County Commissioner James Burke, a business partner of Grigsby's. Burke was caught up in a sweeping probe of corruption known as Operation Greenpalm after he had given Grigsby an assist in landing lucrative Miami bond deals. When reporters called for comments, Grigsby immediately resigned as chairman of his own firm. His departure was hastened by a $5,000 fine imposed by the California Fair Practices Commission for improper contributions in an Oakland mayoral race. Cochran refused to take telephone calls concerning Grigsby's influence-peddling in Dade County (Sinton & Howe).

The statistically-striking incidence of murders on the edge of the Simpson case were an overlooked sideshow. During the criminal trial, Judge Ito's bailiff was shot dead without a squeak of speculation from the press regarding a possible connection to the case. With few exceptions, the murder of Ron Goldman's friend Michael Nigg shortly after the verdict was announced went unreported. The Los Angeles Times did not find Nigg's death newsworthy, although the newspaper dealt at length with trial minutiae and duly published leaks from the LAPD concerning "blood-smeared trench tools," and such. The San Jose Mercury-News reported Nigg's murder on September 11, 1995:

> FRIEND OF RONALD GOLDMAN KILLED
> LOS ANGELES (AP)—A waiter and aspiring actor who befriended Ronald Goldman when both worked at the Mezzaluna restaurant was shot to death after refusing to give money to two robbers.
>
> Michael Nigg, 26, was killed Friday night in a parking lot as he and his girlfriend were going to a restaurant, police spokeswoman Cherie Clair said Monday....
>
> Nigg was from Colorado and worked as a waiter at Sanctuary, a Beverly Hills restaurant. He recently appeared on the syndicated TV show "Liars."
>
> Nigg had worked at Mezzaluna in nearby Brentwood, where he and Goldman, another waiter, were good friends. Nigg quit Mezzaluna in May 1994, just a month before Goldman was slain along with Nicole Brown-Simpson.
>
> Nigg had just stepped out of his car at the Hollywood parking lot Friday when two thieves approached and demanded money. He was shot in the head after he refused, Clair said.
>
> She didn't know if the thieves got any money.
>
> Nigg's girlfriend, Julie Long, was still in the car and was not injured.
> The thieves fled in a car driven by a third suspect, police said.

Michael Nigg was one of several employees at Mezzaluna who fell under armed assault. Another, a waiter, was nearly killed in a car bombing. The national media did not find either story newsworthy. Locally, the murder received scant mention on the evening news. It was not until "sweeps" month, November 1996, that the television news industry in Los Angeles realized that Ron Goldman and Nicole Simpson were but two links in a chain of murders. KCOP, an independent television station, ran a series on the Mezzaluna carnage, but cautioned viewers that the station's own investigation found "no connection" to the Simpson case, echoing police sources—despite the LAPD's exceptionally, chronically flawed handling of the related cases.

In an interview, conducted by KABC-AM's Michael Jackson on November 26, Steve Cohen, KCOP news director, positively ruled out the possibility of conspiracy in the Simpson case—yet acknowledged repeatedly that the station's own investigation was not, in fact, all that "definitive":

> Cohen: Michael Nigg was a waiter at Mezzaluna. He was approached by three men, apparently a robbery attempt. They demanded money from Mr. Nigg. He refused to hand over his wallet and they shot him in the head. He died on the way to the hospital. Within a month the police had three men in custody, and one of them confessed. That's what our sources say. What we learned is that the prosecutors never filed a case against the three men.

Jackson: Why?

Cohen: Well, there was some problem in terms of the nature of the informants they had.

Jackson: But if one of the three confessed, the other two were his associates, surely they [the police] had sufficient information...

Cohen: They had sufficient information, but they had what I guess I would call tainted sources that brought them to the case. And the prosecutors were not feeling good about the nature of the confession and how it was obtained. The result was that the L.A. prosecutor's office decided that they would not bring charges against these three people. However, right now the LAPD has continued to appeal to the District Attorney's office to see if they could do something...

Jackson: Again ...

Cohen: Now, Goldman and Nigg ...

Jackson: Just one second. Again, that includes the man who confessed?

Cohen: That's correct. Now, Goldman and Nigg were definitely friends, and they hung in the same circles.... We have not been able to determine anywhere that there was any connection between any of these three fellas that [are] alleged to have murdered Mr. Nigg.

Jackson: So at this stage it's all just a horrible, sad, sick, criminal coincidence.

Cohen: Correct. There's another gentleman, 25-year-old Brent (sic) Cantor, who also was a friend of Ron's and also of Mr. Nigg's....

Jackson: The other guy, what happened to him?

Cohen: Well, he was 25 years-old. His name was Brent (sic) Cantor. He also was a friend of Ron. And he eventually had a record company of his own. He signed bands like Rage Against the Machine, pretty well-known bands. He promoted shows at a place called the Dragonfly, which is an "underground" nightclub.... And on the night of July 30, 1993, which was eleven months before the deaths of Ron and Nicole, someone walked up to Cantor's apartment ... which was just off the Sunset Strip ... rang the bell and was buzzed inside. So we guess that it was someone that he knew. And he was murdered brutally, by how many assailants no one knows. He was stabbed repeatedly, and his throat was slashed.

Jackson: Did they take anything?

Cohen: No, no. The case file is sealed in this one. And, again, this is the case of Brent (sic) Cantor. The Simpson defense team did have the opportunity to examine the Cantor file prior to the beginning of the original O.J. case, the criminal case. His throat was deeply slashed, just like Nicole Brown's. But as far as we can determine—again, this is our independent investigation—that's where the similarity ends. We haven't had access to the file; we've not seen the details of the autopsy report.

Jackson: If I worked there, I'd be in hiding.

Cohen: Well, again ... but ... but ... I know this is hard for everyone, especially our viewers and your listeners, but it does seem, as far as we can tell, ballistically, that there doesn't seem to be any specific tie, except some darn, pretty bad luck that comes out of the kind of the kinds of circles that these folks lived in. I guess that's the only ...

Jackson: But it is fodder for those who see a "conspiracy" in everything.

Cohen: Yeah. Well, sure. And I want to go a little further here just to clean up the record. Phil Vanatter and Tom Lange did meet with the detectives investigating the Cantor case, because of course the similarity—the use of a long knife, multiple stab wounds, etc. THEY concluded that there was nothing further for them to pursue in the case. Now, the "Dream Team" did try to enter Cantor as evidence into the preliminary hearing in the criminal case with O.J., and Ito said, "No. We're not going to have it. It's irrelevant."

Now, there is one other individual who is alive I think your listeners might be interested in. They probably know about it. His name is Keith Zlombowitch. And Keith was the director of operations at Mezzaluna, and he was also a former lover of Nicole. He did appear before a grand jury, and his testimony is a matter of public record that he was her lover, and that he was scared to death, as he put it, of O.J.'s having found out about that. And he went to Aspen to run the Mezzaluna there, then went to Florida. We have been unable for the last two months of this investigation to find him. When we have it that he disappeared, he disappeared.

There also was another incidence of a fella who was a waiter for a short time, in the same period of time. His car was firebombed. He was just working at Mezzaluna. He's okay, but his car was blown up.

Unsolved murders, the release of a confessed killer for nebulous reasons, similar murder weapons, sealed autopsy reports, disappearing witnesses and car-bombings do not add up to the conclusion there is "no connection" between the murders and the under-reported backstage carnage.

Despite the fact that there have been no convictions for any of the above slayings, Cohen closed off the interview with the ironic observation, "I think it's very seldom that the system doesn't work."

But then, the opinions of a news director are all too often susceptible to the influence of the corporate executives who sign his paycheck. KCOP is owned by Chris-Craft, a CIA front that once had auto-cocaine wizard John DeLorean on its board of directors (Levin). Another director of the company that owns KCOP, until his death by brain cancer on December 6, 1996, was Alvin "Pete" Rozelle, the retired commissioner of the Mafia-ridden National Football League (see Interference: How Organized Crime Influences Professional Football, by Dan Moldea, 1989).

According to the New York Daily News on May 6, 1996:

> O.J. Simpson's buddy Al Cowlings was called before a grand jury probing one of the largest sports gambling rings in Southern California.... Cowlings, an ex-pro football player, appeared before the secret panel in the Criminal courts building April 23, a date squeezed among his three days of questioning last month in the wrongful-death civil suit against Simpson....
> The grand jury also wanted to question Simpson's lawyer buddy Robert Kardashian, according to our law enforcement source. But last week Kardashian said, "I don't know anything about it. I don't gamble" (Freed).

In a telephone conversation in June, Donald Freed informed this writer that the grand jury looked not only organized into gambling, but also drugs and child pornography as well.

The Rumor and the Phoenix

After the Brentwood murders, a rumor circulated in Beverly Hills night spots. It explains more than the average corporate media courtroom glossover, and pulls together significant loose ends. Simpson and his estranged wife were immersed in the adrenal world of Joey Ip and the Combination. The rumor accounts for motive, is correct in essential details, and fills some gaps in the trial testimony regarding Simpson's secret life in the Ippolito syndicate.

This account holds that O.J. Simpson had financed a wholesale cocaine distributorship employing a network of Fast Eddys and aspiring celebrities on the Hollywood fringe. It is said that suppliers (Mr. Ippolito and Mr. Lorenzo?) entrusted him, over a period of several months, with a sizable quantity of cocaine, on credit. And Nicole was not exactly the thriftiest of wives with her designer, danger-high-voltage wardrobe and jet-set vacations ...

Barry Hoestler, a private investigator hired for the Simpson case by Robert Shapiro, contended that Nicole entertained the notion of becoming financially independent by opening a restaurant with Ron Goldman as her partner and financing it with cocaine profits (Frost). Hoestler also said that Nicole and her friends were "over their heads with some dope dealers."

As one Beverly Hills resident put it, Simpson and his circle were under intense pressure but "optimistic—entering a tough street business, fueled by a jolt of the goods from time to time."

Simpson's inability to make good on cocaine debts, run up largely by Nicole's circle, was not viewed lightly.

When Simpson's suppliers insisted on payment, Nicole Brown-Simpson and friends suddenly found reasons to leave town. O.J.'s suppliers were attempting to control him by controlling his finances.

This was done by manipulating the habits of Nicole's circle. He attempted to patch up the marriage and failed.

"Simpson wanted her to straighten up and come home," an adherent to the rumor maintains. "Unfortunately for her, O.J. was not in the mood to pick up her 'bar bills' while some young stud was driving the Mercedes he bought for her. He told her that explicitly.... He refused to pay for the wholesale purchases she and her friends made for their new 'business' venture. When O.J. was threatened by her "bill collector," he balked because it was not the debt he agreed to back, and it was more than he could raise."

Simpson's debtors did not buy his excuses. He went to Chicago to pay a call on "the man whose Family, even though not in Los Angeles, has always been the 'patron saint' of a particular part of the movie industry. The people in Chicago tried to step in. They asked for a meeting, but it's a new Family that owns the streets of Los Angeles these days. That only made it worse, because the L.A. boys took the interference as an insult. They've been beating the Chicago crowd for years, even in South Chicago and all over Indiana, where they have spread their operation."

Nicole Brown-Simpson was living precariously. Her best friend was a cocaine addict. Next door when she lived on Gretna Green Way, lived Carl Colby—son of William Colby, a former CIA director and guiding force of the PHOENIX program, the notorious mass-murder operation in Vietnam that targeted suspected and potential Viet Cong collaborators in the South. Carl's sister starved herself to death. It is widely thought that she slowly dwindled away to protest her father's role in the war, according to David Corn in The Blond Ghost (1995).

Colby's wife, Catherine Boe, took the stand first to testify that she'd often heard O.J. Simpson, at the time of his separation from Nicole in early 1992, argue with her about their respective sex lives. Nicole, she said, "was upset about his womanizing." O.J. fumed that Keith Zlombowitch, the Mezzaluna manager, had been sleeping at Nicole's in a spare bedroom.

Repeatedly, Mrs. Colby—who asked to be addressed as "Miss Boe" (probably to distance herself from the name "Colby" and the CIA) continued to answer the prosecution's questions after Shapiro and Cochran raised objections.

Glaring, Simpson's attorney barked for a sidebar conference:

> Shapiro: Your honor ... we have no discovery on this. I have called this lady and asked to talk to her and she refused to talk to us.
> Darden: You just really never know what you are going to get from Mrs. Colby,
> Cochran: It might be helpful if you talked to her.
> Darden: I have, but I believe she is going to testify that ...
> Cochran: She is an ALIEN from another planet!

The Los Angeles Times (February 4, 1995) reported that Carl Colby's testimony at the preliminary hearing was "disjointed and confused." Colby testified that he "spied [sic] a suspicious man" outside his house one evening in 1992. It was Simpson. Colby called police, "because he found it odd that a person of Simpson's description was in the neighborhood at that hour. As he said that, a black alternate juror rolled his eyes toward the ceiling, and another alternate, also black, chuckled to herself."

The Times did not find it worth mention that Nicole happened to live next to the son of a necrotizing CIA official.

Nicole Brown-Simpson had been tethered to Simpson throughout her adult life. She feared her husband's periodic rages. He followed her ("Oh my God, it's O.J.!") and knew her whereabouts at all times. She had escaped a suffocating marriage. Her newfound freedom was exhilarating.

Why glance back?

PART III:
The Catspaw Precursor—A Mirror Image of the Simpson Case

Because the Simpson case is a carefully concerted reenactment of another double-murder: Before the legal throes of O.J. Simpson, there was embattled Murray Gold.

The Brentwood slaughter was foreshadowed in 1974 when 71-year-old Irving Pasternak and his wife Rhoda were brutally stabbed to death in Waterbury, Connecticut. All in a few moments. Gold was charged. There were no witnesses.

Mr. Pasternak, before his retirement, was legal counsel to the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America (MPPDA), a Hollywood labor union once run by Pat Casey, an "undercover agent" of mob boss Johnny Rosselli (Moldea). (Already the "Catspaw" case has struck familiar territory: Murderville.).

A glance at Mafia history links the two cases.

Rosselli, like Lansky, had one foot in the underworld, the other in Langley, Virginia. By his own testimony before the Church Committee in 1974, Rosselli was once handed a CIA contract on the lives of Fidel Castro, Che Guevara and other Latin American rebels. Rosselli went on to link Las Vegas casino interests with Howard Hughes, Moe Dalitz and Jimmy Hoffa (Kohn).

John Rosselli was an asset of the intelligence sector, per his own admission before the Church Committee on Assassinations. Charles Rappleye, in a biography of Rosselli, describes the gangster's initial appearance as Congress attempted to unravel criminal interconnections of the Watergate debacle:

> Hoping to get to the bottom of the Nixon administration burglaries, the Watergate prosecutors turned to John Rosselli. Leslie Scherr, the Washington D.C., attorney who appeared with Rosselli at the closed hearing, recalled, "It was so convoluted, you really had to be John Le Carre to follow it." But judging from the questions posed to Rosselli, Scherr said, the prosecutors felt that "the reason why the break-in occurred at the Democratic Party headquarters was because Nixon or somebody in the Republican Party suspected the Democrats had information as to Nixon's involvement with the CIA's original contract with Rosselli" (Rappleye & Becker).

In July 1976, Rosselli's dismembered body was found—shortly after a Congressional appearance—stuffed inside a 55-gallon oil drum bobbing in the intercoastal waters of Biscayne Bay, off Miami, near Donald Aronow's speedboat factory.

Lansky and Aronow were both questioned by police about the murder (Burdick).

The indictment of Murray Gold, a Jewish survivor of the Holocaust and former son-in-law of the Pasternaks, hung entirely on circumstantial evidence. There was, for one thing, the tell-tale slash on the index finger of Gold's left hand. The prosecution made a fuss over the finger. They argued in court that Gold had injured himself in the course of killing the Pasternaks. His defense team—a coalition of world famous attorneys, soon to include F. Lee Bailey—ushered to the stand an expert witness who testified that it was improbable a slasher could frenetically wound his victims and stab himself without inflicting more damage than a minor flesh wound.

Witnesses passing the Pasternak home the night of the murders gave police a description bearing no resemblance to the accused.

Bruce Sanford, a friend of the Pasternak's daughter who enjoyed sleeping in graveyards, fit the description in all particulars. Sanford was known to wear Catspaw boots consistent with the feral heelprints stamped in the blood of the Pasternaks. Sanford had a long, sordid criminal history: a heroin addict, he once attempted suicide by eating glass, admired Charles Manson and belonged to a motorcycle gang called the "Peddlers of Death." On two occasions, he openly confessed to friends of committing the murders, yet Waterbury authorities covered for him, at one point going so far as to testify in the courtroom that Sanford had been safely locked away in a jail cell the night of the murders when, the defense learned, he had not.

Yet the name Sanford did not turn up on the list of suspects, because on December 12, 1974, he cut his own throat. Murray Gold argued that police and prosecutors had set him up and were deliberately overlooking Sanford's guilt to win a false conviction.

The prosecution dogged Murray Gold through five murder trials before a guilty verdict was finally handed down—ten years after the crime took place. It was a textbook frame-up.

On the jury sat a secretary for the Attorney General of Connecticut, the same office that indicted Gold (just as a secretary for the D.A.'s office turned up on the jury in the second Simpson trial), a woman with two first cousins on the police force, another who admitted upon questioning to have "extensive contact" with the police, a juror who spent "23 years in government service," an employee of a state agency, and an alternate with a son employed as a "corrections officer" (Nizer).

Yet Gold's claim that he was the target of a "police conspiracy," lightly dismissed by the state's prosecutrix, Marcia Smith, was treated by the court as proof of diminished capacity.

The jury found Gold guilty of the murders, but at a post-trial hearing the verdict was set aside with a false finding that Gold was mentally crippled, that an irrational fear of courtroom "conspiracies" had decimated his sanity. The judge concluded that Gold was entitled to a sixth trial. In the meantime, evidence that Sanford committed the murders mounted. Gold was released after a defense argument about suppressed evidence at the post-trial hearing.

PART IV:
A Killer's Brain Frequencies & A Few Words About CIA/Mafia Clean-Up Operations

Gold was not the slasher—but he was an ideal cut-out for a CIA/Mafia killing. Gold once held a top-security position at Grumman Aerospace. He had worked on secret defense projects (Nizer).

Grumman's personnel office would have kept a comprehensive file on Gold. His history would be an open book to any intelligence operatives—including the period when he was incarcerated at Mount Sanai Hospital in New York, where he received shock treatments for depression.

Mount Sanai shares with other leading hospitals around the country the distinction of employing psychiatrists moonlighting in the scientific/psychiatric netherworld of CIA mind control. Dr. Harold Abramson (hand-picked for the mind control program by Sidney Gottleib of the CIA's Technical Services Division) conducted LSD research at Mount Sanai—unusual in itself because Abramson had no formal training in psychiatry. His research was funded by the Macy Foundation, a CIA shell (Marks). Abramson is best known as biochemical warfare specialist Frank Olson's therapist—before the CIA mind control subject plummeted from a tenth-floor office window.

At Mount Sanai, too, the Agency would have easy access to detailed information concerning Murray Gold. His professional and psychiatric profile spelled p-a-t-s-y.

The backroom presence of CIA mind control in the Simpson case explains the break-in at the office of Dr. Ameli and other therapists retained to temper the emotional aches of the Simpson crowd.

A chilling indication that the CIA's mind control fraternity exercised a hidden influence on the trial was the breakdown of juror Tracy Hampton in early May, 1995. Before she was released by Judge Ito, Ms. Hampton had been observed sitting motionless in the jury box. Jurors reported that she had taken to staring at a blank television screen for hours at a spell. Hampton was removed from the jury on May 3, after complaining to Judge Ito, "I can't take it anymore."

Hard Copy reported that Hampton had been "hearing voices," a detail overlooked in newspaper accounts. The CIA's mind control fraternity has, for at least 20 years, transmitted words to subjects snared for experimentation in mental institutions, prisons and even society at large. After she was ousted from the courtroom, Hampton tried to commit suicide by eating glass—an allusion to the Catspaw case—specifically the attempted self-immolation of suspect Bruce Sanford, who also bolted down a mouthful of glass. Paramedics carted Ms. Hampton from her home on a stretcher. She was hospitalized. After her release, she denied attempting suicide.

Prosecutor Christopher Darden also seems to have had a close brush with mind control. In April 1995, Duarte, California artist Steve Hardy related a grim story of CIA brain manipulation and death to reporters of the Los Angeles Sentinel. The "subject" was Sonji Taylor, an elementary school teacher shot by police on a medical center rooftop in Los Angeles on December 16, 1993. Taylor was discovered in a stairwell at the medical center at about 8 PM by a janitor, who summoned security guards. They found Taylor—a church choir singer, devoted single mother, a former homecoming queen—holding her son in a head-lock, clutching a knife. A hospital dispatcher called 911 at 8:25 PM and reported that Taylor had threatened to stab anyone who approached.

"Sonji Danese Taylor," Hardy said, "was an involuntary human experimentee. Advanced technologies using microwaves can make people hear voices":

> Officials do not know how, when or why Taylor arrived atop the medical center. She moved to Los Angeles in 1991 with dreams of becoming an actress or model. Neither she nor her son, Jeremy Jamal, 3, had ever been a patient or received any treatment at the center.
>
> Taylor was working as a substitute teacher at K.L. Carver and William L. Valentine elementary schools in San Marino....
> Shortly after [a] 911 call, Los Angeles Police Department officers Sgt. Michael Long, an 18-year veteran, and Craig Liedahl, a 15-year veteran, arrived on the scene....
>
> Taylor was holding her son in her left arm and using her right to make threatening gestures with the knife and yelling "For the blood of Jesus!"
>
> The heliport lights were off and the only illumination was provided by the street lights below and by adjacent structures.
> Taylor failed to respond to repeated commands to release her son and drop the knife. The officers later said Taylor was swinging the knife dangerously close to Jeremy and they feared she might stab him.

Long sprayed Taylor twice with pepper spray and the second application forced her to release Jeremy, who was grabbed by another officer and rushed from the immediate vicinity.

Long and Liedahl said Taylor then lunged at them with the knife and both officers shot her, Long firing twice with his nine-millimeter automatic and Liedahl seven times with his weapon. Jeremy witnessed his mother's death.

Although nine shots were fired, the autopsy revealed Taylor sustained ten bullet wounds, seven in the back. The coroner speculated the tenth wound was caused by a ricochet.

Hardy said he became intrigued with Taylor's case because her last minutes on earth were so unlike everything that preceded it.

"Something seemed wrong," he said. "She wasn't on drugs, she wasn' t drunk and she had no mental health problems. She was a good mother and a law abiding citizen. She came from a stable family and she had a little boy. Then, suddenly, she goes crazy. No one has any idea why she was there [at the medical center] or what she was doing."

If Taylor was an involuntary human experiment of microwave experiments, all of her odd behavior is explained, Hardy said....

Hardy said people will not participate in experiments if they know the outcome of certain types of research is permanent physical damage and/or death. Therefore involuntary human experimentees are needed and Hardy says unsuspecting citizens are routinely used as test subjects.

Taylor, Hardy said, through microwave transmissions, was subjected to voices that told her to got to St. Vincent the night of Dec. 16, 1993. He said the voices probably pretended to be demons or Taylor, because of her religious upbringing, thought she was hearing demons and that accounts for her repeated use of the phrase "For the blood of Jesus" as a chant to ward off demons.

He said she was not threatening her son that night, but trying valiantly to protect him.

"She was displaying the traits of a mother who was bravely doing her damnedest to protect her son and ward off attackers. She was steered to do what she did."

On Sept. 28, 1994, the Los Angeles County District Attorney's Office released a report on Taylor's death that said Officers Long and Liedahl would not face criminal charges. The team of prosecutors, including O.J. Simpson prosecutor Christopher Darden, concluded the case could not be won in a court (Parker).

The coroner ruled the shooting of Sonji Taylor a "homicide." The L.A. County coroner's office, reported the San Gabriel Valley Tribune, was not forthcoming with the report. It was released to reporters only after an attorney intervened (Bolden). The 45-page investigative findings, prepared by Chris Darden, raised "the possibility ... that the officers are not being truthful about their actions that evening," Questions concerning the account of the shootings given by Long and Liedahl arose when it was revealed that four of the bullets that dropped Taylor were flattened, or "mushroomed," directly under her body, indicating she'd been shot repeatedly after she was prostrate. One investigator observed, "it was a bad shoot and it can't be justified" (Stein).

"If this woman posed such a danger, why was she shot in the back?" attorney Johnnie L. Cochran, Jr. asked. "For the district attorney's office to find that this was a justifiable shooting is outrageous" (Hubler).

Prosecutor Darden's reasons for clearing the officers depended entirely upon a legal loophole in a less than full investigation. The coroner's report acknowledged public speculation of a police cover-up. Indeed, Investigators Darden and Richard Goul wrote, "the evidence does not square with the police account." The most troubling question: "How could Taylor lunge forward at the officers and yet be shot in the back?" Darden and Goul wrote. However, they noted, the force of the bullets' impact could have turned Taylor's body around as she fell—subverting criminal prosecution of the officers." Darden claimed that the officers could not be prosecuted because, under rules of circumstantial evidence, "if a jury is presented with two rational conclusions and one points to innocence, that is the conclusion it must adopt" (Stein).

1: "Sufficient Truth": Blowback at the LAPD

> "When people in the mainstream talk about the man charged with the Oklahoma City bombing—and keep in mind that was allegedly the worst act of domestic terrorism in history—they speak in much gentler terms than they do about O.J. Simpson."
> —Johnny Cochran, San Francisco Chronicle, November 17, 1996

There are troubling contradictions, still unexplained, in the Simpson case. The Los Angeles Times reported: "Police detectives disregarded state law and their own departmental policy when they waited hours to summon the county coroner" (Frammolino & Weinstein).

Blood, as from a holy stigmata, materialized on a pair of Simpson's socks. AP's Linda Deutch, in her November 4, 1996 story on former police lab supervisor Gregory Matheson's testimony at the civil trial:

> Matheson glossed over the socks found at the foot of Simpson's bed the day after Nicole Brown Simpson and Ronald Goldman were slashed to death.... Matheson, who is now chief forensic chemist for the Police Department, acknowledged he saw no blood on the socks when they were collected June 13, 1994. He examined them again on June 29 and still saw no blood.
>
> It was left to defense attorney Robert Blasier to tell jurors that criminalist Collin Yamauchi studied the socks in his laboratory on Aug. 4 and found copious amounts of blood.
>
> "On Aug. 4, is it correct that's the first time Mr. Yamauchi looked and determined blood was visible to the naked eye?" Blasier asked.
> "That was the first day blood was located, yes," Matheson said.
>
> Obviously miffed, Blasier asked Matheson: "Were you told by the plaintiffs you were not going to be asked a single question about any of the testing you did?"
>
> The answer was blocked by an objection....
>
> When Blasier asked about the socks, Matheson said he didn't do a close examination before writing his initial notes which said of blood: "None obvious."
>
> "I brought them out, gave the general color description ... and there was no blood obvious on the socks," Matheson said.
> In the first trial, the defense suggested the socks were pristine when taken to the laboratory, then contaminated with blood from Simpson and his slain ex-wife while they were in the laboratory.

Is Mark Fuhrman a white supremacist? The spinner of bloody tales for credulous femmes signed a book deal with Regnery Press, which bills itself as the "premier publisher of conservative books." Furhman received a $1.2 million advance from Regnery, the publisher of such Ultracon titles as The Conservative Mind by Russell Kirk, God & Man at Yale by William F. Buckley, Goldwater: the Man Who Made a Revolution by Lee Edwards, Right From the Beginning by Patrick J. Buchanan, and Inventing the AIDS Virus by Peter Duesburg

He has been accused at least a half-dozen times of threatening and beating suspects, particularly blacks and Hispanics. Police Watch, a non-profit citizen advocacy group in Los Angeles, has received five complaints against Fuhrman since 1988. "I work with these files every day," says Police Watch official Michael Salcido, "and I personally handled over a thousand intakes a year and I know no other officer that has five counts against him" (Noble).

Kathleen Bell's July 19, 1994 letter to Cochran is a consistent step in Fuhrman's bucolic track record:

> I'm writing to you in regards to a story I saw on the news last night. I thought it ridiculous that the Simpson defense team would even suggest that their (sic) might ... be racial motivation involved in the trial against Mr. Simpson. I then glanced up at the television and was quite shocked to see that Officer Ferman (sic) was a man that I had the misfortune of meeting. You may have received a message from your answering service last night that I called to say that Mr. Ferman (sic) may be more of a racist than you could even imagine.
>
> Between 1985 and 1986 I worked as a real estate agent in Redondo Beach for Century 21 Bob Maher Realty (now out of business). At the time, my office was located above a Marine recruiting center off of Pacific Coast Highway. On occasion I would stop in to say hello to the two Marines working there. I saw Mr. Ferman (sic) there a couple of times. I remember him distinctly because of his height and build.
> While speaking to the men I learned that Mr. Ferman (sic) was a police officer in Westwood, and I don't know if he was telling the truth, but he said that he had been in a special division of the Marines. I don't know how the subject was raised, but Officer Ferman (sic) said that when he sees a "nigger" (as he called it) driving with a white woman, he would pull them over. I asked would he if he didn't have a reason, and he said that he would find one. I looked at the two Marines to see if they knew he was joking, but it became obvious to me that he was very serious.
> Officer Ferman (sic) went on to say that he would like nothing more than to see all "niggers" gathered together and killed. He said something about burning them or bombing them. I was too shaken to remember the exact words he used, however, I do remember that what he said was probably the most horrible thing I had ever heard someone say. What frightened me even more was that he was a police officer.

In 1983, the volatile Mark Fuhrman was interviewed by Dr. Ira Brent in lieu of a disability claim for work-related stress. Mark Furhman confided to Brent that he "beat up" on suspects, and "blacked out," became "a wild man" (Noble). Investigative reporter Stephen Singular, in Legacy of Deception, found in Furhman's testimony a passage about his thoughts in the immediate aftermath of the murders: he testified that he was "'concerned with the [younger Simpson] children and the ex-husband since they [Nicole and O.J.] still had joint custody of the children.' How, I asked myself, did he know about this joint custody arrangement? " (Singular).

The planned relocation to Sandpoint in the Idaho panhandle was something of an LAPD tradition. So many officers live there, in fact, some residents claim that the LAPD runs the county (Ockenfels). Richard Butler, founder of the Aryan Nations compound in Hayden Lake, 30 miles south of Sandpoint, told CNN: "He has to be a racist, or he'd stay in Los Angeles." A swastika loomed above Butler's shoulder. "It's hypocritical for them to say they come up here for the birds and bees and trees. If this area was all non-white, you wouldn't find a police officer within a hundred miles of here," the Nazi said.

Aryan Nations also entered the picture when an anonymous caller to the Michael Jackson talk show, aired on KABC-AM in Los Angeles, claimed to have met with "Aryan Nations types" from his past on the Colombian cocaine circuit. The caller said that since serving a stiff prison sentence, he'd straightened out his life, and today runs a local construction company.

He told Jackson he'd overheard his past Nazi cohorts "planning the murder of Nicole Simpson." Jackson, flustered, quickly ditched him, babbling "it couldn't be." But without knowing more about the story, Jackson could not have possibly known whether or not the caller was relaying the truth. Jackson, who hails from South Africa, is presumably not a psychic. He refused to delve into the caller's story, which sounded straightforward enough, if a bit unsteady with nervousness.

KABC is an affiliate of Cap Cities, a company with a long history of collaboration with the CIA—the media conglomerate, in fact, is steered by former executives of the Mary Carter Paint Co., a CIA proprietary closely aligned with the Vatican's Maltese order. In the late 1960s, the company moved drugs into the U.S., primarily heroin and LSD, and laundered the proceeds through offshore accounts (Kruger).

The call to Michael Jackson was broadcast weeks before Mark Fuhrman's famed trip to northern Idaho, the beating heart of Aryan Nations. Jackson refused to entertain the possibility that the caller he ditched in a panic may have been an important eyewitness, one who might have decimated the prosecution's case.

And the Ippolito circle is chock-a-block with enforcers capable, with an assist from infiltrators in the LAPD, of framing Simpson.

Frankie Viserto, for example. Viserto, Joey 's lead hit-man, was an original member of New York's Purple Gang, an offshoot of the Genovese Family. The Purple Gang formed in the 1970s, named after the bootleggers of Prohibition-era Detroit. A 1979 file on the gang prepared by the Florida Department of Law Enforcement notes that they operated "in Florida and may be using this state as a base of operations," and were "committing gangland murders in Florida." At the time, they ran the largest heroin smuggling operation in the country.

Viserto, a suspect in the killing of Donald Aronow, is the leader of the Purple

Gang. He is a terrorist and gun-runner. In the past, he has worked with death squads in Guatemala, traditionally a bailiwick of the CIA. A gun once found at the site of the assassination of a Guatemalan official was traced to Frankie Viserto. The BATF considers him, according to one report, a "significant criminal." Angelo Wedra, a former cellmate, told police in 1977 that Viserto claimed to have killed 15 people. "Wedra learned that Frankie especially enjoyed torturing techniques," according to the report (Burdick).

In the past, Viserto has tormented his victims with knives (Goldman was tortured). He has threatened his enemies with decapitation (Nicole was beheaded). He is known to be one of a clutch of hit-men who'd be pleased to make a revenge hit for Joey or silence a troublesome witness, ala Nicole Brown-Simpson.

For those who refrain, "who else would have killed her?" there are other possibilities.

2: "Evidence of Conspiracy"

A thoughtful examination of the case, posted on the Net by a pair of college students during the first trial, raises more nagging questions than Johnny Cochran:

> In violation of policy, evidence remained in the processing room for three days before the first piece was booked in the secure ECU (electronic-controlled unit)—seventy to eighty police personnel have keys to the processing room. The evidence remained on a table top, and could be handled by anyone with access. The reckless processing room analysis of the evidence was 50% inconclusive, but still entered by June 15—in time for the first "summit" case evaluation meeting between prosecutors, serologists and detectives while the blood samples were still unbooked and laying about the evidence processing room.

"The blood drop on Nicole's back gate wondrously appears for collection on July 3, with no photo records of its existence on June 13 or June 14," better preserved than blood collected near the bodies.

"Possibly significant EDTA (blood preservative) discovery in Nicole blood on O.J.'s sock, as Harmon begrudgingly hinted at a 'glimmer of hope' for defense in his typically biased, bonehead, pompom girl manner." (Harmon is the protégé of Judge Lowell Jenson, a central participant in the "Alameda Mafia," a circle of corrupt, right-wing public officials recruited by the Justice Department in the early 1980s by Alameda's Edwin Meese. Jenson was the second-ranking official in the Justice Department under Meese.)

"Racist cop with special animus towards black men with white women. Unexplained DNA mix on steering wheel column: other than O.J., Nicole, or Goldman.

"The suppressed 'car testimonies' of Park and Kato suggest unexplained movement of vehicle(s) after O.J. departed for the airport....

"While witnesses are compelled to tell the 'whole truth,' the prosecution can only argue 'sufficient truth.' In that non-intersecting domain between 'sufficient truth' and 'whole truth' lies an opportunity to establish 'sufficient confusion' in a jury, grounded not merely in speculation but also in real facts left unappropriated by a recklessly and smugly contrived theory of the case" (Larson & Wilson).

Was it smugness that led the LAPD to leak that a "bloody ski-mask" had turned up, and a "blood-stained military-style entrenching tool?" Ten days later, police stumbled on the fact that there was no ski mask, no murder weapon. In the meantime, local propagandists on far-right talk radio had a field day convincing the public that Simpson was guilty.

Liberal doses of perjury eliminated obstacles on the path to a guilty verdict. Furman wasn't the only detective to misspeak under oath. One L.A. weekly newspaper charged criminalists Dennis Fung and Tom Lange with "CRIMINAL BEHAVIOR," noting that the corporate media, the LAPD and the D.A.'s office had failed to investigate them after "Simpson's defense team showed that Fung misrepresented the facts in his testimony about the collection of evidence at the murder scene and Simpson's house. Fung also testified that he altered original documents relating to the booking of evidence. In an apparent effort to run interference for Vannatter, Lange misrepresented the facts in his testimony about the department's requirements for booking blood evidence, claiming that there was a window of 24 hours. He also testified that he took evidence collected at the scene to his house. Not only have these actions gone uninvestigated, but Fung actually received a promotion during the course of the trial" (L.A. View).

Convicted felon Marianne Gurchis, prepared to testify she saw four suspicious men walking away from the Nicole Simpson's townhouse, was told by police officers: "We've got the case all sewn up." She called the district attorney's office. A detective placed her on hold, said he'd get back to her: "I'm talking to a psychic right now" (Hiscock).

From the first drop of the gavel, the case was lost in constant bickering and minute analysis of the evidence by attorneys on both sides of the bench. Any mention of the Mafia or CIA was a taboo observed by both sides. Johnnie

Cochran could have effortlessly impeached the credibility of Denise Simpson by producing the photo of her beaming from the arm of her beau, the "Animal." But then any mention of the syndicate could conceivably open the door to a melée of accusations and counteraccusations, disrupting Ito's tightly-regimented courtroom.

But if the police already had the the killer in custody.

Who broke into Robert Shapiro's office, forced open a locked filing cabinet and stole confidential papers related to the case?

Why did Faye Resnick skip town?

Who broke into Resnick's apartment to appropriate documents and photographs that could link her to the Simpsons?

Who left death threats for Ron Goldman's therapist, Dr. Jennifer Ameli, on her answering machine? (Who knew Goldman had a therapist?) Why was her office broken into? Why were only the files on Goldman stolen (National Examiner)?

Who hired the car-thieving William Wasz to monitor the movements of Nicole Brown-Simpson six months before the hit?

Who stole the slander suit filed in a Los Angeles courthouse against Marcia Clark during the "Trial of the Century?" Ted Chirac, author of The Second Gun, an examination of the RFK assassination, related the saga of the vanishing lawsuit to Dave Manning, a board member of the Citizens for Truth About the Kennedy Assassination, in April, 1996. "Midway through the Simpson trial," Manning says, "Juan Mercado, the son of a Spanish diplomat, was washing his car. He accidentally splashed some soap and water on a car parked next to his own. The driver of the car, an upright woman, approached. Juan tried to clean if off and apologized for the accident. She kept on him about messing up the car. He tried to calm her down, but she wouldn't let it go. She got so volatile that the police were called by somebody because she was getting out of hand. Juan decided to file a complaint against this woman, Marcia Clark. He filed a slander suit. A week later, Mercado's attorney attempted to examine the file on the case at the courthouse. He discovered that no complaint, no suit, had been filed, and couldn't understand what happened to it. It disappeared" (Manning).

The revelations bubbled up in the courtroom and the tabloid press. The "respectable" news outlets were too frequently caught out napping. A point of evidence as significant as Biblical transmutations of blood on a pair of socks should have been nailed down by journalists long before Matheson's uneasy appearance in the courtroom.

And even in the courtroom, key points raised by the defense were suppressed by the bench: "The O.J. Simpson civil trial opened Tuesday with a flurry of rulings that significantly restrict the defense's strategy of attacking the Los Angeles Police Department as a group of inept bunglers and corrupt, racist cops who sought to frame Simpson for murder." If anything else, the first trial demonstrated that the LAPD investigators assigned to the double murders were indeed "inept bunglers." They tromped through blood on the sidewalk, took half a day to call the coroner. At least one was a "racist cop." Ineptitude and racism were the foundation of Simpson's defense argument. "This is not a case about did the LAPD commit malpractice," said Fujasaki (Simon). There is no doubt the LAPD committed malpractice. Did it extend to the framing of O.J. Simpson?

3: The "Experts"

The tabloid cover photo of O.J. Simpson sporting a pair of Bruno Magli's was validated by the Rochester Institute of Technology. According to a CIA document dated October 16, 1975, the Agency had "certain relationships" with the Rochester Institute; they were described as "special," even "particular." The College of Graphic Arts and Photography received roughly $200,000 from the CIA in grants from 1966 to 1975. The school has been adamant in maintaining its relationship with the Agency despite the periodic protests from the faculty and students. M. Richard Rose, president of Rochester Tech, was forced to resign in 1991 after acknowledging that he secretly worked for the Agency while on leave. Trustees had a secret agreement that actually gave the CIA authority over the curriculum (Mann; Glaberson).

Political researcher Paul Ruiz in Washington notes that photographers Harry Scull and E.J. Flammer, "who took 30 photographs of O.J. on the same day that Scull took his photograph, have the same lawyer and the same agent. In addition, Robert Groden says they know each other. This is important, because Flammer has insisted all along that he is 'independent' of Scull."

In the criminal trial, the Menlo Park, California engineering firm of Failure Analysis Associates (FAA) produced a computer-animated enactment of the Brentwood killings. Roger McCarthy, chief executive officer of FAA, described the experiment as "state of the art," "sophisticated"— but he told reporters that the computer simulation was wholly based on the work of forensics experts and the choreography of actors. He boasted that the company exercised "complete artistic control" over the project. But there was no need for the trappings of high technology—filming the actors would have produced the same results, and not cost the "hundreds of thousands of dollars" that McCarthy's company spent on four minutes of highly impressive, if superfluous digitized animation (Armstrong).

FAA's credibility has been an issue since the company's computer simulation of the Kennedy assassination as adopted by Gerald Posner in Case Closed, a book that strains to remove the onus of CIA involvement but is really one more study in disinformation, a rehash of cooked evidence rejected even by the Warren Commission. The book is larded with false quotations (Scott).

McCarthy arrived at the conclusion, "the victims were tortured before they died. There was a clear indication to deliver more than death" (Armstrong).

Another vaunted expert who testified in the Simpson case was Dr. Michael Baden, formerly head of the House Select Committee on Assassination's forensics pathology panel. Baden's testimony before the committee in 1978 was grossly deceptive, according to David Lifton in Best Evidence, a detailed examination of the John Kennedy autopsy by military doctors. Baden's conclusion, after analyzing the panel's medical reports, held that Kennedy had been struck by two shots from behind, supporting the Warren Commission's improbable findings. Baden's supporting evidence, Lifton discovered, had been "created" to agree with the Committee's predetermined judgment that Lee Harvey Oswald murdered John Kennedy.

Dr. Weir, another expert witness for the prosecution, began his testimony insisting that his statistical DNA analysis was unimpeachable. He was proven wrong upon cross-examination, despite his professorship in genetics at North Carolina State University and 100 peer-review articles to his credit. Dr. Weir has long been an FBI consultant. In the courtroom, he never testifies for the defense. His errors consistently favor the prosecution (Gard). These were sufficient grounds to strike much of Dr. Weir's testimony from the record.

FBI Agent Roger Marx, the EDTA "expert," was accused by Agent Whitehurst, the Bureau whistle-blower, of "manipulating" evidence in the Atlanta bombing case (Ruiz).

In the end, author Joe McGinniss chose not to write his book. He prompted outrage in the courtroom early on when Ito honored the "journalist" with a front-row seat. McGinniss is the same confabulator whose Fatal Vision echoed the government's framing of Dr. Jeffrey MacDonald for the murder of his wife and two daughters (Constantine). The MacDonald case, too, involved drugs. As a doctor, MacDonald had treated addicts assigned to Fort Bragg employed in the importation of China White from Vietnam in the body cavities of war casualties. MacDonald himself was the target of murder. He lived to be railroaded to prison by the U.S. Army. McGinniss's account protected the identities of Army and CIA officials linked to the scandal.

The Faye Resnick book is also redolent with the politics of assassination. Michael Viner, her publisher, once resided in Washington, D.C. and worked at Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service (Los Angeles Times, June 3, 1996), the very epitomé of the CIA's academic presence.

The passing connections to the Kennedy killings recur, and they are not the mark of Kismet.

The Nazi-Mafia Combination that ambushed American history in November, 1963 survives to continue urging the country toward open fascist rule. Each murder along the way makes the going a little easier. Nicole Simpson and Ron Goldman were claimed by an Octopus, and the creature continues to destroy anyone threatening its avaricious grasp on power and privilege.

EX-CON, O.J. BOND INSTANTLY AT GOLF TOURNEY

MIAMI HERALD, MAY 19, 1997

O.J. Simpson’s golfing buddy in the recent charity tournament on Key Biscayne: Steve Thiele, 34, an ex-con on parole.

Thiele, once a bodyguard who ran with the Miami River Cops, now works for a courier service. He is a six-day-a-week golfer who shoots in the mid-70s. He showed up—Pings in his bag—at the Crandon Park course, hoping to meet The Juice.

“I started hitting balls and making small talk. I asked him if he needed a caddy or any type of security. He told me the way he sees me hitting, he’d like to get me on his team.”

Thiele says he couldn't afford the entry fee. "He said, 'Don't worry, I'll take care of it.'"

Thiele told Simpson he had done hard time—6 1/2 years—in federal prison for making a threatening phone call to a businessman who owed him money—and for beating up Ray Corona, a former bank president convicted in a marijuana smuggling case. Thiele used to be Corona's bodyguard.

Simpson invited Thiele to play with him in L.A. "He gave me his address and his phone number and told me to definitely call."

But first, Thiele says, he must get permission—from his parole officer.

From "Darkness at Sunshine State," in James Ring Adams, The Big Fix: Inside the S&L Scandal (New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1990), pp. 125–126:

Ray [Corona] did buy his own bank, the Sunshine State Bank in South Miami. It took two years for the FDIC to close down this bank, even after a federal indictment called it "part of a vertically integrated drug conspiracy," and Ray and his father were convicted.

As the government later proved in two protracted trials, Tony Fernendez provided funds for Ray Corona's bank ventures.... Tony Fernandez fled to the United States from Cuba in 1962 and survived for the next 14 years through low-paying odd jobs. He measured drapes, stamped circuit boards for personal computers, and, for two years, did contract work for the Central Intelligence Agency. In 1976, a friend brought him to meet a sinister figure named José Alvero-Cruz, and Tony's fortunes took a dramatic turn. Alvero Cruz was considered the largest marijuana smuggler in Miami."

THE GOOD SOLDIER

Timothy McVeigh's Rise From "Robotic" Soldier to Mad Bomber

Sometimes the minority cannot prevail except by force; then it must determine whether the prevalence of its will is worth the price of using force.

— William F. Buckley, Jr.

The popular conception was spun by the press corps like a shallow clay urn: Timothy McVeigh, the volatile minuteman, was so bitter after failing to make the Army's "elite" Special Forces, so stuffed full of paramilitary dogma and the froth of The Turner Diaries, that he vented his rage on the Alfred Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City.

The popular conception oversimplifies. Captain Terry Guild, McVeigh's former platoon leader, told reporters that the failure to become a Green Beret left the Iraq War veteran "upset. Not angry. Just very, very disappointed."

McVeigh's sister testified at the closed grand jury hearing that he worked for a special forces unit involved in criminal activity. He reportedly trained at the School of the Americas, the CIA's academy for death squads.

As a civilian, Timothy McVeigh clung to the trappings of the military. In 1992, he joined the National Guard of Tonawanda, New York. He took a job with Burns International Security Services in Buffalo. McVeigh was assigned to the security detail at Calspan, a Pentagon contractor that conducts classified research in advanced aerospace rocketry and electronic warfare.

Al Salandra, a spokesman for Calspan, told reporters that McVeigh was "a model employee." His fellow enlistees describe him as a gun-toting, adrenal-crazed cartoon soldier. In the Army, he demonstrated a willingness to carry out orders, any orders. He trained on his own time while other soldiers languished in their bunks or caroused at the PX.

"He was real different," Todd Regier, a plumber, told the Boston Globe. "Kind of cold. He was almost like a robot."

Within a few months, his manager planned on promoting McVeigh to the supervisory level, but he abruptly resigned.

McVeigh had "more pressing matters to tend to," the Globe reported. His bitterness "was becoming directed at a much larger, more ubiquitous enemy. "

It was in Buffalo that McVeigh's rage peaked. He complained that federal agents had implanted him with a microchip and left him with an unexplained scar on his posterior. It was painful, he winced, to sit on the chip.

It's conceivable, given the current state of the electronic mind control art, a biocybernetic Oz over the black budget rainbow, that McVeigh had been drawn into an experimental project, that the device was the real McCoy. Ironically enough, McVeigh's contention that he'd been implanted and tracked was laughed off by most sensible, media-fed folk, even as an electronics firm in Tampa, Florida—Pro-Tech Monitoring, Inc. in Tampa, Florida—introduced a satellite-tracking system, SMART (or Satellite Monitoring and Remote Tracking device) for use by the criminal justice system, a "patent-protected, space-age device that tracks and continuously monitors offenders, stalkers and provides advance warning for victims."

Jeff Camp, who worked as a guard with McVeigh in upstate New York after high school, told Newsweek that John Doe One was "just a very strange person. It was like he had two different personalities."

The press has long ignored the rise of mind control operations and technology, but electronic monitoring of the brain has been perfected in research laboratories more secretive than the military science units that once slipped isotopes to crippled children in their oatmeal.

The generals play it close to their armored vests, but the miniature implantable monitor was declassified long ago. Sandia National Laboratories in Albuquerque, New Mexico markets a sensor implant sealed inside a "hermetic biocompatible package" that operates on a tiny power coil, complete with a programmable sensor and telemetry circuits. Sandia's sales literature notes that the implant design "is founded on technology originally developed for weapons."

From the Pentagon's electromagnetic arsenal came Timothy McVeigh, by his own account obsessed with visions of Waco and Ruby Ridge. If McVeigh was in fact a subject of electromagnetic harassment, he marched in step with a small army of glassy-eyed felons.

No Programmed Killer's Hall-of-Fame would be complete without a bust of Dennis Sweeney, the student activist who shot Allard Lowenstein, the civil rights and anti-war activist. Lowenstein was suspected by many of working for the CIA. A Yale graduate, he marched in the Freedom Summer of 1964 in Mississippi, campaigned for Adlai Stevenson and Robert Kennedy. Yet he was a close friend of William F. Buckley, the garrulous CIA propagandist of PBS fame and Lowenstein's conservative counterpart. He qualified for the Nixon enemies list, yet associated with the bund of Plumbers occupying the White House. Lowenstein ran the National Student Association before the CIA officially took it over.

"Lowenstein," the New Republic reported, "for several years attempted to prove that a great conspiracy had plotted the deaths of John and Robert Kennedy and Martin Luther King Jr., and was also responsible for his own political downfall ... a force of evil that would explain his own and his movement's decline."

Sweeney, who marched with Lowenstein in Mississippi, shot his mentor seven times at Rockefeller Center. He did not flee. The assassin sat down, lit a cigarette and waited for police to arrive.

He maintained that the CIA, with Lowenstein's help, had implanted him with a telemetric brain device fifteen years earlier and made his life an unbearable torment. "Voices" were transmitted through his dental work, he said, and he attempted to silence them by filing down his false teeth. Sweeney blamed CIA controllers for his uncle's heart attack and the assassination of San Francisco mayor George Mosconé.

The murders of Mosconé and City Supervisor Harvey Milk did indeed have earmarks of mind control. Dan White, the "Twinkie" assassin, had been a paratrooper in the 173rd Airborne Division, in which capacity he served a tour of duty in Vietnam. He was discharged from Fort Bragg in 1967, and returned to San Francisco to join the police department. White settled in Sausolito, tooled around in a Porsche and generally lived far beyond his means. In 1972, he gave it all up and took an extended vacation since known as White's "missing year." He broke all contact with friends and family, kept no records of the trip, purchased no travel tickets, did not use a credit card. He later accounted for his mystery year by explaining that he'd worked a stint as a security guard in Alaska.

Back in San Francisco, White joined the fire department where his temper tantrums were an embarrassment to co-workers, though his work record was without blemish. In his run for the Board of Supervisors, he spoke as if he was "programmed," according to Stan Smith, a local labor leader. During Board sessions, White was known to slip into spells of silence punctuated by goose-stepping struts around the supervisors' chambers.

The murders of Moscone and Milk were accomplished with illegal hollow-point bullets. After Milk's body was cremated, the ashes were enshrined at his prior direction with bubble bath, signifying his homosexuality, and several packets of Kool-Aid. The confection was Milk's hint, specified in the will he'd revised a week before the shootings, shortly after the fall of the People's Temple (founded in San Francisco), that the murder was related to the mass CIA mind control experiment that ended with the destruction of 1,200 largely black subjects in Guyana.

"I can be killed with ease," Milk noted in a poem written the month he died. "I can be cut right down." In his revised will, he wrote: "Let the bullets that rip through my brain smash every closet door in the country."

Allegations of classified federal mind control operations have cropped up repeatedly, erupting from hidden pockets of "national security" labyrinths.

In 1984, Francis Fox of Coral Gables, Florida, the owner of a prestigious bridal shop, announced she'd been subjected to traumatic mind control experiments by CIA and military psychiatrists. She spoke to reporters for the St. Petersburg Times for three hours. Her story,

> MILITARY CONTROLS MY MIND, WOMAN SAYS
> was published on March 6, 1994. "Fox said her father was a Cuban-American," the Times reported. "He went into the U.S. military and was stationed in Panama, Germany and several U.S. bases, including MacDill in Tampa."
> She was tormented for a year, while her father was visiting Cuba. She also was subjected to ritualized trauma by her father on instructions from the CIA to fragment her personality and "deposit the painful memory with several alter personalities."

Five months after the bombing in Oklahoma, freeway sniper Christopher Scalley claimed to take direction from "electronic appliances," as reported by the San Francisco Chronicle on August 19, 1995:

> WHY EVIDENCE ON I-80 SNIPER LANGUISHED—
>
> CHP WAS GIVEN SUSPECT'S LICENSE NUMBER IN JUNE
> Auburn, Placer County—The California Highway Patrol received information almost two months ago leading to the man arrested Thursday in the Interstate-80 sniping spree, but an official acknowledged yesterday that the CHP did not pass it on to local investigators.
>
> David Morillas of Loomis said his wife Carla wrote down the license number of a truck that passed them after the side rear window of their car was blown away, showering their sleeping 5-year-old son with glass in what is now thought to have been the sniper's first attack, in Citrus Heights, a Sacramento suburb, on June 27.
>
> "We kept thinking that the CHP was checking into it," Morillas said.
>
> He said yesterday that after his car window shattered, he saw a red Toyota pickup suddenly slow down and shift into the right lane on the roadway.
>
> Morillas said he slowed down alongside the truck and yelled through an open window. "I was shouting at him. 'Did you see what happened to my window?' ... Finally, he said, 'I didn't see nothing.' He was kind of talking weird, mumbling. I couldn't understand him."
> The tie-in between the June 27 shooting and the other fourteen sniper attacks was not made until this week, when Carla Morillas spoke to sheriff's officers. The officers discovered that the license plate number she had reported matched the tag number of their suspect, Christopher Shaw Scalley, 48, of Applegate, who was arrested Thursday.

According to arrest documents, Scalley told Placer County authorities that he had been receiving messages via radio waves and electronic appliances, and had heard voices telepathically from passing vehicles. Scalley had been arrested before for the sale of controlled substances and for driving under the influence. Scalley was booked for investigation of nine felony counts of malicious discharge of a firearm at an occupied vehicle, Placer County Sheriff Ed Bonner said.

The other six reported attacks remain under investigation.

Victims in the shootings identified Scalley from a photo lineup, sheriff's Captain Steve Reader said yesterday.

Scalley had been missing since his home was searched Tuesday. He was spotted Thursday by a television news crew in his red pickup outside a home in Carmichael, where a friend of Scalley's reportedly committed suicide Wednesday.

Placer County deputies were contacted and they arrested Scalley a short distance away.

Authorities said Thursday that they had no further information on the apparent suicide of Larry Don Shores, 58, who died from a gunshot wound to the head after visiting with Scalley at his Carmichael home Wednesday.

Shores was not considered a suspect in the sniper attacks. Authorities said they do not know if Scalley was connected to Shores' death.

There were 15 reported sniper attacks on buses, motor homes and other vehicles, mostly along a two-mile stretch of I-80 between Applegate and Clipper Gap in the Sierra Nevada foot-hills about 40 miles east of Sacramento.

Was Timothy McVeigh a Remote Mind Control Subject?

> Advances in 'overhead' sensors—satellites and UAVs (Unmanned Aerospace Vehicles) included—will create opportunities not only to detect targets but to track them as they move. In [General] Fogelman's view, "this is kind of a revolution in warfare."
> —General Ronald R. Fogelman, Jane's Defense Weekly

> Presumably, research will continue to increase the effectiveness of psychological techniques for controlling human behavior. But we think it is unlikely that psychological techniques alone will be sufficient to adjust human beings to the kind of society that technology is creating.
> —Unabomber's Manifesto, sec. 149

McVeigh's rage at a target "larger" and "more ubiquitous" than the Army was stoked at Calspan within a year of his Special Forces exam.

Calspan and electromagnetic mind control both have roots at the same Ivy League institution—Cornell University, Ithaca, New York. Calspan was founded in 1946 as Cornell Aeronautical Laboratory. Cornell was also the contract base of the CIA's "Human Ecology Fund," a gushing fount of financial support for classified brain experimentation at the country's leading universities.

Cornell Aeronautical was reorganized in 1972 and renamed Calspan. Six years later, the firm was acquired by Arvin Industries. Recently, Arvin-Calspan merged with Space Industries International (SII), a commercial space-flight venture based in Texas. During the Reagan-Bush era, SII expanded from a staff of 33 to over 2,700 employees.

Timothy McVeigh was assigned to the conglomerate's Advanced Technology Center in Buffalo, NY (Calspan ATC). ATC sales literature boasts a large energy shock tunnel, radar facilities and "a radio-frequency (RF) simulator facility for evaluating electronic warfare techniques."

One Calspan research lab specializes in microscopic engineering.

Calspan literature boasts that ATC employs "numerous world renowned engineers" on "the cutting edge" of science.

Human tracking and monitoring technology are well within Calspan's sphere of pursuits. The company is instrumental in REDCAP, an Air Force electronic warfare system that winds through every Department of Defense facility in the country. A Pentagon release explains that REDCAP "is used to evaluate the effectiveness of electronic-combat hardware, techniques, tactics and concepts."

The system "includes closed-loop radar and data links at RF manned data fusion and weapons control posts." REDCAP is managed by the Development Test Center's 46th Test Wing at Florida's Eglin Air Force Base.

The "ubiquitous" enemy that obsessed McVeigh in Buffalo made its presence known—possibly through a national microwave system like REDCAP—the week before the bombing in Oklahoma City. One Patriot computer newsboard claimed that a disembodied, rumbling, low-frequency hum had been heard across the country the week of the bombing. Past hums in Taos, NM, Eugene and Medford, OR, Timmons, Ontario and Bristol, UK were most definitely (despite specious official denials) attuned to the auditory pathways.

The RF hum in Eugene, Oregon in March, 1978 was so powerful that it caused headaches and nosebleeds. Nobel Prize laureate Robert O. Becker has noted that a low-frequency Naval communications line has its terminus near Eugene, Oregon. The Federal Communications Commission reported that the source of the EM signal was tiny Dixon, California (population 10,000), lying midway between Davis and Vacaville, home of the notorious prison and its Maximum Psychiatric Diagnostic Unit, designed by Brown & Root, a site of documented CIA mind control experiments on prisoners, often as a form of punishment.

The Air Force is among Calspan's leading clients, and Eglin AFB has farmed key personnel to the company. The grating irony—recalling McVeigh's contention he'd been implanted with a telemetry chip—is that the Instrumentation Technology Branch of Eglin Air Force Base is currently engaged in the tracking of mammals with subminiature telemetry devices. According to an Air Force press release, the biotelemetry chip transmits on the upper S-band (2318 to 2398 MHz), with up to 120 digital channels.

"Built onto this tiny device," the release boasts, "are programmable capabilities ranging from frequency, transmission mode, input scaling and signal conditioning. The Armament Directorate's Instrumentation Technology Branch is currently pursuing the use of subminiature telemetry to transmit data related to dolphin research."

Monitoring dolphins as they swim through the sea is an unclassified scientific pursuit. The monitoring and controlling of humans has been, for forty years, a highly classified specialty avidly studied by the CIA and military. And brain telemetering systems are but a subset of the Pentagon's "non-lethal" arsenal. The dystopian implications were explored by Defense News for March 20, 1995:

> NAVAL RESEARCH LAB ATTEMPTS TO MELD NEURONS AND CHIPS
> STUDIES MAY PRODUCE ARMY OF "ZOMBIES"
>
> Future battles could be waged with genetically engineered organisms, such as rodents, whose minds are controlled by computer chips engineered with living brain cells.... The research, called Hippocampal Neuron Patterning, grows live neurons on computer chips.
> "This technology that alters neurons could potentially be used on people to create zombie armies," Lawrence Korb, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, said.

The executive suites at SII and Calspan are another pocket of the military elite that jealously squanders certain advances in science and technology—the type with severe human rights implications.

The president of SII is former space shuttle pilot Joseph P. Allen, whose early accomplishments included a Fulbright scholarship to Germany (1959) and nuclear research at Brookhaven National Laboratory (1963–67), recently under investigation by the Department of Energy for conducting secret radiation experiments on human subjects. Dr. Allen was recruited by NASA in 1967. He trained at Vance Air Force Base in Oklahoma. He has also served as staff consultant to the President's Council on International Economic Policy, and was a NASA assistant administrator for legislative affairs (1975–78).

From the "mammal tracking" folk at Eglin AFB hails Richard Covey, a former astronaut who has flown four shuttle missions and taken five spacewalks, currently SII's director of business development. Covey, the fighter hawk, served two tours in Vietnam and flew 339 combat missions. An Air Force press release notes that his immediate postwar assignment was to Eglin AFB, where he was joint director for electronic warfare testing of the F-15 Eagle.

Another military scientist at Calspan, Paul Brodnicki, chaired the technical program at a closed conference on electronic warfare simulations held in February, 1994 at the US Army Research Lab in Adelphi, Maryland. Topics on the itinerary included "off-board Radio Frequency Self-Protection."

Calspan places much research emphasis on bioengineering and artificial intelligence. In May, 1995, Lames Llinas of the Buffalo division gave a talk at the Navy Center for Applied Research in Artificial Intelligence in Washington, D.C. While making his rounds at Calspan, perhaps Tim McVeigh picked up a company newsletter that discussed the work of Cliff Kurtzman, a graduate of UCLA and MIT's Space Systems Lab, and a "team leader" in the R&D of artificial intelligence (Calspan pioneered the field in the 1950s) and telerobotics.

Besides the Air Force and NASA, the firm is a ranking subcontractor for Sentar, Inc., an advanced science and engineering firm capable, according to company literature, of creating artificial intelligence systems. Sentar's customers include the U.S. Army Space and Strategic Defense Command, the Advanced Research Projects Agency, Rockwell International, Teledyne, Nichols Research Corp. and TRW.

All of this is to say that it is technically feasible that McVeigh had been implanted with a telemetry chip.

The "guilt by association" prize goes to retired Brigadier General Benton Partin of the USAF, who laid responsibility for the Oklahoma bombing on "Leftists" conducting a "psycho-political operation going on at the present time against the 'Christian Right' bogeyman." The payoff, Partin insisted darkly, was a propaganda victory for "a world commonwealth of independent states" plotting to "criminalize the patriotic support of Constitutional rights."

The press ridiculed anyone contradicting the FBI's version of events, belittled those who argued that the bombing might be a conspiracy—with the sole exception of Brig. Gen. Partin, who called a one hour press conference at the National Press Club in Washington, D.C. on June 15. The conference was attended by over 100 reporters representing every major broadcast, newspaper and wire service, independent news firm and the foreign media.

But then Brig. Gen. Partin was not exactly a disinterested party. He served 31 years in the Air Force, in the research, design, testing and management of weapons development. He was commander of the Air Force Armament Technology Laboratory. He boasted that he held authority over all advanced weapons concepts R&D'd by the Air Force and its high-tech contractors—which would, of course, include Calspan.

But CIA observers everywhere choked when CNN announced that a psychological trauma team, mustered by the American Psychological Association, would converge in Oklahoma City to treat survivors of the explosion and the victims' families—led by none other than Dr. Louis Jolyon West of UCLA's Neuropsychiatric Institute, the breeding ground of some of the most necrotizing Dr. Strangeloves in the mind control business. Alumni emeritus of the Institute include Dr. Ross Adey, a former NASA brain scientist with much experience collaborating with the Paperclip doctors who expatriated to the U.S. after the war.

Dr. West is a creation of the Agency's mind control fraternity. Among other totalitarian projects, he has studied the use of drugs as "adjuncts to interpersonal manipulation or assault," and employed pioneers in the field of remote electronic brain experimentation at UCLA.

West has recommended to federal officials that drugs be used to control "bothersome" segments of the population:

> This method, foreseen by Aldous Huxley, has the governing element employing drugs selectively to manipulate the governed in various ways. In fact, it may be more convenient and perhaps even more economical to keep the growing numbers of chronic drug users (especially of the hallucinogens) fairly isolated and also out of the labor market, with its millions of unemployed.
> To society, the communards with their hallucinogenic drugs are probably less bothersome—and less expensive—if they are living apart than if they are engaging in alternative modes of expressing their alienation, such as active, organized, vigorous political protest and dissent.

The Lost Tribes of Israel Meet Frankenstein

Ah, distinctly I remember, it was in bleak December,
And each separate dying member wrought a mess upon the floor.
Eagerly I wished the morrow,
for it was then that I would borrow
A pick-up truck and without sorrow, tote the sorry carcasses of this war.
—Linda Thompson

If McVeigh bore a microchip, he was certainly not alone. His rambles would be tracked by remote sensors and receivers, and he would be but one of an unpolled segment of the population that has fallen under the classified federal electromagnetic mind control push. "Classified" but no mystery to victims of sadistic CIA/DoD experimentation and harassment. At present, there at least three national organizations of victims and survivors in the U.S. alone. In past mind control operations—the killings of Robert Kennedy, Allard Lowenstein and John Lennon, among others—operatives were placed in the path of the subject to program his thinking and urge him through a self-incriminating maze to the fatal act.

Afterwards, intelligence operatives (often a psychiatrist) may step forward to hypnotically deprogram the subject.

A cover-up proves the crime and raises the identities of perpetrators into relief. After the Oklahoma bombing, "country" lawyer Stephen Jones was handed McVeigh's case. If McVeigh was involved, Jones asked reporters, "Is he a 'Manchurian Candidate?' Is he a patsy?"

Stephen Jones may never publicly resolve the question. He took the case after both of his legal predecessors were run off by death threats. Jones stepped forward to represent John Doe One. He said he had no qualms about lynch-mob reprisals. He also claimed to have no conflicts of interest in the case. But Jones is not the simple backwoods lawyer he affects to be.

In 1964, he was a legal assistant to Richard Nixon. Jones "stayed in touch." He was among the "honored," he boasts, to be graced with an invitation to Nixon's funeral in 1994.

The Nixon road to high office was paved with political assassinations. In a 1973 Ramparts story, political researcher Peter Dale Scott offered: "what links the scandal of Watergate to the assassination in Dallas is the increasingly ominous symbiosis between U.S. intelligence networks and the forces of organized crime." The Watergate hearings suppressed critical evidence that would have opened old wounds—did not, for example, explore the CIA backgrounds of Howard Hunt (death squad activity and political coups in South America) or J. Gordon Liddy (a hit-man on the White House payroll who proposed kidnapping campus radicals, today the second most popular radio talk show host in the country) or neo-Nazis entering the country from Munich (via Young Americans for Freedom, an all American Nazi front organization), drug running, or a host of capital crimes infinitely more serious than a routine wiretap or Nixon's Milk Fund.

The Watergate Committee also neglected to delve into Nixon's connections to a score of CIA, FBI, Mafia and military intelligence pariahs. They and their recruits are currently trooping along with the Nazi underground, propagandizing the militias with "New World Order" rants designed to incite "conservative" rage with the usual ethnic and political scapegoats of organized fascism.

Congress, the Pentagon and sundry political entities still crawl with right-wing politicians who have struck up an alliance with Nazi movements.

Time magazine reported on May 1, 1995 that George Nethercutt, "the giant-slayer Congressman [who succeeded House Speaker Tom Foley as a Washington State representative]," drew strength from radio shows that had callers hollering about sightings of black helicopters and UN plots to set up a secret compound in the state. In neighboring Idaho, Helen Chenoweth up-ended an environmentalist Democratic incumbent in part by saying that the sole endangered species on the planet was the "white Anglo-Saxon male." Ms. Chenoweth, upon winning the election, equated environmentalism with Marxism and defended

Samuel Sherwood, leader of the U.S. Militia Organization, who told followers far and wide to know their legislators, because some day they might be forced to "blow their faces off."

Anne Fox, Idaho's superintendent of education, won the office with an assist from the state's 1,000 militia members. The victory was tarnished, however, when it emerged that her campaign manager and chief deputy, Terry Haws, had been charged in Alaska for giving drugs to a minor in exchange for sexual favors.

Another Patriot booster is Don Rogers, a California state senator who has shared the podium with the likes of former Klansman Louis Beam. His first political act in Sacramento was the introduction of a measure opposing the formation of a global government controlled by the United Nations.

Four leading Republican state senators backed the bill.

Larry Pratt, a Virginia state legislator, is a thumping anti-Communist. He has run with anti-insurgent movements in Guatemala and the Philippines. In 1990 he published Armed People Victorious, a sentimentalization of death squads, or "the people's militias." He calls for these same groups to fight the domestic "drug war."

A right-wing extremist in Colorado's state senate, Charles Duke, is running a national campaign for state legislatures to pass states' rights resolutions.

It stands to reason that Aryan Nation's leader Richard Butler, at a news conference in July 1995, enthused that the Republican Party is "waking up." Butler said he was particularly taken with California governor and frustrated presidential candidate Pete Wilson for supporting the University of California Board of Regents' decision to overturn affirmative action in admissions and hiring.

Proponents of the Beltway's "Republican Revolution," engineered by propaganda assaults to occur midway through President Clinton's first term, invited the Patriots to present their case publicly after the Oklahoma blast. Some on the Beltway have abetted the most volatile extremists linked to the Patriot movement.

In August 1995, for example, Mother Jones ran a feature story on the creepings of "law-and-order" Republican Phil Gramm. In his bid for the Oval Office, Gramm has scolded Clinton for overturning minimum mandatory sentencing for drug pushers. But upon arriving in Washington in 1980, he was "petitioned for help by the family of federal inmate Bill Doyle, a white, middle-class drug dealer. Doyle had served a total of fewer than seven years in jail—and less than half of his latest sentence—on three adult and eight juvenile offenses, many of which involved narcotics, guns or explosives. What did Gramm do? He lobbied long and hard to [free] Doyle. Instead of pursuing information that might have exposed the ammunition sales, Gramm had it excluded from a parole hearing."

Gramm's sudden attack of altruism was prompted by a letter that Doyle wrote to his brother Jim—a Pentagon official—pleading for aid. Jim Doyle turned to a neighbor, Mary Fae Kamm, an employee in the senator's office. The staff wrote letters of support for the accused, and went so far as to expunge Doyle's criminal files of serious felonies, including a charge of "possessing a bomb."

Doyle admits freely that he has engaged in the sale of weapons stolen from the Army by militiamen "armed with anti-tank weapons, grenades, rocket launchers, the whole show."

Gramm offered the convict taxpayer funds to start up an electronics company. Upon his release, Doyle "devoted that electronics business to helping drug dealers guard their operations against the police. Meanwhile, he opened three new drug franchises, and helped his gun-running accomplice conceal firearms from the cops."

This is the same law-and-order candidate who has set out to "remake the criminal justice system in America." He has a vision ... of slave labor. At the annual NRA convention in Phoenix earlier this year, Gramm proposed "decriminalizing prison labor" by converting "every federal prison in this country into a mini-industrial park. I want prisoners to work ten hours a day, six days a week,"

Collaborations between populist politicians and extreme-right militants (The Reichswehr) gave rise to the Third Reich. Another familiar pattern is the mingling of political vigilantés and enlisted men, and a thriving black market in armaments boosted from military bases. Shawn Helmer, a sergeant at Fort Lewis, Washington, testified that he loaded a truck with anti-tank rocket launchers and an assortment of guns looted from a local base, and drove to Florida where he planned to sell them to some of Lt. Col. Oliver North's political mercenaries. Helmer was arrested by the BATF.

Ironically, by stockpiling arms against military intrusions of government, the right wing plays into the hands of the defense establishment that markets them and invites repressive tactics. One Patriot group went so far as to hijack a TOW missile from a military convoy and attempted to blow up the Southern Poverty Law Center with it. And a month after the destruction in OKC, Time reported on the conviction of two firebrands from the Minnesota Patriot's Council for "planning to use a lethal biological weapon against U.S. marshals and IRS agents. Federal prosecutors are going after other members of the right-wing military group. In doing so, they hope to stop the spread of ricin, an extract of castor oil, which can kill in minutes if ingested, inhaled or absorbed through the skin. According to trial testimony, Patriot's Council members discussed poisoning U.S. agents by placing ricin on doorknobs."

PART II

"Hell has Victories": The Deep Politics of the Oklahoma Bombing

On April 27, 1995, the Knight-Ridder newswire announced:

WEEKS BEFORE OKLAHOMA, THREAT PUT UTILITIES ON ALERT

The U.S. Marshal's Service, a full month before the bombing, issued a warning that "Islamic terrorists" were planning to attract media attention by launching "suicide" assaults on federal buildings and installations. The memo was wired to federal courthouses nationwide. On April 23, the Carthage, Texas Penula Richmond published a story on Norma Smith, an employee of the courthouse across the street from the Alfred Murrah Building. Ms. Smith detailed how she arrived at work on the 19th at 7:45 AM and found a bomb squad in the parking lot between the two buildings. The spectacle was observed by other courthouse employees perplexed by the commotion.

A haunting moment of April 19, 1995 was the execution of Richard Wayne Snell in Arkansas. Among the charges filed against Snell was participation in a 1983 plot to blow up the federal office building in Oklahoma City. The San Francisco Chronicle reported in April 1995 that this was the very same day "on which Richard Wayne Snell, an Oklahoma native and alleged member of the white supremacist group called The Order, was executed for his part in a conspiracy to murder federal officials."

"Snell," the Denver Post reported, "repeatedly predicted that there would be a bombing or an explosion the day of his death."

The Militia of Montana rallied to defend the Nazi martyr, "a Patriot to be executed by The Beast." The Militia's national network of faxes and web pages were flooded with right-wing battle cries against the "liberal" justice system that had condemned the Patriot to death. From his own prison cell in Varner, Arkansas, the doomed Nazi distributed his own newsletter, The Seekers, the trumpet of the "war to establish righteousness."

Snell felt no remorse for the killing of a businessman and a black state trooper. Nevertheless, he had an arm-banded "spiritual adviser," the haughty Robert G. Millar, the leader of a heavily-armed apocalyptic cult near Muldrow, Oklahoma.

At a clemency board meeting, Snell quoted his hero Rudolf Hess and demanded that he either be executed or set free. He shot off a note to Governor

Tucker before his execution was ordered. "Governor Tucker," Snell wrote, "look over your shoulder. Justice is coming. I wouldn't trade places with you or any of your cronies. Hell has victories. I am at peace."

The New York Times conceded on May 20, 1995 that "although evidence of an earlier plot does not itself demonstrate any links between those identified as plotters then and those accused now, it does suggest that the idea of bombing this particular federal building could have been a subject of discussion among small extremist groups for more than a decade."

McVeigh once received a traffic ticket, the Times noted, in the Fort Smith, Arkansas area, where some co-conspirators in the original bombing plot lived. The only other known connection is his sister's subscription to the Patriot Report, a newsletter published in Fort Smith.

The principal prosecution witness of the 1983 conspiracy was James D. Ellison, founder of the Covenant, the Sword and the Arm of the Lord—more accurately described as a sword and arm of virtual government—a neo-Nazi sect that once thrived in northern Arkansas. In 1988, fourteen Nazis were charged with scheming to overthrow the government. One of them was Richard Butler, the guiding force of the Aryan Nations sanctuary in Hayden Lake, Idaho. Other notable ubermenschen put on trial were Robert E. Miles, a former Klansman and leader of the Mountain Church of Jesus Christ the Savior in Michigan, an ex-con since his school-bus burning glory days, and Louis Ray Beam, former grand dragon of the KKK and "ambassador to the Aryan Nations."

These organizations share a common set of "religious" beliefs—the "Christian Identity" strain—grounded in a mythic past of Aryan supermen with superior electrons spinning in their brains, recalling the anti-Semitic, paganistic, rune-reading, sun-worshipping cults that flourished in the early days of the Nazi Party. The movement binds many of the neo-Nazi movements in the United States.

On one hand, Identity Christians believe they are the true descendants of Adam and Abraham, that Jews conspire with the Devil to enslave the world, all explained in frothy racist diatribes sweetened with Old Glory patriotism to put the icing on the mind control. On the other, the Identity altar is littered with the occult paraphernalia of the Nazi twilight. Wesley Swift, Richard Butler's mentor, blended KKK and Nazi racism with the "lost tribe" concept and the occult. Swift often preached about Atlantis and alluded to Edgar Cayce. Identity's Pastor Arnold Murray let on that the Great Pyramid was the second revelation of God, architecturally encoded to deliver the Word to the initiated patriarchs of the Identity racial fantasy.

The most exalted is Richard Girnt Butler, a retired Lockheed engineer and a suspect in the original Oklahoma bombing plot. Butler founded Aryan Nations, an Identity church, on a 20-acre plot of Idaho panhandle, in the shadows of looming guard towers. Butler's speeches were met with Nazi salutes and culminated in cross burnings. Buildings in the Hayden Lake area were periodically bombed. Armed compounds have cropped up in Pennsylvania and Utah, with minor outposts scattered about the country. The movement has been linked to dozens of murders since 1980. Butler's Idaho HQ was disarmed in 1987 following the passage of the state's Terrorist Control Act, but it was here that Oberführer Butler played host to a vanity fair of seething neo-Nazi celebrity bombers, including Richard Snell and the Order.

One of the most sinister was Manfred Roeder, leader of the the largest and most rabid Nazi organization in Europe. American and South African benefactors subsidized his terrorist fund. In 1978 he made a junket to Brazil for a meeting with Dr. Josef Mengele and other holdovers of the Nazi regime. From Brazil he made a bee-line for the United States, where he met with Dr. William Pierce, a former assistant professor of physics at Oregon State University, leader of the rabidly right-wing National Alliance, author of The Turner Diaries, the blueprint for the Order's carnage. (Like many domestic leaders of fascist cadrés, Pierce entered the network through the John Birch Society, arch-conservative supporters of Brig. Gen. Partin's "Leftist International" theory of the Oklahoma bombing.)

Pierce's world-hopping German ally, Herr Roeder—then a fugitive wanted in Germany for the bombing of a Vietnamese refugee center—was an honored guest at the annual gathering the Aryan Nations compound in 1982. Like Butler, his American counterpart, Roeder was the patriarch of several neo-Nazi groups. He fed them a steady diet of Jewish conspiracy theories. All this, and he still found time to steep himself in the blood-drenched politics of the PLO.

Another crazed bomber linked to Butler's movement is Jeremy Knesal, who faces a 45-year sentence for the bombing of an NAACP office in Tacoma, Washington. Knesal's mentor at the Idaho compound was Floyd Cochran, then the Nations' resident propagandist, today a reformed fascist who lectures around the country about the evils of racism.

Under Cochran's tutelage, Knesal acquired a National Socialist perspective on religion, eugenics and "racial history."

A second bomb plot in Washington state was allegedly hatched by Darwin Michael Gray, 27, at roughly the same time the Oklahoma bombers conceived their plan. Gray is the foster brother of Kevin Harris, the Identity rebel acquitted with Randy Weaver of the murder of a deputy U.S. marshal in the shootout at Weaver's cabin in northern Idaho in 1992.

Alexi Erlanger, another familiar face at Aryan Nations gatherings, hails from Buffalo, New York, Timothy McVeigh's stomping grounds. Erlanger was Nazi to the bone, the leader of the Liberation Movement of the German Reich, a bridge to the survivors of Germany's Nazi confederacy known as the Kameradenwerk, or Odessa. Ladislas Farago reported in Aftermath that in 1973 a German-American journal called Die Brucke "proudly announced that Alexi Erlanger of the Buffalo chapter was heading a drive to bring two 'famous German war heroes' to the U.S.A. for a visit of our military institutions and our German community. One of the invited guests was Colonel Hans Ulrich Rudel. The other was Colonel Otto Skorzeny."

Hans Rudel, the German ace and postwar founder of an aircraft factory in Argentina, is a ramrod of the postwar Nazi "refugee" underground, a world spokesman of the neo-Nazi movement, a Mother Theresa to fugitives of the Hitler era.

Otto Skorzeny, the 6′4″ hulk of an SS commando, was trained in assassination and terrorist tactics. He was among the very first Nazi officers recruited by the budding CIA. During the war, he rescued Mussolini from his jailers and kidnapped East European politicians who refused to collaborate with invading Germans. His postwar career included the running of ratline operations for Nazis escaping via Spain and Syria. "Both the Odessa and die Spinne SS escape organizations," Christopher Simpson observes, "revolved in large part around the personality—and the myth—of Otto Skorzeny."

A member of the network that survives "Hitler's Commando" told an interviewer in 1981 that the "Nazi International" had infiltrated Texaco, Resorts International and Lockheed, among other major federally-subsidized corporations.

Tim McVeigh, the migratory hawk, lived in Kingman, Arizona, home of the Hephzibah Ranch and its Christian Identity proprietor, Jack Maxwell Oliphant, ex-convict, Mojave County militia leader, and with Butler a co-conspirator in the original plot to blow up the federal building in Oklahoma City. The ranch is 20 miles off the main road.

Oliphant has worried local lawmen since he moved to the Arizona mountains over a decade ago. From primitive training camps near Kingman and Flagstaff, the Arizona Republic reported on December 21, 1986 that a contingent of Patriots intermingled with the Order and Aryan Nations. The newspaper identified one Arizona Patriot as a member of Posse Comitatus, the Christian

Identity tax-protest group. (Other insidious links have been forged by this native fascist organization. In a videotape distributed by anti-abortionists, leaders of violent opposition to the clinics appear with Bryan Dale of Posse Commitatus.)

Oliphant's brigade, the Arizona Patriots, has taken refuge in the past few years in a morbid cloud of secrecy. One witness in the grand jury hearings claims that McVeigh mingled with Oliphant's mountain men. Kingman residents emphasize that local Patriots are outsiders, clearly not from the area. Oliphant, who shot off his right arm in 1977 while handling a shotgun, has a demonstrated penchant for ultra-violence. From the News and Observer:

> Kingman is a hotbed for paramilitary activity and if he mixed with militias here, he almost certainly mixed with the Arizona Patriots, said Bernell Lawrence, a former law officer who ran surveillance on the group's activities before 1992....
> In 1983, Oliphant bought 160 acres in the mountains from Tod Becker, a local real estate agent whose family owned the property, according to Becker.
>
> Almost immediately, men wearing military fatigues were sighted on Oliphant's land conducting desert warfare training.
>
> Oliphant founded the Arizona Patriots and made no secret of his paramilitary activities, said Lawrence, who watched the ranch first as a Mohave County sheriff's deputy, then as part of an area anti-narcotics unit and finally as a Department of Public Safety officer.
>
> The people who trained with Oliphant were typically not locals.
>
> In 1987, Oliphant and two fellow Patriots devised a plan to hold up an armored car that carried money to and from Laughlin, the cash-rich gambling town across the Colorado River in Nevada, according to statements from federal investigators at the time. One of the members of the group, who was unwilling to take part in the heist, went to the FBI and told of the plot. When agents in helicopters raided Oliphant's ranch in 1987, they also found plans to blow up the nearby Hoover Dam.
>
> Oliphant and two other Patriots pled guilty to conspiracy. Clutching a worn Bible at the hearing to enter his pleas, Oliphant acknowledged that money from the planned robbery was to be used to "build a compound for the Identity Movement" on his property, according to news accounts of the sentencing. The Identity Movement is associated with white supremacists who believe Jews are the root of evil in society, according to the FBI's case. Among the allegations against Oliphant and his co-defendants was that they intended to stop the armored car and use explosives to blow it open.
> Oliphant served a short prison term, then returned to his ranch and has not shown signs of restarting the Identity Movement, Becker said.

Opinions differ on whether the Patriots remain active on Oliphant's ranch today. Lawrence believes the group still trains at Hephzibah Ranch, but that in recent years the group became much more secretive.

Oliphant's desert brigade planned to pull an armored car heist and launder the proceeds in Las Vegas casinos. Two men who'd been charged in 1985 with selling Uzi submachine guns to undercover agents were also rounded up.

The Patriot Movement takes its direction from Christian Identity propagandists, strident "constitutionalists" all, most with backgrounds in military intelligence, including Mark Koernke, the Enola Gay of ultra-rightwing conspiracy theorists, Bill Cooper, Bo Gritz and Linda Thompson.

The leadership has included the likes of John Salvi, a rabid militia footsoldier from Florida accused of killing two abortion clinic staffers in Boston in December, 1994.

Francisco Duran, wrestled into submission after squeezing off a few rounds at the Clinton White House, ran with a militia in Colorado. Police found occult literature on the front seat of Duran's car, according to the San Francisco Chronicle, possibly originating in the cabalistic fringe of the Identity movement. The occult is often found in combination with mind control in the covert operation arm of virtual government.

In 1994, the following organizations issued alerts on the threat posed by white supremacists mixing with the Patriots: the Southern Poverty Law Center, Planned Parenthood, The Coalition for Human Dignity, the Center for Democratic Renewal, the Montana Human Rights Network and the Association of National Security Alumni, among others.

The Iran-Contra Players and the CIA's War on America

McVeigh's social circle—strutting fundamentalist Identity rebels and politically-programmed Patriots—led the press to assume that others had joined in the plot. The day after the bombing, the New York Times offered that right-wing militias were not believed "to have the technical expertise to engage in bombings like the one today," only to report on the very same page that a fertilizer bomb is so "cheap and easy" to construct, "anyone" can do it.

The press has speculated at length on the bombers' probable motives. That speculation has been accepted as fact, but a vengeful commemoration of the Waco and Weaver fiascos have not been confirmed as motives.

Another probable reason for the destruction in Oklahoma was offered by the Nazi Party itself.

On April 20, 1995, mailing list subscribers of the American National Socialist Worker's Party received a copy of the "Official ANSWP Statement Regarding the OKC Bombing." The statement noted that the Secret Service and much-despised BATF were investigating Gary Lauck of Lincoln, Nebraska, leader of the domestic NSDAP and the most prolific distributor of racist propaganda to neo-Nazis in Germany. With Lauck's European arrest, "U.S. officials have been doing extensive surveillance of Lauck's contemporaries in Oklahoma, Kansas, Nebraska and north Texas. These surveillance activities were being coordinated out of the OKC offices, according to our sources."

Furthermore, "the OKC office of the ATF had plans to serve search warrants 'by the beginning of Summer' on several well-known white supremacists."

But the warrants were never issued.

Agents investigating Aryan Nations were headquartered at the Alfred Murrah Federal Building. Evidence was stored there. The investigation may explain, as the New York Daily News reported on May 1, precisely why "Feds Rescue Documents, not People." Within hours of the bombing, the News discovered, "some rescue workers were stopped from searching for survivors while federal officials removed boxes of documents. 'You'd think they would have let their evidence and files sit at least until the last survivor was pulled out,' one angry rescue worker told the News.

"The worker and a firefighter said that 10 to 12 hours after the 9 AM blast on April 19, federal officials began limiting the number of rescue workers in the building to a dozen, confining them largely to the lower right side of the battered structure. Meanwhile, 40 to 50 federal agents spent much of the night carrying boxes from the floors occupied by federal DEA and the BATF."

Was there a connection between the investigation of neo-Nazis in the southwest and the bombing? The contents of the files were not divulged, but federal agents told reporters they were "looking into the possibility that alleged bomber Timothy McVeigh and his accomplices had targeted the nine-story building in an effort to destroy DEA or ATF investigation files."

Acquaintances of McVeigh told reporters that Timothy McVeigh, like Billy Doyle, Senator Phil Gramm's Nazi cause celebré, supported himself by peddling methamphetamines. McVeigh ran his drug concession in Kingman, Arizona. Ralph McPeak, a Kingman resident and friend of McVeigh's, told the Los Angeles Times: "When I met him [last year], he was wired up. He couldn't stand still." McPeak and his estranged wife said in separate interviews that some of the same people who had frequented the house also designed and detonated explosives. Two of the acquaintances fled when a fertilizer and fuel oil bomb damaged their house. They accused "McVeigh or his associates in the drug trade."

McVeigh traveled widely, always with a billfold crammed full of cash. He had no visible means of support. Drugs may explain the financing of McVeigh's whirlwind Gypsy tour around the country.

And then there were the syringes found by McVeigh and Nichols on their food trays during confinement at El Reno. Were the syringes a warning?

The San Francisco Examiner published a fascinating story from independent sources implicating the warden in El Reno prison:

> AUG. 28, 1995
>
> The warden of the federal prison holding the two Oklahoma City bombing suspects says the inmates are not at risk despite a report that syringes were found on their food trays.
>
> Warden R.G. Thompson told the Daily Oklahoman on Monday that security at the El Reno Federal Correctional Institution is "not at all" in jeopardy. He said the controversy was "an internal personnel matter" and refused further comment.
>
> The Muskogee Daily Phoenix reported that Charles Mildner, chief correctional supervisor at the prison, was suspended with pay after he ordered that only one officer be allowed to handle food trays for bombing suspects Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols.
>
> Mildner's supervisors revoked the order, his attorney, David Wilson, told the newspaper.
>
> Mildner established the policy after syringes were found on food trays going into the unit where McVeigh and Nichols are held, Wilson said.
>
> Contraband was found again on the trays after Mildner's order was countermanded and inmates had access to the trays, Wilson said.
> "What would happen if one of those two inmates were to die inside the prison?"
> Even though Mildner is a member of management, he has the support of Local 171 of the American Federation of Government Employees Council of Prison Locals, whose members total more than 95 percent of the 430 rank-and-file employees at the prison. Union members planned to hold a rally in support of Mildner Monday at the El Reno city park and to picket the prison on Tuesday.

A sensitive investigation of Nazi activity and drugs was allegedly underway in Oklahoma City. If the building was destroyed, in part, to bury evidence of virtual government involvement in the distribution of drugs, it's certain that a representative from this murky milieu would step forward to float disinformation and divert attention from higher-ups.

Who should surface immediately after the bombing but a chorus of "National Security Experts" drawn from hundreds of propagandists squatting in the blinds of the corporate press.

The most strident terrorism "expert" consulted by the media was Vincent Cannistraro, the former CIA officer who ran covert ops for the NSC during the Iran-Contra debacle with its cocaine backdrop. In 1991, he told the San Francisco Chronicle that sinister "environmentalists" had formed "clandestine cells" plotting to create technologies to diminish, even "eliminate" the entire human race.

Cannistraro performed a similar service for the NSC Contragate defendants by blaming the Gander crash on Iraqi terrorists. In fact, the plane was bearing a score of intelligence agents to the U.S. when it crashed in Newfoundland. Several of them had gathered damning information on John Singlaub, North and Pentagon/CIA chicanery abroad.

In December 1990, Gene Wheaton, formerly an investigator for the Christic Institute, concluded a probe of the Arrow Air jet crash with the comment, "the official version is a cover-up, and the Canadian and U.S. government officials who are responsible have been criminally negligent or worse." On board had been over 20 crack commandos from the Special Forces, identified on the passenger log as "warrant officers." Arrow Air itself was a CIA dummy front, and bore a ton of mystery cargo when the jet and its 256 passengers crashed.

Wheaton found that Arrow had transported arms from Israel to Iran on North's behalf as part of the arms-for-hostages swap. The mid-flight explosion was a retaliatory strike by the Iranians for a swindle perpetrated by the Reagan administration's pugnacious Oliver North, Wheaton says.

Immediately after the Oklahoma bombing, the same spin doctors who muddied the water of such CIA misadventures as Jonestown and Iran-Contra hauled out the fertilizer.

Admiral Stansfield Turner, former director of the CIA, currently a director of Monsanto and a public affairs officer at the University of Maryland, suggested that it's time to "reassess the nature and extent of anti-terror measures." (As CIA director, Turner once spoke this way about the Soviet Union to scare up operating funds from Congress.) "We have to decide what to do with the FBI and other agencies [to] ward this kind of thing off in the future," said Turner, who foresaw the inevitable "trade-off between [terrorist] intrusions and our personal freedom."

Frank Keating, governor of Oklahoma, echoed Turner's sentiments. But then Keating himself is a career intelligence operative and a solid "conservative" Republican. Keating earned his B.A. in history from Georgetown University in 1966. His resumé notes that his "distinguished public service career began as an FBI agent, where he investigated New Left terrorist activities, bombings and bank robberies on the west coast." After a term as assistant district attorney in Tulsa, Keating won a seat in the state House of representatives in 1972. In 1986, President Reagan offered him the position of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, in which capacity he supervised Interpol and the BATF. Back in Oklahoma, he served as associate attorney general and presided over the federal prison system. His wife, Cathy Keating, is a consultant to U.S. News & World Report.

One trail to Oklahoma bumps against Bill Clinton and the CIA-Mena drug scandal. The Agency's London Station Chief, Cord Meyer, recruited Clinton, then a Rhodes student in the UK, into the fold. The dimpled spy and and current resident of the White House has since been dragged into the muck at Mena, one of the largest aircraft refitting facilities in the country, situated just across the Oklahoma border, and may have figured in the interagency probe of regional drug operations.

As governor, Clinton failed to investigate allegations of drug running in Mena. Funds earmarked by the state legislature for an investigation of CIA activity in Arkansas disappeared under Clinton's watch.

Federal agents in Oklahoma City were not the only ones investigating drug movements in the southwest. In 1995, Gene Wheaton investigated the theft of 32 military aircraft, and was drawn to familiar territory. Wheaton was at one time an affiliate of North's. The investigator is mentioned in the disgraced NSC aide's notebooks, first as a potential ally to the contra supply effort, later as a bothersome whistle-blower. The same culprits, he said, who flew massive cocaine shipments from South America to Mena under Reagan "were running things now. It's a continuation of Iran-Contra. Everybody thinks Iran-Contra quit with Ollie North and Secord being exposed. But it's actually got bigger because the media stopped looking at it."

Some of the mud flicked at Clinton originates with Arkansan Larry Nichols, a CIA veteran of the contra guns-for-drugs network. Nichols fought under John Singlaub in Vietnam, and reported to the World Anti-Communist League official during the Nicaraguan contra war.

Singlaub is an anti-Communist of the 1950s genus, and it was during that decade, as deputy CIA station chief in South Korea, that his political pathologies found an outlet. During the Korean war he fell in with a circle of Seoul's most powerful politicians, spies and industrialists. His sole ambition in life since appears to be fund-raising to destroy Communism. In Vietnam, Singlaub organized the dreaded Phoenix Program under his Special Operations Group, a bund of 10,000 troops unleashed in the south to conduct covert raids, assassinations of Viet Minh by the tens of thousands, psychological warfare and sabotage missions.

Ollie North was one of John Singlaub's second lieutenants.

Claire Sterling, a veteran CIA propagandist, writes that Singlaub "came to be regarded with awe by a whole generation of military men and intelligence officers, many of whom shared his conservative views about the way things should be in Asia. Around him grew a following that developed into an infrastructure at the Pentagon and CIA."

This infrastructure is represented in the OK bombing case by Michael Tigar, the attorney representing Terry Nichols. In the 60s and 70s, Tigar was employed by the law firm of Williams, Wadden & Stein. He reported to Edward Bennett Williams, the head of the firm, a Beltway attorney long on intimate terms with the CIA. Williams often referred to Tigar as his "most brilliant protégé."

The law firm sprang into existence to cater to the same interagency intelligence underground implicated in drug distribution, mind control and by all appearances a U-Haul of exploding compost in Oklahoma City. A senior partner of the firm was Brendon Sullivan, the high-strung legal phenomenon who represented Oliver North during the Congressional Iran-Contra hearings. Williams, a Jesuit, was twice offered the post of CIA director. He refused (possibly because he was already a de facto CIA functionary) and by refusing shaped history—Gerald Ford gave the job to George Bush instead. Robert Maheu, the CIA hit man, attended Holy Cross with Williams and was a close friend. In 1958, the famed attorney paired Robert Maheu with Los Angeles mobster Johnny Rosselli to plot against Cuban premier Fidel Castro.

The Williams' client roster has included Joseph McCarthy, Mafia don Frank Costello, Jimmy Hoffa, Frank Sinatra, Armand Hammer and John Connally. He was general counsel to Georgetown University, which has long maintained a symbiotic relationship with the CIA. Junk bond magnate Michael Milken, a client of the firm, openly wept at Williams' funeral in 1988.

Michael Tigar came to the firm after resigning his position as a Supreme Court clerk. He represented some extremely high-powered clients for a journeyman attorney. It was Tigar who coached Bobby Baker, the LBJ aide imprisoned for tax fraud and influence peddling in 1967, before Senate appearances. Tigar defended John Connally when the former Texas governor was accused of pocketing a bribe. Connally was acquitted. He rewarded Tigar with a prize bull. The beast was packed off to Fidel Castro.

One San Francisco reporter suggests that Michael Tigar, with his pricey wardrobe and trademark crewcut, looks "more like a young Republican than the spell-binding firebrand he was a dozen years ago." The press has made much of his radical days at Berkeley and representation of Angela Davis, but he usually caters to the Right. One of Tigar's most controversial clients was John Demjanjuk, the accused Nazi war criminal. Tigar also represented Clayton Jackson, the California lobbyist convicted for money laundering, racketeering and offering a bribe to state senator Alan Robbins.

He agreed to counsel Terry Nichols at the request of three federal judges.

Like his mercurial attorney, Terry Nichols was turned out by the same national security bund behind the Iran-Contra swaps, Mena and the Gander bombing, not to mention a series of foreign coups, death squad outrages, drug imports and a long history of homicidal covert operations.

Terry Nichols hid a dagger under his compost-smeared cloak. Lana Padilla, his first wife, called a news conference on July 13 after visiting him in prison. She said that Nichols made frequent trips to the Philippines—so many, in fact, that the farmer from Kansas had charged $40,000 in air fares to his credit cards. Ms. Padilla also claimed that Tim McVeigh footed the bill for a 1989 trip. After his arrest, federal agents discovered that Terry Nichols had a locker full of gold and silver bullion stored in Las Vegas. Nichols, she told reporters, was given the precious metals in November, 1994, while on a junket to the Philippines, by a party unknown.

Padilla said that Nichols refused to take Mary Fay, his second wife, a mail-order bride, along when he traveled, though her family lived in Cebu—a well-known terrorist haunt in the Philippines.

Before departing for his last trip, Nichols told Lana, "I might not be coming back." He traveled with a gun, she said—and managed to pass through airport security gates. Before he left, he entrusted her with $20,000 for McVeigh in case he never returned. He did and he was noticeably on edge,

"Those people can kill you," he told Lana with a shudder, "I'm never going back there again." Who are the deadly mysterians who hired Nichols to perform secret missions in far-off lands? Lana Padilla suggested they were Islamic terrorists.

The U.S. has a long, sordid history of intrigue in the islands. Islamic terrorists make their home there. The investigation of the World Trade Center bombing was not as painstaking as it might have been because sandbags were repeatedly dropped in the path of FBI investigators by operatives of the CIA. One veteran FBI agent, in a Village Voice story that appeared on March 30, 1993, claimed that Sheikh Abdel Rahman was a core conspirator. "It was no accident that the Sheikh got a visa and that he's still in the country," one veteran FBI agent complains. "He's here under the banner of national security, the State Department, the NSA and the CIA. I haven't seen a lone-gunman theory advocated [with this vigor] since the John F. Kennedy assassination."

Jack Blum, a former investigator for the Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee, was appalled at CIA-terrorist interactions that surfaced after the bombing: "One of the big problems here is that many suspects in the World Trade Center bombing were associated with the Mujahedeen. There are components of our government that are absolutely disinterested in following that path because it leads back to people we supported in the Afghan war." "We" are a deep cover infantry of counter-insurgent drug smugglers, arms dealers, money launderers and professional liars.

There is a bridge spanning the World Trade Center and the Oklahoma City federal building. It is in the Philippines.

And it's made of gold—Japanese and Nazi gold buried in underground vaults once used to imprison and torture American prisoners of war and local insurgents. Approximately 1,000 tons of the loot was liberated by Ferdinand Marcos before his ouster. Billions of dollars worth were shipped overseas by American intelligence agents and the Mafia. Much of the horde was cabbaged away in a high-security, subterranean storage caché buried under the Zurich airport. This vault was once used to conceal European gold from Hitler's SS scavengers. Fifty years later, some of the same bullion has found its way into the campaign coffers of ultra-conservative political candidates in the U.S., according to the Las Vegas Sun.

But Marcos didn't recover the lion's share of the pelf. A six-month series in the Sun reported in 1993 that Marcos abandoned thousands of tons of gold hidden in his homeland. Gary Thompson, then the newspaper's managing editor, and journalist Steve Kanigher published photo-copies of gold certificates from Credit Suisse, deposit records from the Union Bank of Switzerland, the correspondence of Corazon Aquino and letters to Reagan administration officials documenting witness accounts that lackeys of the CIA and Army Special Forces carted off an unknown quantity of the bullion. They followed one lead after another, flying around the world for eleven months to piece together an elaborate story of political corruption and greed. The gold extraction was sanctioned by Lt. General Robert Schweitzer, President Reagan's senior military liaison to the National Security Council, and Lt. General Daniel Graham, then director of the DIA and a key consultant on the Strategic Defense Initiative. Schweitzer and retired General John Singlaub, the aforementioned veteran of the Iran-Contra affair, joined the board of Nippon Star, a Japanese conglomerate with branches in the Philippines. As they explained to two plaintive Nippon Star consultants, "the company is going out of business—the National Security Council is taking over."

Among those recruited to run the intelligence front was retired Army Colonel Dan Myers, a former aide to Watergate-hit-man-cum-radio-celebrity G. Gordon Liddy. Eldon "Dan" Cummings, a Pentagon staffer, was named vice president.

Schwartz's ambitious aide, Oliver North, was already dabbling in the gold trade. In 1985, he attempted to sell 44 tons of Marcos bullion, worth $465 million, on the black market. He blithely suggested skimming $5 million to finance the Nicaraguan contra war, but the deal fell through when North, true to form, stiffed the Israeli middlemen on the Marcos payroll.

Tapes and documents implicating American officials in the gold transfers were withheld from the Iran-Contra committee by Major General Colin Powell, Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger and William Odom, director of the NSA. "It wasn't so much the mention of gold that concerned them," say Thompson and Kanigher. "It was Marcos talking (on tape) about contributions to U.S. presidential campaigns and the use of the gold proceeds to fund illegal arms deals."

To extract the metal, Ray Cline, then deputy director of the CIA, organized a working group that included a chief regulator of the S&L industry. Citibank was drawn into the operation to negotiate the claims on a Philippine gold horde secreted in the Bahamas. NASA pilots drew up a plan to transport the bullion.

Bo Gritz, the Idaho militia leader who ran for president with David Duke as his running mate, also traveled to the Philippines to participate in Singlaub's gold dig. Gritz claims that he struck out—but the Special Forces veteran has been known to spin a plausible denial or two in his time.

Either Lana Padilla was right about Terry Nichols' mystery trips abroad, or she is a scholar of national security studies with an emphasis on black operations. Her reference to terrorists from the Middle East was hardly far-fetched. And General Schweitzer's crew from the NSC hired a team of attorneys to peddle gold recovered in the Philippines. Much of it was sold off to Middle Eastern terrorists. Some of them have indeed been linked to the World Trade Center bombing, according to the Sun exposé.

It is not at all unlikely that Terry Nichols should have had dealings with the rabid foreign clients of the national security sector. McVeigh had intelligence contacts as well. In McCurtain, Oklahoma a major flap erupted over a telephone call McVeigh placed a few days before the bombing. The local Gazette reported on July 14, 1996, "phone records indicate that on April 5, a call was made to Elohim City from a motel room registered to Timothy McVeigh." Elohim City is a "Christian" settlement near the Arkansas-Oklahoma border—and the burial sire of the venomous Richard Wayne Snell, executed for his part in the original Oklahoma City bombing plot. As it happens, two calls were placed by McVeigh to Elohim City's director of security, Andreas Carl Strassmeier. The FBI maintains that Strassmeier was a paid informant assigned to "infiltrate" the Identity Aryans at the encampment. Officially, Strassmeier was a lowly "informant," but his immediate entry into the heart of the federal intelligence underground suggests he was a functionary, a guiding light of the reactionary cult.

The Identity Nazis at Elohim City received military instruction in the use of small firearms from Strassmeier. And one witness in the case has identified him as the mysterious stranger who rode with McVeigh in the Mercury Marquis, which trailed the Ryder truck through Oklahoma City.

After the Gazette story appeared, Strassmeier's attorney, Kirk Lyons, a legal champion of the white supremecist cause, wrote in a newsletter that Strassmeier had fled the country, his "escape" from "death threats" conducted by Germany's "elite" counter-terrorist squad, GSG-9, via Mexico, Paris and Frankfurt. He arrived unaccosted in Berlin.

The Gazette detailed Strassmeier's background: "The son of [one of] Europe's most able and influential politicians, Andreas began 'visiting' the U.S. in 1988. Up to that time, the then 23-year-old German army officer served in the Panzer Grenadiers.... Srassmeier's father, Gunter, had risen to the position of Secretary of State to Berlin.... Strassmeier junior has admitted to journalists that his military assignments sometimes include covert projects and training... In the London Sunday Telegraph, Strassmeier told interviewers that he settled in the U.S. in 1989 on a 'special assignment' he was promised by the U.S. Justice Department...."

When he disembarked, posing as a tourist, Herr Strassmeier was quickly taken under the wing of Vincent Petruskie, a retired Air Force colonel and former intelligence operative for the Office of Special Investigations. The colonel set out to find empolyment for the German "tourist." Publicly, Petruskie has admitted that he sought only "odd jobs" for Strassmeier, who had his eye on a job at the DEA. Though he had no green card, the German was blessed with a Tennessee driver's license and a social security number.

"Strassmeier," the London Telegraph reports, "settled down and said he was acting as a middle man for an old family friend, Col. Petruskie, who he also described as 'an ex-CIA guy that my father has known since the Cold War.'"

In 1992, Strassmeier committed a traffic offense and his car was impounded by the Oklahoma highway patrol. Inside, police found a valise full of government documents. Strassmeier called in his cavalry—the State Department and the Governor's office phoned police to urge his release, as did an unnamed caller who argued that Strassmeier—his proof of citizenship notwithstanding—enjoyed the protection of diplomatic immunity.

The client list of Kirk Lyons, Strassmeier's attorney and co-sponsor in the United States, include (as do many of the arch-conservatives in McVeigh's entourage) the Identity Nazis of Elohim City, home of the original bombing plot that ended in the execution of Richard Snell and his burial in the shell-shocked hills of Arkansas.

Military-Intelligence Connections

Patriot leaders descend from the Nazi-anchored Identity movement that formed around William Potter Gale and a clutch of like-minded individuals who served under General Douglas MacArthur during the last world war—with one notable exception: Colonel William Neblett, an officer in MacArthur's entourage. In Pentagon Politics, published in 1953, Noblett summarized his feelings about American covert military policy:

> The power of the military must be curbed at once. To allow the professional military to control us any longer will mean the end of our republican form of government. If the Pentagon and certain politicians can keep the fear of Communistic aggression fresh in the public's mind for a few years longer, a 'Prussianized type of army' will be achieved.

The leadership of the Patriots have roots in the "Prussianized" military intelligence community. Between domestic Nazis, Patriots and the clandestine "services," there is much commingling. Members of the Wisconsin's Free Militia may drift over to the U.S. Taxpayer's Party, a "Constitutionalist" cadré run by radical right organizer Howard Phillips, a career CIA neo-conservative, and vice versa.

In 1976, a flap erupted at Camp Pendleton with the discovery that the KKK had heavily infiltrated the base. Several black Marines were assaulted by whites sporting the Klan insignia, and a cross was burned nearby. Corporal Daniel Bailey, Jr., an Exalted Cyclops, informed the local press that Marines recruited by the Klan numbered about a hundred. But the Corps managed to contain the story—until a group of black Marines beat up a congregation of white men. At the court-martial, the accused GIs testified that commanders at Camp Pendleton had ignored the flaunting of Klan regalia and assaults on blacks by KKK Marines. Pro-Nazi literature materialized on the base.

Hardline Identity Nazis mix freely with the militias. The Michigan group is friendly with the Militia of Montana, led by John Trochmann, a featured speaker at the Aryan Nations compound in Idaho in 1990.

Trochmann claims to have visited the Nazi enclave on "four or five occasions." But Loretta Ross, research director of the anti-fascist Center for Democratic Renewal in Atlanta, noted in her Congressional testimony on July 11, 1995, that Trochmann "frequently visited the Aryan Nations neo-Nazi paramilitary compound in Idaho and was a featured speaker there in 1990, although he claims to have merely spoken on morality. But according to Aryan Nations founder Richard Butler, Trochmann visited the compound many times and even helped write the group's code of conduct."

When Trochmann appeared at a post-bombing Congressional probe, the Nation quipped that if Senator Arlen Specter had been half as hard on the militia movement as he was on Anita Hill, his recent Judiciary Subcommittee hearing on the militias might have truly discredited the radical right. Instead, the inquiry became a soapbox for the 'patriots' rather than the critical forum that was so badly needed." Specter was provided with a letter from Aryan Nations documenting Trochmann's close relationship with the leaders of the organization, yet his gentle inquisitors in Washington neglected to ask him about it.

The Michigan Militia was thrust into the roving media spotlight by reports that Tim McVeigh had once been employed by the oratorical Mark Koernke, the leading light of the group. Koernke is a veteran of the 78th Division of the Army Reserve in Livonia, Michigan. His star in the Patriots began to rise when he traded on his self-proclaimed military intelligence background. He often refers to himself as an "intelligence analyst" and "counter-intelligence coordinator" with a "top-secret clearance."

He co-founded the Michigan Militia in April, 1994, with Reverend Norman Olsen, a Baptist preacher, abortion foe, military veteran and "intelligence specialist." The cadré has since become the largest in the country, boasting to have recruited some 12,000 footsoldiers.

The April 22, 1995 edition of the stridently anti-fascist Germany Alert noted that the Michigan Militia "is organized closely along the lines of the established German neo-Nazi organizations."

Koernke has boasted of commanding two "special-warfare" brigades that trained Army personnel in "foreign warfare and tactics." These claims may be exaggerated, but Koernke did in fact attend the Army's intelligence school at Fort Huachuca in Arizona. He returned to Michigan an E-5 specialist with a G-2 (security) section of a peacetime Reserve unit. Koernke's particular brand of fulmination against bastions of the looming "world order," with emphasis on the Council of Foreign Relations and the Trilaterals, smack of the dark arts of propaganda and psychological warfare, the curriculum of any self-respecting spy school.

At a militia conference in Florida, Koernke introduced himself as a "military intelligence advisor for the militias" with tentacles reaching across the country. He boasted of supplying his troops with information about "United Nations troop movements and federal government activity."

Mark from Michigan has boasted freely to friends that he was once employed as a "provocateur." For whom?

Provocateuring at the behest of an unnamed branch of government accounts for his role in a crazed scheme to blow up a local National Guard base in January, 1995. The bombing plot was conceived when some 70 recruits of the Michigan Militia Corps convened at a truck-stop near Detroit. The brigade was outraged by photographs of Russian tanks en route to Camp Grayling via railway flatcars. They interpreted the photos as proof of Russian troop movements under UN control launching an invasion on American soil.

A few days later, about 20 militia men met at a farm near Leonard, Michigan for their weekly combat training. Militia leaders laid out maps and a plan to lay siege to the camp.

"Let's go blow up those tanks and kill those bastards who put them there," one brigade leader urged.

From a summary of the planned assault on the military base:

> Contact all the brigades in the state and storm Camp Grayling, killing anyone who attempts to defend the base and arresting anyone else who is left.
>
> Photograph, for historical purposes, all foreign equipment.
>
> Hunt down anyone involved in bringing in the foreign equipment and try them for war crimes in a revolutionary court, which denies the accused a chance for appeal. The accused would be executed as soon as possible.
> Hunt down all UN forces in the U.S.

The Michigan Militia has attempted to distance itself from Timothy McVeigh. The day after the blast, Koernke's regiment faxed out messages informing the world that one of the Nichols brothers had attended a meeting, but was tossed out for circulating tax resister material. But Branch Davidian Ron Cole, a Waco survivor who knows Koernke well and has met each of the bombing suspects at Patriot rallies, insists there was a close relationship. "Tax resister material is the kindergarten curriculum for beginner Patriots," Cole told the Boulder Weekly. "The idea that they would throw him out for that is highly unlikely. If people in the militia movement are going to tell lies, then let's at least make them believable."

The fringe of the lunatic fringe is monopolized by Bill Cooper, a Navy veteran and commander of an Arizona militia. Cooper preaches in his shortwave broadcasts that a secret government cabal has struck an alliance with a species of hominoid-saurus reptiles from space. This "serpent cult," he says, has granted the privileged, namely conspiratorial ranks of "Jesuit-Masonry," dominion over all terrestrial Gentile non-Masons.

Echoing Brig. Gen. Partin, Cooper attributes mass murder in Oklahoma City to the fulfillment of "the hidden agenda of the Communist/Socialist Internationale."

In Kooks, a compendium of American extremists, author Donna Kossy writes: "Cooper was born into a military family in 1943, and upon graduating high school in 1961 (in Japan) enlisted in the Air Force. During his more than ten years in both the Air Force and the Navy, he was an exemplary member, earning medals, and steadily taking on greater responsibility. Soon after enlisting, he was graced with a secret security clearance, and outfitted with a dosimeter, worked around "REAL atomic bombs" on a daily basis. He says that he was part of the elite of the Air Force."

By definition, intelligence agents are liars. Cooper's shortwave broadcasts are feasts of capricious political fantasy, yet his protégé and worshipful booster, Indiana militia leader Linda Thompson, who spent 14 years in Army uniform, once told an audience of rapt, highly-impressionable right-wing sod-busters: "If Bill Cooper is wrong, we're all in trouble."

In a Village Voice profile of Linda Thompson, author Adam Parfrey noted that she resembles "Madge the manicurist, and that is perhaps a source of her credibility among the Patriot common folk. But similarities to the lumpen proletariat end there. According to her resumé, Thompson served in the Army between 1974 and 1978, including a stint as 'Assistant to the U.S. Army Commanding General, NATO, Allied Forces Central Europe' with a 'cosmic Top Secret/Atomal security clearance.' Thompson's military career did not end with her honorable discharge in 1978, but continued for another decade in the Army reserve."

Her computer network bulletin board asks, "What is the address of your safe house?"

"For all of those who believed the claims that I'm an 'agent provocateur,'" she argues, "notice that the ONLY information about me is what I have put out, personally, on public record (when I was arrested)." Her logic recalls Ronald Reagan's explanation to the press regarding the Iran-Contra scandal, and her political thinking is equally suggestive of Alzheimer's. Where she once flogged prolifers (or "racists wanting more white babies to adopt"), Thompson, in a recent shortwave broadcast, sniffed, "I've always been against abortion."

To critics, she argued that turnabout was fair play. Thompson claimed she pivoted to oppose abortion after viewing ghastly photos of the medical procedure. She joined with one of the anti-choice movement's most pathological proponents, Reverend Matt Trewhella, pastor of the Mercy Seat Christian Church in Milwaukee and leader of the "Missionaries of the Pre-born National." The Missionaries are among the most radical "rescue" operations in the country. Their tactics include blockades and invasions of abortion clinics, lock-and-blocks and picketing campaigns. At a recent conference of anti-abortionists, Trewhella advised his congregation: "This Christmas, I want you to do the most loving thing—buy each of your children an SKS rifle and 500 rounds of ammunition."

The comments were made at the Wisconsin state convention of the U.S. Taxpayer's Party in May, 1994. His speech was taped secretly by staffers of Planned Parenthood at the convention. Trewhella, who has signed a document advocating the slaughter of doctors and the formation of militias around the issue of abortion, insisted, "Our government wants to disarm us! What should we do? We should do what thousands of people across the nation are doing—we should be forming militias." Pastor Trewhella asked parents who teach their children to play Pin-the-Tail-on-the-Donkey. "We need to start blindfolding them, sitting them down on the living room floor and saying: 'Now put that weapon together.'"

Some of the hottest rhetoric to come out of the Thompson camp is reserved for the Anti-Defamation League, which they consider the fountainhead of all sinister conspiracies. In one of her computer network alerts she insists:

> The ADL was the source of all LIES about militias, claiming militias were "racists."
>
> The ADL provided ALL the so-called experts who testified before Congress on militias.
>
> The ADL was the source for the lies about the Branch Davidians...

In Thompson's world, the ADL accounts for any tarnish on the reputations of the Davidians. Moreover ...

> The ADL-FBI alliance is destroying our country. It has taken over our media, taken over our congress, and its terrorist backers want the omnibus counter-terrorism bill passed by the FBI. ALLIED WITH THESE TERRORISTS, THEY WILL CONTROL THE COUNTRY!

She claims to be a perennial target of the government. Within a week of the decimation of the Alfred P. Murrah building, Thompson informed her computer network, "The FBI just threatened me." Why? Because she claimed to have information that a Japanese saboteur had infiltrated the Bureau to spy on the White House. The Justice Department, she alleged, was aware of the situation and was "trying to shut down all information about it. I called the FBI to give them this information and related what information I do have, and it was an instantaneous reaction, as if I am on to what is going on."

"What if McVeigh suddenly decides to give a statement," the FBI agent rejoindered, "and says he blew up the Oklahoma building because of Linda Thompson?" (McVeigh, in fact adored Thompson.) The militia leader regarded this as a "clear threat" that the FBI intended to indict her, but the comment could be interpreted as a simple observation that her violent rhetoric had egged McVeigh on.

Like McVeigh, Thompson claims to be a victim of remote electronic harassment:

> GOVERNMENT WANTS ME DEAD BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS, 5-14-95
> INDIANAPOLIS – A national militia leader arrested last week ... made claims about people wanting to kill her, according to court documents.
>
> Court records show attorney Linda Thompson told a deputy at the Marion County Prosecutor's Office that the government was trying to kill her with radio frequency weapons.
>
> Her behavior was so alarming the deputy feared Thompson was going to shoot him or other workers in the office with the loaded .45-caliber handgun she wore in a holster, court documents stated.
>
> Thompson was arrested Thursday and charged Friday with battery on an officer, resisting law enforcement and disorderly conduct. A pretrial court hearing was set for next Friday morning in Marion Municipal Court.
>
> The incident Thursday began after Thompson went to the prosecutor's office > and told Sheriff's Deputy Jeffrey Dunn she wanted to file battery and stalking charges against Richard Bottoms.

>
> Bottoms is a systems analyst for Nuvo, a weekly newspaper in Indianapolis, who has written about Thompson's militia activities. Thompson became irate when Dunn told her that she was not providing enough details to file charges against Bottoms, according to court documents.
> Thompson then began "yelling and screaming" and told Dunn that the people responsible for last month's bombing of the federal building in Oklahoma City were shooting her in the head with radio frequency weapons and already had killed six of her friends this way.

She lashes out at the FBI, derides gun control lobbyists, curses informants. But Thompson reserves her most corrosive venom for James 'Bo' Gritz. Both Bill Cooper and Gritz emerged on the radio talk show circuit in 1989, parroting public speakers of the Christic Institute at the height of the firm's La Penca lawsuit. The effect was to marginalize the group.

Gritz served four tours of duty in Vietnam. 'Bo' is a former chief of Congressional relations for the Defense Security Assistance Agency. In 1988, Col. Gritz and an associate pled guilty to shipping a quantity of plastic explosive by commercial airliner to train Afghan rebels in the Nevada desert. His counterinsurgency training of the Afghans began with his employment by the Pentagon's Intelligence Support Activity (ISA) group, a top-secret covert operations unit. The ISA was formed by General Shy Memey, then the Army's Chief of Staff, a unit so covert that even the Pentagon, CIA and White House claimed to be unaware of its existence until the unit was exposed by Gritz himself in 1982 Congressional testimony. In open hearings, Gritz let slip that his search for American POWs in Laos had support from "the Activity," a covert brigade with which Congress was completely unfamiliar. A barrage of questions followed.

Scott Barnes, a former CIA contract officer in Bakersfield, California, insists that Gritz, then working as an employee of Hughes Aircraft, claimed credit for Barnes's own attempts to document the imprisonment of American POWs in Southeast Asia. "Gritz," Thompson notes, "is a known FBI informant and has known connections to CIA" documented in her "Traitor File."

Gritz denies that he is Nazi, even a white supremacist, despite his unabashed praise of Identity:

> I believe that the Identity Christian Movement will continue to grow in this nation until it is able to stand self-sufficient in spite of the government....

> Basically the Zionists are taking over and we Christians are being formed into small pockets that have to go to camps twice a year to learn what's going on.... The enemy you face today is a Satanic overthrow where he would change the United States of America, a nation under God, into U.S.A. Incorporated with King George as chairman of the board, and a Zionist group that would rule over us as long as Satan might be on earth....
> I am telling you that he (God) has given us all that we need. He's given us ... the Identity Christian movement.

The blue-eyed ruler of the universe also created James Nichols, brother of Terry Nichols, accused co-conspirator. The Michigan farmer often describes anyone who doesn't travel with Israel's "lost tribes" as "sheeple," a common Identity put-down.

American Patriots and many militia groups, led by hired guns of the CIA and DoD, are waging war. "Sheeple," particularly liberals, are perceived as the enemy. This same scape-goating has resulted in massive destabilization, "secret" wars and wide-open conflict in every country on earth.

The United States is rapidly becoming the terminal battleground.

CIA Mind Control & the U.S. Postal Service

By Vincent Fontana & Alex Constantine

At a Congressional inquiry in September, 1992, an angry witness to mass murder at a Royal Oak post office charged the panel with conducting a "controlled investigation" to leave "the impression that efforts are underway to stop this tragic carnage."

He added that the investigation was not an effective response and did not lead to a cessation of violence ...

> We are in need of more than political responses which produce nothing more than window dressing. Such efforts have led to:
>
> - Blaming the victims, declaring them to be mentally unstable.
> - Review of a whistleblower's background, military record and prior work behavior.
> - Hot lines to permit employees to report "unusual behavior."
> - Blaming union officials and supervisors.
> - The convening of a joint task force to make written pronouncements that "postal workers oppose violence."
> "Violence in the U.S. Postal Service," Congressional Hearing, Royal Oak, Michigan

The postal service has long had a cozy relationship with the intelligence "services." Former CIA employees are often granted appointments as postmasters. It's a little known fact that the system has its own built-in intelligence agency known to bug employee restrooms illegally, and the internal agency has spied on the American Postal Workers and Letter Carriers unions. The service uses its own covert intelligence network to harass whistle-blowers and sow disinformation about them.

It has also been used for human experimentation without the knowledge or consent of employees.

In 1977, after the Watergate break-in, it surfaced in the Select Intelligence Subcommittee investigation that the CIA was illegally spying and conducting field mind control experiments on unwitting subjects. The organic mysteries of the mind were decoded by CIA scientists with illegal drugs, electronic hypnosis, sleep deprivation, subliminal suggestions over controlled radio and television stations, direct microwave communication to the auditory pathways, the remote transmission of images and electronic manipulation of emotions.

> There are subliminal and brainwashing techniques by which the subconscious of the individual is invaded and his thoughts or personality influenced without his consent. These influences can be smuggled in past the customs of the senses. Methods of which I am aware include ultrasonic waves. These are inaudible to the conscious sense, like the 'silent' dog-whistle. Similarly subliminal messages can be concealed in films or television programs. Of course, such means are banned, but anyone sufficiently ingenious, or some central authority seeking to indoctrinate, could succeed.
> Experiments have also demonstrated that it is possible to hypnotize persons with television and radio.
>
> Surveillance Technology, U.S. Senate Hearing

Implants—placed in the body by human experimenters—are another means of tracking or controlling a subject, according to the San Francisco Examiner (November 8, 1995):

> VENTURA—He didn't want his name used. He's a California surgeon, and he's scared of repercussions.
>
> "I'd probably be ostracized, I'd be criticized, maybe I'd even lose my license," he said. "People with credibility who put themselves forward in this field could wind up dead, in jail or out of business."
>
> He performed the operations anyway, before witnesses and a video camera. He cut into the big toe of a woman and into the back of a man's hand. Both believed they'd been abducted by aliens. From both, he extracted small foreign objects with some unusual properties.
>
> The object in the man was the size of a cantaloupe seed; one of the woman's two was T-shaped. The objects were encased in a thick, dark membrane. But these weren't cysts, he said. They were so tough, his scalpel couldn't cut them.
>
> The doctor was prepared for ingrown follicles or shards of plastic. "I was as doubting as anyone else," he said. When the membranes were dried out and cut open, they revealed tiny, highly magnetic pieces of a shiny black metal. The hard membrane was composed of substances naturally occurring in the body.
>
> The skeptics remain skeptical. "We haven't heard of anything that, without the shadow of a doubt, couldn't have been made here on Earth," said Barry Karr, director of the Center for Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal.

The hearings of the Select Committee in 1977 exposed an illegal research program that ruined lives and careers. Much of the populace did not hear of MK-ULTRA because, with the exception of New York state, news of the hearings was blacked out across the country. The pleas of victims are still ignored and ridiculed by an indifferent press.

Subjecting private citizens to terminal experiments and remote electromagnetic harassment is not a national security issue. The SS carried out political sieges of imprisonment and human experimentation because the Jewish faith offended the dictatorship of Adolph Hitler. The Nuremberg Trials found such acts, even with the justification of war, criminal.

> Admiral Stansfield Turner, CIA director, stated in the 1977 Congressional investigation of Project MK-ULTRA, "It is abhorrent to me to think of using humans as guinea pigs." He promised Senate investigators that new procedures and guidelines would be established, and only volunteers would be used for human experimentation. He also said he would follow up and disclose all the names of private citizens who were illegally experimented on, and the Agency would pay restitution, but this was merely political rhetoric.
> When a lawsuit against the CIA was filed by a victim who happened to be a member of Parliament, the CIA director made a statement to one of his subordinates that he hoped that the victim would die before the case ever went to trial.
> Harvey M. Weinstein, M.D., Psychiatry and the CIA: Victims of Mind Control

The United States of America has not openly declared war on private citizens. But illicit human experimentation and vicious "non-lethal" radio frequency assaults have been carried out by agencies within a number of federal institutions for 50 years.

One of them is the U.S. Postal Service. When conducting behavior modification experiments on human subjects, federal agencies are required to follow procedural guidelines for protecting human rights. Behavior modification specialists are obliged to collect full written consent from their subjects. Before volunteering and signing a consent form, a subject must understand the full extent and purpose of the experiment. Research involving humans should not be detrimental to the subject's physical or mental welfare.

In the postal system, innocent victims of mind control experimentation are tortured and ultimately "tested" to death. Once an individual is targeted, mind control will follow wherever he moves, wherever he makes his occupation. Employees are often not aware that they are illegally spied upon, bugged and manipulated by a team of "controllers."

The Nuremberg code of 1947 established protocols for medical research to improve the human lot—not destroy it.

The University of Oklahoma in Norman, Oklahoma was known to conduct behavior modification experiments for the Central Intelligence Agency. Patrick Sherrill, 44, a mail carrier, murdered a dozen people and committed suicide. Was he a programmed killer for the intelligence community? Was he hypnotized and "psychically-driven" to grab a gun and kill his fellow employees? He was harassed by the "voices" of children. Were they really children or adults who disguised themselves with voice synthesizers to harass him? Were electronic bugs slipped in his mailbag or postal vehicle without his knowledge? Was a transmitter implanted on him surgically, enabling his antagonists to transmit radio frequencies and electronically dominate his emotions? Why did they choose him? He may have documented all of his experiences on a computer, posthumously confiscated by the FBI. There is mind control experimentation that attempts to control or kill an enemy with a computer that generates electrical impulses loaded with a post-hypnotic trigger or "trill."(See: William Nack, Sports Illustrated, July 9, 1995, vol. 63: no. 5.)

Several years ago in La Jolla, California, Dr. Carl Rogers addressed a symposium on the "Frontiers of Science" at the Western Behavioral Sciences Institute. Rogers acknowledged that behavioral science had developed to the point that human thought and behavior could be controlled to an unprecedented degree. "This capability is made to order for dictatorial rule," he said.

In 1989, San Diego was hit with an epidemic of murders and suicides:

John Merlin Taylor, a 52-year-old mail carrier in Escondido, CA, was described as mellow and friendly by friends and fellow employees. Taylor shot and killed his wife and two co–workers before killing himself.

William Charles Camp, 62, El Cajon, a postal worker, described as easy-going. Camp hung himself in his garage.

Donald Martin Mace, 44, a Poway letter carrier, shot himself in the lobby of the local post office—after responsibly turning in his keys.

Hector Manuel Rubio, 40, a Pacific Beach postal clerk, hung himself with a weight-lifting belt in his home.

Jay Thomas Fanum, 37, a postal clerk in Vista, perished from carbon monoxide poisoning in his own garage.

Hector Torres, age unknown, a San Diego postal clerk, plummeted to his death from the Coronado Bridge.

Was a barrage of subliminal directions to kill transmitted into their homes via television and radio frequencies? Were they driven to their deaths with strategically-planted electronic devices? Did their psychological profiles match the ones sought by a clutch of state-sponsored behavior modification specialists? Was this a "cluster of mind control experiment?" Who were the psychiatric operatives in the area?

Most of the postal workers who went berserk in the San Diego area had fatal car accidents. Were these a standard modus operandi in illegal mind control experiments? Were the workers intentionally discredited beforehand to provide an easy explanation of their state of depression? Did a directed-energy weapon aimed at their heads while driving cause them to lose control of their vehicles? Or did the intelligence operatives send remote control radio signals to a transmitter implanted on the targeted victim?

Dead men do tell tales. Several of the victims' bodies were summarily cremated—possibly to conceal tell-tale evidence of microwave damage to their internal organs. One dead postal employee had donated his body to science, but when his body was examined the coroner found internal organs badly seared by microwaves, rendering them useless. Is cremation a standard procedure in classified mind control experiments, an attempt to destroy physical evidence of murder?

The terminal use of technology, billed as "non-lethal," presents the medical profession with a challenge to study and detect forensic effects of gigahertz radiation.

Sniper James O. Huberty shot and killed 21 people at McDonald's in San Ysidro on July 18, 1984. Some of the victims were children. Did he nurse a grudge against them? Most mass murderers do not shoot children. Was Huberty tormented by children's "voices?" Mind control technicians beam microwave audiograms (digital simulations of human speech) of baleful, rage-piquing messages to the brain of the subject to mask their own voices.

The intelligence community is responsible for the killings in San Ysidro, not Huberty.

Some of the postal employees were said to have had mental problems. Did they? Or were they discredited in advance because this is a tactic used to isolate them? A personality disorder accounts for an "irrational" obsession with corruption, a strategy reminiscent of the Soviet abuse of psychiatry.

> I strongly assert the need for the executive branch of our government to comprehensively and immediately clean up this local postal managerial morass.

Employees testified at the September 15, 1992 congressional hearings in Royal Oak, Michigan that management and U.S. postal inspectors used "abusive tactics" and threats to silence them.

In Edmond, the local postmaster ordered employees to not discuss the mass murder there. Postal employees testified that they were harassed to stop them from talking.

Federal inspectors blamed the shootings on employee "hiring practices." Whistle-blowers are often treated to a draconian backlash. One woman employed by the mail service testified in September, 1992 that she was "a victim of physical assault and abuse":

> On February 25, 1985, I blew a whistle on a postal violation of child labor law.

> I notified the proper chain of command and they in turn mishandled the report. And the manager responsible was contacted at home and he [came] to the postal facility to attempt to kill me. Mr. Grell did assault me ... and he was given a letter of warning. Mr Martin was then MSC manager. I continued on with my duties that day....

> I demand Congressional oversight of all U.S. attorneys' offices to insure that there will be, henceforth, legal prosecution [for] obstruction of justice cases and postal assaults.

The postal system is riddled with horror stories. In Minneapolis, an undercover postal inspector gave marijuana to a mail sorter grieving the death of his wife. The inspector then turned the worker over to police and had his employment terminated.

The objective is to isolate the bothersome informant, depict him as incompetent, disloyal, troublesome, mentally unbalanced or ill. The whistle-blower is forced out, frightening workmates and supporters. A psychiatric history allows postal inspectors to avoid examining legitimate allegations of corruption. The assault continues until the target is left discredited, exhausted, in poor health, financially-crippled, his career in ruins.

Psychological harassment and intimidation are carried out by hired specialists. The U.S. Postal Service and other federal agencies draw on their services.

The intelligence agencies are capable of transmitting voices and images directly to the cranium's sensory pathways. The onset of advanced radio frequency technology has given rise to a coming generation of "thought police." They are a profound threat to a democratic society. Radio frequency weapons have eased the malignant growth of fascism within the intelligence agencies. Anyone who falls into disfavor with this elite can be condemned to interminable physical and psychological torture. The victim is often murdered without a trace.

The abuse of mind-invasive technology is an unprecedented violation of privacy and freedom of thought. There are individuals presently sitting in our prisons and mental institutions who have been set up with the new thought control technology. Due process is abandoned. The victim's life hangs exclusively on the whims of the "controllers," an unprecedented violation of the individual's civil and constitutional rights.

The new "elite" death squads employ directed-energy weapons to harass and kill a designated guinea-pig. These domestic terrorists are trained in the art of persuasive coercion (CIA jargon for a harassment campaign designed to break a subject without direct physical violence).

Mind control techniques perfected by the CIA include psychological intimidation, often racial and sexual. The unsuspecting victim is treated to post-hypnotic programming, psychological conditioning, chemical harassment and biological assaults 24 hours a day. He is provoked to rage and violence at the whim of a remote handler, often to the point of killing.

Mark Hilbun, a postal worker in Dana Point, CA, killed his girlfriend and several other postal employees in a frenzy of jealous rage in 1993. Was his girlfriend, a supervisor, a behavioral modification specialist conducting classified research? Did she seduce him by sending him synthetic love with radio waves on his biological EM frequency? Did a programmer transmit repeated messages to Hilbun that she was disloyal? Was a gun placed in his hands in the grip of remotely-induced rage? Did the girlfriend play God with his life? She may have even dared him to go after her with a gun because she is "omnipotent"—she could put him to sleep with a transmitted radio frequency. If so, she found out all too quickly that she is not "God" for all her "black magic tricks."

To the intelligence community, Hilbun was a "hypno-patsy."

Bruce Clark, a postal worker in the City of Industry in California, was another. In 1995, Clark met a co–worker and shot him for no apparent reason. Was there someone in the catwalks transmitting subliminal commands to kill, images of someone he was hypnotized to fear or hate? Bruce Clark was not listening to the "voice of God," but to a mazer shotgunned to his head. A post-hypnotic "trill" may have triggered him to commit murder. Was it the clothes the victim wore? Was it something he said? Or was it in the lyrics of music playing over a controlled PA system at work? Bruce Clark was a loner. He loved cats. His friends said that Clark was not violent. He had no criminal history.

A man carrying a gun, dressed as a National Parks Service ranger, was arrested on October 6, l995 in Yonkers, New York. He stole onto the seminary grounds where Pope John Paul II had spoken a few hours later. His name is William Wylong, a 45-year-old postal worker. He claimed he was there to "protect" the Pope.

There will be more just like him.

There is a conspiracy within the intelligence agencies to conceal field testing of highly-advanced mind control technology.

On October 2, 1995, President Clinton publicly apologized to the victims of radiation experimentation. Some victims were volunteers, some were not. The victims were not told of the debilitating effects and multi-generational consequences. It took them 40 years to collect enough evidence to elicit a simple acknowledgement and an empty apology.

The government still experiments on private citizens without their consent, often to death. They will continue to experiment and deny until forced to stop.

But ...

> The dangers of permitting a governmental agency to be the sole judge of the legality of its employees' actions are by this time all too painfully apparent. There is of course the danger that the Agency will quash an investigation to avoid embarrassment rather than serve legitimate governmental objectives.

Auditory Perception of Radio Frequencies

Douglas Barr, a professor of electronics at the University of Colorado, has been hypnotically accessed since childhood for mind control purposes, and as an adult is a target of electromagnetic harassment. He writes:

There has been much discussion of "Microwave Hearing" phenomenon and I was intrigued by this and have done some research. It turns out that microwave hearing does indeed exist. There is a fair sized body of research available on the subject. This is one of the more complete reviews of the subject:

> "Auditory Perception of Radio-Frequency Electromagnetic Fields," in: The Journal of Acoustical Society of America, 1982 pages 1321–1334, by Chung-Kwang Chou and Arthur W. Guy, PhD, researchers at the University of Washington.

>
> Pulsed microwaves have been heard as sound by radar operators since radar was invented during World War II ....
> The earliest report we have found on the auditory perception of pulsed microwaves appeared in 1956 as an advertisement of the Airborne Instruments Lab in Proceedings of the IRE. The advertisement described observations made in 1947 on the hearing of sounds that occurred at the repetition rate of radar while the listener stood close to a horn antenna. When the observers first told their co-workers in the lab of their hearing experiences, they encountered skepticism and rather pointed questions about their mental health.

POWER LEVELS AND FREQUENCY RANGE

At very low frequency range (< 1MHz), a human-size biological object absorbs very little radio-frequency energy; however, the absorption can be appreciable at the resonant frequency near 70–80 MHz (where the long dimension of the body is approximately 0.4 wavelengths) (Durney et al. 1978). For a human head, the resonant frequency is near 600 Mhz.... Although there is universal agreement on the thermal effects of the highlevel (> 100 milliWatts/centimeter(squared)) radio-frequency electromagnetic radiation, there is considerable debate on the biological effects of low-level (< 100mWatts/cm2) electromagnetic radiation. ...

The thresholds (for hearing) of average power density of fields at the head were determined to be 0.4 and 2mW/cm2, respectively for the two transmitters. ...

In another experiment they used a 2450MHz pulse generator with pulses in the 0.5 to 32 microsecond width. The generator produced peak power of 10kW. Calculations indicated that the maximum amount of absorbed energy was 16 microJOULES/gram (They are talking microjoules per gram now instead of milliwatts per cm squared. They use microjoules when they talk of absorbed energy and milliwatts when talking about radiated wattage. The two are related of course, but the energy absorbed depends on the makeup of the human head, whereas the energy radiated is dependent on the transmission power). (ED) ...

In another experiment they used 5 to 15 microsecond pulses at 3 Ghz frequency.

DISCUSSION

The microwave-induced auditory phenomenon is an example of a microwave-biological interaction that has been WELL QUANTIFIED and WIDELY ACCEPTED (emphasis this author) as a bona fide "weak-field" effect. Although originally the hypothesis of a direct nervous system stimulation was proposed, the evidence is now strongly convincing that the hearing phenomenon is related to thermoelastically induced mechanical vibration. The same type of vibration can be produced by other means, e.g. by a laser pulse, or by activating a piezoelectric crystal in contact with the skull [implant].

The paper ends with about a page of references to other works, one of which is Frey's paper published in 1963.

So there you have it, Microwave hearing is fact, not fiction.

Case Histories of Electromagnetic Harassment

FROM NEXUS MAGAZINE:

EDITOR:

While reading a back issue of Nexus (vol. 2, no. 20), I came across a news clip entitled, "The Mysterious Taos Hum." It says that Representative Bill Richardson (D-NM) has asked the House Select Committee to investigate a noise which causes dizziness, shortness of breath, headaches, anxiety and sleeplessness, and is thought by some to be from a secret defense-related program plaguing various cities in New Mexico.

Well, I believe I know something about that sound, so here is my story.

During the years 1980–83 I was living with the daughter of the now deceased Dr. David Fraser, former head of the Department of Toxicology at the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill. One day the daughter told me of a frightening encounter her father had with the American military. Later, when Dr. Fraser came to stay with us while on vacation in 1981, I asked him to tell me the story firsthand.

In the early 1970s, the small city of Medford, Oregon became the suicide capital of the United States overnight. (The exact dates can be found by checking national health statistics.) After Dr. Fraser was notified of this dramatic anomaly, he organized and sent a team of researchers to look for the cause. They checked the water, the air, the soil and a variety of additional possibilities, but still could find no reason for the massive increase in suicides. Then they discovered that Ultra Low Frequencies were being beamed into Medford, Oregon, from the local military base. (I never thought to ask for the name.) The researchers then went to that military base and met with its commanding officer. The commanding officer said he knew about the ULF, but his base was not responsible, and that Russians were. The ULF waves stopped the very next day.

The researchers had not only determined the military base as the source, they also determined that the ULF was coming into the homes of the populace through their television antennas, which created some sort of standing wave resonance within the structure of the home itself. Those people who did not get out of their homes became severely depressed.

As the ULF wave had now stopped, the researchers returned to the University of Chapel Hill to write their report and confer with Dr. Fraser. At that time, a number of men appeared who displayed CIA credentials and said the ULF waves beamed into Medford were a "national security" matter. They went on to threaten explicitly to kill each of the researchers, including Dr. David Fraser himself, should anyone speak further about it.

As a postscript, I have often wondered how many times researchers have stumbled over the effects of secret weapons directed against the American people and have been intimidated into silence, or possibly murdered. I myself have made no public statement until now, fourteen years from the time I heard this story (and more than twenty years since the initial fact). It seems clear to me that the military-industrial complex has secretly declared war on the American people quite some time ago, and is waging a long-term psychological warfare operation, complete with fully operational, mass mind control technology.

Lastly, I don't say these things so that people will be afraid. The good news is that these cockroaches don't feel strong enough to be caught out in the light. However, should any of your readers be feeling depressed, anxious or nauseous, before calling a doctor try taking down your TV antennae.

Sincerely,
Mark M., Hollywood, CA

A letter to Alex Constantine from G.W., a victim of EM harassment living in Tucson, Arizona:

Alex:
Harlan Girard (director of the International Committee for the Convention Against Offensive Non-Lethal Weapons) has encouraged me to get in touch with you regarding my mind control ordeal.

I've had a hellish year. I began hearing "voices" last August—which promptly got me diagnosed as a paranoid schizophrenic and hospitalized three times. After the first hospitalization, it became clear that the source of this transmission was something other than my own jangled neurons, and it gradually began to dawn on me—partly because the voices themselves said it—that some facet of the government, most likely the CIA, was responsible.

I've been tortured for a solid year: sleep deprivation, electric shocks ... never once have I been let off the line. My film and video business has been stolen out from under me. I have been marginalized—both financially and emotionally.

When I have tried to obtain legal help, I've lost large sums of money, legal documents have disappeared from my files, the lawyers have mysteriously quit or been scared off the case. I now find myself destitute, unable to make any headway regaining ownership of my business.

I am saddled with enormous debts. I no longer have health insurance.

I have no idea why I've been selected for this form of torture. The only thing I can attribute it to is the breakup with my former boyfriend and business partner, David Frankel Arond. We had a film and video business—East West Films. I oversaw the office here, while for much of the last decade David did a considerable amount of work in the then Soviet Union. Among other things, we did some work for USIA [the United States Information Agency, which often fronts for the CIA overseas] both directly and via a company called Techniarts in Washington, DC that subcontracted with us. Techniarts ultimately lost its contract with USIA, and we then contracted directly with USIA on a story-by-story basis.

This may have brought me under the scrutiny of the intelligence community. The only other strange occurrence that I can think of that might have brought us under the watchful gaze of the CIA is when David was the first Westerner given an interview with Oleg Kalugin. This struck me as odd given David's lack of prominence in the media.

The events of the past year have had a devastating impact on my life. My health has suffered greatly. My hemoglobin plummeted to an alarming reading of 6.5. My thyroid is not functioning normally. The loss of my business, the lack of income and poor health has made parttime work more of a challenge than it might otherwise have been. I have no understanding about the science of ELF, microwaves and whatever—but it would seem that this must have contributed to my health problems. With no place else to turn, I have had to rely on the information supplied by concerned individuals who had looked into these goings on. Any suggestions you might have would be greatly appreciated. I live in Tucson and am hoping to connect with people in this region who have some level of understanding about the mind control experience.

Thanks,
G.W.

Correspondence

Dr. Barker (the unconventional psychiatrist in "Bleak House") surfaced in a computer discussion group for social workers in Canada on May 28, 1887. The comments are from Lynne Moss-Sharman, a subject herself in experiments conducted when she was a child, and a survivor's advocate, to a social worker specializing in childhood trauma.

May 28, 1997
From: Lynne Moss-Sharman

Jim:

Part of the healing process is taking responsibility for what one has "enacted" in the "past." Dr. Barker has engaged in a 1996–97 dialogue with Steve Smith [a victim of forced incarceration] that includes creating his own version of the Book of Revelations. At some point I think we arejust dealing with out and out criminal behaviour under the guise of psychiatry and with the protection of that profession, and unless the Dr. Barkers in Canada are legally pursued there will be no moral healing. Don't forget that Dr. Ewen Cameron [a pioneer of CIA mind control experimentation] was the President of the Canadian Psychiatric Association, and Dr. Martin Orne (who was named as a torturer conducting CIA funded mind control experiments on children in the 1950s, a President of the American Psychiatric Association and more recently, Founding Member of the False Memory Syndrome Foundation) at the Presidential Hearing on Human Radiation Experiments in March 1995.

When I see things like electro-shock "Therapy" increasing 3000-fold at our regional psychiatric hospital (wipe 'em all out before it gets closed down?) in the past four years ... I do not think the torture has stopped. The public and other professions are not being informed ... I get chills thinking that Dr. Barker is still functioning as a "child/adolescent specialist" ... proclaiming himself to be the Director of The Canadian Society for Prevention to Cruelty to Children.

—Lynne

Since CIA involvement is suspected, Canadian intelligence needs to pay attention too. And government needs to address the damage caused by the secrecy that protects these institutions by walling them off from public scrutiny and supervision, so that the basic human rights of their inmates are denied. The confidentiality of Steve's records has not been in his best interests!

The 60s and 70s were a dark time in the children's treatment field, but enough people tried their best to help children that the effects of neglect and of sexual abuse and of child trauma gradually became recognized, and today we are at the threshold of being able to genuinely help traumatized people. Unfortunately that knowledge is not widely known yet.

A letter to the author from Val Bankston, an abductee who has been repeatedly accessed by her perpetrators to the present day. Although initially believing her "controllers" to be "aliens," she has since recovered memories of human perps lurking behind hypnotically-induced screen memories of little green men.

Alex:

I remember being abducted at an unmarked clinic (by humans) where I reported for a referred mamogram. I never got the mamogram, and only remembered later that I had gone there. I had a chunk of "missing time"!

This was near the VA hospital in the San Fernando Valley. I haven't been able to find the exact spot. It made me physically ill to go around there, so I just gave up on it.

Over a period of time, I had experienced what seemed to be a number of UFO related incidents. In addition to these sightings and contacts with what appeared to be alien entities, I have flashbacks and memories of being abducted in vans and cars and taken to hospitals and drugged by doctors, set in front of TV screens and debriefed about various things that happened while "on duty" as it were. I have been tortured. I have been drugged at parties (I never eat or drink anything offered to me at a party anymore—especially orange juice) I have possessed and have been photographed wearing spy-tech devices. I have remembered using them ... I remember having had them used on ME.

I had no idea where I got my orders. I knew only that I was doing a job for a man to whom I was (am) intensely loyal. The job involved being able to operate with no memory of what I was doing, because I had to infiltrate certain groups undetected. I felt that this was my choice.

I remember also incidents of breaking and entering locations, threatening people, stealing an object from an aerospace lab, delivering articles, giving verbal encoded messages etc. My cues were either verbal or by seeing a very bright light, or encoded in the personal section of the Recycler. I thought these orders were coming from the UFO entities. Up until I wised up about being programmed, I used to get instructions over the phone.

Listen to this story:

I find myself approaching a doorway of a nice looking house in an upperclass neighborhood. When I get to the door, I hand something that I can't see to a woman. She asks me to come in and join the party. I decline. I recognize this woman as my enemy, but I don't know why. My adrenaline is pumping and I know that I must go. She insists that I come in. I walk briskly away, declining curtly once again. She calls for a man in the house who joins her at the door as I am walking down the driveway to my car, which is parked up the street, out of sight. When I reach the bottom of the driveway, the woman says something that I don't understand, and I fall right down on the ground. Just like a UFO abduction experience! I look up and see the woman and the man approaching cautiously, with tense looks on their faces as though they don't know what to expect from me.

Finding myself in this condition, I remember an order to look at my hands if this ever happens. I struggle to raise my hands and look at first my left then my right hand. On my right hand is the ring, which I immediately recognize. I know that I am supposed to depress a button on the side of it. I do this. It clicks off five clicks and then delivers an electric shock to my hand. I am somewhat revived but not enough to get up and flee. I know if this happens, I must hit the button again. This time, it ticks very rapidly, many times. I get the feeling that it could be a bomb or administer a drug or something terrible like that. As I lose consciousness completely, I realize just how vulnerable I really am-following orders that could possibly kill me without knowing what in the hell I am really doing.

(I have a picture taken of myself wearing the "spy-ring." I really thought it was a watch. I can send you a copy if you like.)

My next memory was finding myself at home, in the bathroom, looking in the mirror. The ring was destroyed and in pieces (some of which were missing) on the counter beside me. I felt like hell and went to bed. I don't remember the next day or the previous day or anything else. The ring peices disappeared next time I looked.

But I have photos of myself with the ring clearly shown, taken before the event. Before it happened, I knew that I had to wear the ring at all times, and that I would be called upon to do a "job."

Love,
Val

A letter to the Freedom of Thought Foundation, an organiation of survivors, from a victim of unauthorized medical experimentation with radioactive implants.

Dear FOTF:

My name is Roland Thompson. I'm 38 and I have a radio isotopic loop implanted in my abdomen. It was placed there during a routine surgery for ulcers in 1980 while on active duty with the army.

It is apparent on x-ray and it registers on geiger counters in the range of .02-.03 millirads. At times it seems to be moved closer to the sensor of the geiger counter by my heart beat....

I've gone to several doctors and nuclear educators at my university. All of them, save one or two, are skeptical. The two individuals who have witnessed the evidence are critical to my situation; one is my personal physician who is a close friend and happens to be the coroner in my district. He is in favor of removing it, as am I, and is agreeable to video taping the operation and being present in the operating room while it is removed. I feel safer with him there and am fortunate enough to have a friend in his capacity.

The other individual is a technician in our local hospital who indulged me in a test with a geiger counter. He also has an open mind and will attest to the fact that the radiation is localized. They seem to be together on their beliefs and are convinced that i'm the genuine article. all that remains are the details of the surgery.

The physician will read the copy of the interim report on human radiation experimentation that president Clinton's advisory committee has produced. he'll also read my biography of the events leading up to the implant's discovery, contact a surgeon we both trust and I suppose we'll go from there. I would solicit advice on how to go about having the device analyzed, preserving a chain of evidence and the mechanics of involving the media in this bizarre undertaking.

Thank you,
Roland

A letter to the Freedom of Thought Foundation, an organization of survivors, from a victim of unauthorized medical experimentation with radioactive implants:

Dear FOTF:

My name is Roland Thompson, I'm 38 and I have a radio isotopic loop implanted in my abdomen. It was placed there during a routine surgery for ulcers in 1980 while on active duty with the army.

It is apparent on x-ray and it registers on geiger counters in the range of .02-.05 millirads. At times it seems to be moved closer to the sensor of the geiger counter by my heart beat...

I've gone to several doctors and nuclear education at my university. All of them, save one or two, are skeptical. The two individuals who have witnessed the evidence are critical to my situation: one is my personal physician who is a close friend and happens to be the coroner in my district. For Susan and Robyn

'In any case I long ago realized that it is almost impossible for a layman and a non-Catholic, and indeed for most Catholics and ecclesiastics outside the Vatican City, to form a valid judgment or express an authoritative opinion on Papal policy. The Pope's decision may, or must be influenced by so many imponderable or invisible elements. Moreover, not only is the atmosphere of the Vatican supranational and universal . . . but it is also fourth-dimensional and, so to speak, outside of time . . . for example, they can regard the Savoy dynasty as an interlude, and the Fascist era as an incident, in the history of Rome and Italy. They reckon in centuries and plan for eternity and this inevitably renders their policy inscrutable, confusing and, on occasion, reprehensible to practical and time-conditioned minds.'[1]

– Sir D'Arcy Osborne,
British Ambassador to the Vatican,
March 1947.

'I gather that . . . some arrangement has been worked out with Vatican and Argentina . . . protecting not only Quislings but also (those) . . . guilty of terrible crimes committed in Yugoslavia. I presume we must protect our agents even though it disgusts me . . . we are conniving with Vatican and Argentina to get guilty people to haven in latter country.'[2]

Preface to the New Edition

For a small volume, this book has engendered considerable controversy over the years. Since its first release in Britain in 1991 under the title Ratlines, there have been numerous translations, including into Polish, French, Italian, and even Serbian. Each foreign-language edition was published in a country that had some part – mostly major – in the Vatican's operations to smuggle Nazi war criminals out of Europe from under the noses of the Allied teams that were hunting them and to safety in Latin America (especially Argentina), and even in Britain, Canada, the United States, and Australia.

The Serbian edition was undoubtedly used as a propaganda weapon by the Orthodox Serbs against the Catholic Croats in the Balkans war that broke out just as the book was first published. One of the major revelations of the first half of the book is the role of the Croatian priest Father Krunoslav Draganović in smuggling hundreds of wanted war criminals out of Europe on behalf of the highest officials in the Vatican.

The detailed account provided in the first half of this book of Croatian Fascist atrocities against Serbs, Jews, and Gypsies engendered considerable interest amongst Serb nationalists around the world. Some Australian Serbs even approached us seeking support for the nationalist cause being pursued in Bosnia in the 1990s. Needless to say, and in light of the detailed research we had undertaken in Bosnia and Croatia, this overture was rejected as an attempt to secure our support for the Serb genocide of the 1990s as some sort of 'just' retribution for the Croat genocide of half a century earlier.

In America, the book was published as Unholy Trinity in 1991 and more recently became the basis for an ABC Prime Time special on Nazis in Argentina, the country most favoured to receive the wanted fugitives by Father Draganović and his senior Vatican sponsors, especially then Assistant Secretary of State Giovanni Montini (later Pope Paul VI). After explaining how the Vatican-Argentine connection worked, we supplied ABC with intelligence documents that correctly identified Reinhard Kopps, a German intelligence officer who worked for Bishop Alois Hudal and the Vatican on the first Nazi smuggling operations detailed in Chapter Two.

After sending hundreds of his fellow Nazis to Argentina, Kopps followed them and promptly occupied himself writing anti-Semitic hate propaganda and meeting with other fugitive war criminals to reminisce about the 'good old days' under the Third Reich. As much of this book documents, when it came to the Vatican's Nazi-smuggling networks, most roads led to Argentina regardless of whether the fugitive was German, Croat, Slovak, or Austrian.

When Sam Donaldson confronted Kopps with our files on his past, he confessed. Not realizing that he was on camera, he was caught whispering the name of a much more senior Nazi, Erich Priebke. To the television audience (and every Nazi in South America), it appeared as if one war criminal had denounced another to save his skin. When the program aired, Kopps fled to Tierra del Fuego out of a justifiable fear of retaliation. The truth is that the ABC producer, Harry Phillips, had already identified Priebke as a target.

Months before the television show aired, Harry had combed Argentina looking for Nazi suspects. He called early one morning and stated that he had a lead on a major war criminal, Erich Priebke, but no one knew quite what he had done. Even Simon Wiesenthal could only find an innocuous link between Priebke and an SS office in Verona, Italy.

We had a bit more luck. One of our sources from the US Army Counter Intelligence Corps, the late William Parkinson, had donated a classified two-volume index, produced by US Naval Intelligence at the end of World War II. The old intelligence files revealed what Wiesenthal had missed: before Priebke went to his last posting in Verona, he had spent the majority of the war as the Deputy Gestapo Chief of Rome. In thirty seconds, we had the answer. Priebke had not only tortured Allied agents, he had personally organized the infamous massacre of unarmed Roman citizens in the Ardeatine caves in Rome.

We tracked down Priebke's history with the help of several sources, including former Ambassador to Australia Mel Sembler and Mrs Betty Sembler, who donated a rare volume on the Italian

Fascist era. John Taylor and George Wolff, of the US National Archives, helped us locate innumerable Nazi documents on Priebke's service. Most importantly, the staff of the US Army's Central records facility at the Intelligence and Security Command at Fort Meade, Maryland, were invaluable in retrieving the Army Counter Intelligence Corps (CIC) files on Priebke's past.

When confronted by Sam Donaldson with the voluminous intelligence records and original Nazi documents, Erich Priebke was stupid enough to confess on national television that he was indeed responsible for the Ardeatine caves massacre. Priebke became the first of the Vatican's Nazis ever extradited from Argentina to Italy to stand trial for his crimes.

It was not an easy trip. At first the Menem government denounced ABC and sought to delay Priebke's extradition. ABC promised to pursue the Priebke story to its conclusion. Suddenly, John Loftus, one of the authors of this book, received an invitation from the Menem government to come to Buenos Aires to address an International Seminar on anti-Semitism.

It did not take long to discover why: the Argentine government wanted him to talk about Nazis in America, to take the sting away from the Nazis in Argentina. The conference turned out to be a public relations effort to gloss over the dark side of Juan and Evita Perón's role in providing Argentine visas to the Vatican to smuggle Nazis out of Europe, which we document later in this book. Several speakers minimized the presence of Nazis in Argentina, defended the Peróns, and praised President Menem for his courageous decision to open Argentina's immigration files for inspection.

It was an empty promise. A small staff of Jewish volunteers and scholars had been given access to the voluminous immigration files, but not to the intelligence index. Loftus gave the researchers a copy of the American intelligence index, as well as a list of ships that were chartered to carry Nazis to Buenos Aires. Suddenly, the Argentine files began to yield the proof of the ugliest chapter in Argentine history. As this book shows, Juan and Evita Perón had welcomed some of the worst Nazi mass murderers of World War II, including Ante Pavelić, the leader of the 'independent' state of Croatia. Pavelić and nearly the entire cabinet of his bloody Ustashi government had emigrated via the Vatican to Buenos Aires, where Perón promptly made Pavelić one of his senior 'security advisers'.

Even the carefully presented facts did not move the Menem government. Months passed, and it seemed that Priebke would suffer little more than 'protective' custody under the benevolent eye of the Argentinians. Eventually, however, they had to hand Priebke over in the wake of an almost unprecedented international campaign.

Several of our intelligence sources warned us that Priebke was still being protected. He knew too much about the Vatican's Ratlines to Argentina to ever be permitted to stand trial. Amazingly, the Italian military tribunal acquitted Priebke on a technicality. The people of Rome dimmed the lights of the city in protest. The next morning, Priebke was rearrested. The Supreme Court of Italy ruled that he must stand trial in a civil court. But to our dismay, Priebke received only a five-year sentence, roughly equivalent to a week in jail for every person he had murdered in the Ardeatine caves.

As we were to discover, Priebke was indeed protected by charitable Church forces. Priebke knew too much about the Vatican's Ratlines, and did not even serve his time in a prison, but lived comfortably for many months under 'house arrest' in a Catholic monastery.[1] In March 1998 the Italian military tribunal again considered his case, and this time decided to gaol him for life. By this time Priebke had been moved to a hospital located, ironically enough, in the Jewish quarter of Rome. As we write in April 1998 it seems unlikely that Priebke will serve more than a few symbolic days of his 'life sentence' in a prison.

How could a confessed Nazi murderer get away with it? What did Priebke know to receive such special treatment? The answer lies in the secrets revealed in the original edition of this book, and in the new material we have added in Chapter Thirteen.

Among other things, this new chapter deals with one of the best-kept secrets shared between the Vatican and the British Secret Service. In pursuing their own economic interests, the British spies – many of whom came from the banking and financial elite – bugged the Swiss banks and broke their telegram codes. Buried in the Western intelligence files is the evidence of Swiss corruption in financial dealings with the Third Reich, and damning evidence against the Dulles brothers – John Foster and Allen – whose American clients also invested in the Third Reich, together with a large number of Britain's industrial and financial establishment.

Even more relevant for the main themes of this book, the electronic intercepts of the Swiss banks revealed the role played by the Vatican Bank in investing the Catholic Church's wealth in Hitler's Germany, and its part in smuggling the Third Reich's massive treasure – stolen from its victims – out of Europe to safety in the Nazi diaspora in Latin America, and especially in Juan Perón's Argentina.

According to our sources in the intelligence community – whose information is reported extensively in the follow-up to this book, The Secret War Against the Jews – the British codebreaking files contain many revelations. We are told, for example, that a secret German intelligence group, operating under the cover of Nazi Airforce intelligence, deciphered Allen Dulles's private codes from Switzerland, which revealed his treasonous activities on behalf of his wealthy clients while he was supposed to be conducting anti-Nazi intelligence operations on behalf of the American government.

While Jewish groups campaign to force the Swiss bankers to open their files, the best evidence is sitting in the communications intelligence vaults of the National Security Agency in Maryland and the Government Communications Headquarters in Cheltenham, England. The material contained in the new chapter at the end of this book outlines the ugliest secret of World War II: the bloody circle of Western money laundered through Switzerland to the Third Reich, then out through the Vatican Bank to South America, and then finally back to the original owners in Germany. The entire, corrupt system was established for the profit of a few pro-Nazi Western investors, and to ensure that the Vatican Bank could keep the ledgers of St Peter's balanced no matter who won World War II.

So what, in the end, have we learned? Perhaps the moral is that you can get away with murder, if you are rich enough. In the end, the Nazis – with the help of their Western and Vatican collaborators – got away with it. A large number of Nazi mass murderers did not even seek sanctuary in Argentina; they simply settled in Britain, America, Australia, and Canada, where it took thirty to forty years to catch up with them. Most either died in the meantime or were too old to be prosecuted for anything more than immigration and naturalization felonies.

These were lessons that every mass murderer of the last half century has learned and skillfully applied in the many genocides that have followed the Nazi Holocaust.

Pavelić's Croatian Fascist movement of World War II has been reborn in the present government of Croatia, led by Franjo Tudjman, ironically a former Communist general who served under Marshal Tito. The cruelties of the Communist retaliations against the Ustashi of the postwar years are mirrored in the Serbian atrocities in Bosnia in the 1990s, and the Croatian reprisals against both Serbs and Muslims.

There is an irony that fifty years after World War II, we are still hunting war criminals in the Balkans, and despite the hard work and good intentions of people from all around the globe, we are still failing at the task, just as we failed to bring Ante Pavelić and his cut throats to justice half a century ago. Perhaps if we had been more assiduous in prosecuting Pavelić in 1947, we could have avoided the resurgence of violence that has led to the stationing of Allied troops in this sad and striven land.

It is no coincidence that Pavelić's lieutenant Srečko Rover – whose roles in the brutal atrocities in and around Sarajevo during World War II and in the British intelligence terrorist networks of the late 1940s are documented in Chapter Six of this book – has given Tudjman's government specialist advice on how to conduct a good massacre. Nor is it a coincidence that Rover, and his Ustashi comrades who were smuggled down the Vatican Ratlines to Argentina, America, Canada, Australia, and Britain, trained a new generation of Western-educated Croatian war criminals who left their adopted countries to slaughter Serbs and Muslims in the 1990s Balkans wars.

We hope that in some small way, this book may teach our children a different lesson. Sooner or later, all secret crimes pass into the public domain and are judged before the bar of history. No matter how great the wealth, or influential their access to the press, those who lie about history are exposed. Sooner or later, the truth emerges, even from the darkest corners of the intelligence vaults. Except, it seems, from the voluminous holdings in the Vatican's vaults.

In an era when the unthinkable has happened, and the Kremlin's secrets have finally been revealed in the Gorbachev and Yeltsin eras, the last secrets of the twentieth century lie buried inside the Holy See. When we first researched this book, several senior Catholic historians in Rome commented that the current Pope, John Paul II, was considered a radical because he had advanced the open period of the Vatican's Secret Archives from 1891 to 1922. Perhaps they did not fully realize the irony of their comments.

The Vatican's cover-up, however, continues into the 1990s. In September 1997, the Simon Wiesenthal Center had a personal interview with Pope John Paul II and requested that the Vatican's Secret Archives on this period of history be opened up for public scrutiny. The venue was the annual conference of the International Committee of Christians and Jews held in Rome. The Wiesenthal Center's European Director told Monsignor Remy Höchman, Secretary General of the Pope's Committee on Relations with Judaism, that 'in light of a rumor mill going around about the Vatican assisting war criminals, we would appreciate a decision to open its archives'.

It is a sad commentary that fifty years after the amoral events recorded in this book – and long after the publication of the substantial evidence that indicts the Holy See – Monsignor Höchman replied that the Vatican 'will not address the issue; it is out of the question'.[2]

A few months later the Vatican announced that it would finally open the files of the infamous Inquisition, over five hundred years after the cruel events which saw so many innocents suffer at the hands of the Church. It seems that Pope Pius's secrets from the Nazi era are also so painful, and so damaging, for the 'Princes of the Catholic Church' that, like the files of the Inquisition, the records must remain buried long after the truth has been so comprehensively documented in this, the most definitive history thus far of the Vatican's Ratlines.

The Vatican's determination to hide this aspect of Church history was illustrated by the document on the Nazi era issued in Rome by Australian-born Cardinal Edward Clancy in March 1998. 'We Remember: A Reflection on the Shoah' is a ten-page document which took the Church a decade to prepare. While it is the nearest thing yet to a statement of the Church's responsibility for Jewish suffering, it is notable for its silence on the Vatican's Ratlines which were set up to help the guilty mass murderers evade justice.

Not surprisingly, it has nothing at all to say about the Vatican's decision to invest in the Third Reich in the 1930s, nor about the extraordinary lengths the Church went to in order to recover its fortune from the ashes of the Third Reich. Nor does it address the Church's role in putting the Vatican Bank at the disposal of the Nazis and their many Western investors so they could illegally transfer their wealth – much of it stolen from the victims – out of Europe and into the safe hands of the Nazi diaspora in Juan and Evita Perón's Argentina.

We had hoped that this work would serve as a road map for other historians, and we have not been disappointed. In April 1998, the Jewish researchers of Buenos Aires released a two-volume set of documents taken from Argentina's hitherto secret immigration files. These records reveal what the Vatican has tried to conceal for a half century.

Buried in the Argentine official records is dramatic proof that the story we relate here is accurate in all major points. The Argentine files are replete with the evidence of the felonies of Father Draganović, Ante Pavelić, and Ferdinand Durčansky, whose names appear in detail in the following pages. With independent confirmation from Buenos Aires, there can be no doubt that what we have written is the truth.

As we finished updating this book in March and April 1998 two international media groups undertook their own research and confirmed what we had already documented seven years earlier. Working independently, the BBC and the US News and World Report reached the same conclusions about the Vatican's Ratlines and the central role played by the Argentine government of Juan and Evita Perón in the illegal emigration of thousands of Nazi fugitives out of Europe.[3]

No matter what the Vatican does to deny and cover up its role, the truth keeps coming out: the Vatican-Argentine connection can no longer be disputed. For fugitive Nazis, all roads had indeed led to Rome.

PART ONE

The Church's War Against Communism

A Spectre Was Haunting Europe

No one can trace with precision the psychological roots of either heroic or tragic decisions, but the disasters that befell the Vatican after World War II may have sprung in part from one man's obsession. Thirty years before the Cold War, in May 1919, a Catholic priest was violently threatened in Germany. It happened on the last day of an abortive Communist uprising . . .

The fighting had raged all through the day as the remnants of the Red forces clung desperately to key positions around Munich's Palace of Justice and at the railway station. The ragged gunfire punctuated the death cries of the revolutionaries. The White troops, bearing their blue and white flag aloft and wearing fir twigs on their steel helmets, slowly but surely dislodged Munich's short-lived Soviet government.

May Day 1919 was a time of blood and madness. The anti-Communist troops wanted revenge for the ten hostages shot by the Communists the day before. The Whites took their vengeance in the brutal killing of some 300 Red Spartacists. In those chaotic last hours, another war – the long cold war of the Catholic Church – was perhaps also beginning.

As the Whites advanced into the city, the Papal Nuncio's residence was repeatedly raked in the crossfire. In the final spasm of massacre and retreat, the 'civilised' rules of war were abandoned as each side hunted for one last target of revenge. The priest could hear the mob coming; it was coming for him.

The Reds entered his extra-territorial compound and clattered up the stairs. The Nuncio 'insisted on facing them alone', dressed in his Bishop's robes. He coldly berated them, and in response they menacingly pointed their weapons at his head. It was one of those moments where history holds its breath.

The priest remained impassive and stared the mob down. With a quiet smile he said, 'It's never wise to kill a diplomat'. The Spartacists were dumbstruck, and left soon after in the Nuncio's car. As one historian later recorded, by 'impressing them with his dignified, decisive and immovable protest he forced them to withdraw without daring to commit violence. It was a magnificent victory.'[1]

By mid-afternoon the victory was complete. The Pope's representative emerged from his bullet-scarred residence and angrily denounced the Reds' 'bestial hostage murder'. Despite his calm demeanour, the incident was a 'genuine shock to his system'.[2]

The Papal Nuncio was Eugenio Pacelli, who later became Pope Pius XII. For the rest of his life, he never forgot the moment that the Reds held a gun to his head. That memory became the Pope's recurring nightmare. Pacelli's 'private doctor recounted later that the Pope often relived it in his dreams even when he was nearly eighty'.[3] Some historians trace Pacelli's silence towards Hitler to that May Day in Munich:

> Pius XII's acquiescence in Nazi misdeeds during the Second World War . . . can be traced back to that year when the Pope – as nuncio Pacelli – had an encounter with Soviet rule that turned him into an inflexible anti-Communist for the rest of his life.[4]

There is only circumstantial evidence to support the obsession theory. While publicly denouncing the Reds' murder of the ten hostages in 1919, the Nuncio ignored the 300 prisoners massacred by the Whites. A pattern of selective condemnation had begun that later appeared to many to be echoed by the Pope's silence concerning Hitler's atrocities and his strident denunciations of Stalin.

One historian maintains that Pius XII's vocal condemnation of Communist atrocities after the war can also be traced to Munich, claiming that 'it acted on him as a stimulant rather than a depressant, and many of his challenges to the Communists after the Second World War were inspired subconsciously by that remote incident'.[5]

Eugenio Pacelli was not the only priest to have experienced Bolshevik terror first-hand, nor was he the only future Pope who became an inflexible anti-Communist as a result. One year after the attack on Pacelli, the Papal Nuncio in Warsaw also witnessed Communist methods during the Russo-Polish war. Like Pacelli in

Munich, the Nuncio in Poland had personal experience of 'the anti-religious policy of the Moscow Government [which] inspired in him an abiding hatred of Bolshevism' and 'a conviction of its danger to a Christian Europe'.[6]

In 1922 the Papal Nuncio in Poland succeeded Pope Benedict XV, and took for himself the name of Pius XI. He was not a man to over-react to danger. The new Pope favoured a slow, balanced approach, 'patiently hoping to reach a practical understanding with the Bolshevik regime . . . to secure a measure of protection for Catholics in the exercise of their religion'.[7]

In October 1925 Pius XI sent a senior Jesuit to the Soviet Union to study the religious situation. His report 'was gloomy in the extreme', as he found the Orthodox Church 'hopelessly divided' and the Catholics 'suffering from a complete absence of bishops and acute shortage of priests'.[8]

But none the less Pius XI was still optimistic in 1925, and confident that Communism was corrupt and transitory. The inevitable collapse of Soviet rule in Russia would give the Vatican the long hoped for opportunity to bring the Orthodox schismatics back into Rome's fold. Therefore, 'quiet but thorough preparations [were] continually being made in Rome' for eventual missionary work in the East. The Pope himself had 'acquired a large piece of land in Rome in which [would] be erected a Russian seminary for the training of priests, chosen from the exiled clergy'.[9]

A few months later a British diplomat reported that while the Soviet situation 'filled him with despair', the Pope was certain that 'Providence' would soon provide a man 'capable of stirring the sluggish minds of the Russian peasants to action and with the capacity and courage to lead them to a better state of things'.[10] Providence had already delivered Lenin's death, but the outlook was far bleaker under Stalin.

Pius XI frequently preached of 'the licence and anarchy to which Liberalism and Socialism lead society', and of the need to resist 'the disruptive influences of Bolshevism'. As Stalin's campaign of religious persecution became more severe, he responded with explicit denunciations of 'a page of history dark with persecution and atrocities inconceivable in this 20th century'.[11]

The Pope frequently drew attention to the plight of the Church under Communism, where '[p]riests and nuns were daily facing death and worse than death in the territories of the Soviet Republic unobtrusively preaching the Word of God, ministering to the sick and dying, and bringing comfort to countless homes where all hope of better things had perished'.[12]

These denunciations remained in the background during the 1920s while Nuncio Pacelli negotiated with Soviet officials in Berlin, hoping for a Concordat, or at least a bilateral agreement. As the 1930s opened, Pius XI apparently concluded that there was no hope of an understanding and launched a strident public campaign against the atheistic foe.[13]

The bitter truth was that there was little Pius XI could do. As Stalin once asked with derision, 'how many divisions does the Pope have?' There was once a time when he could have answered, 'All the armies of Europe.' In its first thousand years, the Church grew from a tiny, underground cult into a vast, multinational power. As one Catholic historian has put it, the Pope 'examined the claims of candidates to the Imperial crown, organised the crusade against the Albigensian Heresy, deposed the King of England, John Lackland; he established around St Peter's throne a ring of vassal monarchies'.[14]

After the bloody Crusades of the Middle Ages, the Popes assumed many of the characteristics of Kings. Entire Italian provinces were politically incorporated into the Papal States. Citizens owed allegiance and paid taxes to the Bishop of Rome. But the traumas of the Reformation and the Napoleonic Wars signalled the gradual erosion of the Pope's earthly powers. By the middle of the nineteenth century, inexorable political, social and cultural processes sapped, and then overwhelmed, the Vatican's political power.

The unification of Italy, confiscation of Church lands, and the Pope's confinement to the few square miles of St Peter's symbolised the loss of temporal power. By the time of Pius XI's election, the world had long since outgrown its need for Emperor Popes. In many ways, this was the inevitable outcome of the onset of modernity and the consequent rise of democracy, anti-clericalism, liberalism, socialism and Communism. As a result, by the end of the nineteenth century it was widely believed to be 'anachronistic that the Popes should play a civil political role in the modern international community of Europe'.[15]

Instead of dealing with the changing times, the previous Popes had retreated inside the Vatican's walls. Catholicism began to stagnate under a heavy load of isolationism, conservatism and increasing rigidity. This was caused in no small part by a destructive election policy that excluded all but Italians from the Papacy by stacking the votes in the College of Cardinals. For several hundred years, the Universal Catholic Church had been virtually dominated by the Italian clergy.

The world was changing rapidly, and for the worse. Even in heavily Catholic Italy, old traditions of obedience to the clergy were gone and new doctrines were rising in their place. Mussolini's Fascist government had taken over Italy, and was enthusiastically welcomed by some rank and file Catholics. In addition to the growth of Fascism in Italy and the rise of Communism in Russia, the Holy See was concerned with the increasing influence of secularisation, materialism and even the spread of Democracy. Pius XI believed that this latter form of government, 'based on almost universal franchise, had grave defects' because it allowed even a common 'porter' to govern a democratic nation.[16]

These new doctrines were even more disturbing after the collapse of the old order in Central Europe. Traditionally, the Vatican had looked to the Habsburg rulers of the Austro-Hungarian Empire for the protection of Catholicism in Central Europe. The Habsburg dynasty was the Vatican's military bulwark between Protestant Prussia and Orthodox Russia.

The dismembering of the Austro-Hungarian Empire at the end of World War I was yet another major catastrophe for the Holy See. The long serving Secretary of State, Cardinal Pietro Gasparri, considered the resultant creation of a number of small, independent states to be 'extremely unfortunate'. In his view, 'the new Czechoslovakia was so nationally heterogeneous and so geographically anomalous as to be unstable and likely to raise grave difficulties. His view of probable developments in a Serbian-dominated Yugoslavia was the same.'[17]

The collapse of a stable Catholic Central European Empire was a major blow to the Vatican's historic conception of the proper order. The new nations emphasised secularisation, and rejected the ancient concept that their citizens owed a dual allegiance to Church and State. The Vatican viewed these changes with alarm:

> With the break-down of this dual allegiance and the emergence of the omnicompetent secular State, tending in the direction of totalitarianism,

> the Catholic Church held that disastrous results had followed. The secularization of European society and its indifference to the Christian moral law in politics and economics, had led to the laisser faire economy (the tyranny of the astute); and that in turn to collectivist democracy (the tyranny of the supposed will of the majority); that had then been followed by war conducted between whole nations, which had given rise to totalitarianism (the tyranny of armed and unscrupulous gangs).[18]

The greatest totalitarian threat the Vatican faced still came from socialism, especially the brand advocated by the disciplined and well organised international Communist movement. By the end of the 1920s, the spread of 'atheistic Bolshevism' had made it even more imperative for the Vatican to settle its political status and stabilise its base of operations in Rome.

As a former diplomat, Pius XI understood the reality of modern times, and opened discussions to resolve the Vatican's political relationship with the Italian government. Since 1870, his predecessors had steadfastly refused to accept the loss of the Papal States to Italy and had chosen to remain prisoners in the Vatican. Pius XI offered to relinquish his claims to temporal power over the former provinces in return for permanent recognition of the sovereign status of Vatican City.

Pius XI never liked, let alone accepted, Fascism, declaring that 'no Catholic could be a genuine convinced Fascist'.[19] However, an uncomfortable accommodation with Mussolini was reached to end the Church's stagnation. In February 1929 the Lateran Treaty was concluded, settling the so-called 'Roman Question'.

All that remained of the Papal States as a result were the few square miles of Vatican City, together with some extra-territorial colleges and institutes in Rome itself. In effect, Pius XI ruled a tiny nation completely surrounded by Mussolini's Fascist state. However small his kingdom, Vatican City was finally recognised as the Pope's sovereign territory, complete with its own border security (the medieval Swiss Guards), banks, postal service, diplomats and legal system.

The Lateran Treaty was a realistic admission that the twentieth century had no place for the ancient status of the Popes as political leaders. But the loss of the Papal States had brought about a major change in the Holy See's orientation. From Leo XIII in the late 1870s, the Popes of Rome increasingly sought 'a supra-national world moral authority'.

Taking a far greater interest in issues of social justice and the rights of workers (for example, Leo XIII's seminal 'Labour' Encyclical, Rerum Novarum), and in wider questions, like world peace, the Holy See tried to establish itself as a moral force against the iniquities of the modern world. The Popes were becoming diplomats for peace. The Lateran Treaty contained the essentials of this modern, supra-national moral position. In Article 24, the Vatican declared that > it desires to remain and will remain outside the temporal competitions between other States and international Congresses summoned for such an object, unless the contending parties make a unanimous appeal to its mission of peace, in all cases reserving to itself the right to assert its moral and spiritual power.[20]

After the 1929 Lateran Treaty with Mussolini and the 1933 Concordat with Hitler, Pius XI used the Church's enhanced diplomatic status as a springboard for its modern moral mission. Under the protection of sovereignty, condemnations of right-wing totalitarianism continued to issue from the Vatican. The strongest denunciations, however, were reserved for the left, particularly atheistic Communism.

As the 1930s opened, the Vatican began to come to terms with the fact that Bolshevik rule was proving more enduring than first expected. Pius XI's public statements on religious repression became more frequent and more strident, expressing 'horror and emotion over the acts of persecution and sacrilege that were being perpetrated in Russia', protesting at 'the ill-treatment and imprisonment of the Catholic clergy, including three bishops, two of Latin and one of Byzantine Rite, and against the activities of the anti-God League.'[21]

Increasingly the Church's pronouncements spoke of the 'Bolshevik Yoke' imposed by Stalin on his people. Communist principles were denounced by the Pope, effectively making it a practical impossibility for any Catholic to simultaneously be a Communist. At the same time, he condemned the increasing materialism of the age, exhorting his flock 'to return to a simpler and less ease-loving life'.[22]

At first the British Foreign Office perceived a definite lack of balance in Pius XI's concern with Communism's threat. They believed that his 'experience as Nuncio in Warsaw increased his natural hatred of Bolshevism to such an extent that it blinded him to the scarcely lesser dangers of Fascism and Nazism'. For much of the 1930s the British actually thought he was dangerously in Mussolini's pocket.[23]

But in March 1937, that view altered dramatically, when the Pope issued his famous Encyclical, Mit brennender Sorge, sharply attacking aspects of Nazi ideology and rule. It was smuggled into Germany and read from pulpits all over the country. In particular it denounced the many breaches of the 1933 Concordat negotiated by the Pope's Secretary of State, Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli. The Nazis' encouragement of anti-Christian doctrines, and their racist ideology and policies were also highlighted by Pius XI. 'Whoever gives the idea of race or people or state or form of government a value beyond that of the ordinary world and claims to make idols out of them, violates the divine order of things,' Pius XI declared, although he did not specifically mention Nazi attacks on Germany's Jews.[24]

The Pope had carefully prepared the ground for his anti-Nazi stand. Two weeks earlier he had issued another Encyclical, Divini Redemptoris, in which he declared that Communism 'is intrinsically wrong and no one who would save Christian civilization may collaborate with it in any field whatsoever'.[25] The British, though, believed that Mit brennender Sorge was an important turning point in Vatican policy. With almost none of its previous temporal might, the Vatican could do little but be a moral standard bearer, but Pius XI, unlike his successor, Pacelli, waved the banner well:

> Not only did His Holiness courageously assert the rights of catholicism against the attacks of international communism and German national socialism, but, in a world distracted by ideological controversies between dictatorships and democracies, capitalism and communism, abstract international ideals and concrete nationalist ambitions, he proclaimed the Church's neutrality as regards political systems and national differences, and reiterated and emphasised her unwavering support of the principles of social justice and international morality.[26]

As Pius XI edged towards death, his public statements became even more markedly anti-Nazi. One British diplomat noted that 'Nazi Germany has taken the place of Communism as the Church's most dangerous enemy'. A few days before he died in February 1939, Pius XI prepared a final speech to give to the Italian Bishops. In the most 'vigorous and caustic' language, he was ready to issue a stinging denunciation of Nazism and Fascism. The Pontiff, unfortunately, departed earth without ever delivering it.[27]

In his recent study of British–Vatican relations during this period, Owen Chadwick argues that in 'February 1939 it mattered more to the Powers who the new Pope was than at any election since the earlier nineteenth century'. The British and French hoped for a successor who would continue Pius XI's outspoken policies, especially his 'ideals of peace and justice, [and] his denunciation of racialism'. They wanted a Pope who would continue to preach with Pius XI's boldness against the Nazi menace.[28]

Naturally, Hitler and Mussolini hoped for the converse, for a Pope who would at least remain neutral in their struggle with Britain and France. Yet, as Chadwick shows in great detail, all sides supported Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli's elevation. Nearly every major player on the world stage, from very different perspectives and conflicting interests, saw Pacelli as the man most likely to serve their cause.[29]

Pacelli came from a prominent, aristocratic Roman family which had been influential in the Vatican since the early years of the nineteenth century. He could have chosen almost any career, but pursued the calling of the Church and was ordained in 1899. Although he wanted a pastoral career, he was rapidly inducted into the Holy See's Secretariat of State (the Vatican's Foreign Affairs Ministry) in 1901. He soon made a name for himself as a consummate Vatican diplomat, serving with such distinction that he was made titular Archbishop of Sardes. Prior to his posting in Munich, Pacelli had already risen to the senior levels of the Holy See's Secretariat of State, becoming Under Secretary for Extraordinary Affairs in 1914 at the age of thirty-eight.[30]

This section was in effect the Vatican's 'political organ' and administered the Holy See's relations with foreign governments, including negotiating Concordats. The Secretariat's other section, Ordinary Affairs, issued relief, alms and subsidies, and gave advice to Catholic Action throughout the world, thus influencing 'the internal politics of other countries'.[31]

After his heroic stand at Munich, Pacelli was appointed Papal Nuncio to Germany, and was responsible for negotiating Concordats with both Bavaria and Prussia. In 1929 he was made a Cardinal and the following year Pius XI appointed him Secretary of State. Described by a British diplomat as a 'man of impressively saintly character', a 'fine preacher, a man of great piety, intelligence and unusual personal charm', Eugenio Pacelli also played a major role in bringing about the Vatican's 1933 Concordat with Hitler's Germany.[32]

Two decades after his traumatic encounter in Munich, Cardinal Pacelli was lifted by his peers into the most exalted position of all, assuming the title of Pope just as the world was bracing itself for another World War. On 2 March 1939, his sixty-third birthday, Pacelli adopted the name of Pius XII. Some saw great significance in this, claiming that the new Pope thus declared his intention to continue his predecessor's anti-Nazi policies.

It is instructive to compare and contrast the decisions of Pius XI and Pius XII during their time on St Peter's Throne. The two former Nuncios had more in common than their Papal names. Both were diplomatic activists determined to resist the encroachments of Communism and re-unite the splintered Christian churches under the authority of the Vatican. In some ways, the Vatican's Cold War strategy evolved from the pre-war experiences of Pius XI. In other respects, Pius XII's policy was a radical departure from his predecessor.

In fairness, the differences between the two approaches arose less from their personalities than from the varying degree to which the Church itself was threatened by the evolution of Communism. Both were leaders of the Church in crisis, but their reactions were very different. For Pius XII, Communism was the all-consuming enemy because it posed a clear and immediate threat to the very survival of the Church. For Pius XI, Communism was but one of many pre-war threats. The danger was real, but still remote. Where Pius XI acted from a sense of immediacy about the Nazis, Pius XII adopted a more understated, diplomatic role. Certainly, Pius XI's outspokenness against Nazism's threat was all but absent from his successor's public stance. Following the outbreak of hostilities in September, Pius XII's policies, attitudes and actions pleased none of the combatants.

Pius XII's first decision was to consign his predecessor's undelivered denunciation of Nazism to the oblivion of the Vatican Secret Archives, where it remained for twenty years until John XXIII released extracts in 1959.[33] The controversy about Pius XII's policies during World War II is well known; readers may judge for themselves from the many scholarly texts which explore the evidence.[34]

On the one hand, the critics accuse Pius XII of having abrogated his moral and charitable roles during the war, of remaining silent when faced with the most urgent imperative to speak out against the massacre of millions of innocents. They believe that he should have spoken out with unequivocal moral force, instead of moderating and even masking his messages of sympathy and solidarity with the persecuted. Further, the Bishops of Europe could have been ordered to take more effective actions to discourage the atrocities, and provide greater moral and material assistance. Might not many of the dead have survived if the Pope had put the full weight of the Church's not inconsiderable resources into the anti-Nazi struggle?

On the other side, the Church has very ably defended itself from such attacks, arguing that the Pope did everything possible, under the prevailing conditions. Virtually surrounded by enemies in the tiny state of Vatican City, first by Mussolini's Fascists then by Hitler's Army, Pius XII could do little more than pursue a quiet, diplomatic approach to the great moral issues of the day. If he had done otherwise, the entire Church might well have been destroyed, and with it the last hope for the persecuted. All he could do was rescue as many potential victims as humanly possible, and this was done to the best of the Church's ability and means.

There is undoubted merit, and much substantial evidence, to support both these contending viewpoints. The truth is probably somewhere between the two extremes. In fairness to the Vatican, however, it should be recalled that none of the major powers emerged from the Holocaust with unstained records. The Western Allies, while willing to capitalise on 'atrocity stories' in their propaganda, did virtually nothing to help the victims; in some cases they actually refused Jews safe haven.

Since the end of the war, the Catholic Church has been singled out for turning its back on the Holocaust. With hindsight, one of the reasons for Pius XII's silence was his wish to secretly support the policies of the Western governments, particularly Great Britain.

In April 1943, a conference of British and American officials formally decided that nothing should be done about the Holocaust, and 'ruled out all plans for mass rescue'. The Foreign Office and the State Department were both afraid that the Third Reich would be quite willing, indeed eager, to stop the gas chambers, empty the concentration camps, and let hundreds of thousands (if not millions) of Jewish survivors emigrate to freedom in the West. As late as 1943 the British Foreign Office 'revealed in confidence' to the State Department their fear that if approaches to Germany to release Jews were 'pressed too much that that is exactly what might happen'.[35]

The bigoted reality behind the Secret Report of the Easter 1943 Bermuda Conference was that not a single Allied nation wanted to let the Jews settle in their country. The unspoken consensus was that it was better to let Hitler handle them than arrange a mass evacuation to America, Britain, or Canada. In short, the Jews were expendable to the war effort. The Soviets, too, had a poor record on this score and, of course, were busily carrying out their own atrocities during and after the war.[36]

In fact, the Vatican's shocking silence towards the Jews was fully in accord with Western policy. This is well illustrated by an incident which occurred in 1944, just as Adolf Eichmann was preparing his last major extermination operation. Most of Hungary's 800,000 Jews had survived until the Germans installed a completely pro-Nazi government in March 1944.

An urgent plea was dispatched to the Vatican by an American delegation. Acting on behalf of the War Refugee Board, they requested Papal intervention to save the helpless victims. 'It is both timely and fitting we believe that the moral values involved and the spiritual consequences that must flow from indulgence in the persecutions and mass murder of helpless men, women and children be brought to the attention of the Hungarian authorities and people'. They pleaded that 'His Holiness may find it appropriate to express Himself on this subject to the authorities and people of Hungary, great numbers of whom profess spiritual adherence to the Holy See.'[37]

Over the following months, Hungary's Jews were rounded up and concentrated in hastily prepared ghettos, where they were horrifically maltreated. Most were then shipped off to Auschwitz and murdered. By October, their numbers had been drastically reduced, but the Americans received information that up to 300,000 survivors were about to be deported to their certain deaths. The Vatican was approached once more, and the Pope asked to broadcast a public appeal to the people and clergy of Hungary, 'urging them to temporarily conceal Jews and oppose the deportation and extermination of these people to the full extent of their powers'.[38]

Rumours that the Pope might actually do this apparently reached the British, who were alarmed lest His Holiness go too far. They instructed their Ambassador to speak to Franklin Gowen, an American diplomat at the Holy See. Gowen reported that the Ambassador 'feared the Holy Father may make a Radio appeal on behalf of Jews in Hungary and that in his appeal he may also criticise what the Russians are doing in occupied territory. [He] said something should be done to prevail upon the Pope not to do this as it would have very serious political repercussions.'[39]

Gowen was not in the least perturbed, having already learned that Pius XII had decided against making the appeal, 'because if he did so he would in fairness to all have to criticise the Russians'. Without revealing this, the American quietly persuaded his British colleague to take no action to intervene with the Vatican.[40] Apparently the diplomats knew that their leaders wanted to avoid conflict with Stalin, so Hungary's Jews were abandoned.

It is ironic that Pius XII is condemned for following Western policy in public, while his private actions may have saved more Jewish lives than all the Allied governments put together. For example, the Vatican Nuncio in Berlin protected 28,000 Jews in the heart of the Third Reich itself by cleverly insisting that the Vatican would not allow German Catholics to divorce their Jewish spouses. As long as they were married to Catholics, the Jews were safe.[41] Using similar pretexts, the Vatican temporarily delayed deportation of Jews in the Balkans and slowed implementation of the racial laws for several years. Such efforts were ultimately ineffectual as most of the pro-Nazi clerics, such as Slovakia's Monsignor Tiso, ignored the Vatican.

In countries like Italy, where the Pope had some political influence, he used it well. Largely through his personal intercession, Mussolini's forces deliberately bungled the shipment of Jews from Italian-occupied areas. The Germans were so convinced of stereotypical Italian incompetence, that they did not realise the cleverness behind the botched shipment schedules:

> In Italy . . . the deportation and murder of Jews began only after . . . the Germans became masters of the country. There were Italian priests and > monks, who like those elsewhere, went out of their way to save Jewish lives. Several thousand Jews were at one time harbored within Vatican City. The sympathies of Pope Pius XII were not outspoken, though it was known that he condemned the barbarities which were being perpetrated against the Jews.[42]

Moreover, the Vatican bank was the conduit for secret bribes to save lives. The Israeli government publicly credits the Vatican for secretly negotiating payments that ransomed thousands of Jews from Nazi custody. Pius XII was not as evil as his critics claim, nor as righteous as his defenders hope. The record is mixed to say the least. The Pope was silent in public, but helped some Jews in secret. Churchill and Roosevelt made speeches in public, but their policy was to abandon the Jews. If the Pope was a hypocrite, he was not alone.

Far from being a covert supporter of Hitler, the Holy See's secret disgust with both Nazism and Communism was well known to Western diplomats. During the war, Monsignor Domenico Tardini, Under Secretary of State for Extraordinary Affairs, conveyed voluminous memoranda to Western diplomats. He emphasised that 'Europe is faced with two great dangers; Nazism and Communism. Both are opposed to religion, to Christian civilization, to personal liberty, to peace.' That the Vatican viewed Communism as the greater of the two evils is certain, as Tardini added that:

> If even one of these evils – Communism, for example – were to remain an active force, Europe would, within a few years, be in a situation identical with that in which it finds itself today. In fact, Communism, once victorious, would find no further resistance in Continental Europe and would spread among the germanic peoples, the slav races and finally among the latins. In consequence, within the space of a few years there would be an enormous Communistic bloc, whose inevitable destiny it would be to provoke a war with England and America, regarded by the Communists as a Capitalistic bloc.[43]

In May 1943 Tardini openly predicted that 'there is ground for fearing (a) that the war will end in a preponderantly Russian victory in Europe and (b) that the result will be a rapid diffusion of Communism in a great part of continental Europe and the destruction there of European civilization and Christian culture.'[44]

Imminent Allied victory also realised Monsignor Tardini's worst fears – Soviet occupation of most of Central and Eastern Europe, and formation of a powerful Communist bloc. Previously there had even been talk of some sort of rapprochement between Moscow and the Vatican. However, as the Soviet Army advanced westwards, Moscow launched a vitriolic propaganda campaign, accusing the Holy Father of being 'pro-Fascist' and in favour of a German victory. Moscow had somehow learned of Pius XII's post-war plans for a Catholic buffer state in Central Europe, free of both German and Soviet influence. Hence their propaganda campaign to discredit the Vatican.

By February 1944, American intelligence had discovered the Soviets' purpose. They believed that the Soviets were very well informed of the Holy See's plans and activities, noting that the 'projects of the Vatican for the re-establishment of a Habsburg Monarchy in Central Europe and plans for the re-organization of a Catholic Federation to counteract the Soviets' religious policy, are no secret to Moscow'.[45]

US intelligence predicted that the Vatican would try to exclude America from Central Europe as well. Confirmation came from a senior SS intelligence officer debriefed by the Americans after the war. Albert Hartl left the Catholic priesthood in 1934, and the following year became Chief of Church Information in the notorious Reich Security Main Office (RSHA), with the rank of SS Major.

Hartl was, in fact, the Nazis' specialist in Catholic religious matters.[46] During the war he wrote numerous 'reports concerning political and religious trends outside Germany'. The SS officer was also sent to Rome on an especially sensitive mission in 1944 'to establish contact through the Vatican with the Western powers'. He was to convince the West to break with Stalin, 'and join with [Germany] against the Bolsheviks'. Hartl's senior position in German intelligence certainly gave him access to top secret information, as he told the Americans:

> When the Vatican realized that the United States and the Soviet Union would be victorious in the Second World War, it started immediately to form a bloc of Western European nations to effect a counter-balance to these two countries. France, 'the most beloved daughter of the Catholic Church', was to take the leading part . . . Therefore, the Vatican turned its sympathies away from the Vichy government and toward the Free French under De Gaulle . . .
> At the same time, the Vatican hopes to create a similar unity among the powers of Eastern Europe. This bloc was initiated by de Gasperi . . . later Premier of Italy. De Gasperi, by means of this bloc, sought to increase not > only the influence of the Vatican, but also that of Italy. The plan was quickly supported by other Vatican dignitaries – among them were Archbishops Tardini and Montini, Bishop Hudal, and the Bishops of Gorizia and of Ljubljana.[47]

As we shall see, this tiny but highly influential cabal around Pius XII indeed favoured this secret policy. The two men most closely involved were Alcide de Gasperi, post-war leader of the Italian Christian Democrat party, and Monsignor Giovanni Montini, the Pope's Under Secretary of State for Ordinary Affairs since 1937.

Like Pius XII, Montini came from a well-to-do Catholic family with good connections to powerful figures at the Vatican. He, too, had pursued a brilliant career in the Secretariat of State, and established close relations with lay Italian Catholic political leaders. US intelligence described Montini as one of 'the most authoritative persons in the Vatican', who 'for many years has been among the important personalities in the Vatican Secretaryship of State'. It can hardly be alleged that Montini formulated policy without Pius XII's knowledge. Following Cardinal Maglione's death in August 1944, the Pope did not fill the Secretary of State position, effectively re-assuming the role himself.

Although the Pope formulated his own foreign policy, Montini and the other Under Secretary of State, Monsignor Tardini, were certainly among 'the most influential people of the Vatican'.[48] Both were in constant, daily personal contact with Pius XII, with whom Montini in particular enjoyed a 'special confidence' and 'a certain affinity of temperament'.

Their personal relationship was certainly close, but it extended into matters of high policy. In practice, Montini was Pius XII's personal assistant; he gave Montini 'particularly delicate and difficult tasks to perform'. During the war Pius asked Montini to organise the Vatican Information Service, whose ostensible task was to trace missing persons, refugees and prisoners of war. But US intelligence suspected that its role went far beyond humanitarian purposes.

Pius XII also asked Montini 'to supervise Vatican efforts for the resettlement of the millions of refugees and displaced persons who swarmed into Western Germany, Austria, Italy, and France' after the war. Further, as one of the Holy See's finest diplomats, Montini controlled foreign policy 'in regard to Italian politics'. As will be seen, each of these 'delicate and difficult tasks' brought Montini into the centre of the Pope's clandestine activities.[49]

Montini deservedly has a reputation as an anti-Fascist and Democrat. He had a close personal and political relationship with Alcide de Gasperi, who spearheaded the post war anti-Communist fight through the Christian Democrat party. The Vatican bureaucrat and the Italian Catholic politician had begun their close working relationship during the war. According to US intelligence they spent many weekends together discussing 'important political problems', particularly the Communist threat.[50] In fact they were working on active anti-Communist plans in Central and Eastern Europe. In the fearful days that followed Stalin's occupation of these regions, the two men forged even closer bonds.

It was probably not surprising, then, that the Americans concluded in 1944 that Moscow's anti-Vatican campaign 'should be considered as an attempt to serve as a serious warning to the Pope to refrain from any interference in problems affecting Catholic citizens' in areas occupied by the Red Army. Ominously, they also predicted that if Pius XII did not heed this threat, 'Moscow may have recourse to an anti-clerical movement among Soviet citizens of the Catholic creed'.[51]

The war had no sooner ended than this analysis was proved correct. New battle lines were immediately drawn, this time between the Soviets and their new satellites, and the Western democracies. It was a shattering blow to Pius XII, who became 'more than ever oppressed by the Communist menace in Europe i.e. [the] combination of atheistical materialism and Russian imperialism'.[52]

Where the Vatican was publicly silent towards Soviet and German atrocities during the war, Pius XII reversed his own policy in 1945 and decided that now the Church's voice had to be raised against Stalin's crimes. Montini was thrown into the fray, providing detailed reports to the Western powers on conditions in the Soviet zone of Berlin. They were replete with stories of confiscations, deportations, the proliferation of abortions as a result of widespread rape by Soviet troops, disease, deprivation and deliberate starvation.[53]

It was a scene of horror which the Vatican reported from every country under Soviet occupation. In Hungary, the Soviet troops > under the eyes of their own officers and other civil authorities, who almost always remained passive, gave themselves over to unbridled sacking of private houses, sparing not even the Bishop's palace and the rectories, and putting to death not a few of the civil population. Even the Apostolic Nunciature was invaded and completely sacked, in spite of the protests of His Excellency the Nuncio. Women from ten years of age to seventy, not excluding religious women (about twenty) were raped . . . Bishop Apor of Györ was killed by a Russian soldier, while defending the honor and the life of the Faithful . . . Bishop de Mikes died from apoplexy, which was the effect of the sufferings inflicted on him by Russian soldiers. Many priests lost their lives while defending their people from similar outrages.[54]

By 1950 the Vatican had gathered enough intelligence to show that the same situation, to one degree or another, existed in all the other countries where the Communists had effective control – Albania, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria, Romania, the Baltic States, Yugoslavia, eastern Germany and Poland. In newly acquired Catholic areas of the Ukraine, the hybrid Uniate Church was forcibly disbanded and united with the Communist-controlled Orthodox Church. Hundreds of priests were arrested or deported.[55]

As news from behind the 'Iron Curtain' filtered into the Holy See from 'reliable confidential channels',[56] the Vatican increased their criticism. In return, the Soviets stepped up their barrage against Pius XII. One British report summarised Moscow's propaganda thus:

> The Pope is charged with being a reactionary, a supporter and protector of Hitler and the Nazis and of Mussolini and the Fascists . . . an enemy of democracy . . . an opponent of reforms benefiting the masses, but a champion of the vested interests of the privileged classes. He is accused of intervening in political life and, in general, of plotting to restore Fascist tyranny and to rob the progressive democracies of their newly-won . . . liberties. He is also denounced as an ally of Anglo-Saxon capitalistic imperialism.[57]

To bolster such claims, prominent clerics, including Cardinal Mindszenty of Hungary and Archbishop Stepinac of Croatia, were arrested, tried and imprisoned on basically trumped up charges. It was hardly surprising, then, that the British Ambassador's 1945 Annual Report noted that, with 'the eclipse of nazism and the passing of the persecution of the Church in Germany and German-occupied territory, bolshevism, with its worldwide Communist satellite organisation, automatically regained its former position as the Church's Enemy No 1'. The Vatican was 'engaged in a life-and-death struggle for survival'.[58]

The bureaucrats at the Foreign Office in London noted with satisfaction that the Vatican had apparently returned to form and was raising a long-term moral struggle against the evils of Stalinism. 'Believing that . . . the ultimate triumph of the Church is sure, the Vatican tends to take longer views than do secular governments . . . As is often said "The Church is eternal and can afford to wait".'[59]

There were clues that the Vatican was in fact pursuing a more immediate anti-Communist strategy. The British had discerned at least one unexpected post-war trend. They noted that Communist propaganda was increasingly linking the Vatican with Nazism and Fascism. The British admitted that it was 'a score on which the papacy is unfortunately slightly vulnerable in view of its attitude towards many men, who are or were virtually war criminals'.[60]

The Americans also received clues that the Church's strategy of patient resistance to Communism was being scrapped. In September 1946, Franklin Gowen reported that an extremely gloomy mood prevailed in the Vatican. According to Cardinal Tisserant, the 'outstanding Vatican authority on Russian affairs', a new war was imminent. 'Russia [was] now obviously in [a] favorable position to over-run Western Europe gearing Germany and Communist organizations to her war machine.'[61]

Between the Holy Years of 1925 and 1950, the enormous growth of Communism was threatening the survival of the Church. Persecution abounded in 1925, but a quarter of a century later had reached unparalleled levels. Pius XII must have reflected bitterly on the setbacks suffered by the Church over the previous century. First had come the rise of Italian nationalism, culminating in loss of the Church's lands. Then, in the aftermath of World War I, the Holy See had witnessed the destruction of the Catholic Central European Empire, and Bolshevism's first victory in Russia. Worse, Hitler's maniacal policies had awakened the Communist colossus which now controlled the beloved Catholic nations of Central Europe.

Which of the Pope's three crowns would Pius XII wear to meet the latest menace? At least the first crown remained undiminished. This signifies that the Pope is the spiritual head of the world wide Church, the 'Vicar of Christ' on earth and successor to St Peter.

In matters of theology, Pius's interpretations bound other priests as surely as his predecessors'. But after the war, millions of Pius XII's flock were forcibly separated from his theological leadership.

The second crown, too, remained undisturbed. Pius was the Bishop of Rome, titular head of the Roman Catholic Church with its vast administrative hierarchy of priests, nuns and lay people. They were, though, no match for Stalin's armies.

However, little was left of the third crown, representing the Pope's status as a sovereign head of state, equal in rank to Presidents and Prime Ministers. But Pius XII's temporal crown was in fact a pale reflection of its once mighty self. He had no armies to command, only diplomats and their fellow travellers. In the Church's life and death struggle against Communism, the Pope opted for espionage and all that went with it. Before the end of World War II, the diplomatic cabal around the Pope had recruited agents for the next, and final war with Communism.

The genesis of these activities can probably be traced to the Pope's request to Montini to organise the Vatican Information Service. The American Army had observed the suspicious activities of this humanitarian agency as early as March 1944, noting that it had been 'organized for handling welfare messages by radio to and from prisoners of war in North Africa'. The Americans believed that some kind of clandestine activity was taking place and ordered that no 'extension of the Vatican Information Service can be contemplated, having due regard for security consideration'.[62] If later reports can be believed, the Vatican Information Service expanded after the war into a major intelligence force.

American intelligence had been taking an active interest in the Vatican's response to the 'Red Menace' for some time. Indeed, 'high ranking Allied intelligence officers' were reportedly in 'close relations with high Vatican dignitaries' well before the Nazi collapse.[63] In October 1945 the Americans noted 'the preponderant influence which the Jesuit fathers, who always present concrete and well-reasoned projects, tend to exercize at the Curia'. According to their source, the Jesuits were leading the Holy See's struggle with Moscow, and the > one positive step so far taken by the Vatican has been the organization of a penetration program; especially resourceful personnel is being sent into the area to lead the catholic elements and through their zeal and example keep these elements from wavering. Most of these agents are Jesuits.[64]

In late 1947, US intelligence received completely fantastic reports of Vatican involvement in clandestine anti-Communist operations. Jack Neal, head of the State Department's Division of Foreign Activity Correlation (a top secret intelligence group with the US Foreign Service), addressed a memo to FBI director J. Edgar Hoover, the chief of Naval intelligence and American diplomats at the Holy See:

> . . . source which is considered most reliable has reported that the Vatican Information Service, with Headquarters in Vatican City, is the international espionage service of the Vatican.
> The same source reports that during and after the last war, Russian Army deserters organized clandestinely in Germany and Austria. Shortly after VE Day, this group was rumored to consist of several million people . . . It seems, moreover, that the Vatican decided to make use of this clandestine organization, and reportedly has already spent millions of dollars toward this end, possibly through the above-mentioned Information Service.
>
> Most of the deserters are said to be Estonians, Lithuanians, Czechs, and other nationals of predominantly Catholic background, who were forcefully inducted into the Russian Army during the war.
>
> The Vatican is said to be presently organizing these men within the respective countries in which they are located, and reportedly is also planning to send to those countries in the future additional man-power, under the guise of displaced persons or immigrants. These groups allegedly are being organized in the various countries under the name of the Christian Front . . . A primary prerequisite towards admission consists of each member taking an oath of allegiance to the Church, which entails loyalty to the latter over and above the prospective member's national allegiance. It is, of course, possible that individuals who join this organization are primarily interested in fighting Soviet Communism, and the Red Army in particular . . .
> It is stated that since the Vatican is convinced that a Soviet invasion of Central and Western Europe is inevitable, it considers this recruiting and support of a clandestine buffer contingent a justifiable measure of self-defense and self-preservation.[68]

In hindsight, it is clear that few believed the Vatican had abandoned its patient resistance policy and launched a covert war. Such reports were promptly discarded as outlandish exaggeration. How could such a grand enterprise have hitherto gone undetected? Where would the Vatican find the resources for such an immense scheme, particularly as much of its wealth was in fixed assets?

An American diplomat at the Holy See cautioned that 'reports of the Vatican spending "millions of dollars," on para-military organizations should be treated with considerable reserve'. He outlined the moral and practical impediments to their involvement, citing the views of a 'highly placed Jesuit priest whose name has been linked with confidential information services'. His Jesuit informant knew nothing of the 'Christian Front', although on 'one occasion he professed to have a vague recollection of such anti-Communist groups in East Prussia and the Baltic countries. He believed, however, that they had been heavily penetrated by Russian agents.'[66]

Despite these overblown claims, there were grains of truth to some of the intelligence reaching Western agencies. As we shall see, the same group of senior Vatican officials who supported the Central European programme was also directing clandestine anti-Communist operations in this area. To say that its efforts led to disaster would be an understatement. The tiny cabal of right-wing officials around Pius XII was co-ordinating that most secret and most shameful operation in Vatican history: they were recruiting ex-Nazis to fight the Communists for control of Central and Eastern Europe.

Later, after American intelligence had staged a burglary at the centre of the Vatican's Nazi smuggling network, bugged its code room and recruited their own informants, it was discovered that many of the worst rumours were true. Some of the Vatican's anti-Communist recruits were notorious Nazi war criminals. A few Church officials were laundering stolen Nazi treasure to finance their 'freedom fighters'. Although it was not discovered until much, much later, Communist agents had in fact penetrated their command structure from top to bottom. The Vatican's 'anti-Communist' networks were secretly manipulated from Moscow. Some of the Vatican's Nazis were really spies for the Kremlin.

In the beginning, the Vatican's involvement with Nazi fugitives was disorganised, even amateurish. The first priest who ran the operation was Bishop Alois Hudal. As already seen, Hudal had been closely associated with Montini and de Gasperi in formulating the Holy See's response to the expected Allied victory. Now his job was to rescue as many Nazis as possible from what he believed was 'Allied vengeance', a task he grasped with considerable enthusiasm. Pius XII's nightmares were only beginning, as Hudal's wildly erratic operations led the Vatican on the first steps down the road to the Ratlines, and tragedy.

Bishop Hudal and the First Wave

The Vatican's road to disaster was paved with good intentions. The scandal of the Ratlines actually began innocently enough. At war's end the Western-occupied zones of Germany, Austria and Italy were teeming with millions of DPs – Displaced Persons from all parts of Europe. Most were legitimate victims of Nazism and Communism. They were the uprooted who had left their homes not through choice, but as a direct consequence of the war. Most could not return home because of Stalin's brutal occupation of Central and Eastern Europe.

Many were Catholics, and it was not surprising that the Vatican took up their cause with the Western military authorities. Months before the Third Reich disintegrated, the Holy See's Secretariat of State launched a concerted lobbying campaign. They wanted permission for selected priests to visit the civilian and prisoner of war camps. The aims of these missions were noble and humanitarian – to provide spiritual and material assistance, and to extend the hand of Christian Charity to the needy.

Among these largely innocent masses, however, were many Nazis who had the blood of millions of innocents on their hands. It was hard for the Church to know who was who. The Vatican has consistently claimed that they were unaware of the identity of those who were undeserving of their humanitarian assistance. But some influential priests not only knew who the Nazis were, they actively sought them out and provided extra-special treatment . . .

In 1948 Franz Stangl wearily trudged along the road to Rome. Three years earlier he had been an important man: Commandant of the Treblinka extermination camp. He was meticulous in his work. When the boxcars crammed full of deported men, women and children arrived, all they saw was an ordinary train station neatly decorated with flower boxes. In the distance were a few innocuous looking sheds. Franz Stangl insisted on order. The passengers were told to disembark for a routine rest stop and showers. As they disrobed, people were told to secure their valuables in numbered stalls so they could easily find them later.

It was all so swift, so organised, so deadly. The showers were actually a gas chamber where 900,000 people, mostly Jews, were murdered immediately upon arrival. Unlike Auschwitz, no work was done here. Treblinka existed for one purpose only: mass murder of human beings. Franz Stangl had commanded the Third Reich's most efficient death factory.

When it became clear the Nazis would lose the war, Treblinka was razed and efforts made to hide its traces. Poplar trees were planted over the site and a small farm built from the bricks of the dismantled gas chambers. A Ukrainian family was moved in, awaiting the arrival of the Red Army. Stangl would not be there: he had been transferred to fight Yugoslav partisans.

When the Third Reich collapsed, Stangl was captured by the American Army and interned at Bad Ischl, near Salzburg in Austria. In July 1945 he was transferred to the huge prisoner of war camp at Glasenbach, where he remained a virtually anonymous figure for over two years. Around Christmas 1947, the Americans handed Stangl over to the Austrians, who held him in the open prison at Linz. There were many Austrians willing to turn a blind eye towards a good comrade. The following May Stangl 'escaped' and travelled south. One of the most wanted war criminals had slipped the Allied net and was trudging slowly on his way to Rome.

After many days on dusty roads, he walked wearily across a bridge over the Tiber, looking for a priest whose name had been whispered back in the prison camps. Suddenly he found himself face to face with a former comrade, a security police officer who had served in Vichy France. 'Are you on your way to see Hulda?', the man asked. 'Yes,' Stangl replied, 'but I don't know where to find him.'[1] Years later, after he was re-arrested, Stangl's recollections of his escape were taped in a German prison by his noted biographer, Gitta Sereny. Stangl said that when he came to Rome he was in fact looking for Bishop Alois Hudal, Rector of the Pontificio Santa Maria dell'Anima, one of three seminaries for German priests in Rome. It was Hudal's name that had been whispered throughout the Nazi underground:

> The Bishop came into the room where I was waiting and he held out both his hands and said 'You must be Franz Stangl. I was expecting you.'[2]

Stangl described the power and influence of Hudal's extensive smuggling network for fugitive Nazis. It was Hudal who arranged 'quarters in Rome where I was to stay till my papers came through. And he gave me a bit more money – I had almost nothing left.' After several weeks, Hudal 'called me in and gave me my new passport – a Red Cross Passport . . . [he] got me an entrance visa to Syria and a job in a textile mill in Damascus, and he gave me a ticket for the ship. So I went to Syria.'[3]

But when he was given his passport, the punctilious German noticed that his names had been reversed and said indignantly, 'They made a mistake, this is incorrect. My name is Franz D. Paul Stangl.' Hudal patted the naive Stangl on the shoulder and said in his fatherly way, 'Let's let sleeping dogs lie – never mind.'[4] Hudal knew that Stangl should never risk using his real name again. Like numerous fugitive Nazis, Stangl was very grateful to the charitable organisations of the Catholic Church which aided his escape.

Gitta Sereny asked Monsignor Karl Bayer for a comment. At the time, Bayer was the Rome Director of the Catholic relief organisation, Caritas International. He said that such mistakes were unfortunately commonplace in the post-war chaos. After all, the Church was dealing with enormous numbers of refugees. Stangl, he confirmed, probably 'would have received money – which came from the Vatican – or a ticket to Syria, but rarely both'. Bayer conceded that there were perhaps 'exceptional cases where "refugees" were given a ticket and money, but it didn't happen to anyone I helped.'[5]

Bayer initially played down Hudal's access to International Red Cross documents, but eventually admitted, 'Perhaps Hudal did get batches of passports for these particular people.' Finally he conceded that the money Hudal gave Stangl would certainly have come from Vatican funds. 'The Pope did provide money for this; in driblets sometimes, but it did come.'[6]

Was Stangl an isolated case, a regrettable but unavoidable accident by a legitimate Catholic charity? Or was he one of many who escaped via Hudal's secret Church connection? Simon Wiesenthal, who was responsible for Stangl's eventual recapture in Brazil in 1967, believes that a sophisticated Vatican network was involved.

Wiesenthal was in the courtroom when Stangl went on trial in Düsseldorf in West Germany, and heard him tell the judge that the Nazis had advance knowledge of the Vatican escape route. 'During the time we were in the internment camps we knew that we should go to Rome . . . Catholics should go to Bishop Hudal [who would] give us an International Red Cross Identity card and then a visa.'[7]

The assistance Stangl received from Hudal is strikingly similar to that provided to other German war criminals. Gustav Wagner, one of Stangl's close friends, was also helped by Hudal. Wagner was the Commandant at Sobibor at the time Stangl was running Treblinka. These were the major Nazi extermination camps in occupied Poland. After their escape from Allied custody, they bumped into one another in Graz, Austria, and travelled together on the long road to Rome. They eventually ended up in Brazil, and both praised Bishop Hudal's help.[8]

Wiesenthal alleges that yet another Nazi, Alois Brunner, also escaped via Hudal's Vatican smuggling network. Brunner, one of the most brutal senior officials in the Jewish 'deportation' programme, escaped to Damascus in Syria where he still lives under the name of Dr Georg Fischer. By all accounts he remains totally unrepentant about the hundreds of thousands of victims he sent to be 'processed' by Stangl and Wagner.

Wiesenthal is convinced that Hudal was also responsible for smuggling the most infamous war criminal of them all: Adolf Eichmann, the chief architect of the Holocaust. As head of the SS Department for 'Jewish Affairs', Eichmann's careful supervision ensured that men like Brunner, Stangl and Wagner ran the machinery of death at peak capacity. Wiesenthal believes that Hudal equipped Eichmann with a new identity as a Croatian refugee called 'Richard Klement', and sent him to Genoa. There Eichmann was apparently hidden in a monastery under Archbishop Siri's charitable control, before finally being smuggled to South America.[9]

Someone so notorious could not be protected for ever. Eichmann was eventually tracked down in Argentina by Israeli intelligence, kidnapped, tried and executed in Jerusalem in 1962. What angers Wiesenthal is that a Catholic relief organisation, Caritas, 'paid all of the travelling expenses for Eichmann' to reach South America.[10]

Official Vatican historian, Father Robert Graham, admits that

Hudal might have helped 'a handful, a mere handful of Nazi war criminals to escape':

> When Eichmann was arrested it was alleged he passed through Rome and got some help from Bishop Hudal. Hudal was asked about this and said, 'I don't know, I helped a lot of people and Eichmann may have been among them. I don't know, he didn't use his own name'. Hudal did help Germans go off to Latin America, particularly Argentina, but that wasn't the Vatican, that wasn't Pius XII.[11]

If Eichmann was a case of unauthorised assistance, he was certainly not the only instance. Hudal seemed to make mistakes with frightening regularity. Wiesenthal recalls: 'During my search for Eichmann I found out that many [war criminals] were living in monasteries, equipped by Hudal with false documents', showing they were refugees. One point is certain: many war criminals who escaped to South America have gratefully acknowledged that they owed their freedom to the Austrian-born Bishop.

Hudal was certainly no stranger to the Nazis, having served during the war as Commissioner of the Episcopate for German-speaking Catholics in Italy, as well as Father Confessor to Rome's German community. Born on 31 May 1885, he became Professor of Old Testament Studies at the University of Graz in 1919. Four years later Hudal moved to Rome as Rector of the Pontificio Santa Maria dell'Anima, on the ironically named Via della Pace, the street of peace. If Wiesenthal was correct, it was anything but peaceful during Hudal's tenure. The Anima had been established in the sixteenth century for the theological education of German priests, but it was a hotbed of Nazi-smuggling in the post-war era.

It is not surprising that Wiesenthal accuses Hudal. The Bishop's pro-Nazi views were well known. Even Father Graham concedes the point: 'Hudal was rather notorious in Rome for being openly philo-Nazi. He had this idea that it was his divine call to settle relations between the Nazis and the Catholic Church.'[12] By the early 1930s, Hudal openly supported Hitler, travelling widely through Italy and Germany to address large crowds of German-speaking Catholics. From the very beginning of Nazi rule, he warmly embraced the new goverment as his own.[13]

Hudal was an ardent anti-Communist and convinced that the real threat in Europe was 'atheistic Bolshevism'. He therefore advocated reaching an understanding with the National Socialists, the only power strong enough to defeat Communism. Hudal believed that this was a life and death struggle for the Church, one that would decide whether Communism or Christianity would eventually survive.

His first contact with a senior Nazi was probably with Franz von Papen, Hitler's Vice Chancellor. Von Papen arrived in Rome in April 1933 to negotiate the Concordat between Berlin and the Holy See. A month later, Hudal gave a speech at the Anima in Rome. Among the invited guests were members of the German Diplomatic Corps, as well as local representatives of various Nazi organisations. The Bishop told his approving audience that 'in this hour of destiny all German Catholics living abroad welcome the new German Reich, whose philosophies accord both with Christian and National values'.[14]

There is no direct evidence that Hudal actually worked with von Papen on the 1933 Concordat, although he was closely connected with the Vatican's chief negotiator, Secretary of State Pacelli. However, by the following year Hudal had certainly become von Papen's political ally, and was consulted by him immediately following the unsuccessful Nazi putsch in Austria.[15]

Within a few years, Hudal's Nazi sentiments became public knowledge. In 1936 he published a 'philosophical' treatise, The Foundations of National Socialism. He later modestly claimed that his work examined trends in the Nazi Party, 'objectively as a scholar, not as a politician'. In fact, the book was fulsome in its praise for the ideas, programme and actions of the Nazis, although it did criticise anti-Christian elements in the Party. By this time many of the worst features of Nazi rule were already apparent. Yet Hudal argued that there were no philosophical reasons why 'good' Nazis and Catholics could not co-operate closely to build a Christian Europe.

Hudal was not the only cleric to hold these views. The Primate of the Austrian Church, Cardinal Theodore Innitzer, was at that time strongly pro-Nazi. It was natural, therefore, that he gave Hudal's book an 'imprimatur', or official Church permission for publication. The Cardinal glowingly endorsed it 'as a valuable attempt to pacify the German people's religious situation'.[16]

However, Hudal's book received a mixed reception from the Nazis. His friend and Vice Chancellor, Franz von Papen, was delighted 'that a Bishop of Hudal's rank so praised the positive achievements of National Socialism'. Nevertheless, Propaganda Minister Joseph Göbbels promptly banned it, reflecting the Nazis' hostility towards Vatican functionaries in general.

Leading Nazi ideologist, Alfred Rosenberg, justified the decision, declaring that 'we do not allow the fundaments of the Movement to be analyzed and criticized by a Roman Bishop'.[17] Despite the book's harsh treatment, Hudal was apparently well regarded by the Nazi hierarchy, for he held a Golden Nazi Party membership badge.[18]

Apparently Hudal's high Nazi profile did not harm his Vatican career. Since 1930 he had been a consultor in the Holy Office, a senior Vatican tribunal working 'in the most rigorous secrecy', as US intelligence reported. Founded in 1542 'to combat the Calvinist and Lutheran revolts', its role was basically ideological purity, 'to defend the faith, Catholic morals, and the unity of the Church against heresies, schisms' etc.

The Holy Office was 'concerned with the protection and surveillance' of religious doctrine. To put it bluntly, it was the section of the Vatican concerned with censoring books and educational materials. Hudal was no stranger to that. Today the Holy Office is the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, and remains one of the most influential Vatican Ministries, the 'guardian of orthodoxy of doctrine' and enforcer of religious discipline.[19] The post of consultor is extremely important in this work, as these prelates 'have to examine, investigate, and prepare all the cases submitted to the Holy Office'.

Yet as Hudal's views grew more stridently and publicly pro-Nazi, nothing was done either to discipline or remove him from this powerful post. Instead the Vatican promoted him in June 1933 from priest to Titular Bishop, an extremely rare honour for a relatively lowly Rector of a teaching college.[20]

Despite this promotion, Father Graham distances Hudal's pro-Nazi political sentiments from the Vatican. They certainly had nothing to do with his choice Vatican assignments; he was merely 'a Catholic Bishop in good standing and among such people there's room for a lot of political opinions'.[21]

Father Burkhart Schneider, a German Jesuit, is also certain that 'Bishop Hudal was not at all close to the Vatican. And certainly not close to the Holy Father. He was . . . how shall I put it . . . even then slightly suspect – not taken seriously. He desperately wanted to be taken seriously.' Schneider, who worked with Graham preparing the Holy See's defence of Pius XII's wartime role, was adamant that Hudal 'was very much on the fringes'.[22]

By contrast, Father Jacob Weinbacher, who was in a better position to know, has no doubt that 'Hudal was very close to Pius XII . . . they were friends.' Weinbacher became Rector of the Anima in 1952, and clearly recalls several conversations in which his predecessor discussed his close personal relationship with the Pope. 'I talked a lot with him and this certainly emerged very clearly.'[23]

Weinbacher's account is not the only one which contradicts Graham's and Schneider's contention that Hudal had no influence with leading Vatican officials. One version alleges that Hudal and Pius XII had a longstanding friendship dating from 1924, when Pacelli was the Nuncio in Germany.[24]

Another more conspiratorial version is that Hudal followed in his patron's brilliant footsteps. Hudal's appointment to the Holy Office in 1930, and his elevation in 1933 to Titular Bishop of Ela, were due to Pacelli's growing influence at the Holy See. Certainly Hudal's promotions followed Pacelli's appointment as Secretary of State in 1930.

According to this theory, Hudal's close relationship with Pacelli is illustrated by the fact that 'Pacelli personally celebrated [Hudal's] mass of consecration' as a Bishop in the Anima. In fairness to Pacelli, it should be noted that he was by then the official Protector of the Anima. However, according to this version, their relationship was also very political, stemming from Hudal's role as Pacelli's adviser in the lengthy negotiations leading to the 1934 Concordat with Austria.[25]

Far from being just another anonymous cleric on the fringes of the Vatican, 'Hudal may well have been the sounding board for the Pope in the German speaking countries'.[26] The current Rector of the Anima, Monsignor Johannes Nedbal, is certain that Hudal was very close to Pius XI. Nedbal cites Hudal's part in the Austrian Concordat as the reason for his appointment as Bishop.

Nedbal admitted in a recent interview that Hudal's career was most exceptional. In his view, 'it's quite rare' that the head of a Roman college would be made a Bishop. Nedbal confirmed that Pacelli presided at Hudal's consecration as a Bishop, but insisted that this in no way recognised Hudal's pro-Nazi views. Rather, it was 'because Cardinal Pacelli was the protector of the Anima'.[27]

While conceding that Hudal worked directly with two Popes, Nedbal is rather scathing about his predecessor's rescue work for Nazi war criminals. 'It's quite possible that he helped individuals, a few people . . . He himself talks of helping several hundred but I think that's an exaggeration and he had a real propensity for exaggeration.'

Nedbal provided a fascinating insight into Hudal's character, emphasising that he 'was a man of very small stature and he was always trying to "big note" himself. You can see it in his photographs and if you knew him, you could see it as well.'[28] But for a man with an ego problem, Hudal certainly had unusual and powerful friends.

In 1943, for example, he met Walter Rauff, a major war criminal. Following Himmler's distress at witnessing a mass shooting of Jews at Minsk in 1941, Rauff had overseen the development of the programme for mobile gas vans. These 'Black Ravens' murdered Jews by pumping exhaust fumes from diesel engines into hermetically sealed chambers at the back.

Rauff's gas trucks were not without their macabre technical problems; in early tests the unfortunate victims died not from exhaust fumes, but from gradual asphyxiation. Instead of being quickly poisoned, the human cargo left claw marks on the metal walls as they slowly choked to death. Once Rauff's system was 'perfected', some 100,000 people, mostly Eastern European women and children, died in his mobile gas vans.[29]

Following the collapse of Mussolini's regime in September 1943, Rauff was dispatched to northern Italy where he served with the SS in the region around Genoa, Turin and Milan. Once again, his assignment was the extermination of the Jewish population. It was during this period that Hudal made contact with this notorious mass murderer.

The genesis of Hudal's and Rauff's friendship is something of a mystery. Alfred Jarschel, a former Nazi Youth leader, claims that Rauff first met Hudal in the spring of 1943, when Deputy Führer Martin Bormann sent him to Rome for six months without any apparent mission. This was at a time when the Reich desperately needed senior officers of Rauff's experience and calibre as the war's outcome still hung in the balance. Jarschel believes 'that the first contacts with the Vatican were established during those months, which were to lead eventually to the setting up of Hudal's escape network.'[30]

The time was fast approaching when it would be needed. By early 1944 when the Allies landed in Sicily, even Hudal could see that Hitler's 'Thousand Year Reich' was doomed. As long as the Nazi Armies were winning, he had proudly driven around Rome with a 'Greater Germany' flag on his car; but when the Allies arrived in the Italian capital in June 1944, Hudal 'was the first to change it – suddenly his flag was Austrian'.[31]

Like many Austrians in 1945, Hudal switched overnight from being a Fascist philosopher to demonstrating his new-found democratic aspirations. Discarding his long held pro-German position, he rushed to join the Free Austrian Committee in Rome and even helped organise a 'symbolic' liberation of the Austrian legation, belatedly reclaiming his long lost national pride. Hudal was not alone in his hypocrisy. It is ironic that the people of Austria, who had a higher percentage of Nazi party members than Germany, immediately demanded special treatment as the first victims of Hitler's tyranny.[32]

There were many dramatic changes in the Vatican as well, one of which may have played a crucial role in the development of Hudal's escape network. In August 1944 Cardinal Maglione died. Pius XII decided not to appoint a new Secretary of State, reassuming personal responsibility for foreign policy. From that time, Monsignors Tardini and Montini worked directly for the Pope.

Ladislas Farago claimed in his controversial book, Aftermath, that this decision 'was Hudal's entrée to the highest echelon of the Holy See'. Farago argues that Hudal had been on the outer with Maglione, relying on infrequent contact with the Pope himself to influence Vatican policy. But now he 'acquired a friend in the Secretariat of State'.[33]

Maglione's death suddenly left Giovanni Montini in charge of Pontifical Assistance to refugees, opening the door for Hudal's plans. Farago claims that it was Montini who allowed Hudal access to Vatican passports and other identity and travel documents, which he then used to aid his Nazi friends. At the same time Hudal allegedly developed good contacts with another important Vatican bureau under Montini's control. This was the Pontifical Commission for Assistance, which was concerned with work among refugees. One of its major roles was issuing travel documents to legitimate refugees. Finally, Farago alleged that Montini gave Hudal access to Caritas International, a Catholic charity which paid living and travelling expenses to help genuine refugees.

One of the Vatican's official historians hotly disputes Farago's claims. While conceding that Hudal 'interested himself, by his own admission, with ex-Nazis', Father Robert Graham is certain that 'Bishop Hudal had no role' in the Pontifical Commission for Assistance. He was not 'even "close"' to its work.[34] However, Farago's claims, if true, would explain Wiesenthal's persistent allegations that Caritas and the Vatican refugee bureau were directly involved with Nazi-smuggling.

The Nazi connection may have been purely personal, through Hudal, rather than through the agency officials themselves. They insist their roles were purely humanitarian, claiming that they were entirely ignorant of any Nazi-smuggling operations. But if Farago's allegations are true, it is astounding that Montini would have allowed Hudal, a declared pro-Nazi, any access to these Vatican sections at a time when the Nazis were desperate to escape. Such a decision would have been seen by Hudal as an overt act of encouragement to aid his Nazi friends. If Farago is right, Montini apparently gave Hudal every opportunity to do so.

There is some circumstantial evidence in the American diplomatic records to support the claim that Montini was deliberately aiding Hudal's Nazi-smuggling. This came about in a fairly innocent way. Following the virtual collapse of the German Army in Italy, Pius XII began to campaign for the right to send his personal representatives to visit the tens of thousands of prisoners of war and civilian internees then held in Italian camps.

As previously discussed, the Pope wished to extend his 'mission of charity in favour of all the victims of war without national or religious distinction'. In taking up this case with the Allied authorities in August 1944, the Vatican Secretariat of State pointed out that the Holy See 'cannot fail to interest itself now in these German prisoners'.

Over the next few weeks, the British and American forces debated the Pope's request. They asked the Holy See to provide a detailed justification for the proposed visits, and received this reply:

> . . . the Representative of His Holiness (usually an Archbishop), accompanied by a Secretary, acting if necessary as interpreter, visits the camp, bringing with him some small gifts (spiritual books, books of instruction or light literature, games etc.); makes a short discourse and spends some time with the prisoners or internees . . .
> . . . the purpose of the visit of the Representative of the Holy See is to assure normal religious assistance to Catholic prisoners as well as to exercise that mission of charity proper to the Church by bringing some comfort to those in affliction.

It was a completely reasonable argument in favour of humanitarian and charitable works. On 10 November the US President's Personal Representative to the Pope conveyed the Allied decision to the Vatican Secretariat of State. These visits would be permitted, provided they were restricted to religious assistance, and each visit was requested individually.[35]

A very peculiar request followed a few weeks later. Having achieved their humanitarian goal, on 2 December the Vatican asked that a representative be permitted 'to visit the German-speaking civil internees in Italy'. The Bishop chosen to minister to the defeated enemy population was none other than Hudal, the Vatican's 'Spiritual Director of the German people resident in Italy'.

It is astonishing that the Holy See singled out the most notorious pro-Nazi Bishop in Rome for this extremely sensitive mission. It was well known that these 'civilian' camps were teeming with fugitive Nazis who had discarded their uniforms and were hiding among the legitimate refugees. The Americans were at least partly to blame for granting Hudal access to the internment camps. When a senior US diplomat at the Vatican forwarded the Secretariat of State's letter to Allied headquarters in Rome, he made no mention of Hudal's pro-Nazi sympathies. But the Americans at the Vatican knew all about Hudal's views. One diplomat had formed a bad opinion of him during the war, observing that he did not 'trust Bishop Hudal', as his 'reputation . . . was not too good from an Allied point of view'.[36]

American intelligence were also aware of Hudal's views, and compiled an intelligence dossier on his pro-Nazi book.[37] Although Allied Headquarters had previously refused some Vatican requests for travel passes, the Security Division approved this one, 'provided the object of [Hudal's] visit is specifically limited to giving normal religious assistance to catholic internees'.[38] Still, for the Vatican to obtain an Allied travel pass for Hudal to visit the German internees was a bit like giving whisky to an alcoholic and telling him not to drink; the resulting corruption was inevitable.

Equipped with his special credentials, Hudal was free to spread the good news about the escape system to his German friends hiding in the camps. There was no need for wanted war criminals to visit Rome to obtain assistance; Hudal brought it to them. Many years later he wrote a frank confession about his travels:

> I thank God that He [allowed me] to visit and comfort many victims in their prisons and concentration camps and [to help] them escape with false identity papers.[39]

Hudal had nothing but contempt for the American victors who helped him:

> The Allies' war against Germany was not a crusade, but the rivalry of economic complexes for whose victory they had been fighting. This so-called business . . . used catchwords like democracy, race, religious liberty and Christianity as a bait for the masses. All these experiences were the reason why I felt duty bound after 1945 to devote my whole charitable work mainly to former National Socialists and Fascists, especially to so called 'war criminals'.[40]

Hudal's self confessed activities are all the more controversial because he operated with the full authority of the Vatican. Far from being 'on the fringes' as Father Schneider argues, Hudal obtained the approval of high level officials. Without the Vatican's direct diplomatic intercession to obtain his Allied travel pass, he could never have succeeded in making contact with so many Nazi war criminals. Indeed, without such help, he would have been bottled up in Rome.

It appears that one of the first Nazis Hudal visited was his old friend, Walter Rauff, in Milan. Eighteen months earlier, Rauff had left Rome to become Head of the Milan SD. This made him the chief SS security officer for all of northwest Italy, including Turin and Genoa. By 1944, Pius XII was extremely concerned that Italy's major industrial region would be destroyed in the final Allied offensive.

With Rauff's assistance, the senior Wehrmacht commanders in northern Italy began a series of secret surrender negotiations. Allen Dulles, the American intelligence chief in Switzerland, worked out the surrender of German forces with the help of Vatican intermediaries. These negotiations were codenamed Operation Sunrise, and although they were singularly unsuccessful in shortening the war, each of the Nazi officers involved escaped serious punishment.[41]

When the German Army in Italy surrendered on 29 April 1945, Rauff obtained a false passport in the name of Carlo Comte and rented a flat in Milan. He then took his copy of Mussolini's secret police archives, including the Fascist Party membership lists, and quietly buried them outside the city. He knew they would be very useful in the coming months and his judgement proved correct. The very next day, however, Rauff was arrested by the Americans and interned in Milan's San Vittore gaol. Within hours a priest arrived and arranged for Rauff to be transferred to an American Army Hospital.

According to Wiesenthal, Rauff's release was arranged by Monsignor Don Giuseppe Bicchierai, Secretary to Milan's Cardinal Schuster. Bicchierai was one of the Vatican intermediaries in the secret surrender negotiations, who sheltered Rauff after his release and arranged for him to stay covertly 'in the convents of the Holy See'.[42]

On the other hand, Alfred Jarschel believes that Rauff's release was engineered by the Milan branch of the Italian Communist Party. In exchange for Rauff's Fascist Party membership lists, the Communists allegedly turned a blind eye to the establishment of his escape organisation.[43] What neither Wiesenthal nor Jarschel realised was that Rauff was released to the custody of 'S Force Verona', an OSS unit working with the British-American 'Special Counter Intelligence' team in Italy (SCI-Z), headed by James Jesus Angleton.

The S Force was, among other things, the Western equivalent of Rauff's wartime anti-Communist section. Rauff was a valuable asset, and over the objections of the US Army's Counter Intelligence Corps, who called him 'an unrepentant Nazi' and recommended lifetime imprisonment if not elimination, S Force Verona took charge of the grateful Rauff. After an extensive debriefing on Communist activity in his sector, he was released. Perhaps this was because Rauff openly boasted of high level connections in the Vatican negotiations, which he claimed could be 'confirmed by Hussman and Mr Dulles, allied agents in Switzerland'.[44]

It is no coincidence that Rauff's 'Mr Dulles' later became Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, or that James Jesus Angleton became head of CIA Counter Intelligence. Throughout Angleton's career he retained exclusive control over American intelligence liaison with the Vatican.[45] Whatever the American motive, it is incontestable that Rauff was released from custody and returned to his flat in Milan.

According to the French publication, Cercle Noir, Rauff made contact with Archbishop Siri of Genoa, and immediately went to work for the Vatican in establishing a Nazi-smuggling system. Apart from his high level American and Vatican contacts, Rauff's main contribution to Hudal's smuggling system may have been financial. The man who once ran the mobile gas truck programme now became a money launderer, with the help of Frederico Schwendt, Rauff's former SS colleague. Schwendt is considered among the greatest counterfeiters in history, having forged millions of banknotes during the war as part of an SS operation codenamed Wendig.[46]

The original intention was to undermine and possibly destroy the Allied economies, but, as the war was drawing to a close, Schwendt laundered the counterfeit money through various banks and obtained legitimate Western notes. This was the seed money for the first Nazi escape network. Wiesenthal claims that Schwendt turned the proceeds over to his old comrade, Walter Rauff.[47]

However, Jarschel has a slightly different version. He claims that Hudal contacted Rauff in July 1945, asking him to come to Rome for a secret meeting. This proved impossible, so Hudal suggested that Rauff travel instead to Genoa and contact the newly appointed and strongly anti-Communist Archbishop Siri, another key player in the Nazi-smuggling operation. Rauff went to Genoa and was received by one of Siri's private secretaries. Jarschel alleges that he was given a sizeable sum of money and a Red Cross passport with a valid visa for Syria. He then returned to Milan and established the escape network.[48]

Perhaps the truth is somewhere in between: Rauff probably used Siri's money to augment the proceeds from the counterfeit laundering operation. Jarschel and Cercle Noir both agree that over the next four years some of the most wanted Nazi war criminals passed from Rauff in Milan, to Bishop Hudal at the Anima in Rome and then on to Archbishop Siri in Genoa. Here they boarded ships and left for new lives in South America.

The Vatican has never opened its bank records to show what sums were allocated to refugee assistance. To this day the dossiers on Schwendt and the Nazi money laundering are among the most highly classified American intelligence documents. However, the one paragraph which was declassified contains an intriguing reference about Schwendt's connection to the Nazi underground:

> On the Brenner Pass route from Austria the first stop on the underground railroad in Italy is at a castle in Merano where German is the language of the directors. [It is owned by] an agent of the SS task force . . . sometimes called 'Group Wendig' under the command of Schwendt, Col. Frederick, who was responsible only to Kaltenbrunner and Himmler. One [agent] . . . claimed 5,000,000 Dollars from the US Government for property confiscated at Merano after the war's end. All this property was the loot of the SS group which had been stored in . . . Schwendt's HQ and other buildings in Merano. Included in this loot were large quantities of British Pound Notes.[49]

The report goes on to list banks in Britain, Palestine, Italy and Switzerland that were tied to Schwendt's network. But money alone was not enough. False papers were the most important requirement for escaping Nazis. Hudal could provide all of these: Italian identity papers, false birth certificates, even visas for their country of destination. The most necessary were International Red Cross Passports.

According to Madame Gertrude Dupuis, a senior official in the Rome branch of the Red Cross, it 'was comparatively simple for [Hudal] to achieve this; he was a Bishop don't forget – that did help . . . How could we refuse to accept the word of priests?' she asked.[50] Madame Dupuis explained that if Hudal had requested that Red Cross papers 'be made out according to his specifications' and sent to him at the Anima, 'they probably were'.[51]

The IRC in Rome was flooded with applications in the mass confusion at war's end. To be fair, millions of people were on the move throughout Europe, many had lost their homes and their identity papers; others with shady pasts preferred to 'lose' documents which might identify them to a War Crimes Tribunal.

Many relief organisations issued new identity documents to the refugees. Some were only valid in Italy. For example, the International Caritas and the Vatican Refugee Organisation (Commissione Pontificia d'Assistenza) both issued hundreds of local 'identity documents' each week at this time. Many refugees used these unofficial Vatican documents as the starting point for the long paper trail for emigration.

While a Vatican identity card could be used to apply for the many further documents needed for emigration, on its own it did not permit its holder to leave Rome, let alone Italy. There is therefore no truth to the oft-repeated allegation that the Vatican handed out thousands of passports to Nazis. Indeed, the only strictly Vatican passports were the official credentials for its accredited clerical diplomats and officials.

The Red Cross was a far more promising source for a fugitive Nazi. For those who could not risk a personal appearance at the refugee relief counters, there was a flourishing and lucrative black market in stolen and forged documents. Madame Dupuis had personal experience of this, angrily recalling seeing such papers in her superior's office at IRC's Rome Headquarters. 'I could see from several feet away that they were forged. Not only were they filled out differently from how we do it ordinarily, but my signature was obviously forged.'[52] While Madame Dupuis could do little about this situation, some IRC officials apparently turned a blind eye to these abuses.

The illicit trade in Red Cross documents was soon discovered by American intelligence. By late 1945 they were almost certain that fugitive Nazis were among the beneficiaries. This was confirmed in mid-1946, when there was a breakout of German prisoners from Rimini camp in northern Italy. Many escapees were subsequently apprehended with false IRC documents.

An investigation, codenamed Operation Circle, was launched by the American Army's Counter Intelligence Corps. They forwarded their early findings to Vincent La Vista, a senior Rome officer of the Division of Foreign Activity Correlation. La Vista had been involved in a number of top secret post-war intelligence operations, investigating Fascist espionage cells operating in America and commercial, financial and industrial dealings between Italy and Germany.

La Vista investigated and forwarded his report to Washington in May 1947. Since its release in 1984, it has become known simply as the 'La Vista Report'. Although the findings contain some significant errors, it is a fairly comprehensive analysis of illegal emigration through Italy. It should be noted that La Vista was himself a Catholic, but one of his main conclusions was that the Vatican was helping the escape of fugitive war criminals.[53] When his report eventually surfaced, this claim was strongly denied by the Church.

Official Vatican historian, Father Graham, argued that the report's real purpose had been 'completely misrepresented'. Its focus was not escaping Nazis, but 'Communist infiltration into Latin America. It isn't very honest or objective to pick out a page and a half where La Vista alludes to Nazis escaping, when the whole report wasn't about Nazis but Communists. The only real Nazi mentioned escaped with the help of the Jewish Zionist organisations.'[54]

However, much of La Vista's report is concerned with the role of Vatican institutions and officials in illegal Nazi emigration. The State Department officer listed nearly two dozen 'Vatican relief and welfare organizations engaged in or suspected of engaging in illegal emigration'. At the top of the list was the ubiquitous Bishop Hudal.[55] The US Army's CIC conducted extensive investigations into the black market in forged documents, and several reports were appended to La Vista's report.

Appendix B dealt extensively with the Rimini breakout the previous July. A reliable CIC informant reported that two of the escapees, Gianni and Vorkörper, 'had been instructed to proceed to Rome and contact' a CIC informant, who was supposed to help them emigrate to South America. The Germans were placed under surveillance and it emerged that Gianni's real name was Walter Fütling 'living in the apartment of a German woman who was formerly employed at the German Embassy in the Vatican'. The two escapees joined two other fugitives in Rome, who were in close contact with local priests.

One priest was reported to be 'aiding the escapees with food, lodging, and contacts with German and Vatican officials'. When two of the escapees went to Genoa to arrange transportation to South America, the CIC informant 'borrowed' their passports and discovered that they were 'issued by the International Red Cross'.[56] The CIC agent instructed his informant to attempt to obtain his own false passport. He did so 'by paying 20,000 lire to a person known to have contacts with the International Red Cross'.

The system for obtaining passports was simple. The informant was sent to a man who took down his personal details. The man had an inside contact who examined the IRC files, looking for 'the name of a missing or dead person who fitted the [informant's] description'. Two days later the CIC informant was told to apply for a Red Cross passport under the false name of Mirko Baucech. He also needed two letters of identification which his contact obtained from the Vatican and the Italian Red Cross.[57]

In August 1946 the CIC operation ceased when the men under surveillance were arrested; three were Rimini escapees and the fourth held 'false discharge permits'. The Germans admitted having contacts with people close to the Vatican. The CIC report also referred to another Vatican representative who had good connections with 'South American Consulates and business firms'. This Vatican contact was the last link in the 'German emigration chain which funnels all of its clients through the International Red Cross'.[58]

La Vista also confirmed that Milan was an important centre in the smuggling network. Although he does not mention Rauff, La Vista discovered a network run by his close friend, Frederico Schwendt:

> There is a general movement of Germans . . . who cross the border via Treviso and Milan for the sole purpose of obtaining . . . ficticious identity documents, passports and visas, and leave almost immediately via Genoa and Barcelona for South America.[59]

As a demonstration of how easily the Vatican could obtain false IRC documents, La Vista arranged for two 'Hungarian refugees' to visit Father Josef Gallov, who operated the Hungarian relief 'agency sponsored by the Vatican'. La Vista called Gallov 'an honest, conscientious Catholic Priest, but he is likewise a sentimental old man' who did not bother to ask too many questions of the 'refugees'.

The men had been chosen because they spoke Hungarian. They arrived at Father Gallov's office without any personal papers or documentation of any kind, saying they had just fled from the Soviets. 'Both men claimed to be natives of a small village in Hungary and to have lost their entire families in bombing raids during the war.' The second informant agreed to corroborate his friend's story under oath and Gallov prepared an affadavit. He then gave the man a letter to present to the Red Cross and, a few hours later, La Vista's informant obtained a perfectly valid passport. Shortly thereafter, the first informant simply reversed the procedure and obtained a passport for his 'Hungarian' friend. 'Needless to say,' La Vista commented, 'both men are Italian, neither ever having been outside Italy.'[60]

Yet another CIC officer concluded that IRC documents could be obtained without any identification through 'the assistance of persons operating under the protection of the Vatican'. Paul Lyon later became a key US liaison to the Vatican's Ratlines, but in 1946 he investigated their operations. He discovered that the Holy See was sponsoring the illicit trade in Red Cross papers, obtained either 'under an alias or with false nationality'.[61] Lyon also confirmed that Hungarian Catholic priest Father Gallov was central to this operation. He also identified some of those who obtained such false documents as 'known or wanted war criminals'.[62]

According to the CIC officer, the system for obtaining false papers was fairly straightforward. An applicant would be provided with a letter bearing 'an official stamp of the Vatican' to take to Gallov's 'personal contact in the International Red Cross . . . to secure a . . . Red Cross identity document'. This could then be used to obtain 'the necessary ration cards and temporary resident permit from the Italian police authorities to remain safely in Italy', while awaiting 'permission from the Consuls of Central and South American countries to immigrate'.[63]

La Vista's report initially caused a major upheaval in Washington. The State Department decided that the report 'required urgent attention'.[64] A top secret meeting was convened, but the Washington bureaucrats eventually decided to issue only a very discreet and informal protest.[65] La Vista was not even asked to follow up his investigation to establish the full ramifications of the Vatican smuggling network.

The Americans decided that good relations with the Holy See were more important than bringing mass murderers to justice. The State Department's orders to their representative at the Vatican were hardly a model of American outrage.[66] He was merely asked to 'approach the Vatican informally. I leave it to you to decide what, and how much, should be done in this regard'.[67] The diplomat took the hint, and decided that an oral message, or Note Verbale, would be sufficient. This is the lowest class of diplomatic communication, reserved for informal topics too insignificant to warrant an official Diplomatic Note.

Yet by the time the oral message was delivered, it had been watered down even further. Monsignor Walter Carroll of the Vatican Secretariat of State was only advised that 'unscrupulous persons, often engaged in illicit and clandestine activities' had somehow managed to obtain travel documents 'through the unwitting assistance of charitable organizations'. Although the message was somewhat ambiguous, there was apparently no mention whatsoever of La Vista's evidence that the Vatican was actively helping Nazis to escape.

The State Department seemed more concerned that the false documents might inadvertently assist Jews going to Palestine or 'secret [Communist] agents, many of them destined for the Western Hemisphere'. The bewildered Vatican official probably thought that the Americans were only concerned about sophisticated Jewish and Communist smuggling organisations. He hastened to assure the American diplomat that 'such agencies are not connected to the Vatican'.[68]

The American concluded his 'protest' by requesting the Vatican's assistance to ensure that all 'nations may be preserved from infiltration by unfriendly agents and that the charitable and benevolent work of assisting bonafide displaced persons . . . may not be prejudiced' by such illegal activities.[69] None of the priests named in the La Vista report was even mentioned.

If Father Graham only read the oral summary of this strange meeting, he would be quite right to assume that La Vista's report had nothing to do with smuggling Nazis. The American diplomat provided the lame excuse that it 'has not been possible to be more specific because of the need to protect our sources of information and our investigators who still have important work in progress. Also, I felt that my action should be tempered somewhat because officials in the Vatican have betrayed to me on several occasions their sensitiveness over the amount of private American capital which has gone into the financing of illegal migration.'

These may well have been the reasons for American indifference towards the Vatican's Ratlines. However, one researcher discovered a document in the US Archives which throws fascinating light on official US attitudes. According to Charles Allen, the very same day that this meeting with Monsignor Carroll was reported to Washington, another, unsigned letter was dispatched from Rome to Washington, warning that 'Monsignor Walter Carroll, Secretariat of State of the Holy See, had cautioned . . . in an "Oral Message" not to delve too deeply into the details of the financing of the Nazi escape routes'.[70]

Apparently the State Department was informed that the Vatican was, indeed, aware of the funding arrangements for the smuggling network.

While the diplomatic niceties were being observed, Hudal continued to send wanted fugitives down the escape route, until the Vatican itself came under concerted attack. A series of articles in the Italian press questioned the motives of Pius XII, who was by then widely labelled as the 'German Pope'. The entire Vatican–Nazi connection was threatened with exposure. For example, on 6 August 1947 the Milan based evening paper, Milano Sera, published an article headed 'Too many Germans around the Pope'. It claimed that within > the Pontifical apartment in the Vatican, only German is spoken – a language in which the Pope is exceedingly well versed . . . The Pope lives on German cuisine . . . Pius XII's private secretary [Father Leiber] is a husky Bavarian . . . He is often seen about Rome in his car, from which he alights alone to stop at one of the typical German beer parlors . . . frequented by . . . SS war criminals who hide under assumed names.

> It is plain that the new myth, to which even the Vatican subscribes, of the 'poor German' who is paying the penalty for others' guilt and who has the right to assistance from the whole world, has arisen solely from this particular [pro-German] atmosphere which so tightly surrounds the Head of the Church.[71]

The Vatican realised that this form of publicity harmed its international reputation. They immediately knew who to blame. Pressure was applied to Hudal; he later wrote that Vatican diplomats began to shun him, some even calling him the 'Nazi, fascist Bishop – troppo tedesco [too much the German]'.[72] However, despite the fact that Hudal's Nazi-smuggling operation threatened to become a public scandal, it took nearly four years to replace him as Rector of the Anima. He finally bowed to the inevitable at

Christmas 1951, announcing that he would leave the Anima the following July.[73]

Convinced that his only sin was a bad press image, Hudal remained in Rome until his death, unrepentant for his work on behalf of Nazi war criminals:

> To help people, to save a few, without thinking of the consequences, working selflessly and with determination, was naturally what should have been expected of a true Christian. We do not believe in the eye for an eye of the Jew.[74]

Apparently Bishop Hudal believed that the Germans should be excused for their crimes in the name of Christian Charity while simple justice was a vengeful concept, at least when it applied to the killers of Jews. To his death, Hudal remained a convinced anti-Semite.

The press scandal that erupted in 1947 did not end the Nazi Ratlines. By the time Hudal's star was waning, more discreet priests had taken his place in the dark constellation of the smuggling system. There was one direct benefit from the threat of the press scandal. From that moment on, extraordinary measures were taken to conceal the existence of the Nazi escape routes. Their full extent would not be publicly discovered for another forty years.

Well before Bishop Hudal stepped off the stage, the scene was set for a more professional and clandestine smuggling operation that would assist war criminals and quislings from all the Catholic countries of Europe. Whether or not Hudal had acted alone, his successors were clearly authorised by senior Vatican officials. Like Hudal, his successors received their start in Nazi-smuggling as the result of official Vatican intervention to obtain Allied travel passes.[75] It is no coincidence that the Vatican selected Fascist priests from Central and Eastern Europe for this work. Hudal had already sent many Germans to South America, but now tens of thousands of non-German Nazi collaborators were clamouring for assistance.

As the Americans would soon discover, the Vatican was willing to smuggle Fascists of every stripe. What the Americans did not know was why the Holy See was involved.

A French Spy in the Vatican

Special Agent William Gowen was puzzled and frustrated. The American intelligence officer was increasingly despondent at his failure to trace the émigré Nazi underground in Rome and apprehend wanted war criminals who were thriving in the city. As soon as he discovered their whereabouts they disappeared from view, as if swallowed by a dark and unfathomable chasm. He was sure that a shadowy group called Intermarium was somehow involved, but lacked hard evidence to justify his suspicion.

A few months earlier, Gowen and his colleagues in the US Army Counter Intelligence Corps had seemed on the verge of a major breakthrough, but this was now further out of reach than ever. When the reports of Operation Circle had been assessed they thought they were close to solving the Vatican mystery. As previously discussed, this clandestine operation had been launched in July 1946 to discover how such fugitives were able to survive on the run, who was assisting them to hide in Rome and then leave for the safety of South America.

The American officers concluded that the Vatican was 'the largest single organization involved in the illegal movement of emigrants' in and through Italy, and that the Holy See's justification for 'its participation in this illegal traffic is simply the propagation of the Faith'. For it was > the Vatican's desire to assist any person regardless of nationality or political beliefs, as long as that person can prove himself to be a Catholic . . . The Vatican further justifies its participation by its desire to infiltrate, not only European countries but Latin American countries as well, with people of all political beliefs as long as they are anti-Communist and pro-Catholic Church.[1]

State Department intelligence officer, Vincent La Vista, reported that the Vatican had 'brought pressure to bear' on Catholic countries in South America, especially Argentina but also Mexico, Cuba and others. This resulted 'in the foreign missions of those countries taking an attitude almost favouring the entry into their country of former Nazi (sic) and former Fascists or other political groups, so long as they are anti-Communist'.

During the investigations of this traffic, US intelligence had come across an array of Vatican-sponsored 'relief and welfare organizations in Rome engaging in or suspected of engaging in illegal emigration'. La Vista interviewed many Church officials involved, concluding that they were operating 'under the benevolent sponsorship of the Vatican':

> Needless to say, all of the Agencies operating in conjunction with or under the protection of the Vatican are financed by Vatican funds. No attempt was made to ascertain the amount of these funds, their origin, or their method of distribution, but it is the observation of this writer that substantial sums are being spent generously in the promotion of this work.[2]

La Vista was qualified to draw this conclusion, having investigated the web of illicit Nazi money laundering which occurred after World War II. Similar claims have been repeatedly made by other researchers. Austrian-based Nazi hunter, Simon Wiesenthal, has dubbed it the 'Roman Way'. He alleges that the Vatican ran a systematic smuggling system to spirit Nazi mass murderers out of Europe.[3]

The Vatican has consistently denied these claims. When La Vista's report surfaced in early 1984, it caused an international furore, forcing the Vatican to deny it. Their spokesperson, Reverend Romeo Panciroli, cited two of the Holy See's historians, Father Robert Graham and Reverend Pierre Blet. Graham claimed that La Vista's findings were 'propagandistic manoeuvres' by people who 'never lose the occasion to crucify' the Church. 'The accusations in the report are founded on nothing but air,' the American priest said.

Reverend Blet concurred that the report was 'artificial and false, unworthy of attention', and probably 'based on information furnished by questionable elements'. Reverend Antonio Weber, a German-born priest who ran a Vatican-sponsored relief organisation, went even further, stating categorically that 'the Vatican never hid or aided Nazis after the war'.[4]

Clearly there is little agreement between the Vatican and its critics. However, in mid-1947 William Gowen established that the truth lay somewhere in the middle. Gowen was in a good position to discover what was really happening. Not only was he a CIC agent, but his father, Franklin Gowen, was a senior State Department officer. In 1940 President Roosevelt had sent Myron Taylor to be his Personal Representative to Pius XII, and Gowen senior went to the Holy See as one of his assistants. He served there until 1947, when he returned to Washington. His son stayed in Rome and investigated the Vatican's Nazi connections.

Gowen junior was by then an up and coming young intelligence officer, ambitious for postings in the exciting world of European espionage. The shadowy Nazi diaspora seemed to have eluded his colleagues, but now Gowen was putting the pieces together. He had solved the puzzle that had frustrated him for so many months, going beyond Operation Circle's conclusions and getting right inside Intermarium. He discovered that the Vatican's total denials were not supported by the evidence; neither was the blanket claim that the Holy See as an entity was involved.

Rather, Gowen found that a well organised network of Central and Eastern European Nazi émigrés was operating on the Vatican's fringes, and receiving the secret support of a tiny but powerful cabal, of church and intelligence agents. These investigations took the best part of eighteen months and in the process the American officer also discovered that the Vatican cabal was only a small part of a mysterious spy organisation called Intermarium.

Gowen found that its roots went back to the early 1920s, to a so-called 'White' Russian émigré group which fled to Paris in the wake of the Bolshevik seizure of power. They were termed the 'Whites' to distinguish them from the Communist 'Reds' in the civil war. Once in Paris, a former Czarist general established a group to unite all nationalities subjugated by Communism.[5]

By the mid-1930s the Paris group had evolved into Intermarium, 'a secret international organization that desires as its members people whose homes are to be found in the "Intermare" – that part of Europe between the Baltic, the Black Sea, the Aegean, the Ionian Sea, and the Adriatic. Also included are the Caucasians.'

Intermarium grandly proclaimed the unity of sixteen nations 'inhabiting the territory between Germany and Russia proper . . . which are united in the effort of their struggle for liberation, as well as in their tendency to secure a peaceful existence and to participate in the construction of a new Europe and that of a world, free from tyranny, terror and famine'. Although the goal was to ensure the self-determination of all these disparate 'nations', it was almost completely impractical. Many of the countries supposedly united in these endeavours had long histories of bloody conflicts between themselves, in which ethnic, cultural and even religious differences played powerful roles.[6]

Nevertheless, Intermarium proclaimed the necessity for a powerful anti-Communist Pan-Danubian Confederation, comprised in the main of the Catholic nations of Central Europe. Before the war it had received strong support from both French and British intelligence for anti-Communist operations.[7]

Intermarium's goal was to create a cordon sanitaire against both the Russians and the Germans. This plan had received considerable support from France, Britain and the Vatican in the 1920s and 1930s. The Holy See looked with great fondness on France, proclaimed by Pius XI as 'the first-born of the great Catholic family'. The British Foreign Office had noted in October 1942 that the Vatican's post-war policy would 'favour the creation of a large Danubian federal State, if it gives promise of stability and is not controlled by Bolshevik Russia'.[8]

Gowen's CIC colleagues in Austria had found traces of this Pan-Danubian Confederation during their early investigations of the Ustashi's post-war revival. Formed in the late 1920s, this Fascist group had conducted a campaign of international terrorism in the 1930s. They were then placed in power in Croatia by the Nazis during the war, and proceeded to exterminate hundreds of thousands of innocent civilians. On 25 June 1945, only seven weeks after the war had concluded, the Ustashi had made contact with a Papal mission in Salzburg in the US zone of Austria. They asked for the Pope's assistance to create either another independent Croatian state, or at least 'a Danube-Adriatic union in which, according to all natural laws, Croatia would have its possibility for development'.[9]

Gowen had discovered the intricate connections between Intermarium, the Vatican, French and British intelligence by tracking down a young Hungarian he suspected was one of its key organisers. He hoped that Ferenc Vajta would provide valuable inside information on how Intermarium linked into the well organised and financed Nazi-smuggling network. He believed that Vajta could even confirm the Vatican's deep involvement in these activities, as he knew the Hungarian was well connected with Church leaders.

Vajta had proved an elusive quarry, well hidden in the émigré underground that had been built in Rome since war's end. Hints of his important role had emerged in late 1946, when the Hungarian government claimed that he was 'living in great state at the "Grand Hotel", Rome'. The CIC discovered this was untrue. Rather, 'according to fairly reliable sources', he was in fact living 'in one of the many monasteries in the Rome area'.[10] This chance discovery led Gowen to Vajta in the first half of 1947.

Gowen told Vajta's close friends that in return for information, he would assist the fugitive to regain possession of his identity papers, recently confiscated by the Italian police.[11] Vajta had a lot to tell. He said he had worked for over two years with both French and British intelligence, organising 'two clandestine movements against the Russians'. According to Vajta, the Vatican had supported these operations, informally working with the French and British to revive Intermarium after World War II.[12]

Vajta revealed that he had been Hungarian Consul General in Vienna at war's end, sent to organise the evacuation of Hungarian industry and establish escape routes for 'refugees'. He 'organised more than 7,000 train trucks of machinery and factories' to reach western Germany, and saved 'the great majority of Hungary's bourgeoisie and aristocracy' from the Soviets.[13]

The French soon discovered his key role as 'one of the few men who knew the location of this evacuated industry'. The French were desperately short of money to finance clandestine operations, and Vajta's stolen treasure became the main financial base for France's revival of Intermarium in 1945.[14] Vajta recalled that he had been easily located by French military intelligence in their occupation zone in Austria. He was recruited for special intelligence operations then taking shape at General Charles de Gaulle's Paris headquarters.

According to Vajta, the historical convergence of French and Vatican interests in Central Europe played a crucial role in de Gaulle's schemes 'to employ the factor of Catholicism'. Vajta told French intelligence of his pre-war role in their clandestine operations in Central Europe. While studying at the Sorbonne in the early 1930s, he joined the secretive Grand Orient, an organisation specialising in Central and Eastern European affairs which linked Francophiles from these regions to French activities.[15]

This was one of many reasons why Vajta was employed in 1945 and 1946 by the Deuxième Bureau and the French High Command in Austria. He claimed to be a personal favourite of de Gaulle himself, visiting Paris in late 1945 and gaining a first-hand impression of the President's aims. Gowen later noted that Vajta had not only helped to finance French operations, but also proved himself in various active anti-Communist operations. These included the 'arrest and expulsion of a Czechoslovakian Army search team, and the detection and courtmartial of Hungarian Soviet agent Galle'.[16]

Vajta explained that as soon as hostilities ceased, de Gaulle ordered an aggressive campaign 'to gain the sympathy of the peoples of Eastern Europe'. His aim was to create a counterweight to British plans and his conception was 'very simple' but, according to Vajta, very just. The French leader believed that it was necessary to prepare for a new war with Stalin to restore France's rightful role in the region.

De Gaulle told Vajta that France needed 'the friendship of those countries' émigrés who tomorrow, with discreet help, could become the rulers of Eastern Europe'.[17] Vajta claimed that he had received 'the authority of the French High Command in Austria to bring together in the French zone all the exiled politicians of South Eastern Europe'. He worked with two branches of French intelligence – État Majeur and the Deuxième Bureau – laying the foundation for Intermarium's resurrection. He categorically denied that former Nazis were involved.

Under French direction Vajta built intelligence centres in Innsbruck, Freiburg and Paris. 'The émigrés travelled with État Majeur papers', so that they could move about securely, and establish a sophisticated intelligence network. Vajta claimed that de Gaulle developed close relations with the Vatican. The French leader's plan 'was to collaborate with the Church and to be sustained by the Vatican in the struggle for the Europe of tomorrow. He knew too well that France alone was not strong enough to play the heavy cards.'

The French General staff were initially successful in gaining the Vatican's help, utilising 'Church personalities' to make contact with émigré leaders. One of the most important Vatican officials to take up their cause was French Cardinal Tisserant, the Holy See's leading Eastern European expert. Among other things, the French utilised Tisserant to approach the Vatican 'for a secret collaboration to "save European heritage"'.[18]

De Gaulle wanted the Pope's help to create a European Confederation, bringing together the Catholics of Spain, France, Italy, Austria, Germany, Poland, Hungary, Slovakia, Croatia, Slovenia and the Baltic states, among others. To realise this pipedream, de Gaulle knew that 'France would have to sign friendship treaties with Spain and Italy', establishing a powerful 'triangle' which would then be aided, 'under the Pope's influence', by the South American Catholic states. The success of this 'triangle' also depended on Vatican assistance 'to help French politics in Bavaria, Würtemberg and Baden-Baden for the creation of a federal state of Catholic Germany', detached from the Protestant majority.

The final link in de Gaulle's plan was a Central European Catholic Pan-Danubian Confederation, allied to Poland and the Baltic states. This would enable the detachment of Catholic Slavs from their Orthodox and Protestant countrymen, ensuring the collapse of Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia and large parts of the Soviet Union itself, thus contributing greatly to rolling back the Bolshevik menace. De Gaulle's plan was the first formal step in Intermarium's revival.

Gowen later reported to his superiors that through 'the winter of 1945–46 the propaganda effort in Italy diminished . . . However, Vajta Ferenc . . . succeeded in establishing himself in "Intermarium". His reputation as a conceited adventurer true to only money did much to drive the Hungarians away from "Intermarium".'[19] Vajta became a senior Intermarium leader, writing two books and propaganda for the Intermarium Bulletin.[20] He later 'elaborated for État Majeur and the [French] Foreign Minster' a number of 'confidential plans' for organising clandestine Balkan activities.

After July 1946 Vajta lived briefly in Innsbruck with the local French intelligence chief, who proposed that Vajta should direct all émigré operations from Paris. However, he declined this invitation because of a major disagreement, left the French zone with his closest comrades and relocated to Italy. He soon re-established the close contacts he had built with the Vatican and Italian Catholic politicians during the late 1930s when he had been a journalist in Rome. Soon after, 'the Vatican retired from the circle of French interest'.[21]

American intelligence established that in Rome Vajta 'started to work with the Jesuits. This line of work took him to Spain and Switzerland.'[22] Gowen discovered the reason for his 'disagreement' with the French, who had demanded that Vajta sign over his rights in a Hungarian bauxite mine 'in return for financial and political backing'. Vajta severed most of his contacts, as he no longer wished to be branded as 'a French spy' by the Hungarian Communists.[23]

Vajta had filled in important gaps about France's role in Intermarium's post-war resurrection, but he also explained the British connection. The origin of post-war British activities was traced to the establishment of a 'Central European Committee' by Prime Minister Churchill in early 1944. His aim was to create a Confederation of Central European nations under London's influence.[24] As the war ended, the Secret Intelligence Service (MI6) launched a sophisticated intelligence operation to recruit Central and Eastern European émigrés.

Vajta explained that SIS aimed to establish 'a political league against Bolshevism', and provide material aid to draw the exiles into the 'British circle' for anti-Soviet counter-espionage and paramilitary operations. The British had also established Masonic Lodges among the exiles, thereby attracting 'the most eminent leaders of the Balkans'.[25] Then, using 'their very best teams', many of whom had worked with Intermarium in the 1930s, SIS took the initiative from the French. Although British and French operations were tentatively co-ordinated, the two European powers had very different plans: London wanted total domination of Central Europe.

'The first British intelligence experts and specialists were already working in Austria in June 1945', and Vajta's French bosses ordered him to liaise with the SIS teams. The SIS men were 'very clever and very hard, harder even than the French and better prepared'. Vajta knew that they had penetrated agents among the émigrés, establishing intelligence centres in Graz and Klagenfurt in the British zone of Austria. By July 1945, '215 British agents had begun the battle for the peace, among them some of the most important Balkan experts.'[26]

The British were convinced that war would soon break out with the Soviets, so they collected everybody, 'it didn't matter who they were, where they came from, what party they belonged to, what ideology they proclaimed'. According to Vajta, the British 'gave succour even to Nazis and the Ustashi', and from the first they 'built military and terrorist centres among all the Balkan refugees. They were in a hurry and didn't want to lose any time,' and soon they had 'a magnificent organisation' which reached into the most obscure parts of the Balkans.[27] A network of émigré centres was set up in Italy, Austria, Germany, London and even Paris.[28]

Gowen was finally putting together the pieces of the Intermarium puzzle. 'During the latter part of 1945,' he wrote, '"Intermarium" was in embryo form and by the summer of 1946, it was a well developed organization . . . British and French intelligence took considerable interest in the development of the organization.'[29]

By late summer 1946, British intelligence had achieved 'an undeniable predominance' over their French rivals. Vajta admitted his own contacts with the SIS men, especially after closer French–British co-operation was established in the second half of 1946. He told the Americans that ultimately his 'discussions with the British were not successful, because they asked for too much'. There was at least one major point of agreement between Paris and London: the United States should be excluded from these clandestine operations. They adopted the slogan of 'Europe for the Europeans, without Russians and Americans. Make the United States fight the Russians and exploit the victory'.[30]

Gowen noted that by mid-1946, Intermarium was sufficiently strong for British intelligence to launch 'a large-scale propaganda campaign' in the Italian Displaced Persons camps. 'Apparently the organization had considerable sums at its disposition, for it printed and distributed a 14 page charter of the "Free Intermare" and began printing a bulletin in Rome.'

Gowen also noted that 'the propaganda became so strong at Fermo camp', where many Croatian war criminals had settled, that Father Krunoslav Draganović, Secretary of the Confraternity of San Girolamo in Rome, 'became Croat representative to "Intermarium" in a quasi-official capacity'. The official representative was Croatian Peasant Party leader, Vlatko Maček, who was in fact residing in Washington. In Rome, the man who gave Intermarium its most powerful influence with the Vatican was Father Draganović.[31]

Described by CIC as a 'prominent member of Intermarium', Draganović was the most important figure in the clandestine network. San Girolamo was the centre of the operation, supported by powerful figures in the Holy See hierarchy. Founded in 1453 with the patronage of Pope Nicholas V, San Girolamo has produced some of the most outstanding Croatian scholars, scientists, writers and priests. Like France, Croatia is one of the Church's most beloved nations, a Catholic bulwark against the Orthodox schismatics.[32]

After World War II, Father Draganović skilfully used the benevolence with which the Vatican viewed San Girolamo, to build a thoroughly professional Nazi-smuggling system. With the help of other fanatic Croatian nationalist clerics, the Institute became the headquarters of the Ratlines. Born in 1903 in Brčko, Bosnia, Draganović had been brought up to be a fiercely proud Croatian Catholic. After completing his education in Sarajevo and Vienna he studied theology, taking his vows in 1928. In 1932, Draganović went to Rome to study at the Papal Oriental Institute and the Jesuit Gregorian University. He stayed there until 1935, working in the Vatican Archives. He then became secretary to Bishop Ivan Šarić of Sarajevo, who achieved notoriety in the war as the 'hangman' of the Serbs during the Ustashi's bloody massacres.[33]

Draganović had returned to Rome in August 1943, representing the Ustashi and the Croatian Red Cross. This allowed him to build his escape routes for Nazi war criminals. He was supported by Croatia's Archbishop, Aloyius Stepinac, who had provided Draganović with introductions to influential Vatican contacts. As a result, he could move in the highest circles, meeting regularly with Secretary of State Maglione, and even with Pope Pius XII. He also had close contacts with Axis diplomats at the Vatican, which would later prove invaluable.

Draganović began lobbying the British in favour of the Pan-Danubian Confederation in early 1944 when he delivered a lengthy memo to the British Ambassador to the Vatican. He passed on proposals made by senior Ustashi ministers in Zagreb, which were sent to London via the Vatican. Although nothing came of this early contact, Draganović's London connection blossomed after the war.

Draganović established very close relations with senior Vatican figures, especially Assistant Secretary of State Montini, who helped him gain access to the Pope's Refugee Assistance Commission. By 1944, he was ready to open his Ratline. He depended heavily on the Pontifical Assistance Commission, from which he obtained large numbers of identity papers. Although many, perhaps most, were given to legitimate refugees, thousands helped fugitives make good their escape from justice.[34]

One of Draganović's most important lay colleagues was Intermarium's President, Miha Krek. Leader of the Catholic Slovene People's Party, and a close friend of Vajta, Krek worked for British intelligence.[35] Gowen noted that Krek 'is known to have wide connections' and that one of his principal > assistants is Kotnik Ciro, former Royal Yugoslav diplomat accredited to the Vatican. Kotnik who has been in Italy over twenty (20) years has built up a chain of useful contacts. Thus, in individual cases, Krek sends Kotnik to the Rome Questura [police] to 'fix up' the foreigners in Rome in whom Krek has an interest. This is relatively easy for Kotnik since he is the respected acquaintance of Dr Angelo de Fiore head of the Ufficio Stranieri [the Italian police section dealing with foreigners].[36]

Draganović's own contacts reached to the very top of the Italian Interior Ministry. The two men had another thing in common: high level Vatican contacts. Krek operated through the Slovene Assistant General of the Jesuits, Monsignor Anton Prešeren. The OSS reported that the Pope had received Krek and Prešeren 'in private audience' in November 1944. According to Italian intelligence, Prešeren was the leader of a powerful group of Slovenes inside the Vatican, which received 'a lot of help from the English'.[37]

Other British agents in Intermarium included the former Nazi Romanian Foreign Minister, Gregorij Gafençu; Casimir Papée, Poland's Ambassador to the Vatican; his fellow countryman, Myz-Mysin, who was the group's counter-espionage expert in Rome; Monsignor Ivan (John) Bučko, the 'spiritual leader of the Ukrainian resistance movement', who also had extremely good Vatican connections; and Ferdinand Durčansky, former Slovak Foreign and Interior Minister, and wanted war criminal. Even the Orthodox Serbs were represented at the Vatican by Dr Kosta Čukić, who was 'in charge of communications with the French', as the Italian secret service reported.[38]

The vast majority of Intermarium leaders were ex-Fascist leaders who worked either for British or French secret services, although there was also a fair sprinkling of Soviet agents. Needless to say, the CIC listed Ferenc Vajta as a senior Intermarium figure and its main propagandist in 1946 and 1947.[39]

Gowen was struck by the fact that many leading Intermarium figures also operated the Vatican-sponsored emigration bodies listed in La Vista's report. At the top of the list was Bishop Hudal of the Austrian committee, who ran the first crude escape networks while Intermarium was being organised: Father Draganović, Monsignor Prešeren, Bishop Bučko and Father Gallov were all active in Intermarium's Nazi-smuggling operations.[40]

William Gowen was reasonably sure that by developing his contacts with Vajta he would get to the bottom of the murky waters covering Intermarium. So he visited local police headquarters and 'arranged for the return of Vajta's documents from the Italians and continued the Intermarium investigation which led into a series of various channels'.[41]

Vajta explained that after arriving in Rome in September 1946, he quickly 'made contacts with various circles inside the Vatican', particularly with the Jesuits where fellow Intermarium leader, Monsignor Prešeren, was influential: they 'always supported my struggle'. As previously discussed, in October 1945 the OSS had identified the Jesuits as key Vatican agents involved in 'a penetration program' inside Communist-occupied areas.[42]

Vajta also 'worked especially closely with the Christian Democrats', and had 'lots of friends' in their top leadership.[43] On one occasion he negotiated a deal involving the Italian government and exiled Hungarian businessmen. Gowen reported that in 'the name of a group of businessmen in the French Zones of Austria and Germany, Vajta was responsible for negotiations with [the] Minister of Industry of the de Gasperi Italian Government. These negotiations were successfully concluded in August 1947.' The Hungarians re-established their industries in Italy, providing employment for a significant population, which might otherwise have looked to the Communists.[44]

After re-establishing his Church and Christian Democrat connections, Vajta extended his activities. In February 1947 he travelled to France and Spain where he obtained 'the help of the Archbishop of Toledo'. In Madrid he also contacted the local US Embassy, which discovered that Vajta was a friend of the former Polish Ambassador in Madrid, Marjan Szumlakowski, who assisted his work in Spain.

Vajta held discussions with Spanish Foreign Affairs officials which resulted in an agreement for the 'entry of Eastern Europeans into Spain'. The US Embassy commented that such people were 'not necessarily "pro-American" but favourable to Vajta's group'. In an obvious attempt to curry favour with US intelligence, Vajta also provided the Embassy with information on the Soviets' 'Tangiers network'.[45]

On his return to Rome, however, Vajta received a nasty shock: he was arrested 'as a war criminal'. Apparently the Hungarian government had organised this through Eugenio Reale, the Italian Communist Under Secretary of Foreign Affairs. 'At the time of my arrest, naturally the Church could do nothing for me,' Vajta said, emphasising that his close relations with them had 'remained intact'.[46]

After investigating the incident, Gowen reported that Vajta had taken up 'residence at the "Mediterranée" [hotel] on 10 April 1947 apparently after returning from Spain.' When he was arrested two days later he was 'interned in Regina Coeli jail', but on 26 April 'released despite the fact that he is on the official war criminal list and that Italy should automatically deliver him as such to the foreign authorities'.

Gowen reported that Vajta's release was 'believed to have been engineered by Pecorari, Secretary General of the Italian Demo-Christian Party, and Insabato, head of the Italian Agrarian Party. These two men are known to be in close contact with Vajta and to be in constant communication with him.'[47] Fausto Pecorari was also the Christian Democrat Vice-President of the Constituent Assembly.

Gowen further noted that Vajta had a close friend in the Pope's inner circle, one 'Padre Gallus of the Germanicum, the Pope's confessor'. The Germanicum is another of the colleges in Rome for German-speaking priests.[48]

Another example of Vajta's influence occurred soon after his release. About ten days before his arrest, one of his Hungarian friends had also been caught. Oliver Virtschologi-Rupprecht was the 'former editor of [the] Nazi daily Magyarsar', and 'one of the most notorious Nazi propagandists' in Hungary.[49]

Vajta arranged to save his friend through his influential Italian contacts. Gowen discovered this from Rupprecht himself, who later became one of his sources. The CIC Agent reported that Rupprecht had been > arrested under his mother's name Marconnay in Bolzano for illegal entry. Prior to his entry to Italy he had been cleared by [the] French I[ntelligence] S[ervice] at Innsbruck which also recognized as legal his change in name . . . While in Austria he is known to have worked for the French and to have seen Vajta. Subsequent to his arrest he was transferred to Regina Coeli jail in Rome. There he met Vajta who had just been arrested. Vajta boasted that he would shortly be released and that . . . [Rupprecht] . . . would also be set free.

Gowen then reported a truly remarkable event. After Vajta was freed, Rupprecht was transferred to Farfa Concentration Camp for 'undesirable foreigners'. One day he was summoned by the Camp Director 'who informed him that a telegram had been received from the Ministry of Interior' ordering his 'escape':

> The next morning V[irtschologi]-R[upprecht] was placed on a bus and brought to the Salarian highway 30 kilometres from the camp and released. However, in the Farfa files he is listed as escaped. This man is now in Rome in contact with this Agent . . . [who] . . . presumes that it was through 'Intermarium' that this escape was organized.[50]

The tables were slowly but surely turning in William Gowen's relationship with Ferenc Vajta. At first the American believed himself master of the situation, bleeding his source dry and building a detailed picture of the intelligence, political and Church figures who had encouraged and organised Intermarium's clandestine activities. Now, though, it was Vajta's turn to use the Special Agent.

At some point in this process, Gowen completely altered his outlook. Previously he had diligently searched for wanted Nazis and refused all their offers of co-operation. He had initially believed that Vajta was a 'war criminal' and 'a conceited adventurer true to only money'. By early July 1947, Gowen was strongly advocating that American intelligence should take over Intermarium; before long, the CIC officer was no longer hunting for Nazis, but recruiting them.

One of his first Nazi recruits was Vajta himself. Hungary had requested his extradition in January 1946, but neither the French nor the British complied, although he was in their custody at various times.[51] Vajta complained to Gowen that, in comparison, the Americans took Nazi-hunting too seriously, failing to 'differentiate between Nazis, traitors and those forced to collaborate'.[52] Vajta recalled that immediately after the war the Office of Strategic Services had placed him on the 'Black List' of wanted Nazis, making him liable for 'automatic arrest'. As a result he was rounded up by the CIC and detained at Dachau. As luck would have it, one of his fellow prisoners was the Crown Prince of Siam, and a 'British officer came to release the latter and upon recognising Vajta's name, brought him out of the Center as well'.[53] Like many Nazi collaborators, Vajta was simply considered too valuable to French and British intelligence operations to be handed back.

Gowen discovered the reason for this: Vajta worked for the Hungarian secret service before the war, and had contacts with several Western intelligence services. He had also been a senior Nazi propagandist for German-sponsored newspapers which spewed out 'an incessant pro-Nazi and anti-Semitic barrage that poisoned Hungarian public opinion and prepared the ground for the anti-Jewish measures adopted during the German occupation in 1944'.[54]

Vajta justified his activities on the grounds that there was an anti-Soviet war being fought, telling Gowen he was 'pro-German, but anti-Nazi'.[55] His propaganda, intelligence and political work render this excuse totally hollow. But Vajta contended that he had been a victim of the Nazis, claiming they had savagely attacked him in the press.

However, when this was investigated, the Americans found no evidence that he had been persecuted because of his alleged anti-Nazi activities. Rather, they determined that he had been a member of a pro-Nazi party and had 'allegedly denounced numerous anti-Nazis. Reputation generally unsavoury,' the US Embassy in Budapest concluded.[56] Further, between 1941 and 1944, Hungary's pro-Nazi governments frequently sent Vajta on special missions, including to Berlin, Istanbul (then a centre of intense espionage by the major powers) and a number of Balkan countries then actively collaborating with the Germans. Clearly Vajta was a trusted and loyal agent of the pro-Nazi regimes in Budapest, as shown by his 1944 promotion to Consul General in Vienna.[57]

Vajta's account of his activities on behalf of the Nazis clarified other things that Gowen had discovered about Intermarium. He found that during the war 'it was believed to have been an instrument of the German intelligence'. In fact, even before the war, German Military Intelligence (the Abwehr) used Intermarium members as '"agents of influence" abroad as well as reasonably reliable sources of information on the large émigré communities of Europe'.[58] It is an undisputed fact that by 1939, most Intermarium leaders had thrown in their lot with Hitler and the Nazis. After the war, they escaped punishment by helping British and French intelligence against the Soviets.

Vajta now wanted US support. 'You know, the United States was a horrible failure in Austria and Germany after the war. Our best experts put themselves at the disposal of the French and British services, seeing that in Salzburg and Frankfurt you Americans only wanted Jews, Sovietophiles and idiots. You believed that we were all Nazis, all collaborators, traitors and people with whom you couldn't work, whereas with the British and French we always found a very warm welcome.'

Gowen was hooked, wanting to know what could be done to rectify these past errors and establish an American presence in this vital field of intelligence and clandestine political work. 'The Vatican can and must play an historic role in this,' Vajta insisted > because it's also in its interests to win America for the real European reconstruction. The Vatican must assist us to come together, because even though the majority of Americans are Protestant, in the Danube's valleys there exists a dominant and traditional Catholicism, so America must look for the Holy See's help. From this collaboration a new and modern world can be born. We've had enough of small British and French intrigues. Now, at last, it's time to re-organise Eastern Europe in a way that the peace will be fruitful and we can return to some sort of equilibrium.

Gowen will still puzzled. What could America do? 'The British and French can't help us any longer economically, but the United States can,' Vajta said, pulling in his catch with some delight:

> If you want peace in the world you must look to a Danubian Confederation in which the liberty of all people will be recognised, with a healthy and traditional democracy. The time has come to create the grand unity of Europe and a Pan-Danubian Confederation composed of peoples of the same culture, of the same traditions. It's simply necessary to help it for it to be born. It would be in America's own interest to work with us and accept our demands. You could ensure the collaboration in such a way that you could become very important.[59]

Little is known of what Gowen reported to his superiors following his meetings with Vajta. It is known that the Special Agent wrote a detailed five page report, but less than one page was declassified for release to the authors. Vajta's arguments certainly swayed the American, as demonstrated by the few uncensored paragraphs. Gowen reminded his superiors that he had previously concluded that only the discovery of Intermarium's true source of funding could 'lead to the full understanding' of its activities.[60]

The next four pages were totally blacked out by the censors at Fort Meade in Maryland, but something of its flavour can be judged from his conclusions:

> The most outstanding feature of these complex activities is the inability of worthy anti-Communists to find a stable base of operations. No sooner do they start working in one direction than the government from which they have gotten backing changes policy.
>
> The second outstanding feature is the lack of United States activity in this, the larger intelligence field. While the Russians, British, and French have to build up artificial societies to further their ends, it is the opinion of this Agent, that only the friendly coordination of worthy elements by the United States would be necessary to build a firm base for future healthy European political development.

Vajta now had an influential American agent supporting his world view, reporting on it in very similar tones to his own and recommending it wholeheartedly to 'higher commands so that its full international importance [can] be evaluated'.[61]

Gowen went even further in a later report: Vajta 'is a key man as he has been active in the émigré and clandestine political field since 1932 when he became so engaged as per instructions of the Hungarian Ministry of Foreign Affairs. He has excellent Vatican, British, French and Spanish contacts.'[62]

As far as the American was concerned, Ferenc Vajta was no longer a wanted war criminal. It seemed as though he had cemented his place with yet another Western intelligence agency.

Undoubtedly this was due largely to his successful discussions with Gowen. He later recalled that American policy had changed 'in the first months of 1947', as Washington became more interested 'in the problems of Eastern Europe'. After 'recognising the danger of Communism', Vajta said, the Americans adopted a more concrete policy.[63] A further rude shock, however, was in store for both the Hungarian fugitive and his new American friend.

Two months after Gowen recommended that the United States become involved with Intermarium, the Hungarian government renewed its efforts to bring about Vajta's extradition. Italian foreign affairs official, Reale, filed an extradition order against Vajta and on 1 September this reached Italian Police Chief, Ferrari, who automatically had to send out an arrest warrant.

The Interior Ministry Police Chief had previously told the Hungarians Vajta was not in Rome at all. Gowen later reported that Vajta returned to Rome on 3 September, from a secret trip with Casimir Papée. An 'outstanding Polish diplomat', Papée had been at the Holy See since 1939,[64] and was also a leading Intermarium member. He was also well connected with Western intelligence; Gowen reported that on their trip they met with British and French intelligence officers.

Gowen heard rumours that orders were to be issued for Vajta's extradition. On his return, friends met him and warned of his impending arrest. Instead of returning to the Pensione Patrizia, he went immediately to Castelgandolfo, about twenty kilometres outside Rome. This is the village where the Pope has his summer residence. Although it is not certain that Vajta was actually hidden on Vatican property, Castelgandolfo was a favourite hideout for fugitive Nazis at this time, as will be seen in the next chapter.

On the morning of 4 September 1947, Vajta left Castelgandolfo and returned to Rome, where he had many friends. Gowen noted that Vajta's connections reached to the very top of the Christian Democrat party. Its leader and Italian Premier, Alcide de Gasperi, had personally guaranteed Vajta's safety. Gowen also observed that the French had issued Vajta with false papers on which he still travelled around Europe in relative security.

The CIC officer then got to the heart of the matter, reporting what had occurred on 4 September:

> This Agent had an appointment with Vajta at 1400 at a bar in Piazza Venezia, Rome. Upon meeting, the information pertaining to the arrest > orders was immediately passed on and Vajta took refuge with an Hungarian Jesuit father in the nearby Jesuit Gregorian University. This Agent thereupon left for Castelgandolfo, fearing that the orders might have already reached the village and that it would be unsafe for Vajta himself to return. Orders from the Police were already on hand but this Agent stated that Vajta had gone to Rome to the Police. As a result, Vajta's effects were taken away by this Agent.

>
> At 1730 this Agent picked up Vajta at the Gregorian University and left for Leghorn, arriving there that night. Vajta remained hidden in the Leghorn area the next day while this Agent returned to Rome. Vajta gave this Agent his false documents with which arrangements for flight from Italy would have to be made.
> Upon the return of this Agent to Rome, he conferred with [censored]. The latter, asked where he thought Vajta should be sent, replied that Spain would probably be the best as far as [censored] was concerned. This Agent stated that Vajta himself apparently wanted to go to Spain where he knew General Franco, the Spanish Foreign Minister Artajo, and the Cardinal Primate of Spain personally.[65]

Gowen then made the necessary arrangements for Vajta to travel to Spain, promising that US funding would be made available if the Hungarian could organise a new movement. Once in Spain, the fugitive immediately linked up with his old friend, Marjan Szumlakowski. Vajta decided to establish a new anti-Communist group, which he called the Continental Union. His aim was to attract émigré leaders away from the British-controlled Intermarium, and take them into Washington's orbit. To achieve this, he and Szumlakowski held negotiations with senior officials of General Franco's government. As a result, a new émigré centre was established in Madrid.

They also received the assistance of a senior Hungarian Catholic priest, Monsignor Zoltán Nyísztor, 'formerly head of the Vatican Press Office in Rome'. This enabled them to enlist the support of the Papal Nuncio in Madrid, who came 'to their aid in a strongly-worded four-page letter to Foreign Minister Artajo', warning that Intermarium had been 'penetrated by French and British freemasonry'. Following the Vatican diplomat's intervention, Artajo ordered his officers to assist Vajta and his Continental Union.

Monsignor Nyísztor also introduced Vajta to one of Spain's leading Vatican experts, Joaquin Ruiz-Giménez, the president of the government-controlled Spanish Cultural Institute. Ruiz-Giménez's important role in Spanish–Vatican relations was demonstrated soon afterwards when he was appointed as General

Franco's Ambassador to the Holy See. Having secured the support of this senior Spanish official, Vajta launched a vitriolic campaign against Intermarium, alleging that many Soviet agents had penetrated the groups working for British and French intelligence. This resulted in a purge of Intermarium leaders from the Eastern European section of the Spanish Cultural Institute.[66]

Vajta and Szumlakowski then entered into an agreement with Ruiz-Giménez and senior Foreign Office officials for Spain to 'officially tolerate and silently aid' the Continental Union's activities. Intermarium was to be discouraged, and political and counter-espionage contacts were established between the Spaniards and Vajta's group. The agreement provided for the free entry of Continental Union personnel into Spain, in exchange for intelligence on Soviet operations. The Cultural Institute provided 'silent' financial assistance for the Union to publish a cultural and information bulletin.

Vajta had succeeded yet again in establishing a powerful émigré centre, forcing former Intermarium figures to defect to the Continental Union. The Hungarian assured his American contacts that he did not want to 'get too close' to the Spaniards, as he was working towards firmer relations with US intelligence. To demonstrate his ability to provide good intelligence, he submitted a lengthy and detailed report on émigré affairs to the US Embassy, which stressed that Intermarium's British agents in Madrid were rapidly losing ground to his pro-US group.[67]

In pitching his line to the Americans, Vajta pointed out that 'the peoples of Europe are more favourable to American action than to Anglo-French action', especially after President Truman decided to take a strong anti-Communist line. However, he emphasised that the reaction in London and Paris to Washington's decision to 'put itself at the head of the anti-Communist campaign' had been to regroup, unifying their previously parallel campaigns to take 'united action not only against Communism but also against the U.S.' From intelligence he had gathered, he was certain that they planned for this 'silent struggle to become more spirited and stronger' by demonstrating that the most important émigré leaders were in their camp.[68]

Vajta's approach to the Americans was initially very successful, but soon he became a huge embarrassment to the US government. On 11 February 1948 the Army's Intelligence Division cabled the US European Headquarters Command. They ordered an immediate investigation into Gowen's connections with his Hungarian Nazi contact. The message pointed out that there had been a great deal of publicity about Vajta's arrival in the United States 'on visa issued by American Consulate Madrid Spain marked "Diplomat" also has letter of commendation signed by Gowen . . . stating Vajta had been of great assistance to Counter Intelligence Corps in Rome giving information on immigrants from Russian satellite states'. The message also reported that Vajta had been identified 'as Hungarian war criminal, Nazi stooge and directly responsible for murder of American airmen downed in Hungary'.[69]

This had all come to light after Vajta arrived in New York on 16 December 1947. Apparently Gowen handed over his contact to State Department intelligence which brought Vajta to Washington. The Hungarian fugitive was issued with his visa in Madrid after presenting 'letters from William Gowen . . . indicating US interest in trip'.* The Embassy had passed the details of Vajta's trip to an intelligence agency official, together with a list of people he wished to meet in America. These included Cardinal Spellman, Jesuit leader Father La Farge and a host of émigré political leaders Vajta hoped to entice into the Continental Union.[70] Another contact Vajta wished to see was senior State Department official, Franklin Gowen, father of his CIC sponsor.[71]

The main purpose of Vajta's trip was to enlist support for the Continental Union. Although he had acquired influential backers in US intelligence and diplomatic circles, his mission turned into a disaster. News of his arrival rapidly reached two well known journalists, Drew Pearson and Walter Winchell. Soon the government was enveloped in adverse publicity, and someone had to be held responsible.

Vajta was immediately arrested and held on Ellis Island, and on 3 February 1948 the Hungarians requested his extradition. A secret Congressional enquiry was soon underway, but its results have never been released. Vajta himself became something of a media celebrity, boasting to the press, truthfully, that Italian

*In a recent discussion, Gowen insisted that neither he nor any other CIC agent played a role in bringing Vajta to the United States. It is very plausible that the State Department removed evidence of its recruitment of Vajta and falsely implicated the CIC by placing Gowen's letter of introduction in Vajta's visa file.

Christian Democrat leader, Fausto Pecorari, had requested Rome's Chief of Police to issue various permits to him. Predictably, however, democratic Hungarian groups publicly denounced Vajta as a 'Nazi', a view with which the American courts ultimately concurred.[72] William Gowen's reports admitted not only his own involvement in Vajta's escape, but his close personal knowledge of the Vatican's role in hiding and assisting known Nazi fugitives. The special Agent's outlook was characterised by his belief that the storm then raging in Washington had been created by Hungarian Communists, who had somehow manipulated Drew Pearson into writing his article. In Gowen's view, the whole thing was a Communist provocation.[73]

Back in the United States, though, Vajta had become a public relations disaster for the government. The Immigration and Naturalization Service took action to have him summarily deported. Although he resisted through a series of legal appeals, he was finally thrown out in February 1950. Charles Ashman and Robert Wagman in their book, The Nazi Hunters, report that he went to Colombia after both Italy and Spain refused to have him back.

As the Americans did not want to return him to Hungary, which was still agitating for his surrender in 1950, it fell to the Holy See once more to extend its charitable hand to Vajta. According to Ashman and Wagman, 'the Vatican stepped in and arranged for Colombia to accept him, and for a small Catholic college there to employ him. He spent the rest of his life in Bogota as an economics professor.'[74]

By mid-1947, William Gowen had already recommended that America should ignore the Vatican's protection of an even more notorious Nazi mass murderer. As will be seen in the next chapter, he justified this because of the Holy see's contribution to the anti-Communist cause. After the publicity surrounding Hudal it may have been expected that the Vatican would become more circumspect. But Vajta was not the last of the Vatican's Nazi scandals. The worst was yet to come. For fugitive Nazis, all roads led to Rome.

A Staggering Blow to the Holy See

Ante Pavelić turned back to face the rising sun. Although the spring of 1945 was already some weeks old, the Slovene countryside was still cold and mist hung in the valleys and hollows. Despite the temperature, Pavelić wiped sweat from his brow. The fleeing dictator was now on foot, having abandoned his car on the clogged roads and joined the throng of refugees marching wearily towards Austria.

Pavelić reflected on the irony of his situation. A few days before he had been the Poglavnik of 'independent' Croatia, exercising comparable powers to the Führer in Germany. He had even managed to keep the death machine operating almost until the end, while the Germans were frantically dismantling theirs. Then, without warning the Nazis had capitulated. The Poglavnik was now just one of hundreds of thousands fleeing towards Austria to surrender to the British.

Pavelić recalled with bitterness his previous flight into exile in 1929. Then he had been a young man and an underground life – building his clandestine Ustashi terrorist network – had appealed to him. His twelve years abroad had seemed worthwhile, for in April 1941 he had assumed power in his beloved Croatia, even if the Italian Fascists and German Nazis exercised real authority behind the scenes.

The fugitive dictator had become used to power and wondered if he would ever taste it again. For Pavelić knew that if he fell into the wrong hands his future would be very short indeed. He hoped that his emissaries sent ahead into Austria had made the right contacts with British intelligence and the Catholic Church. If they had failed, only death awaited him.

Pavelić quivered, almost like a startled rabbit; he was sure he could see a motorised partisan unit in the distance. He turned again towards the Austrian frontier and broke into a desperate jog . . .

Such is the legend of Ante Pavelić's disappearance in May 1945, which has grown in the retelling over the years. Depending on which side is telling the story, his flight was either the end of the most glorious four years in Croatian history, or the country's liberation from a terrorist and mass murderer.[1]

It is impossible to know for sure the precise details of the Poglavnik's flight from his homeland. We do know that he fled from Zagreb to Austria via the Slovenian town of Maribor on the Yugoslav–Austrian frontier. However, both pro-Pavelić and pro-Tito accounts agree that panic was the predominant mood as the retreating Ustashi leadership fled for their lives ahead of the Communist forces.

Pavelić had many reasons for concern, among them the horrific massacres of Serbs, Jews and Gypsies over the previous four years; half a million innocent civilians slaughtered at his personal command. Many had been dispatched using extremely medieval methods; eyes had been gouged out, limbs severed, intestines and other internal organs ripped from the bodies of the living. Some were slaughtered like beasts, their throats cut from ear to ear with special knives. Others died from blows to their heads with sledgehammers. Many more were simply burned alive.[2]

Even so, Pavelić hoped to be greeted in Austria by both Church and British leaders as a prominent Catholic leader in the struggle against 'atheistic Bolshevism'. After all, British intelligence had maintained close pre-war relations with his underground terrorist network, even after the 1934 assassination of Yugoslav King Alexander in Marseilles. Pavelić also knew that the Holy See looked on Croatia as 'the frontier of Christianity'; a special relationship between Croatia and the Pope extended back to 700 AD.[3]

Apart from this strong historical connection, Pavelić was also aware that Pius XII and his senior advisers held extremely charitable opinions of his militant Catholicism. During the war Pavelić had forcibly converted tens of thousands of Serbian Orthodox under penalty of death. In fact, the atrocities were already underway at the very moment Pius XII received the Poglavnik in private audience in late April 1941.

The bureaucrats at the British Foreign Office reacted with outrage at 'the reception by the Pope of a notorious terrorist and murderer', describing Pius XII as 'the greatest moral coward of our age'. When pressed to justify the reception, the Vatican explained lamely that Pavelić had only been received in his private capacity, not as head of the Croatian state. They could not ignore a Catholic 'statesman' such as Pavelić, the Vatican replied. But the Foreign Office 'was indeed astonished and pained that the Vatican should so consider him even for a moment'.[4]

The British Ambassador to the Holy See found it difficult when he took up the matter personally with the ever charming Pius XII:

> . . . one approaches him with indignation in one's soul and protests on one's lips, [but] it is impossible not to be disarmed by his simplicity, humanity, friendliness and sincerity and by his devastating combination of saintliness and charm. One talks so easily to him, he listens so readily, responds so frankly and smiles so enchantingly and easily that one's carefully prepared attitude of dignified disapprobation just evaporates.[5]

The Pope called Pavelić 'a much maligned man'. Pius XII could not believe that he had been involved in the assassination at Marseilles, even though Pavelić had been convicted in absentia in a French court. The cynics back in the Foreign Office conceded that the Pope 'must indeed be a charmer', but told their Ambassador in no uncertain terms that his reception of Pavelić 'has done more to damage his reputation in this country than any other act since the war began'.[6]

It was hypocrisy of the most unbridled kind! Before the war, British intelligence had used Pavelić, despite his unsavoury reputation as a terrorist and murderer. Now, though, the Pope was to be thoroughly condemned merely for receiving him. Of course, times had changed, and Pavelić was massacring hundreds of thousands of innocents as part of Hitler's savage racial war. Surely the Holy Father would not stand aside and watch such ghastly deeds without raising the voice of Christian Charity?

A young Yugoslav by the name of Branko Bokun believed that the Pope could not. Bokun had been sent to Rome by one of Yugoslavia's intelligence chiefs to ask for the Vatican's intervention to stop the slaughter in Croatia. Armed with a large file of documents, eye witness accounts and even photographs of the massacres, Bokun finally gained entrance into the Vatican Secretariat of State in September 1941.

He wanted to deliver his file to Monsignor Giovanni Montini, Under Secretary of State for Ordinary Affairs, but could not gain an audience. Bokun was told to leave his file and come back a week later, with the promise that 'the Monsignor will give the matter careful consideration'.

This was at the height of the worst atrocities and Pavelić had taken steps of his own to influence Vatican opinion. He had dispatched Father Cherubino Seguić to Rome to counter the spreading horror with which the massacres were greeted in many Catholic circles. Seguić soon discovered that the Ustashi regime was viewed by many as 'a crowd of barbarians and cannibals'. He promply sought an audience with Montini, and recorded in his diary that the Vatican bureaucrat sought 'full information on the events in Croatia', also confirming that the 'calumnies' had reached the Monsignor's ears.[7]

Father Seguić seems to have had a persuasive effect on Montini. When Bokun returned to discuss his file detailing evidence of these 'calumnies', he received short shrift from Montini's secretary. Bokun was simply told that 'the atrocities described in your file are the work of the Communists, but maliciously attributed to the Catholics'. Bokun had the evidence but no access to Montini, while Seguić had no difficulty in presenting his side of the story.[8]

There is no doubt that Montini was well informed of the true situation, for on a number of occasions he castigated Croatia's representatives to the Holy See. While Montini would begin with harsh words, invariably these sessions concluded with assurances that the Holy Father would assist Catholic Croatia.[9]

The Pope's own attitude towards the murderous Ustashi leader was more than benign neglect. When Pavelić asked for another audience with the Holy Father in May 1943, he was assured by Secretary of State Maglione that 'there were no difficulties attached to the Poglavnik's visit to the Holy Father except that he could not be received as a sovereign'. Pius himself promised to give Pavelić his personal blessing again.[10] By this time, the Holy See possessed abundant evidence of the atrocities committed by his regime.

The Vatican has consistently defended its policy, pointing out that official Vatican recognition was denied Pavelić's state. However, senior Vatican officials, including Pius XII, regularly received his 'unofficial' diplomatic representative who called himself the 'Croatian Ambassador'. The Pope also continued to receive other senior officials and delegations, turning his face away from their countless victims.[11]

Pavelić's record was well known. On one occasion a visiting Italian Fascist journalist had been granted an interview with the Poglavnik. Noticing what appeared to be a large bowl of oysters, he had asked Pavelić whether they were from the Dalmatian coast. He was shocked when the dictator replied that they were forty pounds of Serbian eyes sent to him by his loyal Ustashi.[12]

On another occasion, Pavelić held discussions with Hitler in Berlin. In a strange reversal of roles, he castigated the Führer about the 'lenient' treatment of German Jews, boasting that in comparison he had completely solved the Jewish question in Croatia while some remained alive in the Third Reich.[13]

But when Hitler died, Pavelić could not be sure that even his staunchest Church supporters would offer him protection. He disappeared so completely that it was as though the Austrian countryside had suddenly opened up and swallowed him. In the following months, British and American intelligence combed the areas under their control. The Foreign Office and the State Department repeatedly told Tito's government that Pavelić would be returned to face trial as a war criminal, just as soon as he was found, but all they discovered were shadowy rumours.

The Communist government in Belgrade was sceptical of the West's repeated denials. Tito had a battle-hardened and extremely efficient intelligence network operating in Austria, tracking the Ustashi's movements. In July 1945 their Ambassador in London told the British that Pavelić had 'been made prisoner by the troops of Field Marshal Alexander, and . . . is now in the part of Austria under the control of the British Army'. In late August the Yugoslavs repeated their claim that Pavelić had 'been taken prisoner at Celovac (Klagenfurt), Austria, by British troops'.[14]

The Foreign Office was adamant that Pavelić had never been in their hands, and assured the cynical Yugoslavs that every 'effort is being made to discover the present whereabouts of Dr Pavelić'. Their 'energetic attempts' had 'produced no information except that Pavelić was still rumoured to be in the Saltzburg area on September 26th'.[15] Salzburg was not even in the British zone, having been occupied by the Americans.

There were still many leads for the British to follow. Serbian Četnik officers claimed that Pavelić was 'disguised as a monk in a monastery at Klagenfurt'; the Yugoslavs also alleged that he was in 'a villa not far from Klagenfurt'. The British conducted a 'thorough search' of the area 'without result' and finally decided that the fugitive must be in Soviet hands. They wrote to Foreign Minister Vyshinski, but received a negative reply.[16]

The Yugoslavs launched a vitriolic press campaign, claiming they had given the British 'precise information regarding the town and street' where Pavelić was living 'in complete freedom'. The Foreign Office decided that it was time for 'a little counter-battery work' and wrote to the Yugoslav Ambassador insisting that the Yugoslav press campaign 'was entirely without foundation'.[17]

The Yugoslav Ambassador persisted, telling the British in early January 1946 that Pavelić 'was disguised as a monk'. He asked if the British 'had no influence with the Vatican'. Tito was obviously convinced that the British were conniving with the Holy See to protect the Ustashi leader. The Foreign Office reacted with complete innocence, pointing everywhere else. They even asked their American ally if they perhaps had captured Pavelić, receiving yet another negative answer.[18]

Throughout 1946 the claims and denials went back and forth. The Yugoslav Communists sent diplomatic notes and directed their press to launch ever more hysterical campaigns. The message was always the same: the West could find Pavelić if they really wanted to, but refused because he and his supporters were being used in an anti-Tito crusade.[19]

The British response also became repetitive; 'especial efforts' had been made to trace Pavelić, who 'has at no time been in British custody, nor has his whereabouts ever been known to any British authority'. The Americans joined in these emphatic denials, stating that authorities 'in U.S. and British zones have searched diligently' for Pavelić 'without success'.[20]

As 1946 drew to a close, it had been eighteen months since Pavelić crossed the Austrian frontier and apparently disappeared into thin air. In examining the official files it is striking that they assume a significantly different tone in late November. Suddenly the Pavelić mystery was solved. A senior British Political Adviser reported that it was 'becoming increasingly clear that many of the more important quislings are taking refuge under the wing of the Church', pessimistically forecasting that little could be done 'unless the Vatican can be persuaded into active co-operation'.[21]

The British had found that five wanted Yugoslavs were 'at present in the Oriental Institution in Rome'. This was the Pope's institute specialising in Eastern European affairs, and enjoyed complete extraterritoriality. The Foreign Office feared that 'it would create a most unfortunate impression if the British authorities decided to arrest these men on Vatican property without any prior notice to the Vatican authorities'. They proposed to the Americans that they jointly tell Tito that 'since these traitors are resident on Vatican property, they are outside our jurisdiction, and that the Yugoslav Government should apply to the Vatican, to whom they have an accredited diplomatic representative'. The Americans were happy to go along with this cynical proposal.[22]

At last the British bureaucrats had someone to blame for Pavelić's disappearance. They noted on 18 December that it seemed 'more and more likely that Pavelić is in Italy and that his whereabouts may be known to Dr Draganović . . . and to no-one else'. The British had gathered detailed intelligence showing that Father Krunoslav Draganović, Secretary of the Croatian Institute of San Girolamo, was the main organiser of the Ratlines used by known war criminals to escape the Western dragnet. The Foreign Office believed the British Army's claim that it was 'unlikely that Pavelić has been in Austria since the British occupation, except possibly in transit'. They were certain that Draganović held the answer to the Poglavnik's disappearance.[23]

If Draganović's own version of his relationship with Pavelić can be believed, he thought the dictator was a brutal mass murderer, one of the 'most dangerous men' he had met in his whole life. Years later, Draganović maintained that he had repeatedly intervened with the Ustashi leadership during the war, begging for the lives of Jews, Serbs and even Communists.[24] The priest claimed that he had followed the commandments of Christian love, regardless of religion, politics or nationality. He bragged that this had endangered his own life, because the Ustashi strongly disapproved of his charitable work and forceful interventions. Draganović insisted that he took up his complaints with Pavelić himself.[25]

There is no independent corroboration of Draganović's account. If it is correct, it throws fascinating light on his post-war decision to aid this mass murderer, whom he rightly blamed for the extermination of innocent Serbs, Jews, Gypsies and others. Yet Western intelligence was certain that the two men were extremely close after the war, and that Pavelić could never have slipped through their dragnet without Draganović's charitable assistance.

Special Agent William Gowen and his colleagues in the Rome detachment of the US Army's Counter Intelligence Corps found out that their British ally had been lying all along: they knew a great deal about Pavelić's whereabouts. This emerged in early 1947 when American intelligence launched its own intensive operation in early 1947 to find Pavelić.[26] By the time the CIC investigations were concluded, it was established that Yugoslav intelligence had been right all along. According to 'reliable sources', Pavelić had indeed made it across the Austrian frontier and reached British lines, where he > was protected by the British in British-guarded and requisitioned quarters for a two (2) week period. Due to the insecurity of his position and due to the inevitable embarrassment of the British Command, he then left these quarters but remained in the British Occupation Zone for at least two (2) or three (3) months more still in contact with the British I[ntelligence] S[ervice].[27]

This confirmed what Ferenc Vajta had told Gowen about SIS's recruitment of the Ustashi immediately after hostilities had ceased. Gowen's colleague, Special CIC Agent Robert Mudd, was also working on the case, reporting on 30 January 1947 that the former Poglavnik had fled from Yugoslavia and taken refuge at Klagenfurt, where he 'had an apartment and a villa', just as the Četniks and Communists had previously claimed. This report provided further evidence of the Catholic Church's involvement.

In 'April of 1946 Pavelić left Austria and came to Rome accompanied only by an Ustashi lieutenant named Dochsen. Both men were dressed as Roman Catholic priests. They took refuge in a college there in Via Giacomo Belli, 3.' Pavelić's travelling companion was in fact Dragutin Došen, a former senior officer in the Poglavnik's Personal Body Guard. The British discovered that Došen was 'a leading light of San Girolamo (Draganović's HQ)'.[28]

Mudd's informant believed that Pavelić had taken refuge in a Vatican-protected college in Rome, although the authors could not verify this claim. The informant also reported that Pavelić had obtained a Spanish passport 'under the name of Don Pedro Gonner', in preparation for his eventual escape, probably to Spain or South America. However, in mid-1946 Pavelić was afraid that he was too closely monitored and instead of leaving Europe, he returned to Austria.

Mudd directed his informant 'to penetrate the Ustashi intelligence network', and report on their escape routes:

> . . . the network runs from Grumo–Rome–Venice–Trieste–Ljubljana–Zagreb. The whole affair is run under the cover of the Roman Catholic clergy whose priests in these monasteries are nearly all of Croatian extraction . . . The Ustashi organization in Italy is at present a tightly-knit group still maintaining its 'cell' organization, still publishing its papers, and still interested in the same aims that they professed before and during the war . . . the focal point of all intelligence and activity is the Monastery of Saint Jerome (sic), Via Tomacelli, 132, Rome.[29]

From a very confidential source, American intelligence had discovered in May 1946 that the Poglavnik was living 'close to Rome in a building which is under the jurisdiction of the Vatican'.[30] This was soon after Pavelić had first arrived in Rome from Austria, and it is now known that the Poglavnik, like Ferenc Vajta, actually took refuge at Castelgandolfo, where the Pope's summer residence is located. It seems that many Nazis gravitated to Castelgandolfo, for Pavelić was housed with a former Minister in the Nazi Romanian government.[31]

US intelligence received even more sensational information from their confidential source, who claimed that 'Pavelić holds frequent secret meetings with Monsignor Montini, the Under Secretary of State of the Holy See'.[32] Gowen was just then starting to piece together the Intermarium jigsaw puzzle. From what he had learned from Vajta, he was convinced that the Vatican was deeply implicated in some very unsavoury business. Information received by the US Embassy in Rome in early January 1947 claimed that Pavelić had been in San Girolamo the previous month, and was travelling under several aliases.[33] Suddenly Gowen was on to a major case. By late January, the American intelligence officer had collected enough evidence from 'reliable informants' to report that Pavelić > is at the present time in the extra-territorial walled-in compound on the left bank of the Tiber, at Lungo Tevere Aventino, Rome. This compound has within its walls five Catholic organizations . . . 1) The Monastery of St. Sabina of the Dominican Order; 2) The St. Alessio School for Roman Studies; 3) The Cavaliers of the Sovereign Military Order of Malta; 4) The Benedictine Monastery of St. Anselmo; 5) A children's school run by Nuns. The compound is situated on top of the Aventine Hill which . . . is reputedly honeycombed with subterranean tunnels which link the individual buildings.[34]

Having 'carefully checked' the compound, Gowen concluded that Pavelić was probably in the Monastery of St Sabina, reporting that other 'information from reliable informants tends to show that the tram line running beneath the Aventine Hill along the Tiber and thence to the Circus Maximus, the Colosseum and Via Cavour is the connecting link between Pavelić and Via Cavour, 210 int. 3, which is an Ustascia base well known in Rome'. Although we were unable to vertify the existence of an underground tunnel linking Pavelić with his loyal Ustashi supporters, Gowen attached a map to his report showing the route he believed it took to the tramline.[35]

Gowen seemed to have finally uncovered a concrete lead in the mysterious Pavelić case. He was still cautious, though, reporting that 'the information seems plausible and paints a plausible picture when it is taken as a whole'. However, he believed that only 'action against such known Pavelić contacts as Draganović, Krunoslav can ultimately reveal the hiding place of Pavelić and lead to his apprehension'.[36]

The net seemed to be finally closing and all fingers, from the British Foreign Office to the US Army's CIC, were now pointing at Father Draganović as the man who could lead to Pavelić's arrest and extradition. The focus of the Yugoslav press campaign now shifted to the Vatican. They claimed 'that a number of Yugoslav war criminals had been enabled to emigate from Italy under the protection of a Vatican institution'.[37]

US intelligence launched a comprehensive operation to establish the truth, quickly confirming that Draganović was in close contact with the former Croatian dictator all along. According to one report, Draganović was 'known as the "alter ego" of Ante Pavelić', with whom he maintained close relations. Indeed, Draganović operated a regular courier service between San Girolamo and the Poglavnik's Austrian hideout.[38]

After establishing the close relations between the two men, the Americans convened a top secret conference on 11 April 1947 to plan Pavelić's arrest. The US Army's senior Rome intelligence officers were all present to review the information available and put in motion a plan to penetrate Pavelić's Vatican network.[39]

Over the following weeks CIC officers received information that he was hiding in one Vatican-controlled institution or another. They also discovered more of the fugitive's aliases. The Jesuits were among his closest Church helpers at this time, assisting his plans to leave Italy by arranging for his passage to Spain under the alias of Padre Gomez, supposedly 'a Spanish Minister of Religion'.[40]

The barrage of reports that Pavelić had taken refuge under the wing of the Vatican forced a senior State Department official to ask the diplomats at the Vatican to make inquiries. He cynically pointed out:

> 'while I am aware of, and appreciate, the Vatican's humanitarian attitude towards criminals who may have shown any indication of repentance, it seems to me that Pavelić's peculiarly unsavory record would make it difficult for the Church to afford him protection.'

Washington was apparently in no hurry to receive a reply; there 'is no urgency about this case, but I should appreciate hearing anything you may be able to turn up'.[41] In Rome they evidently took this hint, taking over two months to report that they had not been able to confirm the wanted man's whereabouts; 'Pavelić, like Kilroy, seems to be everywhere. Or so the reports of dozens of sleuths would indicate.'[42]

By mid-June, the Foreign Office was also involved in the hunt, proposing that every effort be made to catch Pavelić. Apparently a huge chasm of mistrust existed between Washington and London. The British suspected that the Americans were deliberately sabotaging the plan, by insisting that the Italian police had to be involved in the operation, because 'from a practical point of view there is a far greater danger of a leakage or of inefficient handling'.[43] Ustashi intelligence was especially efficient in Rome, where they had extremely good connections with the Italian police, who had sponsored Pavelić during his exile in the 1930s.

This British position was cynically dishonest; while SIS protected Pavelić, the Foreign Office complained of US efforts to sabotage the plan to apprehend him. As we shall see, both governments were involved in devious and often conflicting machinations at higher policy making levels.

By mid-July the British had also received information that Pavelić was living 'within the Vatican city' and proposed a joint operation to arrest him.[44] The reluctant Americans agreed, but only if Pavelić's arrest was 'carried out to [the] greatest extent possible by [the] Italians'.[45] The British again warned against the risks of Italian involvement, insisting on 'the closest supervision of the whole operation by the Allied Security authorities'.[46]

On 28 July the State Department issued unenthusiastic instructions for American authorities to participate 'to [the] extent necessary and possible in [the] Pavelić case'.[47] The following day, the US Political Adviser in Rome passed this order on to the Supreme Allied Commander, still insisting that US forces would only 'assist the Italian authorities in endeavouring to arrest him at a suitable opportunity outside Vatican territory'. His British counterpart followed suit on 2 August.[48]

In fact, British and American officials were playing bureaucratic chess. The intelligence operatives on the scene were merely their pawns and really did not understand the game's rules. The British hoped to blame the Americans if the operation failed, while the Americans were desperate to force the British to make the arrest so they could claim that they were not responsible.

In this game, the British finally forced their ally to 'supervise the arrest' and it seemed that finally, after more than two years of prevarication, action was about to be taken.[49] On 7 August the US Deputy Chief of Staff at Allied Force Headquarters noted that it would 'be an extremely tricky operation requiring elaborate coordination between the U.S., British and Italian authorities and the maintenance of absolute secrecy'.[50]

Updated information was then collected on Pavelić's exact location, and it was discovered that he was 'hiding as an ex-Hungarian General under the name of "Giuseppe". He wears a small pointed beard and has his hair cut short'. Further, he > is living on Church property under the protection of the Vatican, at Via Giacoma Venezian No. 17-C, second floor. On entering the building you go along a long and dark corridor. At the end of the corridor there are two stairs, one to the left and one to the right. You must take the right. On the right the rooms are numbered 1, 2, 3 etc. If you knock once or twice at door No. 3 an unimportant person will come out. But if you knock three times at door No. 3, door No. 2 will open. It leads to the room where Pavelić lives, together with the famous Bulgarian terrorist Vancia Mikoiloff (sic) and two other persons.

> About twelve other men live in the building. They are all Ustasha and make up Pavelić's bodyguard.
>
> When Pavelić goes out he uses a car with a Vatican (SCV) number-plate.[51]

News of the Poglavnik's hiding place in Via Giacoma Venezian belatedly reached the Italian public in September 1948, when the press published a sensational series of articles dealing with the Vatican's role in the affair. By then, Pavelić was long gone, perhaps explaining why someone in Western intelligence leaked the story to the newspapers.[52]

Twelve months earlier, US intelligence had investigated Via Giacoma Venezian 17-C. They suspected that it was one of the Vatican's libraries, although we have not been able to confirm this. But they did confirm that some senior Vatican official was protecting Pavelić: he regularly travelled around in their official cars. As these bore the special number plates of the Diplomatic Corps, the Western authorities could not stop them, even when Pavelić left Vatican territory.

However, everything seemed in place; the joint intelligence team only had to quietly observe Pavelić, and when he left the Vatican's extraterritorial protection, follow him until he alighted from his Vatican car and arrest him. Three weeks went by and nothing happened, prompting London to ask Rome to 'report recent developments'. Another six weeks elapsed but still no answer was forthcoming; the Foreign Office grew agitated and again asked for a response.[53]

Eventually the operation was allowed to quietly die. The apparent determination to arrest this notorious Nazi mass murderer disappeared, just as Pavelić himself had seemingly done in May 1945. The answers to this further mystery are partially found in three key American intelligence documents. On 7 July 1947 Bernard Grennan, Chief of CIC Operations in Rome, directed his Supervising Agent, Gono Morena, to take Pavelić 'into custody on sight'. The order had come down the line from the Assistant Chief of Staff of Army Intelligence.

One week later, a handwritten note was added to Grennan's memo by Morena. He had received 'new instructions', which he summarised with a brief but all too obvious comment:

'Hands Off'

The order was passed to Morena by Grennan and Lieutenant Colonel Charles Hartman, the commander of Army Counter Intelligence in Rome. Grennan and Hartman were at the top level conference held on 11 April to plan the operation, and must have been astounded by this sudden change of direction.[54] Evidently someone much higher up the chain had already decided to sabotage the operation, even before it had been finalised. The senior American officers certainly passed the 'Hands Off' decision down their chain of command. From all the available evidence, however, it seems probable that the original decision was taken by British intelligence officers, who were the fugitive's real sponsors.

The American motive for quietly going along with London's decision to allow Pavelić's escape was really very simple. Senior US officials were then developing their own network of ex-Nazis, and were beginning to co-ordinate activities with both the Vatican and London.

The 'Hands Off' policy came into effect just eight days after Gowen completed his report on wanted Hungarian war criminal Ferenc Vajta and the Vatican connection. Gowen recommended on 6 July that American intelligence should take over Intermarium, passing his views up to 'higher commands so that its full international importance [can] be evaluated'.[55]

Gowen had certainly worked out which way the wind was blowing. No one cared about Nazis as long as they were anti-Communist. Nearly two months after the 'Hands Off' policy was decided, Gowen and another officer submitted a lengthy report on the Pavelić case. They noted, with a great deal of charity, that though 'fanatically anti-Serb and to a lesser degree anti-Orthodox, Pavelić is a cultured person and a social liberal'. They had to admit, though, that > during the early months of the Pavelić regime about 150,000 persons of the Serb Orthodox faith were slaughtered – in many cases, it is a matter of record, they were offered salvation if they renounced their faith and became Catholics.

>
> Thus, today, in the eyes of the Vatican, Pavelić is a militant Catholic, a man who erred, but who erred fighting for Catholicism. It is for this reason that [Pavelić] now enjoys Vatican protection . . . Pavelić is known to be in contact with the Vatican which sees in him the militant Catholic who yesterday fought the Orthodox Church and today is fighting Communist atheism . . .
>
> For the reasons given above he is receiving the protection of the Vatican whose view of the entire 'Pavelić Question' is that, since the Croat State does not exist and, since the Tito regime cannot be expected to give anybody a fair trial, [Pavelić] should not be turned over to the present Yugoslav regime with the excuse of bringing him to justice. The extradition of Pavelić would only weaken the forces fighting atheism and aid Communism in its fight against the Church.[56]

The CIC agents were still a little uncomfortable with the Holy See's approach, so they went to some lengths to explain fully the Vatican's justification for its immoral policy:

> Pavelić's crimes of the past cannot be forgotten, but he can only be tried by Croats representing a Christian and Democratic Government, the Vatican maintains. While Pavelić is allegedly responsible for the deaths of 150,000 persons, Tito is the agent of Stalin, who is responsible for the deaths of tens of millions of persons in the Ukraine, White Russia, Poland, the Baltic and the Balkan States over a period of twenty-five (25) years.[57]

Gowen and his colleague were also certain that Pavelić 'is today being supported and exploited by some power' other than the Vatican. As Pavelić had been 'protected by the British in British-guarded and requisitioned quarters' when he first arrived in Austria in May 1945, and knowing 'something of the British Intelligence system', the CIC officers were sure that this power was the United Kingdom.

They further pointed out that even Pavelić's arch enemies, the pro-Royalist Serbian Četniks, believed that 'he ought not to be turned over to Tito at the present time since his trial would be used as a basis for more anti-American and pro-Communist propaganda'. So the CIC officers recommended > that the Vatican and Chetnik views of Pavelić be appreciated and that no direct police action be taken against him on the part of the American Military Authorities. Such action would force his extradition to Tito and would bolster the present British anti-American campaign be (sic) waged among the political émigrés in Western Europe.[58]

The US intelligence officers were referring here to the long-standing British campaign to denigrate America in the eyes of the Nazi émigrés. They hoped to exclude the Americans from all aspects of the clandestine intelligence and military operations they had organised over the previous two years.

The CIC officers were aware that the British campaign included the claim that the Americans had returned many innocent anti-Communists to Yugoslavia. They commented that in 'the case of the Croats the British state that while they have only extradited seven (7) Croats from Italy the United States had extradited ninety-eight (98) from Austria'. It was completely false, but nonetheless a very effective propaganda tool in Britain's anti-American campaign. US intelligence was by then fully aware that SIS were recruiting ex-Nazis for their anti-Communist crusade.[59]

A post facto rationale was found to justify the 'Hands Off' policy. Neither the British nor the Americans were serious about apprehending Pavelić and sending him back to Tito's 'justice'. The bureaucrats in London and Washington formally favoured this course, while turning a blind eye to the activities of their intelligence services. SIS was then mounting major political, intelligence and military operations against Tito. Using Pavelić's followers, they wanted to overthrow the Communist government in Belgrade. Some sympathetic Americans were already working on these operations without official sanction. They, too, saw the Ustashi as useful weapons in the anti-Communist struggle.

Clearly, if the Americans handed over the head of the movement to the enemy, it would be impossible to expect loyalty from the Ustashi rank and file. The solution was clear: Britain must 'be forced to arrest and extradite him themselves. The ultimate disposal of Pavelić is necessary if the Croat democratic and resistance forces are to ever be recognized by the United States.'[60]

'Disposal', of course, meant escape, and the Holy See was the perfect 'fall guy' to shoulder the blame for smuggling Pavelić. The Vatican had the most to lose if he was handed over to the Communists. Soon after he helped Vajta to leave Rome, Gowen wrote a final report:

> Pavelić's contacts are so high and his present position is so compromising to the Vatican, that any extradition of [Pavelić] would deal a staggering blow to the Roman Catholic Church.[61]

Ante Pavelić was once again allowed to disappear into thin air. The names of his high level contacts inside the Holy See's bureaucracy are still highly classified. As seen earlier, at least one US intelligence source believed that it was Monsignor Giovanni Montini, the Pope's Under Secretary of State for Ordinary Affairs, and later Pope Paul VI. This is dismissed by present day senior Vatican bureaucrat, Monsignor Milan Simčić, who was Father Draganović's close colleague in Rome at that time.

Although Simčić rejected the claim that Montini was involved with the Poglavnik, he was absolutely certain that Pavelić was in close contact with Draganović. Simčić insisted that Draganović and Montini were also extremely close, suggesting the strong possibility that Montini, the future Pope, may have known of Pavelić's escape.[62]

A few months after Gowen's suggestion for the 'ultimate disposal' of Pavelić, the fugitive re-emerged in Argentina, where dictator

Juan Perón employed him as a 'security adviser'. There is considerable debate about exactly how the Poglavnik made good his final escape. What is known is that he departed Italy on 13 September 1947, arriving in Buenos Aires on 6 November aboard the Italian ship SS Sestriere, travelling under the name of Pablo Aranyos.

In the early 1950s, Avro Manhattan, a bitter critic of the Vatican and Catholicism, claimed that Father Draganović not only provided the Red Cross passport Pavelić used and arranged the shipping details, but actually accompanied the fugitive war criminal to Buenos Aires and stayed with him for twelve months. Despite Manhattan's religious bigotry, he was very well informed, having worked for British intelligence during the war.[63]

As late as 1986, this was still the 'semi-official' story peddled by the Yugoslav secret police, UDBA, in a series of articles in the Sarajevo-based Svijet magazine.[64] However, new evidence has recently emerged which suggests a different version. In early 1990 a secret Communist intelligence file was smuggled out of Eastern Europe to the authors. Although the identity of the Communists' source was not disclosed, whoever it was had intimate contact with the Poglavnik, his family and closest associates, as minute details of events and conversations were provided.[65]

The document confirms that Pavelić and Draganović met on numerous occasions, and the priest did in fact procure the Red Cross passport in the name of Pablo Aranyos, supposedly a Hungarian refugee. But according to this source, the two men had some kind of falling out. Draganović proposed that Pavelić leave Rome by air, and as this was thought too dangerous by the fugitive's closest advisers, the priest was cut out of the final preparations.

There is absolutely no mention in the Communist police file of Draganović accompanying the Poglavnik to Argentina. According to the source, the man who allegedly made the final arrangements was also a Croatian priest, by the name of Father Jole. His real identity is Father Josip Bujanović, another wanted war criminal now living peacefully in Australia.

This version of events is basically confirmed by Draganović's close colleague, Monsignor Simčić. In a taped interview, he freely admitted that Pavelić had asked Draganović to assist his escape. Simčić insisted that Draganović was working on smuggling the wanted man out of Italy. He was certain, though, that Pavelić eventually made other arrangements. This would seem to be the case, as the evidence points to Pavelić using his extremely influential contacts in the Italian secret service to make his escape. Whatever method Pavelić used, there is no doubt about Draganović's role in arranging the Vatican's protection prior to his embarkation, and providing him with the necessary travel documents.[66]

Further, Draganović had gone to considerable trouble to arrange to have Pavelić met when he reached Argentina. The ground had been very carefully prepared. According to US intelligence, one Daniel Crljen had been flown to Buenos Aires with Vatican assistance to 'confer with Gen[eral] Perón on the organization of an Ustasha "Elite" movement in the Argentine'.[67] Crljen was one of the movement's senior ideologues and propagandists, having played a key role in instigating the slaughter of Serbs during the war.

Crljen's mission had certainly been successful; Pavelić's arrival merely completed the transfer of almost his entire government to Argentina. Those veterans waiting to greet him included nearly every surviving cabinet minister, as well as many municipal officers, military and police commanders. Most were wanted war criminals, yet they too had evaded justice, using the same method as their Poglavnik.

Draganović's Ratline was a sophisticated and professional operation. It was extremely well organised and could handle hundreds of fugitives at one time. One of Draganović's key operatives estimates that as many as 30,000 people were funnelled from Austria to Rome, on to Genóa and new homes in North and South America and Australia.[68] Most of those running the Ratline had very shady pasts of their own. They were not part of some exotic SS 'brotherhood'. In fact, nearly all the personnel running the smuggling network were Croatian Catholic priests.

Ratline

It is absurd to believe that 30,000 fugitive Nazis escaped to South America on the few U-Boats remaining at the end of the war, or that they all made their own travel arrangements. Modern popular culture has presented the escape of the Nazis in an adventurous, almost romantic light. The most popular Nazi-smugglers are ODESSA and Die Spinne, although other mysterious groups are also mentioned from time to time. But in the main these stories owe more to the fertile imagination of script writers and novelists than to historical research and accuracy.

The truth is much more ordinary, almost mundane. It is all the more shocking as a result. For whatever successes ODESSA achieved, they were mere amateurs at Nazi-smuggling when compared with the Vatican. Draganović's Ratline was truly professional, ensuring that many guilty war criminals reached safe havens. Often they did not end up in the remote jungles of South America, but settled instead in Britain, Canada, Australia and the United States.

Most Nazi mass murderers were in fact not even German. At the end of World War II, there were tens of thousands of Central and Eastern European Nazi collaborators who were just as guilty as their German sponsors. They were the leaders of Nazi puppet governments, municipal officials, police chiefs and members of local auxiliary police units which had carried out the Holocaust. Many were on Allied 'Black Lists', either because they were individually known to have ordered or committed war crimes, or because they were members of units which had done the Nazis' bloody work.

These were the people of most concern to Father Krunoslav Draganović, Secretary of the Croatian Institute of San Girolamo in Rome. Draganović was well known for his deep sympathy for the Croatian Ustashi, even those who had committed war crimes. Many relatively innocent Croatians had been cynically returned by the British to certain death at the hands of Tito's Communist government in May 1945 But many horrendously guilty war criminals escaped, and were being hunted by Western intelligence. According to Draganović, their real crime was their anti-Communist nationalism.

The Ustashi were the first to be protected by Draganović. Britain and the United States decided after the war that Ustashi atrocities were so horrific that all proven members would be handed over to the Communist government, a policy never actually implemented due to a dramatic change of heart in Washington.[1]

Official Vatican historian, Father Robert Graham, admits Draganović's role. Graham initially described those helped by Draganović as 'Croatian refugees', but then conceded that many were Ustashi members. 'I've no doubt that Draganović was extremely active in syphoning off his Croatian Ustashi friends.' But Father Draganović, like Bishop Hudal, was not the Vatican. 'Just because he's a priest doesn't mean he represents the Vatican. It was his own operation. He's not the Vatican.'[2]

However, this explanation is not supported by the facts. As recounted earlier, Draganović had been in Rome since August 1943, negotiating for Pavelić at the Vatican and working for the Croatian Red Cross. Pavelić's plans for a smuggling network were already well advanced. US intelligence reported a few months later 'that the Pavelić Government has purchased sixty Argentine passports for evacuation purposes. Funds have been transferred to Argentina.'[3]

Draganović was the key man in setting up this Ratline. He established contacts with Pius XII, as well as senior officials of the Vatican Secretariat of State and Italian intelligence. His most important connection was with Monsignor Montini, Under Secretary of State for Ordinary Affairs, and the man responsible for the Pope's charitable work for refugees.

Like Bishop Hudal, Draganović also received very favourable treatment from the Allied authorities. In late 1944 the Vatican requested that he be permitted to visit the camps where his fellow countrymen were housed. Although Draganović was well known to Western diplomats as a fanatic Ustashi, Allied intelligence gave him carte blanche. Using American travel papers, he then ventured out from Rome in May 1945. Travelling in an American car, he visited northern Italy and the regions around Klagenfurt and Villach on the Austrian–Yugoslav border. Here he made contact with senior Ustashi leaders, and also with other Fascist priests who worked on the Ratline.[4]

Draganović's smuggling network was organised around the Brotherhood of San Girolamo, which took its name from the Institute at Via Tomacelli 132. This was the central base for the operation. The Brotherhood's Committee consisted of Monsignor Juraj Magjerec, President and Rector of the Institute; Deputy President and Treasurer, Father Dominik Mandić, assisted by Vitomir Naletilić; and Secretary, Father Krunoslav Draganović. The Brotherhood was soon recognised as the official Croatian Committee of the Pontifical Welfare Commission, the Pope's own refugee assistance body.[5]

This was a powerful base on which to build the network's ever expanding operation. Ostensibly the Croatian Committee offered moral and material assistance to refugees. But, through the Pontifical Commission, they also maintained close connections with the International Red Cross and the Allied authorities in Italy. Draganović had especially close relations with two Western intelligence officers, Colonel C. Findlay, the Director of the Displaced Persons and Repatriation section of the occupation force, and his assistant, Major Simcock. This proved invaluable, for these officers were only too willing to assist the priest's clandestine activities.

Draganović also had close relations with important Italian officials, especially the Minister of Internal Affairs, Dr Migliore, who directed the Italian secret service and the police section dealing with refugees in Italy. Draganović reached an agreement with Migliore to gain unofficial Italian support for his Ratline, especially from the foreigners section of the Questura.[6]

Through this web of influential contacts, Draganović built a sophisticated network, stretching through Italy, Austria and Germany. The official Croatian Committee of the Pope's Refugee Commission was able to send its agents out to visit the numerous camps where the fugitive Nazi war criminals had taken refuge. Most of these agents were Croatian Catholic priests, and while much of their spiritual and material work consisted of helping the sick, invalids, widows and genuine refugees, there was plenty of time to assist the fugitives.[7]

In the course of researching this book a number of visits were made to the Institute of San Girolamo in Rome, searching for eye witnesses to Draganović's activities. The current Rector, Ratko Perić, was initially cool, absurdly claiming that Draganović had never been an important figure. However, Perić suggested we talk with a priest who was actually there. Monsignor Milan Simčić was one of Draganović's closest colleagues in the smuggling network. Through Simčić, contact was established with Father Vilim Cecelja and Monsignor Karlo Petranović, also close colleagues in the Ratline. Each of these Croatian priests spoke freely about their important roles in the smuggling network.

The First Priest

The smuggling operation started in Austria, where Father Cecelja was the link to Rome. Cecelja died a few months after he gave a taped interview in which he vividly recalled his work on the Ratline. His last years were spent in a picturesque village just outside Salzburg where he was cared for by the nuns of the Maria Pline convent. By then in his eighties, Cecelja was a small man with a pronounced stoop, and in obvious poor health. He was still immensely proud of his important role for his beloved Croatia. Although critical of the Ustashi for giving Croatians 'a bad name', he showed neither guilt nor remorse for his own important post in the Ustashi.

Cecelja freely admitted his senior post of military chaplain in the wartime Ustashi forces.[8] In fact, he was Deputy Military Vicar to the Ustashi militia (as opposed to the ordinary Croatian Army, which took little part in the atrocities) with the rank of Lieutenant Colonel. He was appointed by Pavelić himself in October 1941 and later confirmed by his close friend, Archbishop (later Cardinal) Aloyius Stepinac.

Cecelja was unashamed about being listed by Tito's government as 'war criminal number 7103'. While he criticised the Ustashi in 1989, he had previously been extremely proud of his membership. Ten days after Pavelić was put into power by the Nazis, the official Ustashi newspaper, Hrvatski Narod (Croatian Nation), published a lengthy interview with Cecelja. Headlined 'The Ustashi Priest Cecelja', it was a contemporary account of his true attitudes.

Cecelja boasted of his important role in the movement's illegal pre-war activities in Zagreb, where many underground Ustashi leaders had secretly met at his vicarage. He admitted his secret

Ustashi membership, proudly describing the ritual oath he had taken before two candles, a crucifix and crossed dagger and revolver. This entitled him to the revered title of 'Sworn Ustasha', which only pre-war veterans were allowed to use. The Fascist priest later presented Pavelić with his crucifix and candles as a sign of devotion. Cecelja also spoke with pride of his leading role in organising 800 peasants to fight alongside the Nazi invaders.

When a priest was required to officiate at Pavelić's swearing in ceremony, Cecelja was only too pleased to do the job. He administered the oath to his Poglavnik, giving the Church's blessing to the Nazi puppet regime. Shortly after, Cecelja publicly 'greeted the moment of freedom with delight', openly proclaiming his close connections with senior Ustashi cabinet ministers, like Mile Budak. A few weeks later, Budak publicly announced the fate of the two million Serbs in Croatia: one third were to be killed, another deported and the rest forcibly converted to Catholicism. Cecelja, however, did not amend his benign attitude towards Budak.[9]

Cecelja's subsequent attitude toward the Ustashi is very puzzling. From the safety of half a century, he criticised his old comrades. But during the vital period when they were carrying out some of the worst massacres of World War II, he was a loyal adherent. This is shown by his inclusion in Pavelić's official delegation to Rome in 1941, which was blessed by Pius XII at the Vatican on 17 May. By then the dictator's anti-Serbian and anti-Jewish laws had already been proclaimed and the genocide was underway. The delegation's main 'achievement' was to cede the Dalmatian coast to Italy, hardly an act of Croatian patriotism.[10]

In view of prevailing conditions in Croatia during the war, it is impossible that Lieutenant Colonel Father Cecelja could have been unaware of the murder of hundreds of thousands of Serbs, Jews and Gypsies. Yet he admits to remaining at his post until the worst excesses had been perpetrated, although he did not mention the high decoration bestowed on him by his beloved Poglavnik.[11] It was only in May 1944 that he finally abandoned his post to go to Vienna, allegedly to care for wounded Croatian troops. His real task was to prepare the Austrian end of the escape network, for he also founded the local branch of the Croatian Red Cross, which provided ideal cover for his illegal work.

In his interview, Cecelja claimed that he was 'a member of the Central Headquarters of the International Red Cross during the war'.[12] In fact, the IRC refused officially to recognise the Croatian Red Cross, although it did provide a great deal of unofficial assistance. Cecelja's control of the Austrian section of this body proved vitally important to Draganović's Ratline operation.[13]

An American diplomat subsequently exonerated Cecelja of all charges of Nazi collaboration. The US Consul in Zagreb claimed that he had been banished by Pavelić to Vienna for his role in an anti-Ustashi plot. However, this seems unlikely, as Cecelja continued to travel regularly on official Ustashi planes between Vienna, Zagreb, Prague and Berlin, laying the groundwork of the Nazi escape network. Further, in 1944 Cecelja received orders from Zagreb to conduct an intensive propaganda campaign among the Ustashi in Austria, especially at the officer training schools. Instead of being one of Pavelić's enemies, as the American claimed, he was actively bolstering Pavelić's flagging cause until the very end.[14]

By Easter 1945, it was obvious that the 'independent' Croatian state was doomed. With the Red Army on the march, this 'Sworn Ustashi' priest left Vienna and shifted his base to Alt Aussee near Salzburg, where many fugitive Nazis gathered at the end of the war. The area around Salzburg was in fact one of the major destinations of his Ustashi comrades, who were forced to flee a few weeks later. He was well positioned to assist them to avoid repatriation by the Allies.

Cecelja was supplied with Red Cross and American papers which enabled him to travel freely through the US occupation zone. It was yet another example of the Allies supplying a Fascist priest with travel papers, which he promptly used to help notorious mass murderers evade justice. Cecelja declared proudly: 'As I travelled in the American zone, I used to leave these small Red Cross identity papers in all the camps . . . I was in charge of organising papers for people who had lost theirs.' He made no secret of having helped fugitives to change their identities – 'I had blocks of Red Cross application forms', with which he provided new identities to anyone who wanted to change their names and personal histories.[15]

Then, on 19 October 1945, he was arrested by the 430th CIC Detachment of the US Army. He remained in gaol for the next eighteen months, because the CIC had discovered that Father Cecelja was allegedly 'the Ustashi head in this region'. They knew he was using the Croatian Red Cross as a cover for his real activities: to 'protect Ustashi members at Salzburg' who were 'wanted war criminals'. According to the Assistant Chief of Staff of US Army Intelligence in Austria, Cecelja endangered 'the security of the occupational forces as well as the objectives of Military Government'.[16]

Ten months later, the Yugoslav government requested his extradition as a traitor, accurately outlining his activities on behalf of the Ustashi during the war.[17] The Foreign Office noted that the 'fact that he was a chaplain in the Ustaši Armed Forces may be sufficiently incriminating for him to be handed over'. Eventually, the British decided that 'most of his works seem to have been humanitarian and non-political'. The Americans interrogated him in December 1945, and over the following eighteen months strenuous efforts were made to exonerate this 'Sworn Ustashi'.[18]

One of those who spoke in his favour was his old friend, Archbishop Stepinac. During his 'show' trial in Zagreb in October 1946, Stepinac described Cecelja as 'an honourable man, against whom I cannot utter even a single word of reproach . . . if everyone were like Cecelja not a hair would fall from any head'.[19] Another senior prelate who took up his case was American Bishop Joseph Patrick Hurley, who was in Yugoslavia as the Pope's representative. Hurley believed that the Yugoslav motive was 'purely political', merely part of their campaign against the Church.[20]

On the basis of a quite inadequate investigation, the US Consul in Zagreb recommended that Cecelja 'not be surrendered to [the] Yugoslavians', as he was a 'priest of high standards'.[21] This intensive campaign followed the decision of the US Extradition Board in Austria to approve the 'Yugoslav request for extradition as collaborator of Vilim Cecelja'. Previously, the Americans had found that there was insufficient evidence to justify his extradition, asking the Yugoslavs to provide further substantiation.

By 4 April 1947, the Board considered the Yugoslav charges were confirmed by their own intelligence reports which 'reasonably establish Cecelja's participation in collaborationist activities'.[22] Ultimately, however, this finding was ignored and US Secretary of State, George Marshall, ordered that he was not to be surrendered. He was too late. The Ustashi priest had been released seventeen days before.[23]

After his release, Cecelja spent some time in hospital and then returned to smuggling wanted Nazis. When he applied for a visa to visit America in 1957, his official security check declared that the allegation that Cecelja was 'purposely harbouring and hiding ex-Ustasha members was never substantiated'. However, US intelligence had gathered a great deal of information linking Cecelja to militant Ustashi activities.

Four years before the Fascist priest was granted a US visa, American officers in Austria had noted that Cecelja's Croatian Red Cross branch was in fact controlled by the Ustashi. They were using its various offices as an 'information collecting agency' for clandestine operations in Yugoslavia and Austria. Further, Cecelja was known to be one of the key Ustashi organisers in Austria, where he regularly attended militant gatherings and delivered fiery speeches to the assembled faithful. Later, he was directly implicated by Australian security authorities in a series of terrorist actions launched by Ustashi cells operating in Sydney and Melbourne.[24]

In fact, the Americans had ample evidence that Cecelja was directly involved in a range of clandestine Nazi activities. In his 1989 interview, he freely admitted his role in Draganović's Ratline. He was proud of assisting these fugitives 'with food and accommodation, registering them and providing them with immigrant papers, giving them the opportunity to move around the world to Argentina, Australia and South America. I got the papers from the Red Cross.'[25]

Cecelja was well informed about those he sent down the Ratline to Rome and on to their new homes. 'Some of them were high ranking ministers and civil servants,' he admitted. Further, he was certain that Draganović had the approval of the Vatican for his work, claiming that the Holy See had asked him to take care of a broad based emigration of Central European 'refugees'. Draganović 'was fully empowered by the Holy See and was in charge not only for Croatians, but for everybody', he emphatically declared in his taped interview.[26]

Although fast approaching death, Cecelja vividly recalled how the smuggling system worked. Up in Austria the fugitives would be cared for by his section of the organisation, which provided them with money, food, accommodation and the false papers they needed to travel from Austria to Italy. Down in Rome, Draganović was at the operation's nerve centre. He arranged the international travel documents and through his high level contacts with South American consulates, organised the necessary visas, especially to Argentina. Once a week Cecelja called Draganović who told him how many places were available that week. Cecelja then sent exactly that number to Rome.[27]

This interview with an unabashedly Fascist priest had been truly astounding. His testimony was a vital link in the chain of evidence about the Ratline and its connection with the Vatican hierarchy. Western intelligence files fully confirm Cecelja's recollections. The British established that the 'nucleus around which all Ustaš activity in Italy takes place . . . [is] . . . the Confraternity of S[an] Girolamo in Rome'. They discovered that not only was Draganović 'the brains behind the Ustaš movement in Italy,' but he had a remarkably similar history to Cecelja's.[28]

The Second Priest

Like his close friend in Austria, Father Draganović was also a wanted war criminal. The Yugoslav War Crimes Commission recorded that he had been a senior official of the committee dealing with the forced conversion of Orthodox Serbs to Catholicism. Further, they had discovered his leading role in the forced requisitioning of food during the Nazis' bloody anti-partisan offensive on Kozara mountain in western Bosnia in the summer of 1942. This was the same offensive in which Austrian President Kurt Waldheim played a leading role as a Nazi officer.[29] Pavelić awarded Waldheim a major decoration for his services, and then followed him to Austria at war's end.

In July 1947 the Yugoslavs requested Draganović's extradition, especially citing his role in the Kozara offensive, which was carried out in his capacity as Vice President of the Ustashi's 'Office for Colonisation'. This office was an integral part of the Nazi genocide machine, preparing the Serbs and Jews for extermination or, if they were extremely lucky, deportation.[30] Although Draganović claimed to have taken a strong stand against the Ustashi's massacres, allegedly even complaining to Pavelić himself, he did not deny the substance of the Communist charges. When the Nazis occupied Zagreb in April 1941, he was Professor of Theology at the local University. He later recounted that when the 'independent' Croatian state was proclaimed, 'I was waiting in Zagreb with tears in my eyes. I thought that the Croatian nation, after eight centuries, had created their most deep wishes for independence and autonomy.'[31]

Draganović fully accepted Pavelić's state. He felt that he had gained his freedom when the Ustashi came to power, and co-operated with them 'as a citizen according to the laws of the Lord'. One of the tasks he admitted performing with great energy was overseeing the conversion of Orthodox Serbs to Catholicism, as a member of the special committee established for this purpose.[32]

He claimed he had never actually been present in the Serbian villages where the forced conversions took place. These were 'celebrated' by Catholic priests under the close scrutiny of heavily armed Ustashi police units. The threat of death hung over these ceremonies, as the Serbian peasants were fully aware that these same units had been conducting massacres in the neighbouring areas. However, there was at least one occasion when Father Draganović ventured out of his comfortable office in Zagreb. He did not hide the fact that he had held the senior position of Vice President of the Ustashi's Committee for Colonisation. Two witnesses confirmed that the priest had been present at the bloody Kozara offensive, when the Colonisation Committee had played a key part in the assault on the population.[33]

In another striking parallel with Cecelja's career, Draganović also worked on Croatian Red Cross matters. In August 1943 Pavelić and Archbishop Stepinac dispatched him to Rome. American intelligence observed that it was 'a classic example of "kicking a man upstairs" inasmuch as it is fairly well established that the leaders of the Independent State of Croatia expected the prelate, through his good connections in the Vatican, to be instrumental in working out the orientation of Croatia towards the West rather than the East'.[34]

Although Draganović was supposedly sent to Rome because of his defiance of Pavelić, he also admitted accepting appointment as the Ustashi's representative to the Vatican. Perhaps this explains why he continued to have access to senior members of Pavelić's regime on his regular visits to Croatia. Like Cecelja, Draganović travelled on several occasions to and from Zagreb, consulting with his Ustashi superiors. Apparently there was a concerted campaign to provide these Fascist priests with good cover stories, enabling them to present themselves as victims of the Ustashi, while they quietly got on with the task of building the underground escape network.[35]

Draganović also received a 'large subsidy' from the Ustashi government, much of which remained in his hands at the end of the war. American intelligence further established that as 'he was a trusted follower of Ante Pavelić . . . he was entrusted with . . . all valuables smuggled by the Ustacha'. These funds were the financial base on which his Ratline was initially built.[36]

According to British intelligence, at the end of the war San Girolamo assumed the 'role of granting asylum' to the Ustashi émigrés:

> In the summer of 1945 Draganović made a personal tour of the camps where ex-members of the Ustaš armed forces and political organisations were being accommodated. He soon developed an intensified political activity and made contact with the chief Ustaš representatives. In this he was assisted by other Croat priests and close liaison was maintained between S. Girolamo and the Ustaš groups throughout Italy and also in Austria. This led to the formation of a political intelligence service enabling S. Girolamo to collect reports and data on political trends among the émigrés. It is also probable that the information received from these reports was then passed on to the Vatican.[37]

The Third Priest

The distinctive characteristic of the Ratline was that most of its operatives were Croatian priests, many of them unashamed Fascists. Cecelja and Draganović had murky pasts, but Father Dragutin Kamber was a bloody mass murderer. Like so many of the priests involved in the smuggling network, Kamber had a longstanding connection with San Girolamo, studying there in the late 1920s and early 1930s.

The Yugoslav government requested Father Kamber's extradition in April 1947, claiming he had been a Ustashi member since 1936. After the Axis invasion, he was appointed head of the Ustashi administration at the town of Doboj, 'and one of his first acts was to set up a concentration camp, which he himself headed as camp commandant. He introduced in the district the Nazi racial rules and accordingly issued orders for the Jews to wear yellow arm-bands and for the Serbs to wear white bands.'

Later, 'he proclaimed that the Serbs and Jews were to be exterminated as harmful to the ustasha State. In Doboj he carried out mass arrests and internment of Serbs. Many of the victims were first brought for interrogation to Kamber's house and, on his orders, were subsequently killed in the cellars of that house. The first to be killed in this way were the Serbian teachers and priests.'[38]

These were fantastic charges against a Roman Catholic priest. Surely they were just Communist propaganda? However, the British Consul in Zagreb made enquiries and found that Kamber was 'responsible, to some extent, for the massacres at Doboj'. Further investigation established that he had also been an officer in Pavelić's notorious Personal Body Guard, and had definitely 'incited [the] wholesale massacre of Serbs at Doboj in Bosnia'. The British further noted that Kamber was 'in close contact' with San Girolamo.[39]

Despite Draganović's close relations with Fascist priests like Cecelja and Kamber, he repeatedly lied to Western intelligence officers, claiming that he had no connection with the movement at all.[40] Both British and American intelligence found this to be untrue. One US report concluded that 'his task [is] to co-ordinate and direct Ustacha activity in Italy. He provides them with moral and material help', arranging to send them to South America:

> He is helped in this activity by his numerous contacts with the Embassies and Legations of South America in Italy and with the International Red Cross and by the fact that the Croatian Confraternity of the College of S. Girolamo degli Illirici, where he has his office, issues false identity cards to the Ustacha. With such documents and with the approval of the Pontifical Welfare Commission for Refugees, located in Via Piave 41, Rome, which is controlled almost exclusively by Ustacha, passports can be obtained from the International Red Cross, where Draganović has some way of ensuring their issue.[41]

The Fourth Priest

Is it possible that a Fascist priest could have had access to the Pope's charitable welfare organisation without anyone in the Vatican hierarchy knowing? The 'Pontifical Welfare Commission', after all, was an official Vatican body which the Pope had established to assist genuine refugees. Draganović's abuses must have been known in senior Vatican circles, since the false identity cards he issued to fugitive war criminals were 'printed at the Franciscan printing press'. US intelligence discovered that this had been arranged by Father Dominik Mandić, the official Vatican representative at San Girolamo.[42]

Mandić, it will be recalled, was a senior member of San Girolamo's Brotherhood, which was the official Croatian section of the Pope's Refugee Assistance Commission. He was also a senior official in the Franciscan order, holding the position of General Economist, or treasurer. Not only did he arrange to print San Girolamo's false identity papers, he also put the Franciscan press at the disposal of the Ustashi propaganda machine. Much of the British-sponsored campaign waged in DP camps like Fermo, Modena and Bagnoli owed its success to the Franciscan printers. Mandić himself regularly visited the camps to deliver rousing speeches to the assembled Ustashi militants.[43]

Father Mandić was a crucial link in the Ratline. Using his connections with the Italian secret police, Draganović got the Franciscan's identity cards accepted 'as official documents on the basis of which Italian identity cards and residence permits were issued'. The Italians closely monitored Draganović's activities. They launched a top secret intelligence operation, and soon discovered that numerous Ustashi fugitives were using the false identity cards printed by the Franciscans. The Italians found that many wanted criminals were housed at San Girolamo, including senior members of Pavelić's government, but no action was taken against Draganović or the Italian officials who assisted him.[44]

British intelligence also monitored this development closely, although they decided to hide their information from the Italians:

> There is incontrovertible evidence that some of the most notorious war criminals were issued in this way with the S. Girolamo identity card under an entirely false name and thus were enabled to obtain Italian residence permits, visas and other documents allowing them to emigrate.[45]

CIC Agent Robert Mudd certainly procured 'incontrovertible evidence' about Draganović's activities. He penetrated his own spy into San Girolamo, and his reports confirmed the Italian intelligence reports. Italian agents described San Girolamo as 'a den of Croatian nationalists and Ustashi. It is said that the walls of the college are covered in pictures of Pavelić.'[46]

Monsignor Milan Simčić worked in San Girolamo at this time, assisting Draganović in his 'rescue' operations. He indignantly denied that Pavelić's photo was displayed in San Girolamo, because photos of civilian authorities were not permitted in 'a Church institution'. Simčić conceded that some Ustashi were allowed to sleep in the Institute, 'but this was only for a few months in 1945'.[47]

But in February 1947 Mudd's spy found very different conditions inside the Institute. He confirmed the Italian secret service's information, reporting that San Girolamo 'was honeycombed with cells of Ustashi operatives':

> In order to enter this Monastery one must submit to a personal search for weapons and identification documents, must answer questions as to where he is from, who he is, whom he knows, what his purpose is in the visit, and how he heard about the fact that there were Croats in the Monastery. All doors from one room to another are locked and those that are not have an armed guard in front of them and a pass-word is necessary to go from one room to another. The whole area is guarded by armed Ustashi youths in civilian clothes and the Ustashi salute is exchanged continually.[48]

Simčić agreed in a taped interview that there was extremely tight security at San Girolamo at this time. Although he denied that the young men employed to guard the building were armed, he claimed that precautions were necessary due to the ever present threat of attack from the Communists. 'I was in danger and no one could just enter San Girolamo, because people there were extremely scared. The Communists attacked us a few times, as is well known.'[49]

Mudd's spy obtained a great deal of information which explained the Communists' intense interest in what was going on at San Girolamo. He gained a first-hand insight into the calibre of those either living in San Girolamo or 'in the Vatican'. The spy had wormed his way into a position of some trust, for he knew the identities of those attending Draganović's regular clandestine meetings. Far from being religious occasions, these gatherings were all politics. Rather than bringing the faithful together, those in attendance were more like a who's who of the most wanted and notorious Croatian war criminals:

1. Ivan Devčić, Lt. Colonel.
2. Vrančić, Dr Vjekoslav, Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs.
3. Toth, Dr Dragutin, Minister of Croat State Treasury.
4. Sušić, Lovro, Minister of Corporations in Croatian Quisling Government.
5. Starčević, Dr Mile, Croat Minister of Education.

6. Rupčić, General Dragutin, General of Ustashi Air Force . . .
8. Pečnikar, Vilko – Ustasha General and C[ommanding] O[fficer] of Ustashi Gendarmerie.
9. Marković, Josip, Minister of Transport in Pavelić Government.
10. Kren, Vladimir – Commander-in-Chief of the Croat Air Force.[50]

By September 1947, US intelligence had established that several of these senior Ustashi leaders were living with their Poglavnik in what was believed to be one of the Vatican's libraries at Via Giacoma Venezian 17-C.[51] Among them were Lovro Sušić, Pavelić's Minister of National Economy. He had worked closely with the Nazis on the deportation of Croatian workers for forced labour in Germany, later serving with the bloody SS Division Prince Eugen. Sušić's surrender to Tito's government had been agreed in August 1946.[52]

Dragutin Toth was another senior figure on Mudd's list. He had been Pavelić's Minister of Trade and Industry, president of the Croatian National Bank and, finally, Minister of Finance.[53] John Colville of the British Foreign Office, who later admitted that he had deliberately allowed many 'fanatic' Ustashi to escape justice, thought that Toth 'sounds, and looks, a bad hat'. Both London and Washington agreed to Toth's surrender to the Yugoslavs, but he also went down Draganović's Ratline and made his way to Argentina in mid-1947.[54]

Vjekoslav Vrančić was another senior war criminal to benefit from Vatican protection. Vrančić's key role in the extermination programme is clearly demonstrated by his appointment as Under Secretary of the Ustashi Interior Ministry. This was the body directly responsible for the concentration camps and repressive police apparatus. Vrančić was supposed to be handed over to the Yugoslavs, but three days after this decision was taken he mysteriously 'escaped' from British custody. He then made his way to the safety of San Girolamo and was sent down the Ratline by Father Draganović. In November 1947 US intelligence reported that he had arrived in Argentina under the name Ivo Rajičević, where he became a major figure in the revival of the Ustashi's terrorist apparatus.[55]

One further case is that of Vilko Pečnikar, a veteran of the movement and organiser of Pavelić's pre-war terrorist groups. During the war he rose to be a General in Pavelić's Personal Body Guard, also commanding the brutal Gendarmerie which worked in close collaboration with the Gestapo. Both Britain and America agreed to hand him over to Tito.[56]

US intelligence described Pečnikar as 'anti-Hebrew, anti-Serb, pro-Austrian, living in a monastery'. According to this report, Draganović and Pečnikar worked closely together on re-organising the Ustashi movement. The Fascist priest allowed Pečnikar to have access to the treasure he had collected for his Ratline. As will be seen, some of this also financed a new Western-backed terrorist campaign inside Yugoslavia.[57]

All these war criminals were on the list supplied by Mudd's spy in San Girolamo. But the clandestine operation 'stopped abruptly when it became too dangerous for the counter-intelligence agent in the Monastery'. The US officers wanted further proof, so Gowen arranged for a daring burglary of Draganović's office, the centre of the Vatican's smuggling operation. It is not known how this was achieved, but the results were spectacular, for Gowen was able to photograph many of Draganović's top secret records.[58]

The documents procured from Draganović's office were handed on to Mudd for assessment. One of the most important documents was a list of the nominal roll of Croatians who 'are fed, clothed, housed and otherwise provided for by the Monastery of San Girolamo'. By comparing this roll with the West's lists of wanted war criminals, Mudd established that it also included 'the names of several long sought after Jugoslav War Criminals whose presence in the Monastery and whose sponsorship by the Vatican Draganović has consistently denied'.

In fact, at least twenty of those housed at the Institute were on the West's 'Black Lists'. Details about these fugitives were obtained from one of the most significant files photographed during the burglary. It disclosed not only their true identities, but also the aliases Draganović had given them.[59] Other documents contained detailed information on Draganović's system of procuring Central and South American visas.

Mudd reported the results of Gowen's burglary of San Girolamo in September 1947. He noted that the 'photostats of personal files and documents of the Croat Nationalist priest Draganović, Krunoslav procured in Rome indicate clearly his involvement in aiding and abetting the Ustashi to escape into South America. The documents also indicate his connections with Ustasha personnel, a fact which Draganović has formally denied personally to this

Agent'.[60] Mudd further reported that 'all this activity seems to stem from the Vatican, through the Monastery of San Geronimo to Fermo, the chief Croat Camp in Italy. Chief among the intelligence operatives in the Monastery of San Geronimo appear to be Dr Draganović and Monsignor Madjarac.'[61]

Mudd concluded by describing how those Ustashi living in the Vatican travelled between their lodgings and San Girolamo:

> . . . these Croats travel back and forth from the Vatican several times a week in a car with a chauffeur whose licence plate bears the two initials CD, 'Corps Diplomatic'. It issues forth from the Vatican and discharges its passengers inside the Monastery of San Geronimo. Subject to diplomatic immunity it is impossible to stop the car and discover who are its passengers.
>
> Draganović's sponsorship of these Croat Quislings definitely links him up with the plans of the Vatican to shield these ex-Ustashi nationalists until such time as they are able to procure for them the proper documents to enable them to go to South America.

The Fifth Priest

The next and final stop on the Vatican's sophisticated Ratline was Genoa, where yet another Croatian priest took charge of the passengers. Monsignor Karlo Petranović is now almost eighty years old and has lived in Niagara Falls, Canada, for the past three decades. Although he complains of a few ailments and has had heart bypass surgery, he is in remarkably good health and still very active. When interviewed in 1989, he seemed a generous and kind-hearted man, but after the war he was Draganović's operative in Genoa, shipping out hundreds of fugitive war criminals.

In a taped interview, Monsignor Petranović was adamant that he had never been a member of the Ustashi. When the Nazis invaded Yugoslavia in April 1941, Petranović was a chaplain in the Army. The day the 'independent' Croatian state was proclaimed he was stationed at Topuško, south of Zagreb. After hearing of this development, he returned to Ogulin where he had been the parish priest since 1934. Ogulin is a mixed Croatian and Serbian district, and during the war was the scene of some of the most brutal and widespead Ustashi massacres of Serbs. Petranović stayed there throughout the war, but only heard vague rumours of these atrocities.[62]

When asked about his attitude to Pavelić's 'independent' Croatia he said, 'I was very happy when it was created', but as for masacres, 'I saw nothing'. When pressed further, he recalled that he 'heard rumours that people were dying, and there were one or two Jews in Ogulin, but I don't know what happened to them, they just disappeared'. According to Petranović, his superior ordered him to stay away from politics and although he welcomed and recognised the new Croatian state, he claims to have obeyed this order.[63]

In the Public Record Office in London we discovered documents that directly contradict the Monsignor's version. When the Yugoslavs wrote to the British in July 1947 requesting Petranović's extradition, they categorically stated that he was a Ustashi member. They claimed he had joined the movement immediately after the invasion, whereupon he was appointed to a number of very senior and influential official positions. In fact, he had been given the rank of captain in the Ustashi army, also accepting the position of deputy to the local Ogulin Ustashi leader. Contrary to Petranović's claim that he was not involved in politics, the Yugoslavs maintained that 'he became a very important factor in the policy of the local Ustaši regime which decided on the life and death of the Serbs of Ogulin and the surrounding district. As evidence shows, this policy consisted of terror against the entirely innocent Serbian population, resulting in the extermination of about 2,000 local Serbs.'[64]

The Yugoslavs went even further, alleging that Petranović had organised and instigated a number of very serious war crimes. On one occasion, they claimed, he had directed the arrest and execution of seventy prominent Serbs. Another time the priest was allegedly responsible for the removal of five or six Serbian patients from Ogulin's hospital, who were killed 'in the most brutal circumstances'. A further incident was the murder of Dr Branko Živanović on 31 July 1941, 'on the basis of a false statement made by Petranović'.

This was in the summer of 1941 at the height of the Ustashi's first assault on the Serbs. During this period, the Yugoslavs said, Petranović had helped organise 'the mass arrest of [the] Serbs of Ogulin and district' who were robbed and killed, 'some at Brežno, the others near the village of [St] Petar'. Another allegation concerned Petranović's role in the death of about one hundred Serbs at the end of July, a massacre carried out 'in accordance with a decision made by the Ogulin Ustaši committee' of which Petranović was a senior and influential member. The Yugoslav extradition request ended by claiming that, in 'addition to these crimes, the Ustaši committee at Ogulin, of which Petranović was an active functionary, is responsible for sending hundreds of local Serbs and Croats to the Ustaši concentration camps, which resulted in the extermination of the majority of them'.[65]

Despite his denial of any connection with the Ustashi during the war, there is independent evidence which supports the Yugoslav charges. For example, on 1 July 1941, the official Ustashi newspaper, Novi List, announced Petranović's appointment 'to the post of pobočnik in the camp for the district of Ogulin'.[66] This was precisely the position which the Yugoslavs claimed Petranović had held: he was indeed second-in-command to the Ogulin Ustashi leader.

When asked about his post-war activities, Monsignor Petranović cheerfully admitted that he helped 'a couple of thousand people' leave Italy via Genoa. When the war ended, he says he witnessed the Communist massacres of captured Ustashi. After a brief stay in Zagreb, he was dispatched to the Yugoslav-Austrian border, where he moved freely among the fleeing Ustashi. He settled for a time in Graz where many notorious war criminals were hiding. His work there was aided by Bishop Ferdinand Pawlikowski, who obtained clearance from the local police chief to allow Petranović to stay in Graz.

From there he made his way down to Trieste, where the local Bishop arranged his accommodation, and then on to Milan where he was helped by Cardinal Schuster, finally arriving in Genoa towards the end of 1945. He wanted to go to San Girolamo in Rome, but as it was full remained in Genoa and became Draganović's local operative.

Petranović's first contact with the smuggling network was through fellow wanted war criminal, Father Kamber, who took Petranović for a long walk down by Genoa's harbour and suggested that he could assist. Soon afterwards Dragnović himself visited Genoa and recruited Petranović to the Ratline. He desperately needed a reliable link in this key Italian port city, someone who could be counted on to procure plenty of berths on ships for South America. Petranović agreed to carry out the work on one condition:

he insisted that San Girolamo pay his phone bills. According to Petranović, he received no other assistance for his work in Genoa.[67]

When asked about his role in the Ratline, Petranović explained that it was really quite straightforward. Draganović would regularly ring to tell him how many places he required. Petranović would already have visited the local shipping offices and obtained guaranteed berths. He would tell Draganović how many berths were available, and that number of people were sent to Genoa a couple of days before embarkation. Draganović had already provided the passengers with the requisite travel documents and visas, so Petranović only needed to find them lodgings for a few days and then conduct them to the ship.[68]

Some of those he assisted were undoubtedly genuine refugees. He is particularly proud of having helped Hungarian-born actress Zsa Zsa Gabor to travel to America where she launched her famous career. However, Western intelligence knew that most of Petranović's passengers were not aspiring film stars. They were fully aware that many senior war criminals were escaping via Genoa with his aid. For example, in Feburary 1947 a list of wanted Croatians was sent from Rome to London. British intelligence had also penetrated San Girolamo, for they knew that the fugitives were soon to be sent down the Ratline to Genoa, where accommodation and other assistance 'will probably be arranged by the Croat priest Father Petranović'.[69]

The British then made Petranović a major surveillance target, noting that he was 'helping Croat émigrés, and in particular, Ustaši, escape to the Argentine'. Over the following months they confirmed that those assisted by Petranović were mainly 'listed war criminals', also noting that the Croatian priest was 'probably identical with the wanted Croat quisling'. Three who had recently departed with the priest's help were the Pavelić government ministers Stjepan Hefer, Mile Starčević and Vjekoslav Vrančić. They had all been hidden in Rome by Draganović, who had also obtained their false travel documents and sent them to Petranović's charitable arms in Genoa.[70]

Monsignor Petranović now shrugs off the important work he did for Draganović, saying that it really was not well organised and certainly not political, merely 'God's Providence'. However, he had very good connections in the Church hierarchy, especially

Genoa's Bishop Siri, yet another senior prelate involved in smuggling fugitive Nazis. US intellience discovered that Siri was one of the main organisers of 'an international organization whose purpose is to arrange for the emigration of anti-Communist Europeans to South America . . . This general classification of anti-Communists would obviously cover all persons politically compromised with the Communists, namely Fascists and Ustaschi and other similar groups.'[71]

Siri was the same senior prelate who was allegedly Walter Rauff's contact in setting up Bishop Hudal's escape network to smuggle wanted Germans out of Europe. Not surprisingly, his operation was mainly concerned with assisting German fugitives, including Adolf Eichmann. But he also helped Petranović, lending a hand whenever he could.

Although Siri maintained his own organisation, he was fully informed of the Croatian network. Petranović recalled one example of the close relationship he enjoyed with Genoa's Bishop. The Croatian was caring for a number of fugitives who urgently needed to leave for Argentina, but he could not procure enough berths. So he sent a telegram in Siri's name to the shipping office in Buenos Aires, requesting that places be made available for his passengers. This had the desired result, and they were allowed to embark. Petranović later informed Siri of this forgery, but instead of being angry, the Bishop was delighted at the Croatian's initiative.[72]

Petranović also vividly recalled one of the few occasions when Western intelligence took effective action against his operation. This occurred in early March 1947, when Major Stephen Clissold visited Genoa. Clissold had been a British diplomat in Zagreb before the war, then he served as a liaison officer to Tito's partisans. His mission in Genoa was to arrest suspected Ustashi war criminals before they set sail on the SS Philippa, one of the ships which regularly plied between Genoa and Buenos Aires with its cargo of fugitives.

Clissold worked for the British Special Screening Mission, tracking down fugitive Nazis. He had received reliable information that a group of wanted war criminals, travelling under false names, would embark on the Philippa on 4 March. He knew that Vladimir Kren would be among this group, travelling under the alias of Marko Rubini. In his memoirs, Clissold recalled that the wanted men were 'sponsored by the Pontifical Commissione de Assistenza', and 'were being looked after in Genoa by Father Petranović, a trusted collaborator of Draganović'.[73]

The day the ship was to leave port Clissold's men intercepted sixteen of Petranović's passengers as they tried to board. One man, 'of thick-set and distinctly non-Semitic aspect', gave his name as Marko Rubini. Clissold recalled that his 'manner, at first truculent, turned ingratiating and finally servile as he admitted that he was General Vladimir Kren, the former Yugoslav airforce officer who had organised notable defections to the Germans in April 1941 and been rewarded with the command of Pavelić's airforce'.[74] US intelligence had previously discovered Kren's name among those senior Ustashi officials under Draganović's care. Eventually he was one of the unlucky few to be handed over to the Yugoslavs.

When Petranović heard that Kren and nine others had been detained by Clissold, he went to see the British officer, urging him to 'let these people go'. He remembers that Clissold only smiled, but said nothing. The next day Petranović again intervened with the British officer, saying that 'Croatians were very unhappy with Yugoslavia and therefore joyful when the Independent State of Croatia was proclaimed'. This, apparently, was supposed to mitigate in favour of those who had loyally served the Nazi cause.[75]

This was one of the very few occasions when Western intelligence triumphed over the very well organised and successful Ratline run by Father Krunoslav Draganović and an array of Croatian clerics. A few weeks later the British arranged an ambush at San Girolamo itself, arresting about one hundred men as they left a meeting.[76]

Mostly, however, the Western operations were spectacularly unsuccessful. The reason for this was very simple. Sections of the Allied authorities were in fact co-operating with the Vatican to ensure that many fugitives were allowed to slip quietly out of Genoa. One US diplomat discovered that the Western powers were 'apparently conniving with [the] Vatican and Argentina to get guilty people to haven in latter country'. This was indeed the case. Both Washington and London had entered into arrangements with the Holy See to assist many Nazi collaborators to emigrate via Draganović's smuggling system. The Vatican was cynically being used as a respectable cover for the West's own immoral conduct.[77]

The successful operation at Genoa was the exception to an otherwise shoddy Western effort. Gowen's burglary at San Girolamo had probably disclosed Kren's alias, making him one of the handful who did not benefit from the Allies' policy of amnesty.

The Priests' Passengers

There is no doubt that Draganović and his colleagues organised their network because of their ardent, even fanatical, Croatian nationalism. Nor can there be any debate that most were Fascist priests and committed Ustashi militants, sharing Pavelić's hysterical hatred for the Serbs. What, though, was their justification as Christians for shielding mass murderers from justice? A unique insight into their mentality is provided in a lengthy memo Draganović sent in May 1947 to the American Ambassador to Italy.[78]

Draganović argued persuasively that justice under the Communists in Yugoslavia was virtually non-existent. He unequivocally declared that those 'who have committed war crimes', especially 'crimes against humanity . . . must be punished'. However, he then cleverly argued that the most culpable should not be classified as war criminals, by distinguishing between those who had personally perpetrated such crimes and the political leaders of Pavelić's government. His view was that 'to be a state official, even with a high function, or member of the Ustasha Movement does not need signify that the persons in question are war criminals'.[79]

Such a statement, of course, could be seen as completely unexceptional. War criminality should be judged by the evidence in each case, not merely established by general allegations of political misconduct. However, the only people condemned by Draganović as war criminals were the rank and file who actually bloodied their hands in the villages and concentration camps.

He excluded those politicians who actually enacted the racial laws which legalised mass slaughter. These were the senior ministers and functionaries of Pavelić's 'independent' Croatia, who in their statements and propaganda openly instigated mass murder, thus creating a vicious climate. Some uneducated Croatian peasants therefore came to believe that mass extermination was an acceptable, even desirable, form of behaviour. Yet Draganović defended the former and condemned the latter.

This, then, was his justification for assisting Pavelić and his closest colleagues. However, even this was a lie, for he also knowingly helped many common murderers. Ljubo Miloš, for example, had been a senior official at the Jasenovac concentration camp. One of his notable acts was the 'ritual killing' of Jews. After a transport had arrived in the camp, Miloš 'would put on a physician's gown, send the guard to bring him all those who had applied for hospital, take them to the "ambulance", put them along the wall and with a strike of the knife cut the victim's throat, shear his ribs and slit open his belly'.[80]

Miloš also supervised other brutal methods of extermination. Naked prisoners were thrown alive into the raging furnace of the brick factory attached to the camp, while others were bludgeoned to death with clubs and hammers. Miloš was definitely not an 'innocent' Croatian patriot who had merely served in Pavelić's government out of a sense of 'duty' to his nation. He was a common sadist and murderer, guilty of exactly the types of crimes Draganović believed deserved punishment.[81]

Yet Draganović extended his 'Christian Charity' to this man. There is no doubt that he knew of Miloš's terrible crimes, for he later condemned Jasenovac as 'the most horrible bloodbath that Croatia has ever known'. According to Draganović, Miloš was 'a monster, a slaughterer of innocent people and a coward'. He had first met this 'monster' in Austria in mid-1945, where he was hiding under a false name and later saw him in Rome. The priest admitted that he gave Miloš a great deal of money, but only because he feared that Miloš would kill him.[82]

However, Western intelligence established that Draganović was lying. They discovered that Miloš was living in an Italian camp and were about to apprehend him. Draganović was tipped off by someone in British intelligence, and used his sophisticated network to spirit Miloš away to safety.[83]

This was a fairly common occurrence. Western intelligence repeatedly observed that Draganović had advance warning of their operations to arrest war criminals. They even discovered that he had obtained the lists of those to be arrested, indicating his influence with senior levels of Western intelligence. In fact, many key Allied officers were very co-operative. Draganović regularly visited the military and intelligence headquarters in Rome, where Major Simcock would tell him the details of impending operations to apprehend fugitives.[84]

One of the most intriguing aspects is that so many of the war criminals assisted in this way, including Miloš, were later captured on terrorist missions inside Yugoslavia. Perhaps the real reason for Draganović's benevolence related to Pavelić's need for men to serve in his secret anti-Tito army then being organised with Western help.

What kind of priest would extend his protection to a killer like Ljubo Miloš? The Italian press investigated Father Draganović in 1948, describing him as 'robust and slender, dressed impeccably as a priest'. They reported 'that this priest, undoubtedly a complex and ambiguous figure, proposes to justify the criminal Ustashi with evangelical reasons'.[85] At this time the Ratline was operating at maximum capacity, but Draganović was surrounded in mystery and intrigue. Legends grew around the Vatican's 'eminence grise', but few really knew, let alone understood, the real man.

Three of his closest colleagues recently provided fascinating insights into his character. Each had been an important figure in the Ratline, working with amazing dedication to rescue his comrades. Draganović's superb intellect left an indelible impression on both Monsignor Petranović and Father Cecelja. Petranović recalled him as 'reserved, distant and very serious', not someone who often shared a joke or engaged in light hearted banter.[86]

Monsignor Simčić gave the most intimate account. Of the three priests, he was the closest to Draganović, working on the Ratline in Rome for several years. He was 'an amazing person, a great activist and a superb organiser, a man of great ideas. Like all such people he tended to be interested in the big projects and leave the details to others. Perhaps he relied too much on his intuition.'

Simčić was fulsome in his praise of Draganović's intelligence, and certain of his greatness. He was 'one of the most important men in Europe, a great scholar with an excellent knowledge of history'. Draganović had a 'big heart, big horizons, and was far sighted but naive like some great people are'. His naivety did not stop Draganović from also being a great conspirator. 'He had a great love of conspiracy', and thrived on code words and clandestine meetings. He frequently took elaborate precautions to avoid surveillance when he ventured out from San Girolamo. But Simčić was sure that Draganović was not 'careful in many matters. A true conspirator would not have made the mistakes he did.'[87]

Not many of the eye witnesses with whom we spoke agreed with this last point. However, nearly everyone who knew Draganović agreed that he was one of the most conspiratorial men they had ever met. One British intelligence officer remembered him being like 'all Croats, very conspiratorial'. This officer was well acquainted with Balkan intrigues. He had served in Greece, Yugoslavia and Albania during the war, and was then active in anti-Tito operations in post-war Italy. On several occasions he had lengthy discussions with Draganović, finding him rather unapproachable 'from a human point of view. I think he was very cold, very much a realist . . . He was not expansive, flamboyant or outgoing, but very closed and conspiratorial.'[88]

Was it possible, we asked this British officer, that Pius XII did not know of Draganović's conspiracy to smuggle Nazis? In a taped interview, he told us that Western intelligence was fully informed of the Vatican's intrigues, including the racket to supply Nazis with false documents. Draganović was definitely the key figure, he insisted, adding that Pius XII 'knew everything about Father Draganović's activities, otherwise he would never have stayed in his position'.

From the intelligence available to him, this officer was certain that Draganović's real status in the Vatican was 'head of the Balkan desk of the Secretariat of State'. Father Draganović was 'very close, for example, to Monsignor Angelo dell'Acqua', then a very senior Vatican intelligence officer. Later dell'Acqua became an Archbishop, but according to the British officer at that time he was really Draganović's superior in the Vatican intelligence hierarchy. He further confirmed Draganović's close links with Italian intelligence, which were well known in the small circle of Western intelligence agents in Rome. There were close social connections between these officers, and gossip was very common.

In his experience, nearly everyone in Western ingelligence knew that Draganović was protecting Ante Pavelić, who was hiding in the Vatican. Further, Draganović's Ratline was an open secret in the intelligence community at the time. The priest was notorious for helping war criminals to escape. He mentioned other Ustashi figures who he knew had been protected by the Church. One was former Colonel, Jozo Rukavina, who 'was working as a gardener in Vatican City'.

In fact, Draganović was widely known among Western intelligence operatives at the 'Balkan grey eminence'. This was a standing joke among both American and British officers, in whose circles Draganović moved freely. This was also confirmed by Simčić, who was certain that Draganović had direct contact with British, American and Italian intelligence.[89] The former British officer was also emphatic that 'you can almost talk about interlocking directorships between Western intelligence and the Vatican at this period'.[90]

If this allegation is true, Pius XII is deeply implicated in a much wider conspiracy than merely Draganović's smuggling network. The Vatican has persistently denied claims about the involvement of its own senior officials in Draganović's network, let alone with Western intelligence operations.

There is at least some evidence to support this view. For example, one British diplomat at the Vatican came to their defence in November 1947, claiming that it was 'unlikely that the Vatican approve the political, as opposed to the religious activities of Father Draganović & Company'. However, the Foreign Office totally rejected this:

> We fully understand the views of the Vatican authorities and subscribe to some of them ourselves. While we cannot condemn the charitable attitude of the Church towards sinful individuals we feel, however, that there has been much evidence to show that the Vatican has permitted the encouragement both covert, and overt, of the Ustaši. This wholly undesirable organisation has not only been collectively responsible for vile atrocities on an immense scale during the war but has ever since its inception made use of murder as a normal political weapon. There is surely all the difference between giving shelter to let us say dissident Slovene priests, and giving positive aid to a creature like Pavelić?[91]

For its part, the Holy See has gone to considerable lengths to discredit and cast doubt on the reliability of Western intelligence reports which implicate the Church. For example, when we were researching this book, Vatican official historian, Father Graham, warned us not to rely on the veracity of US intelligence reports. Yet the British consistently confirmed the American information. So did the Italian secret police, who also closely monitored the conspiracy. It seems very difficult to believe that Western intelligence was wrong so regularly, in both its information and general analysis. After all, they had penetrated agents into the Ratline's headquarters. The Americans went one better, and actually broke into San Girolamo and photographed Draganović's files.

Further, two key witnesses inside the Church confirmed the Vatican's involvement. Monsignor Milan Simčić and Father Vilim Cecelja, both close confidants of Father Draganović, were certain that senior Vatican officials knew about Draganović's work and approved of it.

Today Simčić is a senior Vatican official, who freely admits that San Girolamo protected senior Ustashi fugitives and helped them to escape. He knew this first-hand, not from hearsay. In two taped interviews, Simčić recalled that many fugitives had been housed, fed and clothed by the Institute. He was absolutely clear that the 'most important people', including 'former government ministers, heads of army formations and former police chiefs were handled separately by Dr Draganović'. Simčić claimed that Draganović had a sophisticated underground network to deal with these people, utilising radio communications and intelligence contacts.[92] These were precisely the Ustashi fugitives identified by Western intelligence as taking shelter in San Girolamo and the Vatican.

Those mentioned by Simčić could not be called 'refugees' by any stretch of the imagination. By his own admission they were the senior politicians and officials of one of the most infamous Nazi puppet governments. Simčić merely commented, with an apparent easy conscience, that San Girolamo's role was not 'to make any moral judgements about the people we were helping. Our job was to make it possible for them to escape and history could judge them later.'

Father Graham, though, emphatically insisted that Draganović 'was not the Vatican'. He was running his own independent operation, and Pius XII and Assistant Secretary of State Montini had not known about it, let alone approved.

The Sixth Priest

Simčić now dropped his bombshell. According to his first-hand account, 'Dr Draganović and Montini were together very many times', discussing San Girolamo's work. Simčić is certain that the Vatican Assistant Secretary of State knew exactly what this work entailed, for Draganović frequently sought his advice and assistance in specific cases. Often he would ask Montini to 'obtain more visas' from countries that were not issuing an adequate number and the Vatican bureaucrat would intercede with the relevant diplomats.[93]

Simčić was just as certain that this relationship worked both ways, and that Draganović frequently returned Montini's favours. He insisted that:

> Montini got in touch with Draganović many times, asking him to help people on his behalf.

Not only was Montini aware of Draganović's Ratline, but Simčić is certain that he actually utilised it himself. When asked what this meant, Simčić claimed still to possess copies of letters from Montini to Draganović in which the senior Vatican official asked for assistance to smuggle certain people. Although Simčić would not produce these documents, he insisted that Montini had asked Draganović to act on the Holy See's behalf on several occasions.

In fact, there 'were excellent relations between us and the hierarchy'. While Simčić carefully avoided implicating Pius XII there is no doubt that the Pope was fully aware of Draganović's work. As already discussed, Montini was the Pope's favourite at this time, and directly supervised the Holy See's charitable work for refugees. As the two prelates met daily and discussed the Secretariat of State's work, it is inconceivable that Pius XII was left in the dark. In other words, two senior Vatican officials were informed. Both the reigning and future Popes (Montini later became Paul VI) approved of Father Draganović's Ratline.[94]

Father Cecelja went even further than Simčić, claiming that Draganović was the Holy See's official representative for the emigration of all Nazi groups, not just Croatians. Although Simčić disagreed on this point, it is independently confirmed by other sources. Božidar Kavran, a senior member of Pavelić's post-war underground network, has testified that Draganović boasted in his presence that he was the Vatican's official representative for all Eastern European nations. Finally, US intelligence identified Draganović as the Vatican's 'DP Resettlement Chief'. They knew this because they were utilising his Ratline to smuggle their own agents out of Europe.[95]

Apart from eye witnesses and the unanimous opinion of Western intelligence, there is other evidence that clearly demonstrates Draganović's influence with both the Secretariat of State and the Pope himself. For example, on many occasions the Vatican intervened on behalf of interned Ustashi prisoners in Allied camps. Nearly always these intercessions were engineered by Draganović. On one occasion, in early March 1946, Draganović appealed to leading Church figures around the world, including Cardinals Griffin and Gilroy in Britain and Australia, requesting their assistance. He then actively lobbied the Secretariat of State to intervene formally.[96] Finally, Draganović went directly to Pius XII.

The object of his appeal was two hundred former Ustashi militia men, and numerous members of the infamous SS Divisions Prince Eugen and Handžar. The former was composed of Yugoslav Germans, while the latter was raised from the significant Moslem population of Bosnia. Both had committed atrocities against innocent civilians. Others whose cases were advocated by Draganović included former Ustashi government ministers, Dragutin Toth, Vjekoslav Vrančić, Mile Starčević and Stjepo Perić, as well as former air force chief, Vladimir Kren. Several of these men later turned out to be hiding in San Girolamo or the Vatican, as discovered by Mudd's spy.

The Vatican soon acted, taking up these cases with American and British diplomats and recommending their 'kind attention and consideration' of Father Draganović's appeal.[97] Many more diplomatic interventions by the Vatican followed, most on behalf of men who had so recently perpetrated the Nazi Holocaust.

Draganović had many opportunities to pass his message to Pius XII. For example, in June 1946 San Girolamo's Executive Committee appointed a 'special delegation' to attend a personal audience with the Pope. Draganović was a senior member of this committee, so it was not surprising that his 'close friends', Dr Ivo Omrčanin and Professor Nikolić, a well known Ustashi propagandist, were chosen to attend the meeting. The Italian government had complained to the Western powers about Omrčanin's activities twelve months before, noting that he had been an official of the Ustashi Foreign Ministry.[98]

US intelligence determined that Omrčanin had 'worked closely with Draganović . . . to assist Croatian refugees emigration matters'. Simčić recalled Omrčanin as a man full of his own self-importance, always boasting of his central role. Nonetheless, Simčić confirmed that Omrčanin 'was very close to Draganović and they co-operated during that period'.[99] Omrčanin had in fact worked directly under Draganović in the Croatian Committee of Pontifical Assistance between 1948 and 1953, touring the DP camps and sending thousands of fugitives down the Ratline.

Omrčanin now lives in Washington, from where he publishes a stream of pro-Ustashi propaganda tracts. He confirms Simčić's and Cecelja's views. For instance, in a 1986 interview he claimed that Assistant Secretary of State Montini was aware of the full dimensions of Draganović's smuggling network. Omrčanin also boasted that they had sent 30,000 people down the Ratline, including many German scientists and technicians.[100]

Finally, there is the issue of the Vatican's involvement in San Girolamo's finances. British intelligence discovered that Father Dominik Mandić controlled San Girolamo's finances 'with considerable dexterity'. He was the treasurer of the official Croatian section of the Pope's Assistance Commission for Refugees. The British established that one of his principal tasks was to 'arrange the placing against Italian currency of the gold, jewellery and foreign exchange deposited by high-ranking Ustaš officials', in reality the valuables of Pavelić's murdered victims, stolen by the fleeing Ustashi.[101]

Mandić was the senior Franciscan official who placed the order's printing press at San Girolamo's disposal so that false identity cards could be provided to the fugitives. American intelligence discovered that he was in fact 'a representative from the Vatican' at San Girolamo. It is not without coincidence that Father Mandić was the treasurer of Draganović's smuggling operation.[102]

Is it possible that all the eye witnesses who worked on this network are lying, perhaps to serve their own political ends? Or that all the Western intelligence officers got the facts completely wrong? According to Father Graham, the Holy See did not even know about, let alone endorse, what Draganović and his fellow Fascist priests were doing.

This seems highly implausible. The declassified Western intelligence and diplomatic records totally support the eye witnesses. American officers like William Gowen and Robert Mudd employed extraordinary means to find out the truth. They infiltrated spies into San Girolamo, penetrated the Ustashi intelligence network and even illegally photographed Draganović's files. Their findings were unambiguous: the Vatican was behind this Fascist priest's activities. Gowen came to believe that the Vatican's attitude, although perhaps unsavoury, was entirely justified by the exigencies of the Cold War. This makes his conclusions about the Vatican's involvement all the more powerful.

British SIS files on this subject (as in nearly all cases) are completely closed. However, there are several key diplomatic and military intelligence reports publicly available that completely support the American findings. It is impossible to believe that all these reports were written by incompetent or prejudiced officials. After all, both the British and later the Americans had recruited the very same Nazis who were being protected by the Church. Their information actually came from within the very bowels of the machine. Further, it is clear that Western intelligence was both co-operating with and cynically manipulating the Vatican for its own ends.

In summary, it is virtually inconceivable that the key officials in the Vatican hierarchy were ignorant of Draganović's Nazi-smuggling network. It is true that these prelates were only a tiny cabal, but they numbered among them the most influential officials, including the Pope and at least one Assistant Secretary of State. They were the men with access to real power and resources.

There was a reason for their protection of Nazis. Britain's SIS had not helped the Vatican save Ante Pavelić through misguided notions of benevolence and charity. They wanted a great deal in return. They wanted agents to infiltrate Communist Yugoslavia, to gather intelligence and conduct terrorist strikes on strategic targets and Communist personnel, especially the feared secret police.

These agents were drawn from the ranks of Pavelić's defeated Ustashi. Harking back to the militant days of Christendom, the Poglavnik dubbed these Catholic warriors the Križari – his Crusaders. The Vatican scandal was only beginning.

The Golden Priest

The main hall of the old Zagreb Fair was packed with a carefully picked crowd of 1500 Communist stalwarts. The fifty-seven defendants of the 'show trial' nervously awaited the inevitable verdicts with an air of resignation. Throughout July and August 1948 a farcical judicial process had been conducted in the close, hot summer. An almost carnival atmosphere had prevailed, as the unruly spectators alternately applauded the prosecution with great enthusiasm, then cat-called, jeered, booed and laughed at the unfortunate Ustashi militants brought to account for their crimes.

The proceedings had been broadcast live over the local radio station, a tightly controlled Communist propaganda outlet. Whenever there was an embarrassing departure from the carefully prepared script, the crowded court room would shout 'Long Live Comrade Tito', and the radio station would switch to repetitious slogans glorifying the dictator's regime.

No one was surprised at the guilty verdicts, or the death sentences and long terms of imprisonment. But despite the crudeness of the trial, none except diehard Ustashi supporters believed that the outcome was not justified. Among the defendants were some of Ante Pavelić's most brutal mass murderers, men who had implemented their Poglavnik's bloody racial and political policies with unbelievable relish.[1]

Their war crimes, though, had merely been a backdrop to the trial's real purpose: to crush the morale of the largely anti-Communist populace. The defendants were the cream of Pavelić's Crusaders, or Križari, the underground resistance movement left behind to raise an insurrection against the Communists. Most of those on trial had infiltrated into Croatia from the Križari's bases in Austria over the previous two years.

Their orders were to strengthen the underground and launch a violent campaign of assassination, sabotage and disruption, preparing for the moment when they would finally settle scores with their old enemies. Their aim was to link up with powerful units operating in the rugged terrain, destroy telegraph, telephone and railway communications, attack industry and murder 'more prominent political and military representatives'. Instead of finding a well organised underground of over 300,000 men, they soon encountered Tito's efficient and ruthless secret police. Most were in Communist hands within a few days of crossing the border, many within hours.

Although the whole Križari affair was obviously manipulated, the prosecutors and judges cleverly turned it into an effective propaganda exercise, linking notorious war criminals with both the West and the Catholic Church. Most of the defendants admitted their murderous roles for Pavelić. Many implicated unspecified Western intelligence services, said to have provided logistical support, training and equipment for the terrorist operations inside their homeland.

Not surprisingly, in light of the powerful position of the Croatian Catholic Church, special attention was reserved for the sinister machinations of the Vatican, which allegedly had been plotting Tito's downfall in league with Archbishop Stepinac and the local clergy. Tito had begun his campaign against the Church in November 1945, announcing that 'terrorist organisations had been discovered which were led by priests and made up of Ustaše, who had now changed their names to Crusaders'.[2]

Trials of Križari members began the following month, when Father Ivan Condrić and four other priests were found guilty of organising Križari terrorist actions. The man behind these schemes was said to be Father Krunoslav Draganović, Secretary of the Confraternity of San Girolamo in Rome and the 'Ustashi representative at [the] Vatican'.[3]

Many of the defendants in the 1948 trial admitted taking refuge at San Girolamo, where Draganović recruited them to the Križari. They outlined his central role in directing the underground network, even claiming that the Pope himself had blessed the work during a meeting with Draganović. According to one defendant, Draganović was the Križari's 'grey eminence', the 'chief person who perhaps acts stronger behind the scenes than publicly. He was the main leader, because he had behind him all forces, both [the] Vatican and the foreign powers.'[4]

In a typical rhetorical flourish, the Communist prosecutor claimed that an 'especially shameful role' had been played by 'Vatican circles'. Father Draganović had 'established contact between the Ustashi terrorist groups', the Vatican had financed them and Draganović had set up a 'spy centre' in Trieste in 1945 and sent in the first group of terrorists.

Draganović had also maintained close contact with British and American intelligence, who had directed and assisted the Križari's military preparations. Ljubo Miloš told the court that Pavelić and Draganović had closely collaborated, jointly issuing orders to the terrorist groups. Miloš knew what he was talking about, having been saved from Allied arrest by Father Draganović, despite his bloody record as a Ustashi war criminal.[5]

These charges were fantastic. If true, the Vatican had actually supported wanted war criminals to launch a terrorist campaign against the 'atheistic Bolshevik' foe. Back at the Foreign Office in London, the bureaucrats dismissed the claims, noting that much of 'the "evidence" produced to this effect was of course puerile'. Still, they had to admit that Brigadier Fitzroy Maclean's Mission in Italy had stumbled across substantial evidence implicating US intelligence in aiding the Ustashi's activities. There was no doubt, the British further noted, that San Girolamo 'was the centre of much suspicious activity'.[6]

Having decided that their American ally was the most plausible guilty party, the Foreign Office happily washed its hands of any responsibility for the disastrous collapse of the anti-Communist cause in Yugoslavia. The reality was very different . . .

William Gowen and his CIC colleagues had started to unravel Britain's role in the Križari's operations during their hunt for Ante Pavelić in 1947. As already discussed, they soon discovered that the Vatican was sheltering Pavelić, with the connivance of the British Secret Intelligence Service. In the course of establishing this, Gowen also confirmed sensational claims made by Ferenc Vajta. It will be recalled that the American's Hungarian Nazi contact had told him that SIS was behind the military and political revival of the Ustashi.

Gowen investigated the Križari's finances and soon uncovered the unsavoury truth: their money came partly from the 'treasure' which 'Pavelić's henchmen' had carried out of Croatia. According to Gowen, the Ustashi had fled with a large number of truckloads of this stolen booty. When the British SIS apprehended Pavelić in Austria in May 1945, they also picked up some of his loot. Gowen believed that the following story of what really happened was 'closest to the truth':

> British Lt Colonel Jonson was placed in charge of two (2) trucks laden with the supposed property of the Catholic Church in the British Zone of Austria. These two (2) trucks, accompanied by a number of priests and the British officer, then entered Italy and went to an unknown destination.[7]

Major Stephen Clissold confirmed that two such Ustashi 'treasure trucks' had indeed reached Austria. Not surprisingly, Clissold did not mention the British role in removing them to Italy, claiming instead that they 'were deposited in the safe-keeping of a monastery'.[8] Perhaps the 'treasure' had been in a monastery, but Gowen was certain that the British were now using it to finance > the Croat resistance movement in Yugoslavia. The resistance forces . . . go by the name of Križari (Crusaders) . . . Radio contact is maintained by means of a field radio operated by Vrančić, a former Pavelić minister, located in the British Zone of Austria. The Ustascia courier service within the Austrian Zones is believed aided by the Roman Catholic Church in Austria. The Cardinal of Graz is known to be on close terms with . . . Professor Draganović, Krunoslav, known Pavelić contact in Rome.[9]

Yet again, Western intelligence found that Father Draganović was at the centre of the Ustashi's clandestine activities. Indeed, he was widely known in Western intelligence and émigré circles as 'the golden priest' because he controlled a large part of the stolen treasure.[10] Although Colonel Jonson had taken away two truckloads in 1945, this was only a fraction of Pavelić's loot.

Four hundred kilos of gold, worth millions of dollars, and a considerable amount of foreign currency had been secreted at Wolfsberg, where it was under the control of former Ustashi Minister, Lovro Sušić. Draganović discovered this from senior Ustashi officials during his visit to Austria in mid-1945. They were apparently determined to maintain some independence from the British, who they feared would seize the gold, so they asked Draganović to save it. The priest was only too willing to oblige, for he contacted Sušić and with his agreement took forty kilos of gold bars to Rome, concealed in two packing cases.[11]

There is no doubt about Draganović's close connections with the Ustashi hierarchy in this money laundering scheme. Sušić appointed Draganović to a three person committee to control the treasure. His colleagues, former Ustashi Minister Stjepan Hefer, and Gendarmerie General Vilko Pečnikar, were also senior Križari officers. Pečnikar was Pavelić's son-in-law and played a particularly important role in the terrorist network. US intelligence discovered that he 'maintained contact with several clandestine Nazi organizations' and operated a sophisticated intelligence service which liaised between the Austrian and Italian groups. All of these men were wanted war criminals, but evaded the Western dragnet with Draganović's help. At one time or another, they each had taken shelter under his wing, either at San Girolamo or in some other Vatican-protected haven.[12]

Draganović's close colleague on the Ratline, Monsignor Milan Simčić, is certain that his conspiratorial friend was not involved in the Križari's operations. Simčić recalled the mood which prevailed among the Ustashi at the end of the war. There was widespread optimism, he said, and a firm belief that the Western powers would soon launch a new war against Communism, and topple Tito's regime. The Ustashi high command thought that their exile would end almost as soon as it had begun, and with Western help they would return to create another 'independent' Croatian state.

According to Simčić, the Križari were 'idealists', who organised the terrorist network without any assistance from either Draganović or Western intelligence, although he conceded that many were also 'fanatics'.[13] However, Draganović admitted at least some involvement with the Križari high command, although he tried to minimise his role.[14]

Draganović sought desperately to place the whole blame for the Križari on Pavelić, who, he said, had organised the terrorists while hiding in the British zone of Austria. The man entrusted to command the operation was one of the Poglavnik's most faithful servants, Božidar Kavran, assisted by Lovro Sušić, Draganović's partner in saving the stolen treasure hidden in Austria. Although the priest did admit to discussing the Križari with Kavran at a meeting in Rome, he insisted that he was not the Križari's Church contact.[15]

He claimed that this was another Croatian Fascist priest, Father Josip Bujanović, who had been the Ustashi leader at the town of Gospić during the war. A young British captain by the name of Evelyn Waugh had investigated Father Bujanović's activities in Gospić, and concluded that 'he is credibly reported to have taken a hand in the massacre of Orthodox peasants'.[16] Like his fellow priests running the Ratline, Bujanović fled Croatia in front of the Communists and became a senior Križari officer working directly under Kavran and Sušić. As previously discussed, Bujanović arranged for Pavelić's trip to Argentina, and then followed him to South America, before finally settling in Australia.

Having confirmed that Father Bujanović was a senior officer in the terrorist network, Draganović denied his own involvement. Indeed, he 'was certain that a priest should not be part of such a revolutionary organisation', and unequivocal that he remained aside from the Križari. In fact, he claimed actively to have discouraged participation in such dangerous operations. His old friend, Monsignor Simčić, fully supported Draganović on this point.[17]

However, in tracking down Pavelić's treasure, Gowen found that the Church's involvement with the Križari went much deeper than Father Bujanović. In fact, the CIC officer finally pieced together yet another jigsaw puzzle which had confused US intelligence over the previous two years. His CIC colleagues in Austria had placed the Križari under close surveillance immediately war ended, arresting some of its senior leaders. They quickly established that the retreating Ustashi had enlisted 'the Roman Catholic Church in their struggle'. As outlined earlier, this was achieved on 25 June 1945 when a meeting was held with a 'papal mission in Salzburg'.

A letter was addressed to the Pope, elaborating the Ustashi's plan to create either a new Croatian state or some form of the Pan-Danubian Confederation. In support of their request for assistance, they argued that Croatia was a bastion in the fight against the large 'Serbian state' (i.e. Yugoslavia), which was 'a tool of Russia for the conquest of the Balkans'. [18] There is a great deal of evidence that the Vatican responded positively to these approaches. One British intelligence officer recently confirmed that the Križari had extremely strong links with the Vatican.

This officer worked on anti-Communist operations in Italy after the war and was certain that the Church had also been a link to senior Italian politicians and bureaucrats who assisted the Križari's terrorist operations. In the hysterical mood of the early Cold War years, Croatia was seen by the Vatican as its stronghold in the Balkans.[19]

American intelligence recorded that the Ustashi have 'received much assistance from the Catholic Church since the end of the war'.[20] One of their principal Church helpers was Archbishop Andreas Rohracher of Salzburg. According to Ljubo Miloš's testimony at the Križari 'show trial', Rohracher put the Church at the disposal of Intermarium's Pan-Danubian Confederation.

At Rohracher's initiative, a meeting was called by the Bishop of Klagenfurt to discuss bringing the Catholic nations of Central Europe into this Confederation. Apart from Rohracher and the Bishop of Klagenfurt, Bishops Gregory Rožman of Ljubljana and Ivan Šarić of Sarajevo attended the meeting. The last two prelates had been enthusiastic Nazi collaborators, US intelligence noting that Bishop Šarić was a '"hangman" known to Croatian Serbs, and those in Bosnia and Herzegovinia under the regime of the Ustachis during the war'.[21]

Archbishop Rohracher had also interceded on behalf of the Ustashi with the Allied authorities in Austria, 'to create a favorable impression' in preparation for their offer to 'put themselves at the disposal of Anglo-American leadership'. The Italians obtained reliable information in June 1945 that the British had immediately accepted this offer. It came from no less a source than Father Draganović's close colleague in the Ratlines, Ivo Omrčanin. According to the Italian report, Omrčanin told them that Pavelić and his closest comrades were meeting regularly with 'sympathetic elements of the British forces, who have been paying for the reorganisation of a united Ustashi for eventual use against Tito'.[22]

Another Italian report noted that these activities aimed 'to overthrow Tito's regime in Yugoslavia'. American intelligence agreed that their British ally was co-ordinating the operations in Austria. Gowen established that in August 1946 a 'considerable number of pamphlets were dropped in Croat territory by planes, apparently from the British Zone of Austria. These pamphlets, signed by Pavelić . . . declared that ceaseless warfare would continue until such time as either Tito or Pavelić was permanently eliminated.' The latter would be the victor in 'this death struggle'.[23]

Further, the US officers received information that the Križari's military supplies were almost completely British, including 'mortars, machine guns, sub-machine guns, two-way field radios and uniforms of British manufacture. The condition of the weapons is good and each man is furnished with a firearm. Nearly all the arms are of British types.'[24]

The Ustashi's approaches to the Catholic Church were apparently equally successful. US intelligence received information that the Križari's 'organization has extended to the Vatican, where the center of the Command is currently located. From the Vatican, help is delivered by underground methods, such as delivery of arms and other vital supplies . . . Arms arriving in Croatia are said to come from Switzerland.'[25]

The outlandish charges made by the Yugoslavs during the Križari 'show trial' may have had more than a little substance after all. Twelve months before the trial had even commenced, the CIC in Salzburg had learned from a reliable source that Draganović was not only the head of the 'Croatian Clerical Party', but also a senior leader of the Križari. He maintained excellent contact with his forces inside Croatia and received 'the backing of the Catholic Church'.[26]

The Salzburg CIC detachment later reported that this so-called 'Clerical Party' was 'under the direct leadership of the Pope', who wanted to create the Catholic Pan-Danubian Confederation.[27] It was further established that Draganović was working 'hand-in-hand' with the Slovene Clerical Party.[28]

The two most important members of this group in Rome were both senior Intermarium figures – Miha Krek, political leader of the Slovene Catholics and Monsignor Anton Prešeren, the Assistant General of the powerful Jesuit order. The Italian secret service noted the influence exercised by the Slovenes at the Vatican as early as August 1944. The Italians observed that the Slovene clericals were actively collaborating with the Nazis, and already working closely with Draganović in providing welfare and assistance to 'refugees'. At that time, Reverend Ahčin was the 'go-between' for this group and the Vatican, the Italians noted.[29]

From their contacts in Italian intelligence, the Americans discovered in July 1945 that Krek, Prešeren and Ahčin were really British agents.[30] By that time, Prešeren was the main contact with the Holy See. Under cover of the Church, and in close co-operation with Draganović, the Slovenes had established their own section of the Križari.[31]

The Slovenes did not make exaggerated claims like their Croatian comrades, who falsely boasted of having between 40,000 and 300,000 Križari in the Papuk mountains and other rugged areas. The Slovenes, however, kept up a constant stream of propaganda to convince the Allies that they, too, had major forces in the field.[32] Interrogation of Slovene leaders indicated that their guerrilla units were operating mainly in the Gorensko region and Pohorje mountains, maintaining a high level of co-operation with the Ustashi groups. They 'are clothed in American and British combat dresses, and armed by subguns. Their ranks consist of deserters and farmers, mostly.'[33]

The spiritual leader of the Slovenian Križari forces was Bishop Gregory Rožman, whose pastoral centre was in the capital, Ljubljana. This very political Bishop had not set foot there since early May 1945, when together with other Nazi collaborators he had fled to Austria. Here he found a warm welcome from the Bishop of Klagenfurt in the British occupation zone. Rožman desperately needed his protection, for he was one of the most wanted Nazi collaborators. In Krek's absence during the war, Rožman took charge of the Slovene Clerical Party, establishing close ties with both the Italian Fascists and the Nazis.

Rožman was more than a mere figurehead, taking an active part in organising the quisling forces. In mid-1942, he went on a secret mission to the Vatican, asking Pius XII to obtain weapons, food, uniforms and other essential equipment for his Catholic anti-Communist army. As a result, the Italians supplied Rožman's forces. At his suggestion, a number of priests also assumed key military and intelligence roles for the Axis powers.[34]

When the Italians capitulated in September 1943, Rožman organised the smooth transition to Nazi rule, suggesting the formation of the Slovenian Homeguard to Hitler's Gauleiter. This Homeguard was completely under German control, serving directly under the command of the local SS and Higher Police chief. It was infamous for its massacres of civilians, especially supporters of the Communist-led partisans, while its secret police conducted a campaign of terror and murder under the Gestapo's direction.[35]

While these atrocities were taking place, Rožman gave enthusiastic support to the Nazi cause, issuing numerous appeals for Slovenes to 'fight on the side of Germany'. His Pastoral Letter of 30 November 1943 was typical of the stridently pro-Nazi tone of the Bishop's 'spiritual work'. Having urged his faithful to fight for Germany, he pointed out that only 'by this courageous fighting and industrious work for God, for the people and Fatherland will we, under the leadership of Germany, assure our existence and better future, in the fight against [the] Jewish conspiracy'.[36]

There was little doubt in London that Bishop Rožman was a notorious Nazi quisling who deserved extradition to Tito's Yugoslavia. The evidence against him was overwhelming. In addition to his anti-Semitic Pastoral Letter, Rožman was photographed on the dais with the local SS commander during an official ceremony. The Homeguard had just sworn to serve under Hitler's command and were marching past their commanding officer. The SS General stood rigidly to attention, giving the Nazi salute, while the Bishop gave pious approval to his quisling army.

By late 1945, the Foreign Office concluded that Rožman had clearly 'collaborated with the enemy' and was no less guilty than others who had been turned over to the Communists.[37] However, Rožman had powerful friends at the Vatican, and this ultimately explains why the British allowed him to 'escape' and play a major role for the Križari.

Six months before the war ended, Krek and Monsignor Prešeren took up Rožman's cause with the Pope. At a meeting with Pius XII on 26 November 1944, they delivered the Bishop's personal letter to the Pontiff. Rožman outlined his plan for a Western-backed effort to defeat Tito's partisans and install a pro-Western government.[38] As soon as hostilities ceased, the Vatican launched a concerted campaign to secure their Bishop's freedom, repeatedly asking that he be given safe conduct from Austria to find refuge at the Holy See.[39]

They even offered to send a specially selected priest to travel to Klagenfurt to collect Rožman. The man chosen for this task was none other than Father Draganović, who later recalled that rescuing Rožman was one of the most important tasks given him by the Vatican. Draganović was ordered to locate the Bishop on his visit to Austria in May 1945 and bring him back to Rome. He worked hard to carry out his mission, attempting to procure the necessary travel papers for Rožman to make the journey. However, he encountered serious difficulties with the British. Although they permitted him to visit the Bishop, they refused to provide the travel pass and Rožman was forced to remain in Austria. Draganović was disgusted, complaining bitterly that politics had intruded into the Church's charitable work.[40]

Indeed they had, for in response to the Holy See's interventions, the Foreign Office noted that Rožman was 'a quisling'. This explained why they refused Draganović's entreaties, for they had decided that Rožman could on no account be permitted to 'find sanctuary at the Vatican'. Officially, the British favoured his surrender to the Communists. But with typical cynicism, they blamed their American ally for their failure to carry out this decision. Their Embassy in Washington reported in January 1946 that on 'account of the probable repercussions amongst Catholics in this country and elsewhere [the] State Department want to be quite sure of their ground before agreeing to the surrender of Bishop Rožman'. Senior US bureaucrats, however, had unofficially indicated that they would probably ultimately agree to hand him over to Tito.[41]

In fact, senior State Department officials concluded that the 'case as presented by the Yugoslav Ambassador is sufficient to justify handing the Bishop over to Yugoslavia'. However, the Secretary of State simply decided that the Vatican's interest in the case overrode the evidence. America refused to agree with London's proposal for Rožman's extradition.[42]

British intelligence were delighted. The attitudes of the Americans and the Holy See were perfect smokescreens for their real plan. Over the following twenty months the British maintained some nominal supervision of Rožman at his relatively luxurious residence at the Bishop of Klagenfurt's Palace. As the Cold War threatened to 'hot up', they decided unofficially to release the Bishop, despite their previous decision to deliver him up to the Yugoslavs.

This followed yet another intervention by Intermarium President Krek, who exerted considerable pressure on the Foreign Office through the good offices of a Labour Member of Parliament. Krek's entreaties on Rožman's behalf were laced with numerous fabrications and lies, among other things asserting that the 'Holy Father approved all deeds of Mnsgr. Dr Gregorius Rožman' during the war. According to Krek, Rožman had really been a courageous anti-Nazi. The real reason for Tito's extradition request was that Rožman had also been 'a vigorous, active, unyielding adversary of the Communists'.[43]

The British knew Krek's version was completely inaccurate, but nonetheless the campaign then being waged in parliament coincided with their own plan. This involved doing a deal with the Vatican to bring about the very solution they had been requesting for the previous two years. The British proposed quietly to allow the Bishop to 'escape', travel from Klagenfurt to Salzburg, and thence to the safety of Italy and finally the Vatican. Once he had 'escaped', Rožman would be under the care of the Catholic Church and no longer the Foreign Office's concern.

So in November 1947 a British Diplomat visited Monsignor Tardini, head of the Extraordinary Affairs Department in the Vatican's Secretariat of State. He explained the scheme to Tardini, who 'was very relieved to hear of H. M. Government's proposal, and he immediately suggested that the best thing' would be to send Rožman to the United States, where he felt sure that the American Catholic Bishops 'would, if requested by the Pope, be glad to look after' him.[44]

Tardini also mounted a spirited defence of Rožman, saying that he was 'an excellent bishop'. His only offence was 'that he had done everything to organise an anti-Tito Government, in the expectation that the British and American troops, who, in his view, stood for order and civilisation, would get to his part of the world before Tito's troops, who were only a "Godless and shirtless crowd"'.[45]

Tardini did not mention that Rožman's anti-Communist government was in fact completely under Nazi control, although he 'added that it was true the Vatican laid down as a general maxim that the clergy should not interfere in politics, but they left it to the bishops to decide how to interpret this in the light of local conditions and their effect on the faithful. Bishop Rožman had acted for the best according to his conscience, and the Vatican could not disown him.'[46]

Back in London they were very pleased at Tardini's response, and immediately asked the Americans if they would go along with the scheme. However, even as the final arrangements for the Bishop's 'escape' were being made, Rožman quietly slipped away without warning. This prompted the British bureaucrats to observe hypocritically: 'It seems curious that a Paladin of the Roman church should have failed to keep his word.' Rožman was by then fully aware of the deal struck with the Vatican. Nonetheless, the Foreign Office feigned shock that a senior prelate, who was merely 'on parole', could have acted dishonestly.[47]

In fact, Rožman's escape was part of a wider plan. The Bishop had quietly slipped away following a message from American Cardinal Spellman to Archbishop Rohracher of Salzburg, telling him that Rožman 'could find sanctuary in the United States'. Soon after, on 11 November 1947, Rožman quietly disappeared from the Bishop of Klagenfurt's palace and made straight for the protection of Archbishop Rohracher in Salzburg. The Foreign Office noted that the story doing the rounds in Vienna was that Rožman had 'left Klagenfurt in an American army staff car, driven by an American driver!'[48]

This may explain why US intelligence soon discovered the real reason for Rožman's disappearance. They traced him to his hideout in Salzburg, and put him under close surveillance. They reported that Rožman enthusiastically resumed his work for the Nazi underground immediately he fled from Klagenfurt. The quisling Bishop had linked up with the Križari command and undertaken an extremely important assignment on their behalf.

According to the Americans, Rožman intended to visit Berne in Switzerland, where US intelligence officers had recently discovered the whereabouts of much of the Ustashi treasure Pavelić had sent abroad. With the help of Catholic priests, Pavelić had begun to transfer large quantities of gold and currency to Switzerland in early 1944. Some of the treasure had been taken to Italy by British Lieutenant Colonel Jonson to finance the Križari forces. Another portion went to Rome with Draganović and also ended up financing the terrorist network.[49]

But over 2,400 kilos of gold and other valuables still remained secreted in Berne. It was supposed to be used to 'aid refugees of the Catholic religion', but was really earmarked for the Ustashi's clandestine operations. Although the Allies had temporarily prevented them from gaining access to these funds, by early 1948 the time had come to use the Church to retrieve the loot.

In Berne, Rožman's Ustashi friends were engaged in wholesale fraud, using the black market to convert the gold into dollars, and later, into Austrian schillings. '[A]id to the refugees is accounted for at the official rate of exchange for dollars,' the American officers noted, adding that 'malpractices have been carried on (officially, the dollar is worth 10 schillings; on the black market, 100 to 150).' According to reliable information:

> Rožman is going to Berne to take care of these finances. The money is in a Swiss bank, and he plans to have most of it sent through to Italy and from there to the Ustashis in [the] Argentine.[50]

A short time later Rožman duly arrived in Berne, accompanied by Bishop Ivan Šarić, the 'hangman' of Sarajevo. By the end of May 1948, Rožman had apparently carried out this money laundering operation for the Ustashi, for he visited the US Consulate in Zurich and was given a 'non-quota immigration visa as a minister of religion'. He then travelled to the United States and settled in Cleveland, Ohio.[51]

The circle was now almost complete. Pavelić's stolen 'treasure' had been tracked down through close monitoring of the movements and activities of the quisling Bishop of Ljubljana. But this was only the beginning of the Križari's money laundering schemes. Through high level Church figures, the Križari command actually received Vatican funds. Some was used to induce the Italian government of Alcide de Gasperi to provide the weapons they required for their anti-Tito crusade . . .

Hints of this were first picked up in the Allied zone of Trieste by Special CIC Agent, Willard Thomas. In May 1947 one of his informants came into close contact with Križari 'Colonel', Drago Marinković. According to Thomas's source, Marinković had 'the responsibility for securing arms and funds from Italian sources', travelling widely on these missions between Trieste, Venice and Rome. Further, Marinković had 'contacted the Vatican in Rome where he recently was successful in securing a large sum of money, although whether this was received from the Vatican or from some other party through the facilities of the Vatican is not known'.[52]

Thomas noted that this money had been used successfully to procure weapons, 'as during the past week a truck and trailer carrying Sub Machine Guns camouflaged with furniture . . . was met by a group of people who were waiting to carry the arms into

Yugoslavia'. The US officer commented that while the West was apparently not helping the Križari in Italy, 'they are supposed to be furnishing aid across the Austrian border'.[53]

The source of these arms shipments was determined a few weeks later when the Americans investigated Slovenian Križari leader, Franjo Lipovec. According to their information, Lipovec had been one of the first Križari leaders recruited by British intelligence after the war. In 1945 he was picked up by the SIS in Trieste, where he was later 'employed on a salary basis' by a British Army intelligence unit.

The CIC officers established that Lipovec was the main liaison between the Križari and the Italian government. In August 1946 he met senior Italian military intelligence officers who 'proposed that some degree of cooperation should be established'.[54] Lipovec accepted their offer and 'sold himself and his plans completely' to the Italians. His plans were in turn furnished to de Gasperi's chef de cabinet, and the Italian Premier subsequently 'assured Lipovec that . . . his government would unofficially do everything within their means to strengthen the Tito opposition.' Unconditional public support was promised when the situation was more favourable.

With the financial support of Italian intelligence, Lipovec and his comrades then launched a propaganda campaign to make new recruits among the émigrés in Trieste. The next step was to arm the Križari units there, and after several meetings with Italian intelligence, Lipovec reached an agreement 'whereby weapons from Italian Army supply depots would be made available to Lipovec for his onward forwarding to Križari elements' in Trieste.

In February and March 1947, eight arms shipments were delivered under this agreement, including over 500 automatic weapons, some 4,000 hand grenades, 100 pistols and over 30 time bombs. Italian intelligence paid the transportation expenses to take the weapons into Yugoslavia from the Allied zone of Trieste.[55]

A former British intelligence officer, who served in Trieste at this time, confirms these American reports. In a taped interview, he recalled that his orders were to establish a special anti-Communist security office in Trieste. Most of his team were British officers, but they co-ordinated their operations with both American intelligence and local Italian police. The latter were in effect Trieste's

Special Branch, or 'political police', but were really under Allied command.[56]

Their main task was to control Yugoslav subversive activities, including infiltrations into the so-called Free Territory of Trieste, which was under British military rule. In investigating Communist intelligence operations, this British officer came into contact with anti-Communist Yugoslav terrorists, who were smuggling weapons into their homeland, helped by Italian Fascists.

According to this officer, Trieste was the 'meeting point for the resistance forces inside Yugoslavia and the forces who were financing, controlling and directing them in Italy'. The main liaison was Professor Ivan Protulipac, described by the British officer as 'Father Draganović's man in Trieste'. In the 1930s, Protulipac was the leader of an official Church group, ironically also called the Križari. After the war, he took a leading role in the terrorist Križari, until Communist agents assassinated him in Trieste in late 1946.[57]

The British officer also confirms that Draganović was working closely with Italian intelligence, smuggling arms into Yugoslavia under cover of the Italian Red Cross. These were the same Italian intelligence officers described in the American reports as Lipovec's link to de Gasperi. The British officer was also aware of the West's role in the Križari's operations, although he had no personal involvement.

He told us that common criminals, especially drug smugglers and black marketeers, were frequently utilised to assist the Križari to cross the Yugoslav border. In his view, this was one reason why the West's political and military operations were a disaster. 'We always used the wrong elements. We took any crook, any compromised person', including Nazis and murderers.[58]

Although the British dominated the joint intelligence operation in Trieste, close liaison was maintained with the Americans. The Trieste CIC detachment received information about joint British–American operations involving > an Allied sponsored recruiting campaign . . . for volunteers for the Križari Movement. Many of these volunteers have already been taken to an American training camp in or near Udine, where they receive training. They are furnished with American Army rations and uniforms, plus 700 lire pay daily . . . On completion of their training the men are furnished with American arms and taken into Austria, from which they enter Jugoslav > territory. They have use of British camps in Austria . . . to which they retire for periodic rests.[59]

The Americans believed this story was possibly Communist-inspired propaganda, 'circulated in an attempt to discredit the Americans, and as such, is not true at all'.[60] However, there certainly were Americans working in Trieste and Udine on joint Allied Križari operations.

For example, according to our former British intelligence contact, Colonel Lewis Perry was ostensibly with the US CIC detachment in Trieste during 1946 and 1947, although he did not wear any distinguishing military insignia on his uniform. 'I know he used to regularly go to Rome, and I'm absolutely sure he must have known Draganović'. As will be seen, Perry later became one of the key US links in Father Draganović's Ratline.

Perry was one of the few Western officers identified by name at the Križari 'show trial' in Zagreb in 1948, specifically accused of being the head of the 'spy centre in Trieste'.[61] The Yugoslavs found out a great deal about Perry from the defendants. For example, the most senior Križari on trial, Božidar Kavran, provided many details about the American's contacts with the terrorist network.

Kavran was the wartime commander of Ustashi headquarters, and then after the war was in charge of the Križari's Austrian base at Trofaiach. He worked directly under Pavelić and Draganović on Križari terrorist and intelligence operations. Nearly forty years later, his interrogation reports were smuggled out of Eastern Europe to the authors. These revealed many aspects of Perry's work in Trieste, especially his close relationship with Srečko Rover, one of the younger rising stars of the terrorist network. Kavran and Rover worked closely even before the war, when they were both underground Ustashi members in Bosnia, involved in a plot to assassinate King Peter.

When the Nazis arrived in 1941, Rover became a member of one of Pavelić's murderous Mobile Courts Martial, summarily executing the Ustashi's racial and political enemies. After serving on this roving extermination squad, Rover was sent to Austria for special officer training, and then promoted to serve in Pavelić's Personal Bodyguard, a repressive police unit similar to the Gestapo.[62]

After the war, Rover joined the throng of wanted war criminals hiding out in the Italian countryside, and soon enrolled in the Križari underground. He got his false identity papers from Draganović at San Girolamo, allowing him to obtain official documents, especially Italian residency papers. Rover worked closely with Draganović, undertaking numerous missions on behalf of the Ustashi's 'grey eminence', and eventually rising to the very top of the Križari command.[63]

Early in 1946 Rover was dispatched to Trieste to work with Draganović's intelligence network. He contacted Colonel Perry and established close working relations with the American intelligence officer. Apparently Perry was impressed with Rover's proposals, for he recruited the Križari 'captain' and supplied him with travel and identity documents. The American then sent him into Yugoslavia to establish a clandestine route for infiltrating agents into Yugoslavia. It was the start of a very profitable relationship for the 'little wolf', the nickname fondly given to Rover by his Križari comrades.

Nearly every time Rover was in trouble with Western authorities, Perry came to his assistance. The Allied Nazi hunting units arrested Rover on many occasions, but Perry's interventions ensured his release. Rover's relationship with the American also gave the 'little wolf' access to resources and information which assured his rapid promotion through the Križari ranks, finally becoming Kavran's second-in-command at the Trofaiach base in Austria.

As the clandestine network expanded, Rover undertook many important assignments. At first he was a courier, carrying top secret instructions between Križari leaders. He also became skilled at procuring and forging sophisticated travel and identity documents, allowing him and his comrades to travel freely, even in Communist Yugoslavia. Then he recruited volunteers for the terrorist and intelligence missions.

After returning from his clandestine mission for Perry, Rover travelled to Rome and met with Draganović to report directly on his recent successes. He was soon working closely with other senior members of Draganović's network, including many who later turned up on trial in Zagreb.

From the very beginning of his relationship with Perry things seemed to go wrong. For example, Rover's first mission for the American had taken him to Rijeka and Zagreb. Although he returned safely, the very next person Rover sent in via this route was immediately captured. Despite this, the 'little wolf' told his closest comrades that he believed the route he had established through Trieste was perfectly safe, and should be used for further operations.

Perhaps it is only coincidental, but nearly every Križari operation on which Rover worked was a complete disaster. Pavelić himself came to suspect that Rover may have been a Communist double agent, or at least some sort of provocateur. Among the senior Križari leaders, Rover seems to have been one of the few who repeatedly entered Yugoslavia and avoided detection and arrest by Tito's secret police. Apparently Rover was extremely lucky, unlike the many Križari he recruited in Italy, Germany and Austria.

Under orders from Draganović and Kavran, he travelled through the numerous camps in the Western zones, persuading many Ustashi to enlist in the Križari. When he became Kavran's deputy at Trofaiach, he was in charge of the underground's radio communications. He was well acquainted with the secret codes used to communicate between the Austrian headquarters and the Križari units inside Yugoslavia.

When the last disastrous operations were launched in mid-1948, Rover was placed in charge of guiding the terrorist groups into the country. Coincidentally, all the men he took across the border were either killed or captured, most within hours, the stragglers within days. The survivors found themselves before Tito's court in Zagreb in 1948. It seems that Srečko Rover was one of a handful of senior Križari operatives not amongst their ranks. Later Rover ran similar fiascos from Australia.

In retrospect, it is clear that the Communist secret police were well informed about all major aspects of the Križari's plans. Some US intelligence officers in Salzburg had suspected this since late 1947, when Dr Petar Prokop approached them asking for 'active financial and moral support'. Prokop promised to carry out acts of terrorism inside Yugoslavia as proof of the Križari's 'ability and organization'. The Americans commented that 'Prokop may be an Agent Provocateur used by [the] Tito authorities in an attempt to compromise US Agencies'.[64]

The evidence presented at the Križari 'show trial' in 1948 left little doubt that the Communist secret police had used double agents to run a very sophisticated counter operation. Somehow they had obtained the secret radio codes used by the Križari, and were informed well in advance of the precise details of their operations. They knew the exact routes used by the groups, as well as the dates and times of their entry into the country. With these advantages, it was easy for the secret police to lure the unsuspecting Križari into their hands using their own radio codes. Once inside the country, they were picked up at will.

It was a pattern that was eerily repeated over the coming years. Despite these terrible setbacks the operations were continued, and even extended into other Communist countries. Throughout the 1950s and into the 1960s the Yugoslav government held trials of captured agents, many allegedly financed by and operating under the orders of Father Draganović. One US intelligence report detailed massive illegal currency dealings in Austria, noting that these financed 'sending couriers and agents into Yugoslavia'. The counter-intelligence officer concluded that 'these present and past activities are being carried out by high-ranking Ustasha adherents, in conjunction with the Austrian government and the Catholic Church, which are attempting to establish the "Intermarium" or "Inter-Danube" state, composed of all the Catholic nations in Southeast Europe.'[65]

Pavelić's Križari were just a part of a wider effort launched by the Vatican in co-operation with Western intelligence. Other underground Catholic armies had been raised to disrupt, and if possible overthrow, the Communist regimes of Central and Eastern Europe. In Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Baltic states and the Ukraine, clandestine Nazi groups were operating in close liaison with the Križari.

US intelligence initially thought that these operations went under the codename 'Integral'. They soon discovered that the Križari's partners were notorious Fascists, operating under the leadership of Ukrainian Nazi Stepan Bandera to build yet another powerful Catholic-dominated alliance – the Anti-Bolshevik Bloc of Nations. They were soon working for the West on operations similar to the Križari, which ended in the same disastrous way.[66]

Long before British and American intelligence officers enticed the Vatican into these operations, the Communist secret police had taken action to frustrate and destroy the Western-backed émigrés. It would be years before the true story of Communist penetration and manipulation of the Catholic Nazis emerged from the classified intelligence files.

PART TWO

Communism's War Against the Church

The Vatican's Black Orchestra

The first public hint that Communist agents had deeply penetrated the Holy See came in 1967, when Father Krunoslav Draganović suddenly disappeared behind the 'Iron Curtain'. The one man who knew every detail of the Ratlines, including the role of two Popes, was about to call a press conference inside Communist Yugoslavia. Previously it had been Pacelli's recurring nightmare about Munich which had dominated. Now it was Montini's turn to have nightmares.

Tito must have been delighted. It quickly turned into a spectacular propaganda coup. Draganović had been at the centre of the Vatican's intelligence network for over three decades, and been on the closest terms with both Pius XII and Paul VI, the reigning Pope. He had also collaborated with Western intelligence on a variety of sensitive operations.

Even better for Tito, Draganović was prepared to do the unthinkable, and openly heap praise on Communist Yugoslavia. By the time Father Draganović met with local and foreign journalists on 15 November 1967, he had actually been in Yugoslav hands for over two months. The Vatican's 'grey eminence' confidently addressed the assembled press corps before he would permit questions, and most accounts agree that he seemed to be completely in control.

Draganović's Ustashi friends were certainly unprepared for his performance. His previously bitter denunciations of Serbian and Communist domination of Croatia had completely disappeared, replaced with glowing praise for the 'democratisation and humanising of life' in Tito's Yugoslavia, and its commitment to de-Stalinisation.[1] A few days earlier, the Yugoslav press had published Draganović's letter to the District Attorney in Sarajevo, where he was living freely. He had nothing but praise for Tito's Yugoslavia, which 'with its independent ways and internal and international politics has so far been an example and guide to many nations'.[2]

To the undoubted consternation of many local Catholics, Draganović stated that religious freedom and the Church's mission were flourishing in Communist Yugoslavia. He also emphasised that he had returned to the country 'deliberately and freely' and not as the result of 'kidnapping, trickery, entrapment or police manoeuvres', as the émigré Ustashi press had claimed.[3]

However, Draganović's close confidant and co-worker on the Ratlines, Monsignor Milan Simčić, strongly disputed this. Father Draganović did not freely return to Yugoslavia, 'he was arrested by UDBA [the Yugoslav secret police]', he insisted in early 1990. According to Simčić, UDBA had laid an elaborate entrapment plan to lure Draganović to a meeting on the Yugoslav–Italian frontier, where he was kidnapped in mid-September 1967.[4]

Simčić claimed that the bait was laid by an UDBA officer, who happened to be distantly related to Draganović. Claiming to be disillusioned with Communism, he offered 'to confidentially inform the Americans about what the Yugoslav army was doing against the Atlantic Treaty [NATO]. Therefore UDBA arrested him through a trick.'[5]

Numerous versions soon gained currency among émigré Ustashi around the world. One popular story was that the priest had been an UDBA agent all along. It was even claimed that he had fled with San Girolamo's entire archives, which he promptly turned over to UDBA. Others speculated that Draganović had submitted to the wishes of Pope Paul VI, who asked him to return to his country for the good of the Church.[6]

Draganović's return also fascinated the Yugoslav media, but the semi-official 'inside' story was not published for nearly twenty years. In 1986 the Sarajevo-based Svijet (The World) magazine published a fifteen part series by a former UDBA officer and a journalist based on official documents. According to their version, an UDBA agent had indeed been involved, but not in the manner claimed by Simčić and the émigré Ustashi.

The articles disclosed that an UDBA officer by the name of 'Zlatko' had befriended Father Draganović in the early 1960s, maintaining close connections first in Rome and then later, in Vienna and Pressbaum in Austria. Draganović was apparently aware of Zlatko's mission, but nevertheless he allowed himself to be drawn into the UDBA trap. Finally, in late August 1967, he supposedly agreed to return.

On 10 September he met Zlatko at a hotel above Trieste and departed in a Yugoslav-registered Mercedes. A short time later they crossed into Yugoslavia and Draganović was taken first to Belgrade, and a few days later, to Sarajevo, where he was held by UDBA for a short time.[7] The senior Croatian prelate, Cardinal Šeper, hinted at foul play, claiming that UDBA had planted an agent in Draganović's inner circle.[8]

However, as Western intelligence desperately scrambled to re-evaluate the Vatican's Ratlines, many fingers pointed directly at Draganović. The old hands were horrified at the possibility that he had really worked for the Communists all along. The reaction of one former British intelligence officer was typical. As previously discussed, this intelligence specialist found Father Draganović a cold and unapproachable character. With the benefit of hindsight, he believed that the priest must have worked for the Communists at some time:

> I think he was very much a realist, and I'm not certain to this day whether he was not a double agent . . . it's impossible that Draganović, having been . . . the 'grey eminence' of Balkan intelligence in the Vatican, particularly from a Croatian point of view . . . [would] go back and end his life . . . [there] . . . on a voluntary basis. I just don't believe it. He went on a voluntary basis, he was never kidnapped . . . if they didn't kill him, it means he was a double agent. There's no two ways about it, in my opinion.[9]

When confronted with this claim, Monsignor Simčić expressed complete amazement:

> This is beyond logic, beyond everything. I knew him in the very depths of his soul . . . he was a great Croatian who could not even conceive of Yugoslavia. He fought all his life for a free Croatia. He was against any Yugoslavia, regardless of the politics of the regime . . . Draganović was religiously anti-Communist. Now, you tell me, how could he be a Yugoslav spy, especially for Communist Yugoslavia?[10]

Far from being a cold realist, as claimed by the British officer, 'Draganović was very naive', and had been completely fooled by a very effective Communist spy. According to Simčić, 'a man of ill repute . . . a notorious spy', had indeed infiltrated Father Draganović's headquarters at San Girolamo in Rome. His name was Miroslav Varoš.[11]

Varoš's career closely tracked Draganović's. They both came from Sarajevo, and soon after Draganović went to Rome in 1943, Varoš followed. He, too, became active in Ustashi émigré politics, quickly establishing close relations with San Girolamo, where he worked for Draganović as a typist. He wrote prolifically for various émigré papers and, according to the Communists, worked for a number of Western intelligence agencies.[12]

Simčić, however, was certain that it was Varoš who lured Draganović into UDBA's hands. It was also Varoš who had organised the guerrilla operations in Yugoslavia. He surely was a double agent, for after Draganović's arrest, he returned to Yugoslavia and continued his work for UDBA.[13] If Monsignor Simčić's version is correct, the priest who smuggled thousands of fugitive Nazis to freedom with the support of Pius XII, Montini and powerful sections of Allied intelligence, was simply tricked and kidnapped because of his naivety.

The British officer could not recall this naive streak in Draganović's character.[14] In some ways it does not matter who is correct. For both Simčić and the British officer agree that the Communists had successfully penetrated the Vatican's Ratline. Whether it was Draganović or Varoš is really academic; either way, Tito knew everything about the Holy See's activities, and Pope Paul VI's key role.

In a taped interview, Milan Simčić was adamant that the Communists did not obtain their information from Draganović. 'He was also a great man in tragedy,' he said proudly. 'When they caught him and forced him to give certain statements, even then he was great in saving others – he accepted the responsibility . . . UDBA didn't get anything important.' Draganović later smuggled a letter to Simčić, telling him: 'Be at peace, no one is in danger as a result of my words.'[15]

Certainly, the Yugoslav public would not have known that Draganović had been at the centre of the Vatican's most remarkable operation of this century. Instead of re-running the 1940s propaganda line against the Holy See, virtually no details of the Church's involvement were publicly disclosed. The Communist-controlled press merely reported that Draganović had 'skilfully avoided giving direct answers to some "delicate questions"'. However, it is certain that UDBA had forbidden Draganović to tell the world what he knew. Instead, he was ordered to bitterly denounce the Ustashi's international terrorist network and, at every appropriate opportunity, to praise Tito's regime.[16]

It should be recalled that this regime had consistently labelled Draganović as a war criminal, the organiser of an elaborate Nazi-smuggling system, and the brains behind the Križari terrorist operations. Yet when they finally had him in their hands, they did nothing to punish him.[17] Instead, he was permitted to shelter behind an amnesty passed by Tito's government in 1962. Obviously a deal had been done, for Draganović assured the Yugoslav public that 'the organs of the state authorities behaved towards me correctly, what is more, humanely and with consideration as towards a human being and priest, for which I sincerely and publicly thank them'.[18]

Eventually, although they kept a close eye on him, the secret police allowed him to settle quietly in Sarajevo. He promptly went back to work for his beloved Church, and spent the rest of his days updating the general register of the Catholic Church in Yugoslavia, which he had published in 1939.[19] He died peacefully in June 1982, and although UDBA immediately confiscated a large collection of his papers, no plausible official explanation of his 'defection' has been forthcoming.

Despite the extraordinary propaganda coup which the public revelations had handed the Communists, Monsignor Simčić was certain that they had not successfully blackmailed Draganović:

> 'Noooo', he said emphatically, 'Draganović was not a man who could be blackmailed . . . I'm 100% sure that they could not have blackmailed him . . . Nor did they get anything significant from him.'[20]

Perhaps, in the end, Father Draganović was sent home as a sacrificial lamb – part of a sophisticated deal struck between Tito and the Vatican. The roots of his ultimate demise can probably be traced to 1960 when another series of "show trials" occurred in Yugoslavia. Draganović was again said to be the organiser of an underground network of Ustashi priests, operating in widely dispersed areas of the country. Apparently, his money laundering days had continued unabated, for he had allegedly laundered millions of dinars to support the network's subversive activities.[21]

Soon after these further sensational allegations, Draganović 'removed himself' from San Girolamo, heralding a marked improvement in Vatican–Yugoslav relations.[22] His old friend Vilim Cecelja, who had run the Austrian end of the Ratline so efficiently, lamented that Draganović 'was not accepted any more' in senior

Vatican circles. In fact, he was distinctly on the outer from that moment on, and as 'he was in the top leadership, he was the one decapitated'.[23] According to the Yugoslavs, Draganović was actually removed from San Girolamo, and assaulted by powerful factions within the Vatican. It was shortly after this that the mysterious UDBA officer 'Zlatko' contacted Draganović and supposedly began the long process of 'bringing him home'.[24]

Over the next few years a remarkable thaw took place between the Holy See and Communist Yugoslavia, culminating in a series of top level talks and ultimately a protocol which virtually normalised relations in June 1966.[25] Fourteen months later, Father Draganović was back home, praising the protocol and denouncing the 'direct political activities of priests' which had 'in the past brought [the Church] so much ill fortune'.[26]

Perhaps Krunoslav Draganović was a victim of the new mood sweeping the Catholic Church in the wake of Pius XII's death, the ascension of John XXIII and the radical departures of the Second Vatican Council. But it seems much more likely that the deal that had been struck between Tito and the Vatican included a provision requiring Draganović to retire behind the 'Iron Curtain' and quietly co-operate with UDBA. The Communist secret police knew almost everything anyway, and this was probably the reason why the Vatican was forced to yield. This may have been the price that Father Draganović paid – even willingly – for the dreadful errors the Vatican had made in establishing the Ratlines.

Strangely enough, both Monsignor Simčić and the semi-official UDBA version agree on at least one important point: Draganović performed extremely well under interrogation. According to Svijet, he was extremely cunning, defeating at least one senior UDBA officer entirely and pushing another to the point of total exasperation. The Communists admitted that Draganović cleverly evaded their probing when he believed they did not know the answer to their questions. But when he was certain they were well informed, he co-operated.[27]

However, new evidence has recently emerged that he in fact admitted a great deal to UDBA. In 1990 a copy of one of Draganović's most revealing statements was smuggled out from an Eastern European Communist source to the authors. This is the first time that Father Draganović's confession to UDBA has been in Western hands. The document is dated 26 September 1967 and is undoubtedly the first comprehensive statement made by the priest after his mysterious return. It described in great detail how the Vatican built the San Girolamo Ratline, and the close connections maintained by the Pope's Refugee Commission with the Red Cross and Italian and Western intelligence.[28]

Draganović also disclosed many details of the Vatican's role in saving Pavelić's war booty, and the operation of the Križari's underground terrorist network. Perhaps UDBA already knew most of these details from Varoš and other sources. A considerable amount could only have been provided by Draganović personally. Even Svijet admitted that his information had enabled UDBA to piece together the labyrinth of the émigré underground, and its connections to Western intelligence. UDBA interrogated Draganović almost non-stop for two weeks on these matters, revealing everything about the Ustashi diaspora, and corroborating UDBA's own voluminous files.[29]

However, even after his death, the Communists did not publish the whole story. Although Svijet obviously based their 1986 articles on Draganović's interrogation reports, no mention was made of the key issues canvassed in this first document. In fact, Draganović's confession gave the Communists a unique insight into the secrets of the Vatican's Ratlines. They were secrets which Tito chose to bury very securely, for they have never been publicly disclosed before, even in Yugoslavia. They included:

- an intimate description of his high level contacts with the Vatican Secretariat of State
- a detailed outline of San Girolamo's smuggling system, including the names of the priests who held key positions, and the formal connections they maintained with the Pope's Welfare Commission
- the names of the Allied officers with whom he had worked closely
- the names of his Christian Democrat contacts inside the Italian Ministry of Internal Affairs
- a complete overview of his senior role in co-ordinating the Vatican's Ratlines for all Central and Eastern European nationalities
- minute descriptions of secret missions he had undertaken on behalf of the Vatican
- an account of his own role in saving and smuggling the Ustashi's stolen treasure
- details of the Ustashi's money laundering operation in Switzerland
- descriptions of the leading personalities, command structure and operations of the Križari[30]

The version so carefully contrived by UDBA in Svijet ignores these aspects. They did let slip at least one very interesting fact: Father Draganović had also been working for West German security chief, Reinhard Gehlen, the former Nazi intelligence General on the Eastern front.[31]

It seems that Draganović had penetrated all the major Western security services. Yet if Milan Simčić is correct and Miroslav Varoš, not Krunoslav Draganović, was the UDBA spy in San Girolamo, then the Communists knew nearly every detail of the Ratlines before Draganović returned home. The Vatican had probably long since realised this, for it turned out that the Soviets had penetrated the émigré Nazi groups long before the Pope had decided to use them. Like Draganović, their agent had penetrated most Western intelligence services, and a few more besides . . .

While Eugenio Pacelli was still a Papal Nuncio in Munich, and before Pius XI had become Pope, Soviet military intelligence had already recruited an agent who would wreck the Vatican's anti-Bolshevik schemes for the next half century. Ironically, the Communists utilised the same tactics and methods used by the Czarist secret police over the previous few centuries. The Empire had always been paranoid about the numerous ethnic groups which sought independence from the Russian centre.

Decades before Felix Dzerzhinsky organised the fearsome Cheka, the Czar's secret police had become skilled manipulators of these dissident nationalists. Whenever and wherever Ukrainian, Byelorussian or Baltic separatist movements grew up, the Czar's police were busily penetrating them with moles. Their tasks included creating intense factionalism and personality splits, dividing the movements and shattering their nationalist dreams. One of the goals of the agents provocateurs was to provoke the would-be revolutionaries into taking premature action which could easily be defeated by the Czar's men.

The Bolsheviks were mindful of the Czar's successes. After all, they had themselves fallen victim to exactly this tactic. It was hardly surprising that the Communists decided to employ the same methods against their anti-Communist opponents, who fled in the wake of the Red Army's victory in the civil war. In fact, some of the police officials who had run these operations under the Czar were recruited into the Cheka, where they faithfully passed their secrets to the Bolsheviks. Soviet intelligence evolved into two rival agencies, the civilian KGB and the military GRU. For the last seventy years they have faithfully copied the Czar's agents provocateurs tactics.[32]

In each generation, Soviet intelligence created 'anti-Communist' émigré front groups, ostensibly to foment revolution and topple Bolshevism. The front groups attracted support from the West. Considerable financial assistance was supplied and close ties forged with various Western intelligence services. This enabled the Communist double agents running the front groups to co-opt the legitimate émigré opposition, splinter their leadership and provoke them into premature and poorly organised rebellions which were easily defeated. More importantly, the false front groups were a vehicle for long-term Soviet penetration of Western society.

The first and classic example was The Trust, organised by Felix Dzerzhinsky himself. It was supposedly an organisation of dissident monarchists and generals, plotting to overthrow Lenin. British intelligence poured huge sums of money into The Trust without realising they were subsidising the Communists. This is the famous spy scandal that enabled the Soviets to capture Sidney Reilly, the much renowned 'ace of spies'.[33] During the 1950s the CIA fell for a similar trap and poured millions into Operation WIN in Poland, only to discover to their horror that their anti-Communist forces were largely a figment of Soviet imagination. For seventy years émigré agents were a critical factor in ensuring Communism's survival.[34]

What no one ever realised was that there was yet another émigré group headed by a long term Communist agent which had an equally disastrous effect on the Holy See. The Vatican's nemesis was a member of the Czar's nobility, Prince Anton Vasilevich Turkul, arguably the greatest professional spy of the twentieth century. During Turkul's extraordinary career he penetrated the Imperial Russian Army, the French Deuxième Bureau, the Japanese General Staff, Mussolini's headquarters, both British Secret Services (MI5 and MI6), Ribbentrop's personal intelligence service (Bureau Jahnke), Admiral Canaris's Abwehr, Wehrmacht Intelligence on the Eastern front (the Fremde Heere Ost or Foreign Armies East, headed by General Reinhard Gehlen), the SS Security Service (SD) and passed Soviet disinformation to virtually every nation in both the Axis and Allied camps.

After World War II, Turkul worked for West German intelligence (the Gehlen Org), collaborated with many of the spy services of NATO, including the American Military Intelligence Service (MIS – for offensive intelligence), the US Army Counter Intelligence Corps (CIC – for defensive purposes), the ultra-secret State Department Office of Policy Co-ordination and the Central Intelligence Agency. Unlike Kim Philby, Turkul was not exposed during his lifetime. He died in 1959, without anyone proving that his exclusive loyalty lay with Soviet Military Intelligence, the GRU.

It appears that not even senior officers of the KGB knew that the GRU had placed an agent right inside Vatican intelligence. Turkul was the double agent who wrecked all of Pius XI's hopes to overthrow the Bolsheviks, and later sabotaged Pius XII's plans to mediate an Anglo-German alliance against the Soviets. Prince Turkul was at once the Vatican's best secret agent, and its greatest secret enemy. Until now, his story has never been fully told.

No one knows when Prince Turkul was first recruited by the Bolsheviks. Much of his early history is shrouded in mystery. Even his birthdate is uncertain. One intelligence report says that he was born on 12 November 1892 in Odessa.[35] Another states that he was born exactly nine months earlier in Bessarabia.[36]

When he was in his early twenties, Prince Turkul served the Czar as an officer in the Don River Legion. After the Revolution, he joined the White counter-revolutionary army, was promoted to Colonel and at some later time to Brigadier General. Turkul's command of his White division was not without controversy, for US intelligence recorded that it was 'alleged that while in this position, shipments received by him of British arms were actually turned over to the Red Forces'.[37]

One of the keys to Communist victory in the Russian civil war was that several of the opposing White generals were really working for Lenin and Trotsky. In addition to Prince Turkul, Generals Skoblin, Voss and the son of General Abramow were also double agents. Perhaps the Bolshevik triumph was due less to Trotsky's military genius and more to the brilliance of his intelligence service. After the civil war, the Communist double agents had still not been discovered. Turkul and the other White Russian officers were evacuated to Paris by the sympathetic French Government, which, along with the British, had financed much of the anti-Bolshevik effort.[38]

In 1925 British intelligence sent Commander Dunderdale to liaise with the White émigrés in Paris. The older generals, led by Baron Wrangel and Aleksander Kutepov, had established a White Russian veterans' corps known by its cyrillic acronym, ROWS.[39] ROWS supervised a secret 'Combat Organisation' as well as a counter-intelligence service, the Inner Line, to concoct schemes for restoring the Czarist monarchy in Russia.[40] The recently released intelligence files explain why their plans met with little success.

Soon after ROWS was created, the double agents went to work to sabotage the émigré resistance. ROWS was to be discredited as ineffective or exposed as totally penetrated by the Communists. A number of new front groups (even more dominated by the Bolshevik clique) were to be established in its place. Over the next ten years, the older generals of ROWS were kidnapped, murdered or assassinated. Turkul's fellow agent, General Skoblin, would emerge as head of the ROWS Inner Line by climbing over the bodies of his victims.[41]

Turkul was among the original group of double agents who came to Paris from Gallipoli in 1920, and was later suspected of involvement in the plots against the ROWS leaders, Wrangel and Kutepov.[42] However, Turkul was spared much of the ensuing scandal in Paris as he was quickly re-assigned to the Balkan section of ROWS. He was in fact being prepared for the second phase of the Bolshevik strategy.

According to top secret information of the 'utmost discretion to British intelligence', Turkul's new superior was Claudius Voss, alias Alexandrov. Voss was regarded as one of Britain's leading agents inside the Inner Line during the 1920s. This key agent was in charge of counter-intelligence for Slovakia. As was later discovered, Voss was loyal to the Bolsheviks, not to ROWS or the British.[43]

Voss's direct superior in the Inner Line was General Abramow, chief of the Balkan section in Sofia, where Turkul had also conveniently settled. Voss pushed General Abramow out of the way by exposing his son as an agent of Soviet civilian intelligence. This was a cynical example of how the GRU sacrificed agents from a rival Communist organisation (the predecessor of the civilian KGB), in order to advance their own men.[44]

Predictably, the Abramow scandal, coming on the heels of the series of assassinations and kidnappings in Paris, substantially discredited ROWS in the eyes of the White Russian émigré community.[45] Another front group was waiting in the wings to replace it. Since 1924, Voss had actively participated in the founding of the Narodny Trudovoi Soyuz (NTS), or People's Labour Alliance, and had talent-spotted young Prince Turkul as NTS's future star. Originally dependent on ROWS, the stepchild NTS lost no time in denouncing the old Monarchist organisations.[46]

Turkul emerged as a leader of the 'new generation' of NTS anti-Communist émigrés and a variety of other front groups, all untainted by the mud that clung to the old ROWS leadership. Between 1927 and 1931 Turkul shuttled between Sofia and Paris, ostensibly keeping himself above the fray, but always making new contacts. According to US intelligence, his 'enemies considered him the ruiner of ROWS and an opportunist'.[47]

When NTS went to work for Menzies of British intelligence, the Soviet agents, including Turkul, were already in place.[48] By 1930 Turkul's cover as an anti-Communist organiser was impeccable and for the next several decades he and the NTS remained at the forefront of Menzies's anti-Communist intrigues:

> The main group used by MI6 for operations inside the Soviet Union until the end of the 1960's was the People's Labor Alliance (NTS) founded in 1930 in Belgrade by social democratic Russian émigrés who sought the overthrow of the Communist regime from within and its replacement with a parliamentary democracy.[49]

American intelligence had a rather different view of NTS ideology, calling it Fascist, anti-democratic and violently anti-Semitic.[50] It should be noted that such attitudes did not prevent the Americans from taking over NTS from the British in the 1950s, not realising that this right-wing group had been thoroughly infiltrated by Soviet intelligence since the 1920s.

By 1930, the Soviet spy services had completely polarised the émigré community in Paris. The military branch, later the GRU, focused mainly on the ethnic Russian exiles. NTS with its pro-Russian orientation attracted those exiles who favoured the restoration of the geographical borders of the Czarist empire, including the ethnic minorities of the Baltic provinces, the Ukraine, Byelorussia and the Slavic regions of the Balkans. The NTS insisted on retaining these non-Russian minorities as subordinate parts of Greater Russia once the Bolsheviks were overthrown.

The Soviet civilian espionage branch, later the KGB, generally concentrated on the non-Russian ethnic minorities which had organised separatist groups to break away from Great Russian domination. These rival émigré organisations – Intermarium, Prometheus and the Abramtchik Faction etc. – had an anti-Russian orientation. Unlike the GRU's recruits, these exiles from the minority populations hated Russian imperialism and favoured splintering the Soviet Union into a loose confederation.

Instead of unifying Russian and non-Russian émigrés around their common hatred of Bolshevism, agents provocateurs ensured that the dissidents spent more time fighting each other than their common enemy. The pattern of division and competition, so skilfully employed by Czarist police and taken over by the Cheka after World War I, lasted well into the Cold War. No matter which way the anti-Bolshevik émigrés turned, Soviet double agents were waiting to co-opt their strategies.

As Menzies's biographer confirms, His Majesty's Secret Service recruited émigré cadres for 'terrorism and sabotage' against the Soviets. Britain was not alone in employing terrorists before World War II. Few Western intelligence services had scruples when it came to dealing with extremist groups, even those with Fascist tendencies like NTS, as long as they professed anti-Communism.[51]

The truth is that during the 1920s and 1930s a little dose of right-wing extremism was perfectly acceptable to several intelligence services. Turkul always claimed to oppose the anti-Russian philosophies espoused by groups such as the Ukrainian-dominated Anti-Bolshevik Bloc of Nations (ABN). However, he never let his affiliation with NTS prevent him from occasional collaboration with the minority separatists who also worked for the British and the French. He was hired by the Deuxième Bureau in Paris just as the Vatican and the French General Staff were recruiting White Russian supporters for Intermarium.[52]

Since Intermarium was dedicated to independence for non-Russian minorities, it may seem contradictory to have included ethnic Russians as members. But, as William Gowen reported, everyone was welcome in Intermarium as long as they were anti-Soviet, and 'it is supposedly for this reason that the "White" Russians are included as the first victims of Communism'.[53]

Indeed, there is evidence that factional groups like Intermarium were formed out of the disintegration of ROWS. According to

Gowen, Intermarium was 'an outgrowth of a "White" Russian society organised in Paris before World War II by a former Czarist General . . . of the old Paris group'.[54] In view of the recently discovered evidence that White Russian double agents deliberately arranged the disintegration of ROWS, there is ample reason to suspect that Intermarium inherited the same group of Red agents who had infiltrated ROWS in the early 1920s.[55]

To illustrate the confusion of the times, some intelligence services used the term 'White Russian' to refer to anti-Communist ethnic Russians, while other agencies called the Byelorussians 'White Russians', although they were a separate ethnic minority opposed to both Red and White Russians. Although Byelorussia literally means 'White Russia' in English, the term is similar to but not the same as, the Russian word for the anti-Communist White forces. To compound the confusion, some Byelorussians were Reds as well, working with NTS's White Russian network for the Soviets.[56] The ethnographic lines were further blurred by frequent interchanges between the various Soviet and Western intelligence services and their various front groups.

One wonders how the Soviets could keep it all straight, but it should be recalled that confusion was part of their game plan. Indeed, the Abramtchik Faction illustrates the complex intelligence cross-overs between the NTS and the separatists. The British-sponsored Prometheus network supposedly controlled the Abramtchik Faction in Paris which in turn controlled another Byelorussian sub-group which was part of NTS at the same time they were receiving funds from the Vatican through a Baltic Bishop. The head of this Byelorussian hodge-podge was Mikolai Abramtchik, yet another Communist agent in pre-war Paris.[57] Abramtchik was a Byelorussian (White Russian) separatist working for the anti-Communist Great Russians while secretly working for the Reds. If such devious complexities gave headaches to the Communists, it was nothing compared to the pain they inflicted on the West and the Vatican. A disgruntled American agent simply threw up his hands and privately referred to all the émigrés as 'lower slobbovians' after the Al Capp comic strip. It really was not funny in view of what happened.

The one thing that is clear is that back in the 1920s, before Western intelligence groups like Intermarium and Prometheus were even formed, the Soviets had infiltrated each new organisation that popped up in Paris. Control of counter-intelligence screening for the Parisian émigrés had already been taken over by the Communists. The trusted Inner Line security apparatus was riddled with agents like Skoblin and Voss who could supply false vetting for double agents. Moreover, Turkul himself was well placed to infiltrate agents into every faction under the guise of NTS's broad-minded collaboration.

Since Turkul was supported by both British and French intelligence, it is not surprising that NTS eventually developed networks among the traditionally pro-Russian Serbs in Yugoslavia (the Mihailović Faction which was later dropped by Britain in favour of Tito). Turkul also had contacts inside the traditional anti-Russian Ukrainian separatist movement (the Melnyk Faction which was later dropped by British intelligence in favour of Stephen Bandera's group). Turkul even had contacts with the Abramtchik Faction of the Byelorussians who supported anyone who was in power at any particular moment. Abramtchik in fact worked for both the Poles and the Soviets, collaborated with the Nazis and was later passed on to the CIA by the British.[58]

In view of the tendency of the exiles to work simultaneously for anyone who paid them, Anthony Cave Brown is probably correct to list the Abramtchik Faction and other pre-war groups as working for the British, while acknowledging the CIA's estimate that the émigrés took 'handouts' from more than one Western intelligence service.[59] Soviet intelligence must have been amused as one spy service after the other swallowed the émigré bait.

The anti-Communist networks in Paris soon attracted the attention of the infant German intelligence service, which opened a file on General Turkul in 1927.[60] One German officer in particular, Wilhelm Canaris, wanted to join the émigré game, and offered to pool German support for the common cause:

> During this same period . . . Canaris also had some part in founding an embryonic intelligence network in Central Europe and the Balkans, and co-operated with at least one Entente agency – most probably the British – against Communist agents who had begun to flood into Western Europe to provoke revolutions in support of the Kremlin.[61]

A few years later, on 1 January 1934, Admiral Canaris became Chief of the German Military Intelligence Service, the Abwehr.[62]

As we shall see, there can be little doubt that Turkul was the go-between for joint Anglo-German co-operation against the Communists. During the 1930s Menzies's representative to the émigré groups in Paris was Charles Howard Ellis, Dick or Dickie to his friends, of whom he had many among the Russian exile community:

> Dick Ellis dealt with anti-Communist exiles in Europe. He was the SIS expert on what Stalin called the nationalities question – the euphemism for unrest among non-Russians making up half the population of the USSR. Stalin regarded White Russians as potential leaders of revolt. Ellis dealt with the best known of the White Russian leaders in Paris, General Andrei Turkul – and encouraged him to keep up his powerful Nazi connections. The Nazi Germans had secret plans for using White Russians and Ukrainians to overthrow Stalin.[63]

Perhaps Ellis thought he was doing the right thing in helping Admiral Canaris prepare for war against the hated Communists. To this day, there is some question whether Ellis aided the Nazis on his own or under instructions from Menzies. Before 1939 it made sense to share British networks with the Germans in the common anti-Soviet struggle.[64] Unfortunately, Ellis was also using Turkul's German connections for personal gain, augmenting his meagre salary by working on the side for Admiral Canaris. Even after Hitler came to power, he was a paid Nazi agent and later admitted selling the rosters of British intelligence agents.[65]

In 1936 General Turkul was doing a little selling of his own: behind Menzies's back he had peddled NTS to the Japanese. According to his recently declassified intelligence file, Anton Turkul is listed as an agent who 'worked for the Japanese in Russia, head of [the] Russian fascist party in Japan, speaks fluent Japanese'.[66] The Japanese paid Turkul through a bank account in New York right up until Pearl Harbor. Turkul later bragged that his organisation had been subsidised by the Japanese General Staff which regarded NTS as an excellent method of keeping an eye on Soviet intentions.[67]

The Japanese did not realise that the Soviet GRU was keeping an eye on them. Turkul's GRU contact in Japan was one Richard Sorge, a German journalist who had infiltrated the Japanese Army for the GRU.[68] After the ring had worked successfully for a few years, Turkul decided in 1938 to sell his own 'Japanese' net to the Germans. Turkul used as his go-between a German Jew, code-named MAX KLATT, whose real name was Richard Kauder. 'Klatt' claimed to have a spy ring inside the top levels of the Soviet military which was willing to sell documents to the Abwehr.

General Turkul wrapped such a shroud of secrecy around himself and Klatt that, as late as 1961, 'Herr Klatt' was described by Ladislav Farago as the most effective (and mysterious) of all the Nazi spies:

> This inscrutable man (whose real name and true identity were never established) was the Secret Agent Extraordinary of the Abwehr against the Soviet Union. Who he was, how he looked, and what made him work for the Abwehr, aside from purely mercenary considerations, I do not know . . . suddenly he blossomed out as a secret agent on a massive scale . . .
>
> In August, 1938, Klatt arrived in Vienna and was taken by a mutual friend to the colonel [of the Abwehr] . . . He came to the meeting with a startling amount of intelligence, especially about the innards of the Soviet Air Force. He claimed to have a link to the Soviet Legation in Sofia and said he was receiving the bulk of his information from the Soviet Union via short-wave radio. Although he was extremely accommodating, he steadfastly refused to reveal anything more about his sources, but he did volunteer to leave his material with the Abwehr so that it might be examined closely before a deal was made . . .
>
> His material stood the test of the most painstaking checking. The discovery of this remarkable agent was considered so important that it was reported directly to the Chief of the General Staff, an unusual step, and, from then on, the Klatt material was handled with top priority by special officers in Berlin. His data became the basis of German planning against the USSR on the highest echelon, something few spies in history could claim.
> When the deal was made (and it was fantastic in terms of money; Klatt was extremely expensive), the new master spy returned to Sofia to become the top secret agent – and virtually the only direct-action spy – the Abwehr had working full-time in this important sector of the secret war. This phenomenal spy never disappointed his employers. And he never ceased to intrigue them . . . All efforts over the years to disclose anything at all about Klatt personally, and about his sources, proved in vain.[69]

But who were the 'special officers in Berlin . . . at the highest echelon' who put this mysterious Jew in charge of Nazi espionage against the Soviets? US intelligence identified Admiral Canaris as one of Klatt's superiors.[70] But the Turkul/Klatt team had another contact whose name has been kept secret for the last fifty years.

General Turkul and his Jewish assistant 'Klatt' worked directly for Oberst (Colonel) Kurt Jahnke, Chief of the Jahnkebureau, Ribbentrop's personal intelligence service. Jahnke was also a trusted adviser to Rudolf Hess and Hitler himself. During World War II all of Jahnke's records for the years 1933 to 1938 were confiscated by the SS.[71]

However, one senior SS officer read the Jahnke dossiers before they vanished. Eleven years after World War II, Walter Schellenberg wrote his memoirs, in which he vividly recalled how Jahnke had developed 'excellent connections with Japan' through unusual channels, involving a former Czarist officer and a German Jew.[72]

General Turkul was not mentioned by name, an understandable precaution since both of them were still working for the British SIS at the time the memoirs were published.[73] Still, Schellenberg left substantial clues, confirmed by recently declassified American intelligence files, which clearly identify Turkul as the Czarist officer who worked for the Nazi intelligence hierarchy.

For example, Schellenberg boasts that this agent ran a spy ring inside Stalin's General Staff at Marshal Rokossovsky's Soviet military headquarters.[74] American intelligence files list Rokossovsky's General Staff as one of Turkul's sources.[75] Similarly, Schellenberg states that one of Jahnke's contacts in Japan was Richard Sorge.[76] American intelligence files state that Sorge passed information to Berlin through Turkul's assistant, Klatt.[77]

The recently declassified files also confirm that Schellenberg's unnamed German Jew was Max Klatt, Turkul's Jewish intelligence chief who worked for Jahnke and Admiral Canaris before being taken over by the SS. Schellenberg's memoirs detail how the SS helped Jahnke protect his German Jew from the Gestapo because he was such an invaluable intelligence source on Japan. Schellenberg further identifies the rescued German Jew as the chief of a world-wide 'information network [which] went through various countries and penetrated every stratum of society. He furnished quick and exact reports from the senior staffs of the Russian Army.'[78]

There was only one team of a Czarist officer and a German Jew with 'excellent Japanese connections' who spied on the Soviets for the Abwehr and were later protected by the SS from the Gestapo. Schellenberg's account is confirmed in all important details by the secret post-war interviews of Turkul and Klatt. But there was something which Schellenberg mentioned which the earlier investigations had missed, something that only Schellenberg had seen: the files on Kurt Jahnke's secret connection to Turkul. Schellenberg's recollection of these long destroyed documents is of more than academic interest. As we shall see, the evidence shows that Turkul became Jahnke's courier to the Vatican.

On 26 August 1939 Hitler shocked his General Staff with news of the Ribbentrop–Molotov pact. It was now safe, he told them, to attack Poland. The war would go well, he predicted. 'I am only afraid that at the last minute some Schweinhund will produce a plan of mediation.'[79]

Kurt Jahnke tried to do just that the following day. On 27 August he 'used every conceivable means to bring an English intelligence man to Hitler' for eleventh-hour peace negotiations. Much to Jahnke's dismay the British agent was turned away when he arrived in Berlin. Jahnke knew that an alliance with the Soviets would mean war with Britain, but Hitler's mind was made up. So was Jahnke's. If Hitler could not understand that Germany must ally itself with Britain against the Soviet Union, then Hitler must be removed.

On 29 August, Jahnke's British agent returned to London and reported that the German General Staff were plotting to depose the Nazi regime. Word leaked back to the Gestapo who wanted to arrest Jahnke for high treason, but Admiral Canaris stopped the indictment.[80]

For years Canaris and Jahnke had been secretly plotting to overthrow Hitler and form an Anglo-German alliance against Stalin. There is evidence of careful pre-arrangement with the Vatican to pass the plotters' messages in the event of hostilities. On 3 September 1939, the same day that Britain and France declared war on Germany, Admiral Canaris made contact with British intelligence through the Vatican. One week later, Canaris passed the Vatican news of Nazi atrocities against Catholic priests and Jews in Poland. The Vatican gave the information to French and British intelligence.[81]

The Vatican's plan to help Canaris and Jahnke replace Hitler did not sit well with the Soviets in 1939. Stalin wanted Germany, France and Britain to fight a long and bloody war until the Red Army could move in and take over Central Europe. If this plan were to succeed, the Vatican had to be prevented from helping the German opposition to negotiate peace with Britain. Apparently the GRU (and Jahnke) sent their best agent. Sometime before the outbreak of war, Prince Turkul moved from Berlin to Rome.[82]

On the eve of war, the anti-Hitler group made contact with Pius XII, who had just assumed St Peter's throne. In October the Pope was asked to play the part of intermediary between Germany and Britain. Canaris had selected Dr Joseph Müller, a Catholic lawyer from Munich, as his first courier to the Vatican. In October, Müller arrived in Rome and met his old friend, Monsignor Kaas, near the Quo Vadis Chapel off the Appian Way. The Jahnke–Canaris group of conspirators was soon given the code name Schwarze Kapelle after the Black Chapel in Rome. But the anti-Hitler group is better known as the Black Orchestra; apparently Schwarze Kapelle is a German pun on the Rote Kapelle, the famous Soviet spy ring known as the Red Orchestra. Subsequent developments in the Vatican revealed that there was more than irony involved in the similarity of names:

> By the first fortnight of October 1939, Müller was able to report to Canaris and [his deputy] Oster that the Pope had consented to serve the Schwarze Kapelle as intermediary with the British government in the person of Sir D'Arcy Osborne, the British ambassador at the Holy See. His Holiness, Müller reported, had accepted with the words: 'The German Opposition must be heard in Britain,' and he [the Pope] would be its voice. The objective of the Pope's intercession would be a peace based upon the proposition that Britain and France would not attempt to take advantage of the disturbance that would follow the deposition of Hitler to invade and occupy Germany.[83]

Pius XII wanted to tread a careful path. If he succeeded, Hitler would be overthrown and the West would join in a common war against Stalin. If he failed, Hitler would wreak vengeance on the Catholic Church. For security reasons, Pius XII stated that he would not meet with Müller directly, but would receive his communications through a Jesuit priest, Father Leiber, a Vatican Archivist, whom the Pope trusted absolutely. Leiber would pass Müller's messages to the Pope, who would pass them on to the British Ambassador personally, because it would be perfectly normal for the Pope to meet him regularly. On 27 October Müller was summoned to meet Father Leiber at the Jesuit Gregorian University. The Foreign Office had given Osborne permission to conduct armistice negotiations with Canaris's Schwarze Kapelle.[84]

Word of the Vatican negotiations quickly reached Heydrich of SS intelligence. The source of the original leak has never been determined, but in hindsight it may have been a Soviet agent who wished to sabotage peace talks with the West.[85] In any event, it was Heydrich who gave the code name Red Orchestra to the Soviet file and Black Orchestra to the Vatican file.[86] Perhaps he suspected (correctly) that a common bond existed. But in 1939 the SS were unaware that the Kapellmeisters, or orchestra leaders for the Schwarze Kapelle were Canaris and Jahnke, the chiefs of the rival German intelligence agencies.

As the SS surveillance around the Black Orchestra tightened, Canaris had to move quickly to convince Hitler that Müller was not a traitor, but the Abwehr's best double agent inside the Vatican. Much to Heydrich's chagrin, Hitler believed the story, and the SS had to put the Black Orchestra file on hold.[87] At first Canaris believed that a Fascist Benedictine monk named Keller had betrayed the Black Orchestra negotiations, but it seems unlikely for soon another more dangerous leak appeared.

A Swiss newspaper published a report that 'high officers of the German general staff' were involved in a plot against Hitler.[88] That information could not have come from a lowly Benedictine monk. In fact, only a handful of people inside the Schwarze Kapelle knew of the difficulty Canaris was having recruiting allies from the skittish General Staff. Someone on the inside had leaked the story.

The Swiss newspaper leak threw the plotters into uproar and made the General Staff even more nervous. One historian records that > someone in the German group asked what guarantees could be got that if the Germans overthrew Hitler the western allies would not force a Carthaginian peace like Versailles upon Germany. From the widow of one of the conspirators, von Dohnanyi, we have evidence that her husband suggested a secret guarantee of the proposed conditions of peace by the Pope. The guarantee was to be got through Müller.

> Early in November 1939, Müller came again to Monsignor Kaas, who put him in touch with Father Leiber the Pope's secretary. Not without doubts whether he was doing what was right, Father Leiber put the plan personally to the Pope . . . The Pope was being invited to engage in a conspiracy to overthrow a tyrant, and incidentally to put himself and his aides into those dire risks which attend conspirators . . . On 6 November 1939 Father Leiber assured Josef Müller that the Pope was ready to do 'all he can' for peace.[89]

Unfortunately, the SS was by then increasing its efforts to find out what the Vatican was doing. They had already sent a phony 'peace offer' to British intelligence. Menzies warned his agents that the terms of the new offer did not correspond to the other Vatican messages, but it was too late. The two British agents who had gone to Venlo to negotiate were kidnapped by Schellenberg and taken back to Germany.[90]

The Foreign Office suspected further treachery and broke off all peace negotiations, although Menzies tried to keep the lines to Canaris open:

> The Vatican talks hung fire for over a month, and were only resumed when the Pope vouched for the bona fides and honesty of Müller. With that assurance, made personally by Pius XII in a communication to Lord Halifax, the conversation reopened with a meeting between the Pope and Sir D'Arcy Osborne, which took place – according to the British Cabinet Minutes – at the Vatican on January 12, 1940.[91]

The peace talks dragged on through February, March and April of 1940 with both the Pope and the British getting ever more impatient with the delays and increasingly dubious about the Black Orchestra's chances of success. According to several eye witnesses, explicit terms for an Anglo-German peace treaty had actually been concluded, but Canaris found that no one in the Germany Army was willing to overthrow Hitler. On 3 April 1940 the Pope told Osborne that he feared their efforts had come to an end.[92]

In an act of desperation, Canaris sent Müller back to the Vatican in May to warn the Pope about Hitler's plans for a sneak attack on Belgium and the Netherlands. Not only were the warnings disbelieved by the Allies, but Belgian telegrams incriminating the Vatican were intercepted by the Nazis before the invasion was launched. Hitler was furious at the security leak, and ordered the SS to investigate. This time Canaris barely managed to talk his way out. His cover-up succeeded only with the help of some 'elfin mischief' in the form of an alibi from the good Jesuit Father Leiber, but the Müller link to the Schwarze Kapelle had to be closed down.[93]

Despite the débâcle, the Schwarze Kapelle decided to put forth new peace proposals 'through other secret channels'.[94]

It did not take the SS long to find out what they were. There is only a hint in the American files of Turkul's pre-war service to the Vatican; a brief notation that he was supplied with false passports by the Abwehr and money from the Japanese to send 'apostles' into the Soviet Union for propaganda. This may have been Turkul's first espionage work for the Jesuits who, as mentioned in Chapter One, had been trying with limited success to infiltrate their own agents into Soviet territory. It is perhaps only a coincidence that Turkul was running his own early Japanese Ratline into the Soviet Union for the Abwehr at the same time as the Jesuits. Even if Turkul had no direct Jesuit connection in 1938, his Abwehr boss certainly did.

It was probably Canaris himself who asked Turkul in 1938 to do for the Black Orchestra what he was already doing for the Japanese; spy on both the Nazis and the Soviets. Admiral Canaris, the 'Jesuitical Russophobe' had a direct liaison with Father Leiber of the Jesuits, the Pope's confidant. According to American intelligence, Turkul suddenly left Paris and moved to Berlin to form 'his own White Russian Army which succeeded in smuggling people in and out of Russia'.[95] Turkul later claimed that it was the Hitler–Stalin Pact that drove him to quit Berlin, but it is possible he had already moved to Rome at the end of 1938.[96]

On the other hand, the move to Rome may have been ordered by the Black Orchestra after Dr Müller was 'anonymously' exposed. Turkul pretended to share Canaris's belief that any pact with Stalin was a betrayal of the White Russian cause. Turkul certainly had a plausible motive for wanting to overthrow Hitler and had the right connections to the Black Orchestra through Jahnke. But after Müller was exposed, the Black Orchestra had to shift to a more secure method of communication. It must have seemed logical to use Turkul's NTS network as back up couriers to the Vatican and the British.

NTS had longstanding relations with British intelligence. Several of Turkul's close associates were Uniate and Orthodox clergymen who were well known to the Jesuits. Indeed, the Jesuits had built an entire college in Rome to train Uniate seminarians.[97] Moreover, Turkul had something invaluable to offer the Jesuits who were worried about security. What could be more secure than diplomatic immunity? The Japanese Secret Service was already funding Turkul's NTS network. By giving NTS couriers diplomatic passports from Japanese-controlled Manchuria, they could travel freely across Europe without embarrassing questions from the Germans, or so they thought. There is evidence that the Jesuits fell for it completely.

In the spring and summer of 1940, the SS began receiving tips about a Japanese spy ring with connections to the Vatican. Two envoys with Japanese-controlled diplomatic credentials were intercepted carrying sensitive documents on the German war effort. The envoys were not orientals at all. One was a White Russian who belonged to the Melnyk faction of the Ukrainian nationalists and the other was a Slav whose last name was given by Schellenberg simply as K.[98]

K was found to be carrying detailed high level information on German military strength and future plans. Under interrogation, K admitted that the plans were to be taken to Rome where 'the material was transmitted by the Japanese Embassy to a trusted agent of the General of the Jesuit Order, Ledochovski'. K could not tell the SS how the Japanese–Jesuit collaboration began, but it appeared to have been a systematic arrangement.[99] According to Owen Chadwick:

> The Jesuit general Ledochowski was a Pole, deeply pro-British, passionately anti-Nazi, a strong and courageous man. In August 1939 the Italian ambassador at the Vatican, Pignatti, told his government that under Ledochowski the whole Jesuit order was 'drawn up, with extreme decision' against Nazi Germany.[100]

Through K, the SS had stumbled across the alternative route for the Vatican's communications with Jahnke and the Schwarze Kapelle. Cave Brown believes that K was a man named Kunzcewincz.[101] However, he may have been another member of Turkul's net, Dr Tuan Kowalewsky, a Polish-Ukrainian separatist who obtained his information from another Japanese spy, Omida, who lived in Sofia. Turkul's intelligence chief, the German Jew Klatt/Kauder/Max also lived in Sofia. He too had a Japanese connection:

> The spy's actual source was neither the Soviet Legation in Sofia nor some mysterious informants on the Red Army General Staff, but solely the obscure correspondent of a Tokyo newspaper, Isono Kiyosho by name, who had his headquarters in the Rumanian capital. From the correspondent the lines led directly to the residence of Dr Richard Sorge, the Soviet's own master spy.[102]

In fact, everywhere the SS investigators turned, Japanese spies with connections to Turkul's network kept turning up. Schellenberg leaves enough references in his memoirs to clearly connect Turkul's Japanese network to the Vatican in the summer of 1940. According to Schellenberg, when the SS checked further they found that the Vatican information was being passed to British intelligence through a Japanese journalist in Stockholm. Turkul's organisation did have a Japanese contact in Stockholm, a journalist named Enomoto who knew Turkul personally.[103]

From Stockholm to Switzerland to the Vatican, all the signs led back to Turkul's work for Canaris and the Jahnkebureau. Yet the SS did nothing to smash the Black Orchestra. There were rumours that Canaris had evidence of Heydrich's homosexuality and Jewish antecedents locked in a safety deposit box in Switzerland, with instructions to send the documents to the New York Times if he was ever arrested. Schellenberg believed that Canaris had a similar file on Himmler.[104]

The actual reason for SS inaction in 1940–41 may be more mundane. The Jahnke–Turkul channel was the only one capable of providing reliable intelligence on both Japanese and Soviet intentions at a critical period in German history: it was the time that Hitler was considering war against the Soviet Union. In April 1941 Tokyo and Moscow had signed a neutrality pact. But Japan had also signed a treaty with the Third Reich. If Hitler attacked Stalin, which pact would the Japanese honour?[105]

Like Leopold Trepper's Red Orchestra network in Western Europe, both the Turkul and Sorge networks were fully informed of Hitler's war plans against the Soviet Union, but Stalin refused to believe his own spies. When Operation Barbarossa was launched in June 1941, it came as a complete surprise. Stalin waited with bated breath to see if the Japanese, like Hitler, would betray their pact and launch an attack from the east. In the autumn of 1941, with winter approaching, even Hitler had become anxious about Japanese intentions. This was the moment the GRU had been waiting for. The Third Reich was in a panic for information in the Orient: they could turn to only one reliable source.

The Gestapo grumbled, Heydrich fumed, but in 1941, Schellenberg swallowed his suspicions and asked Jahnke to use his excellent channels, the mysterious team of the Czarist officer and the German Jew, to carry a message to the Japanese Secret Service. By October 1941, the Germans had received their response: the Japanese would not attack the Soviet Union, but they would support the Axis war effort by attacking the Americans at Pearl Harbor.[106]

If Hitler was less than thrilled by the Japanese response, the Soviets were ecstatic. They frantically stripped their Mongolian divisions from the Soviet eastern borders and shipped them west to Moscow.[107] On 2 December 1941 a German reconnaissance unit reported that they could see the gleaming towers of the Kremlin in their binoculars. Four days later the Soviets threw their newly arrived divisions against the Nazis. Hitler did not know it, but the tide of war was turning against him for ever. The Turkul network was a cancer from which the Third Reich would never recover. Canaris and Jahnke were using the Black Orchestra channels to inform the Vatican (and Turkul) in advance of all of Hitler's moves.[108] As US intelligence discovered too late, the Vatican's Black Orchestra and Moscow's Red Orchestra were one and the same:

> . . . the Schwarze Kapelle was formerly comprised of high ranking Wehrmacht officers and had at one time been directed by Admiral Canaris. [Source] stated that the Schwarze Kapelle had been activated between the years 1930 and 1934, at which time the Rote Kapelle, an organization comprised mainly of MVD [Communist intelligence] members and sympathizers, was active as a resistance organization. Initially the two organizations were coordinated to form a united front, however, the Schwarze Kapelle activities subsided to the extent that those individuals who remained active looked to the Rote Kapelle for guidance.[109]

Even after the Red Orchestra's Japanese connection, Richard Sorge, was exposed as a Soviet agent by the Japanese and Jahnke was exposed as a British agent by the SS, Turkul continued to be trusted by the Germans because of his service to the Black Orchestra. Even in 1942, when Heydrich denounced Canaris's Abwehr for political unreliability, Turkul and his Jewish spy chief survived, but under new masters. Since the Third Reich had virtually no other source for Soviet war plans, Turkul's organisation was ordered to share its precious MAX reports on Soviet troop movements with other German agencies. Canaris ordered the transfer of Turkul's organisation to General Gehlen of the Fremde Heere Ost (FHO – Foreign Armies East), the intelligence headquarters of the German Wehrmacht on the Eastern front.

Klatt's MAX material was so invaluable to the German High command that in the summer of 1942 the Abwehr organisation physically moved to Gehlen's headquarters in Vinnitsa in the Ukraine. On paper, Klatt still reported to the Abwehr, but in practice the MAX reports on the Soviet order of battle were flowing directly to Gehlen's headquarters.[110] Turkul's intelligence production was important enough to force a de facto merger between two rival branches of German intelligence. Heinz Höhne, the noted German historian, aptly described the network's value to the Third Reich:

> The most sensational information on the Red Army, however, came from a mysterious figure . . . a Jewish trader named Klatt, whose code-name was 'Max'. His information was so accurate that the sceptics in FHO often wondered whether Max was not a double agent feeding fake Russian material back to the Germans. No one in FHO knew the truth, which was that, via Isono Kiyosho, a journalist living in Sofia, Max had tapped the Japanese Secret Service, which was better informed than any other about the Soviet Union.[111]

Gehlen needed Klatt's help, but apparently did not realise that while he was reading Klatt's information on the Soviets, Klatt was probably reading every file he could in Gehlen's intelligence headquarters.[112] It probably seemed necessary for Klatt to be briefed on German battle plans so that he would know where Gehlen needed the most information. In any event a great deal of gossip can be picked up inside any intelligence office. One thing is certain: whatever Klatt learned from Gehlen he was passing on to the Kremlin.[113]

American intelligence analysts tried for years to discover what Turkul was doing in Rome during the war, but were sent on a wild goose chase by Turkul's British employers and his fellow NTS conspirators. The Americans were led to believe that Turkul's Roman activities were insignificant, that he was out of the German intelligence loop completely, a 'quantité negligible'. One German officer remembered differently. He recalled that during the week that Klatt's assistant, Lang, went to visit Turkul in Rome, the MAX reports from the Soviet Union stopped completely. But when Lang came back from his Roman holiday with Turkul, he brought the backlog of MAX reports for the entire week.[114]

But apart from this single visit, how was Turkul able to smuggle the voluminous MAX information in and out of Rome? He knew that the Japanese–Vatican courier system was exposed, that the Nazis had previously intercepted and decoded the Vatican's warning of the Belgian invasion and that Klatt was under near constant surveillance by the Gestapo. Schellenberg let the cat out of the bag when he casually admitted that the SS had a German agent in Rome who was 'closely connected to the Vatican'. The agent refused to use couriers, wireless, or travel to Germany, but he had very important information about the Soviet Union. Schellenberg solved the communication problem by giving the Roman source a new secret invention, the burst transmitter. 'The rapidity of the transmission made it impossible for any direction-finder to establish the location of the transmitter.'[115]

The recently declassified intelligence files show that Klatt commanded an extensive radio network across the continent, but that his post-war American interrogators never discovered the central burst transmitter in the Vatican (which Schellenberg revealed only much later). Schellenberg was not the only one to hire the Jahnke–Turkul network. Far from being an insignificant figure in Rome, Turkul was 'allegedly on excellent terms with Mussolini who often asked for [Turkul's] opinions on Russian matters. He was supposedly a frequent guest of Mussolini's; however some people state that Mussolini asked Germany to suppress [Turkul] when he left Italy.'[116]

Mussolini had good reason to be angry. Just as Turkul had sold the phony MAX reports to the Germans, he had convinced the Italians to purchase an equally false MORITZ network that fed Mussolini reams of Soviet disinformation. With the help of his undetectable SS transmitter, Turkul was perfectly placed in Rome to monitor the Axis war effort and report to his Soviet masters. After all, in the summer of 1942, his agents were operating right inside the German intelligence headquarters for the Eastern front.[117]

Although it is beyond the scope of this book, there is reason to believe that Turkul was the mysterious 'Source Werthe' who supplied the Soviet Lucy ring in Switzerland with daily German battle plans long after other members of the Red Orchestra had been captured. The Black Orchestra provided perfect cover for Soviet Military Intelligence: no matter how much evidence the Gestapo gathered against Turkul and Klatt, the heavyweight team of Jahnke and Canaris would intervene to protect them.

Even the Japanese Secret Service provided unwitting assistance as they continued the Jahnke connection in an effort to mediate peace between Stalin and Hitler. As Schellenberg himself admits, Jahnke was a critical player in these efforts. After Sorge's capture in 1942, Turkul had the only secret channel open to Japan.[118]

As Turkul's network had access to German military intelligence on a daily basis, and in view of the widely acknowledged admission that the MAX information shaped much of the German war plans on the Eastern front, the entire history of the Red Orchestra (and much of World War II) may have to be rewritten. The Turkul files have confirmed that the Supreme Command of the German Army received only that information which was approved by the Soviets. Turkul's network may have been the decisive factor behind many Soviet victories during World War II.[119]

Two decades later, American intelligence still had no idea how the MAX system worked, although they knew it was somehow run by the Soviets. The missing link for the American interrogators was the Vatican–Japanese connection. We can reconstruct the system by speculating on how the pieces which are now known to exist fitted together in the Soviet scheme. From Moscow, the Soviet disinformation went to their net in Japan, which couriered it to the Vatican (probably by diplomatic pouch after the K incident). After Sorge was arrested, the MAX reports were probably shipped through one of Turkul's Japanese journalists directly to Rome through a Vatican pouch.

From Rome they probably went by burst message to one of Klatt's listening posts, and then via a secure wire link to Gehlen's headquarters. Klatt's liaison to Gehlen copied down the German battle response and sent it back down the channel to the Soviets, who always had the last move on the chessboard. Thanks to Schellenberg's unwitting technical assistance with the burst transmitter, couriers were no longer needed. The MAX system became so highly automated (and untraceable) that by 1943, Turkul could step out of the loop entirely.[120]

Only a month after the Klatt operation was transferred to Gehlen's headquarters in the Ukraine, Turkul received an alarming message. The Germans were proposing to reverse Hitler's brutal anti-Slavic policies and recruit Ukrainian, Byelorussian and Russian soldiers to fight for the Third Reich. If the plan were ever approved, millions of Central and Eastern Europeans might volunteer to fight the Soviet Army. The Ukrainians alone could provide enough manpower to turn the tide for the Nazis.[121]

As soon as the burst transmitter replaced the MAX courier system, Turkul's new assignment for the Soviets was clear:

1. Monitor anti-Communist activities through his White Russian network
2. Hamstring the German anti-Communist effort by setting the factions against each other
3. Keep the Soviets informed of all new developments[122]

There were new developments indeed. In 1942 some Vatican officials were rumoured to support the new German policy of using Slavic volunteers against the Communists. There was talk of greater religious freedom and an end to racial persecution of the Slavs. There were even reports that high level negotiations with the Nazis over the Church's position in the Ukraine were already underway.

If the Pope endorsed a German crusade, the Catholics of Central Europe might join with the White Russians and Soviet prisoners of war in the common cause of liberation. The Red Army would be overwhelmed. At all costs, any Vatican initiative in the Ukraine must be stopped before it ever got off the ground. In 1942 Soviet military intelligence turned its attention to Rome. Turkul's assault on the Vatican had begun in earnest. What the Pope did not know was that many Ukrainian priests were already working for Turkul's 'anti-Soviet' network.

The Catholic Army of the Ukraine

The lights burned late in the Pope's private quarters in September 1942. It was not a time for peaceful rest. The Nazis wanted Pius XII to make a deal: endorse the Third Reich or face the destruction of the Catholic Church. Throughout the summer, the pressure on the Pope had increased. Despite intervention by his old German friend, Franz von Papen, the Nazis kept turning the screws tighter and tighter. Harassment of Catholics in Europe increased.[1]

The Ukrainian Catholics had been among the hardest hit. On 26 August 1942 the Pope had written to his old friend, Metropolitan Szepticky, Archbishop of the Uniate Catholic See of Lvov in the Polish province of Galicia.[2] It was a hard letter to write. The Uniate Catholics had endured so much. They were a religious hybrid, the result of being the last outpost of the old Austro-Hungarian empire. Ukrainian in nationality, Orthodox in Slavic liturgy, but obedient to the Pope of Rome, Archbishop Szepticky and his stubborn flock had endured hatred and persecution at the hands of Czarist Russia, the Poles and then the Bolsheviks.[3]

Now it was Szepticky's golden jubilee and the Nazis had arrived. The fiftieth anniversary of a priest's ordination is usually cause for special rejoicing. But on this occasion, Pius XII could only commiserate with the old Archbishop, now approaching his eightieth birthday. Szepticky's fellow priests and pastors were suffering terribly at the hands of the Germans. In his letter the Pope sympathised with their plight.[4]

The reply was even more disturbing. Archbishop Szepticky reminded the Pope that three years earlier, he had asked the Pope's permission to commit suicide as a protest against the Communist takeover of Galicia. Stalin had persecuted the Uniate Catholics even more savagely than the previous Polish occupation. Death would have ended the old Archbishop's agony, but on that occasion the Pope had been firm and refused Szepticky leave to die.[5]

However, Szepticky's 1942 letter was not a further request to commit suicide: 'The last three years have persuaded me that I am not worthy of this death which would have had less meaning before God than a prayer spoken by a child.' Now he wrote of the horrors of the new masters of the Ukraine, the Nazis. 'Liberated by the German army from the Bolshevik Yoke, we originally felt a certain relief, which however lasted no more than one or two months.'[6]

Indeed, Szepticky himself had blessed the Nazi 'liberators', and welcomed the 'independent' government of the Ukraine proclaimed by Jaroslav Stetsko of the OUN. The Organisation of Ukrainian Nationalists was a Fascist revolutionary sect under the leadership of Stephen Bandera and his deputy, Jaroslav Stetsko. They had previously served German intelligence in organising pogroms in the East. The fanatical Fascists of the OUN had long awaited the day when Hitler would break his pact with Stalin and place them in power in the Ukraine.[7]

On the heels of the invading German Army in 1941, the OUN returned to Galicia. The biographer of a young Jewish eyewitness named Simon Wiesenthal recounted what they did next:

> They celebrated their return to Lwow by starting a pogrom that lasted three days and three nights. When the massacre was over, 6,000 Jews had been killed . . . The Jews were ordered to form a long row, face the wall and cross their arms behind their necks. A Ukrainian began to shoot . . . The shots and shouts of the dying men were getting closer to Wiesenthal. He remembers that he stood looking at the grey wall without really seeing it. Suddenly he heard the sound of church bells, and a Ukrainian voice shouted 'Enough! Evening mass!'[8]

Although devout in their loyalty to Church and Reich, the Ukrainian collaborators were treated with disdain by the Germans. At that time, the Nazis thought they had no use for an OUN puppet government. Within a month, Stetsko and the other OUN leaders were thrown out or imprisoned under house arrest in Germany.[9] The true face of the Nazi administration was revealed to Archbishop Szepticky. 'Little by little, the government has instituted a truly unbelievable regime of terror and corruption . . . Today, the whole country feels that the German regime is if anything worse, almost diabolically worse, than the Bolshevists.'[10]

It was not only the 200,000 Jews who had already been killed who troubled the Archbishop; 'hundreds of thousands of Christians' were being systematically slaughtered by the Nazis and their local Ukrainian henchmen. The survival of the Ukrainian Catholic Church was threatened: Archbishop Szepticky was writing to tell the Pope that soon the clergy in the Ukraine would be extinct.[11]

Of course that need never happen if the Pope would consider the Nazis' alternative: he could help them resolve a difficult problem. Stalin had been turning people against the Nazis by reviving the Orthodox Church as a potent propaganda force against the Nazi occupation. What the Nazis needed was a religious stooge of their own: they wanted Archbishop Szepticky to collaborate. Everyone in the Ukraine, even the Orthodox clergy, loved the saintly old leader of the Uniate Catholics. The Nazis wanted to portray themselves as 'protectors of religion' by having Szepticky unite all the Ukrainian Christians into one pro-Nazi, anti-Communist Church.[12]

A united Eastern Church had been the Vatican's dream since the great Orthodox schism tore Christianity apart in 1024 AD. The hybrid Uniate Church was a compromise devised in the sixteenth century by the Jesuits and encouraged by the Habsburg dynasty of Austria as a political counterweight to Orthodox Russia. In 1942 the Nazis were offering the Pope a solution to the Ukrainian question. The Pope knew it was a cruel and cynical propaganda manoeuvre, but the Nazis were eagerly awaiting his answer. Would Pope Pius XII permit Archbishop Szepticky to fulfill the Church's ancient dream to unite the Orthodox and Uniate Sees of the Ukraine?[13]

In the darkness of those autumn nights, the Pope weighed his moral and political alternatives. If he accepted the Nazi offer in the Ukraine, there would be more demands, more requests, more deals. Soon the Vatican would be emasculated like the German Protestant Church. On the other hand, there were other considerations. Pius XII reread Szepticky's heartrending letter and considered his options.

Word of the Pope's secret decision reached American-born Bishop Ivan (John) Bučko, one of the Vatican's experts for Ukrainian issues. Bučko was a porcine figure with a receding hairline and close-set eyes that peered out from behind round-rimmed glasses. Bishop Bučko was also a fanatical Ukrainian nationalist. He was one of the first to find out that the Pope was planning to walk a delicate and dangerous tightrope between public collaboration and token resistance. The first step was to accept the Nazi offer to open negotiations in the Ukraine. An accommodation might be reached, the Bishop thought, if the discussions were approached carefully. Bučko smiled. His dream of an independent Ukraine might yet come true.

For Turkul's masters in the Soviet GRU, Ukrainian unity was a nightmare. The Soviets had encouraged division and splinter groups among the Ukrainian nationalists. It was no coincidence that Turkul's NTS agents in the Melnyk faction had denounced the Bandera group to the Gestapo. Before Admiral Canaris knew what had happened, his hand-picked Ukrainians were ousted, and Melnyk loyalists were running auxiliary police units for the SS. Even some of Bandera's followers, like Mykola Lebed and Father Ivan Grynioch, the Catholic Chaplain of the murderous Nachtigall Battalion, had deserted Bandera for the SS.[14]

Those Ukrainians who survived the purge of Bandera's followers served Soviet interests admirably by instituting a reign of terror that drove more and more of their country men into the hands of the Red Partisans. The last thing the GRU wanted was for the Vatican to negotiate peace among the Ukrainian religious factions and work with the Germans for a united Ukraine.

For the US War Department, the vision of a Nazi–Vatican accord was not a dream but a nightmare. At the end of September 1942, word of the impending deal exploded in the pro-Axis press in Catholic Spain and then in Italy. At first, no one believed the rumours of negotiations. Only a few months earlier, the Nazis had given orders that officials in the occupied Eastern countries were not even to meet with Vatican representatives.[15] But by the beginning of October 1942, the press was reporting an enormous change in Church–Reich relations. The teletype clattered out the news that the Vatican was starting to negotiate with Nazi Germany:

> Lisbon – Catholic circles in Italy confirm the report that Pius XII has sent a mission, headed by Cardinal Lavitrano, Archbishop of Palermo, to investigate the ecclesiastical situation in Nazi-occupied Russia. Catholic papers outside Rome have stated that this mission was sent at the invitation of the German government with the aim of studying the possible unification of the Roman Catholic Church and the Orthodox Church.[16]

US intelligence knew that this hinted at a propaganda coup for the Nazis, and tried to downplay its significance in a series of background briefings for the press, claiming that the Germans were only trying 'to play on the religious sentiments of the Ukrainian people in restoring to the cult several churches which had been closed under the Soviet regime'.[17] But if that were so, why would the Pope send a Prince of the Church, a Cardinal, to discuss the Ukraine? It was evident that a change of tactics could be under way.

US intelligence feared that the Nazis might succeed with these new tactics, especially 'in the Ruthenian diocese of Lwow (Lemberg, Poland) of which metropolitan Mgr Szeptycki is the head . . . Mgr believed this means a real opportunity for the revival of faith and when overtures were made by Orthodox Bishops for the union of Christian churches, he has believed that a cherished project might come to execution . . . The Nazi authorities expressed their desires that Mgr Szeptycki should be appointed as metropolitan of Kiev, capital of Ukraine.'[18]

The Allies knew that Hitler did not share the Catholic Church's ambitions in the Ukraine. The War Department speculated that the Nazis had something else in mind than 'Christan Charity' for Archbishop Szepticky. The War Department Intelligence Division was worried that 'the Nazis wanted to use the influence of the extremely popular prelate to further political plans of a Ukrainian puppet state in which a nationalized church would cultivate hate against Russia'.[19]

British intelligence also sensed the explosive potential of a Catholic–Nazi alliance in the Ukraine. A report on the Uniate issue was prepared at Oxford University for the British Foreign Office:

> Mgr Szepticky's early policies were Ukrainophil; he supported the idea, which the Austrian Government encouraged for anti-Russian political reasons, of an independent Ukraine. It would appear that he still pursues this idea (which Germany has revived since her attack on Russia), if a recent report is true that he has issued an appeal to the Ukrainian Orthodox clergy . . . to unite with the Ruthenians . . . for the sake of national unity . . . The prestige of this Bishop, who is the Grand Old Man of this region, and is probably revered by Orthodox as well as his own flock, should be remembered in all propaganda to this part of the world . . . The policy of the Vatican in regard to this region is hard to predict.[20]

Suddenly it appeared to the Allies as if the Vatican's policy was beginning to tilt towards the Nazis. A confidential American report gave the War Department Intelligence Division reason to expect the worst:

> A private information (sic) states that the most Rev. John Bučko who was up to the end of 1941 Auxiliary Bishop . . . of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic dioceses in the United States, has accompanied the mission of Cardinal Lavitrano to the Ukraine . . . Bishop Bučko . . . is considered a friend of Msgr Szeptycki who was in this country repeatedly between 1916 and 1924 and it is not impossible that [Bučko] went to Rome with the intention of advocating the creation of an Ukraine (sic) ecclesiastical province under the leadership of Msgr Szeptycki.[21]

The War Department's confidential informant was probably the Most Reverend Constantine Bohachevsky, who had been Bishop Bučko's immediate superior when he was living in Pittsburgh. As the War Department noted: 'It is said that Mgr Bučko had in his last years of office dissented with Bishop Bohachevsky in stressing that the Catholic Ukrainians living around Pittsburgh had to be favored in their anti-Russian national sentiments.'[22]

News of Bishop Bučko's anti-Russian sentiments must have greatly disturbed the War Department, which was having problems enough with its temperamental Soviet ally. For Pius XII to select Bučko to be part of the Lavitrano Mission was a possible indication that the Vatican was considering a shift towards the Nazis. Equally alarming, official Vatican channels were providing no advance information on the Lavitrano Mission.[23]

Turkul knew because he had inside sources who were well informed about the negotiations. Metropolitan Anastasius of Yugoslavia was head of the Synodal or Karlowac Church, representing the right wing of Russian Orthodoxy which was ardently pro-German. The head of his German diocese was Metropolitan Seraphim of Berlin who called Hitler 'the great Leader of the German people who has raised the sword against the foes of the Lord'.[24] According to American intelligence files, the Orthodox cleric Anastasius was Turkul's direct collaborator in his anti-Communist centre. Metropolitan Seraphim is identified in British files as another member of the Turkul network.[26]

Their agent in the Ukraine was fully prepared to resist the Vatican's offer of unification. Instead of joining the Catholic Uniates:

> A splinter group of the [Autonomous] Russian clergy, under Bishop Panteleimon of the ancient Lavra monastery at Kiev, was prepared to place itself under the émigré church of Metropolitan Seraphim in Berlin.[27]

The number of clerics who belonged to Turkul's network is amazing, among them Archbishop Vitalie in the United States, Father George Leonidov Romanov, a 'Greek Orthodox' (possibly Uniate) priest who worked on the MAX network, and a number of minor luminaries, including Father Alexei Ionov and the Russian Priests Grabbe and Kisiliew, who later worked for Turkul in Munich.[28]

With so many potential sources of agitation, it would not have taken much effort for Turkul to inflame the existing tensions among the various Orthodox sects in the Ukraine, although he may have had some help. At least one of the Orthodox leaders, Archbishop Alexis Gromadskii, has been accused of being an NKVD agent.[29] The Orthodox could not agree to unite among themselves, let alone with Szepticky's Uniates:

> Szepticky made a series of attempts to bring about an alliance between the Uniates and the Autocephalous adherents, the two nationalist churches. However, Ohienko, who conducted the negotiations for the UAPTs, [Orthodox group] refused unification under the authority of the Pope.[30]

Despite Bishop Bučko's strident anti-Russian sentiments, Cardinal Lavitrano had apparently brought a sharp message from the Pope which disappointed Nazi expectations. When word got back to America, the War Department's Intelligence Division breathed a sigh of relief and prepared its own press report:

> Szeptycki has now declared officially that as an old and ailing man of 80 years, he cannot accept the See of Kiev ... To put it bluntly Msgr Szeptycki says that a religious union of Churches cannot be made under the political domination of the Nazis and that he does not desire to be their tool in accepting to be metropolitan of the Ukraine ... the investigations of Cardinal Lavitrano, confirm the fact that the Vatican will not accept to make any new division of dioceses as long as the Germans are occupying eastern Europe.[31]

However, within a few weeks, US intelligence dropped its fulsome praise of the Vatican's steadfastness. It was beginning to appear that Bishop Bučko's anti-Russian outlook may have won at least a partial victory. By the end of October 1942, US intelligence recognised that the Nazis' alternating promises of religious tolerance and threats of greater persecution, had achieved the desired result: 'the Nazis have avoided open protests from the Vatican in the last few months.'[32]

Evidence was trickling in that the Lavitrano Mission had struck a deal after all. On the eve of the Final Solution of the Jewish question, the Lavitrano Mission had agreed to compromise with the Nazis. In return for easing religious persecution in the East, the Vatican would become neutral in favour of the Germans. For the rest of the war, the Pope never discussed Nazi atrocities against the Russians, nor was the word 'Jew' ever mentioned in any Papal pronouncement.[33]

The terms of the Pope's bargain in Eastern Europe quickly became apparent to the American War Department, which noted that although 'the Vatican does not . . . allow any Bishops in those countries to make open collaborationist statements, it [does] not favor all too outspoken protests. A certain modus vivendi seems to have been established in this sense as the result of the Commission of Cardinal Lavitrano.'[34]

In a confidential comment, American intelligence cited as proof the fact that the Pope permitted Dr Werhun of Berlin to remain the official Apostolic Administrator for the Ukraine. For the rest of the war, while the local Jews were being exterminated, the Vatican's chief delegate for Ukrainian affairs was conveniently absent in Berlin. The War Department described Dr Werhun as 'just the man who will not go in for outspoken protests, and will try to make the best of an evil situation'.[35] Amid such silences, Auschwitz was built.

Soviet intelligence had other things to worry about: the subsequent German response to the Lavitrano mission was a direct threat to the Red Army. Within a year, the SS had reversed its anti-Slavic policy toward the Ukrainians and allowed them to form their own SS Division, the 'Galician'. After heavy losses on the Eastern front, the Germans were pleased that 40,000 young Ukrainians volunteered for SS service. Only half that number, the cream of the crop were accepted, usually from among those Ukrainians who had already proved their total devotion to the Nazis by service in the brutal auxiliary police battalions that had massacred Jews, Poles and even fellow Ukrainians.[36]

By the beginning of 1943, nearly all of the 800,000 Ukrainian Jews had been murdered and their police executioners needed new assignments. There were so many ex-police volunteers that the Ukrainian unit was originally named the 'Galician Police Division' before it was formally accepted by the SS. For the rest of his life, Simon Wiesenthal had a special hatred for Gustav Otto Wächter, the Nazi Governor of Galicia, who had directed the Jewish massacre and then rewarded his Ukrainian henchmen with the 'honour' of becoming SS volunteers.[37]

Unlike most senior German officials, Wächter recognised that a loyal Ukrainian SS force was a significant asset to the Nazis. The Soviet partisan underground was seriously threatening the German supply lines. As the war turned against them, Wächter recognised that it was essential to win the hearts and minds of the civilian population who were assisting the partisans. The centrepiece of Wächter's strategy was the five million Catholic Uniates, of which three and a half million were concentrated in the Galician region.[38]

Their religious leader, Archbishop Szepticky, pointed the way by blessing the Galician SS Division. Finally, the Ukraine had its own fighting force to smash the Soviet partisans. The Galician SS, complete with Uniate chaplains, would soon be a Catholic army in a crusade against the 'Godless Bolsheviks'.[39] Bishop Bučko must have been especially pleased that the 'anti-Russian nationalism' of his people had been preserved. The seeds of co-operation sown by the Lavitrano Mission were beginning to bear fruit.

The Uniate victory in the Ukraine was only the first step in the struggle to contain the hated Communists. Only three months after the Lavitrano Mission had concluded its work, the Vatican floated a story in the New York Herald Tribune and the Washington Post about Pius XII's post-war hopes for Europe. The Pope was said to be in favour of an anti-Communist Central European Confederation of Catholic states, 'which would stretch from the Baltic to the Black Seas'. Pius XI's dreams of a Catholic Intermarium were to be brought to fruition by Pius XII.[40]

Such a Catholic anti-communist bloc had also been the dream of the Pope's old friend, Archbishop Szepticky, who 'was in his younger days a personal friend of the Emperor Francis Joseph', last great ruler of the Austro-Hungarian Empire.[41] However, US intelligence did not view the Pope's post-war plans so favourably.

Most of the War Department's views on this sensitive topic are still censored, but their anger about the Pope's political attitude is quite clear from the report's conclusions:

> ... leading Catholics all over the world do not hold the view that it is in the interest of Christianity and the Church to have 'Catholic' States, but stress freedom for the Church everywhere, whether Catholics are in a majority in a particular country or not. There is definite tendency to avoid > the repetition of the opposition between 'Catholic' and 'Protestant' States which did so much harm in the past. They can hardly favor the idea of a 'Catholic Slav Federation'.[42]

The Soviets certainly did not favour the idea and launched a religious propaganda exercise of their own in September 1943:

> Stalin received the Metropolitan of Moscow, whereupon the restoration of the Synod was announced, with the Metropolitan as Patriarch. Moscow gave wide publicity to this event, contrasting it with reports of German atrocities . . . In reply to the Moscow conclave, a special conference of eight Russian Orthodox Bishops, including Seraphim of Berlin, was convened in Vienna in October 1943 . . .
> Sergius of Riga expressed his displeasure in no uncertain terms. In general, he viewed Seraphim and the Karlowac church as decrepit reactionaries who had lost all touch with Soviet affairs and could only compromise the anti-Soviet cause by foisting themselves upon it. What he objected to most was the close and overt association between the monarchist émigrés and the Nazis.[43]

As one of the leaders of the 'monarchist émigrés', Turkul must have been amused. Seraphim and Anastasius had served their purpose, the Orthodox Church was hopelessly divided. Now it was time for the Catholic Uniates. His assistant, George Romanov, was sent to Switzerland to become ordained as a priest. It was a judicious move. Romanov had worked in Vienna on the MAX network and had written to Turkul that Klatt might be a Communist double agent. He had come close to the truth and had to be kept out of the way. Besides, Romanov might be useful in the future as a source on Orthodox–Uniate alliances. It was an area that had concerned Moscow for a long time.[44]

Since the time of the Bolshevik revolution, the Jesuits had revived their interest in playing the Uniate card. Uniate missionaries were trained in Rome for infiltration. Pius XI and his successor both foresaw that Jesuit-trained missionaries might reunite Orthodox Russia with the Catholic Church 'as soon as the way was open'.[45] Unfortunately, the Bolsheviks had blocked the way for three decades, and appeared to have no intention of stepping aside.

The heart of the anti-Communist crusade was a special unit of the Vatican which co-ordinated Eastern policy. During World War II, the secretary of this office, Congregatio pro Ecclesia Orientali, was 'the French Cardinal Tisserant, a well-known Orientalist', and a noted anti-Communist.[46] By 1942, this Congregation was actively preparing a missionary network of Uniates. Jesuits were sent in disguise into Soviet territory to provide intelligence reports on the prospects for religious reunification with the Orthodox.[47]

The extent to which Turkul assisted the Jesuit penetration missions may never be known (at least until the Vatican Secret Archives are opened). Yet it is interesting to note that of the three hundred volunteer 'Apostles' he admitted smuggling into the Soviet Union, only a handful ever came back out.[48] During the war, Turkul's assistant kept close watch on the Catholic Army of the Ukraine. It was not difficult for Klatt to follow the Galician SS since his network monitored all Soviet and German troop dispositions on the Eastern front:

> . . . he conducted its activities in a manner that was unique. His office staff consisted of two persons – everything in the office was mechanized . . . He was able to report large-scale strategic plans as well as details of troop movements in some important cases even down to divisional level; his reports usually came in two or three weeks ahead of events, so that our leaders could prepare suitable counter-measures – or, should I say, could have done so if Hitler paid more attention to the information.[49]

It was not Klatt's intelligence work, but his Jewish background that eventually drew Hitler's attention. The Führer ordered the dismissal of all Jews working for his intelligence services. Gehlen lamented: 'My most reliable agent, who had brought in the best information I have about Russia, I can't use anymore because he is half Jewish.'[50]

A temporary rescue was arranged by transferring Klatt on paper to the Hungarian intelligence staff. According to Farago, Klatt was in need of frequent rescue, > not because his material was not satisfactory (it was uniformly excellent) but because his mystery continued to disturb his employers. Once, in 1945, only the personal intervention of General Heinz Guderian, then chief of the General Staff, saved his life; the Germans, totally exasperated by Klatt's impregnable secret, decided to get rid of him for good by sending him to a concentration camp. Guderian was scandalized; the information the man was supplying was so invaluable that the General Staff Chief gave orders to leave Klatt alone, or else, he said, the best source of information about the USSR would be lost.[51]

Despite his Catholicism, Klatt was still harassed about his Jewish racial status, but continued to provide information up to the last days of World War II. His mysterious sources never dried up.[52] Klatt had worked for Admiral Canaris of the Abwehr, then General Gehlen of FHO and finally, Walter Schellenberg of the SS. Every branch of Nazi intelligence, including General Guderian at Hitler's highest headquarters, depended on Klatt. It appears that he may have been the one mysterious Jew in the SS intelligence service who received Honorary Aryan status. It should be noted that those decrees were signed by Adolf Hitler personally. It would indeed be an irony if Klatt found his final rescuer at the top of the Third Reich.[53]

But the search for Klatt's intelligence source continued. According to the recently declassified files, Klatt's chief agent was 'Lang', yet another of General Turkul's spies who worked for the SS. His real name was 'Ira LONGIN aka IRA aka LANG, head of the "Dr LANG" Section [in] VIENNA which supplied amazingly accurate information to the Germans concerning top level Soviet strategy during the war'.[54]

If Klatt was getting his information from Lang, who was Lang getting his from? Lang supposedly had agents on Marshal Rokossovsky's Soviet General Staff, but how could he communicate with them? After all, one could not simply pick up a telephone in SS headquarters in Vienna and dial a traitor in the Kremlin. Heinz Höhne supplies the answer, although he misspells General Turkul's name:

> [The] line to the senior levels of the Red Army ran through the exiled Russian General Turgut. Living in Vienna and working for the Abwehr office there, he maintained radio stations in the Caucasus and Urals over which he communicated with anti-Stalinists among senior Red Army officers.[55]

Another author also misspelled Turkul's name, but confirms his direct involvement with radio espionage:

> After the outbreak of World War II, Turkhul disappeared . . . General Turkhul showed up unexpectedly in Central Europe, having been traced through a secret transmitter which provided the Germans with intelligence on Soviet military formations and movements.[56]

In a recently declassified intelligence file, the US Army Counter Intelligence Corps filled in many of the blanks on Turkul's wartime movements:

1. Pius XI's Secretary of State Eugenio Pacelli, photographed after successfully concluding the Vatican's Concordat with Germany. Within a few years, Hitler was attacking the Catholic Church while Pacelli, as Pope Pius XII, tried to preserve his diplomatic neutrality on the eve of war.

2. After another triumph of Pacelli's diplomacy, the 1929 Concordat with Fascist Italy, Mussolini's cavalcade arrives at the Vatican for an official reception with Pope Pius XI. Unlike his successor Pacelli, Pius XI was willing to take a strong public stand against Hitler's policies.

3. After Hitler's defeat, Pacelli abandoned his controversial wartime neutrality towards Germany and spread the word that the Vatican would shelter Fascist fugitives. Fearing retribution for their wartime massacres, the Croatian Ustashi pack up for the flight to Austria, first stop on the Ratline to Rome.

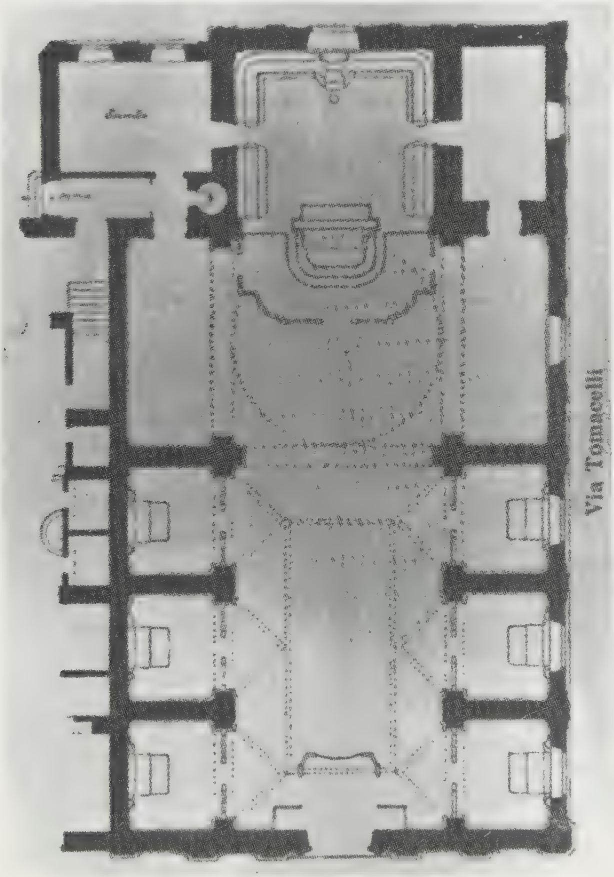
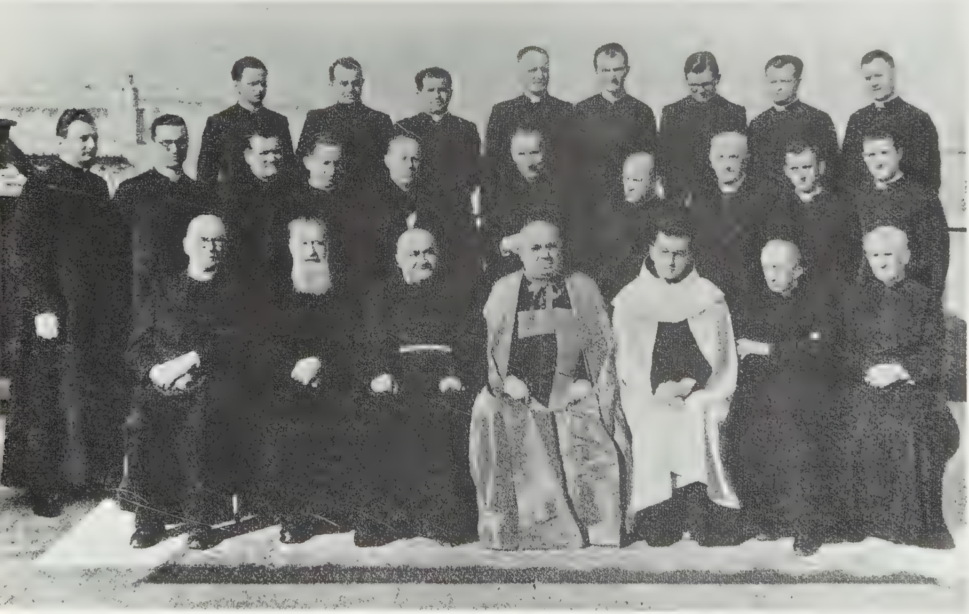
4. In the chaos of post-war Europe, the roads were clogged with refugees fleeing to the West away from the victorious Communists. Many infamous war criminals, including Croatian dictator Ante Pavelić, mingled with the throng to avoid capture by Marshal Tito's ruthless partisans.



5. All roads led to Rome and the charitable hands of Father Draganović at the Institute of San Girolamo at Via Tomacelli 132. After World War II Father Draganović turned this Croatian Institute into a sanctuary for Fascist fugitives going down the Vatican Ratline.

6. The drawing room in San Girolamo when it housed wanted war criminals in the late 1940s. After pro-Nazi Bishop Alois Hudal was exposed for smuggling German and Austrian war criminals such as Stangl and Eichmann, San Girolamo became the headquarters for a more discreet and far more efficient Vatican smuggling network.



7. The priests who ran San Girolamo in the early 1950s, posing with Church dignitaries. Father Draganović is in the second row, sixth from the left. Several of the priests who worked on Father Draganović's Ratlines gave tape-recorded interviews to the authors.

8. Father Draganović (left), and San Girolamo's Rector Monsignor Juraj Magjerec (right) celebrating a special mass in St John Lateran in Rome, 1953, on the occasion of the 500th anniversary of the Institute. Draganović and Magjerec were the key operatives in the Nazi-smuggling network run under the cover of San Girolamo's "charitable" work for refugees. Several religious orders, including the Franciscans and the Jesuits, supplied forged documents and other assistance to the Ratlines.

9. Draganović and Magjerec on one of their many visits to the largely Croatian Displaced Persons Camp of Bagnoli. After the war, many wanted Ustashi war criminals hid at Bagnoli and later used the camp as a centre for terrorist operations against the Communists. During the Cold War, Draganović was a secret Vatican liaison to the intelligence services of Italy, Britain and the United States. When Draganović retired behind the "Iron Curtain" in 1967, there were many who wondered whether his real loyalty lay with the Communists all along.

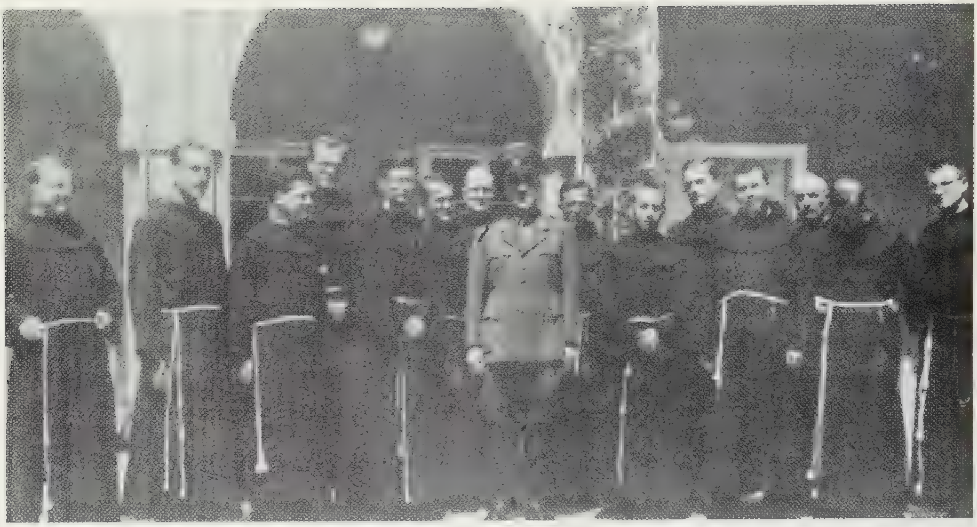
11. Pius XII's Under Secretary of State, Monsignor Giovanni Montini, with another dignitary on the terrace of San Girolamo. It was Montini who secretly supervised Draganović's Ratline and lobbied the Western powers for the release of war criminals. During this time Montini was recruited as a secret intelligence source for US counter-intelligence chief, James Jesus Angleton, a relationship which boosted Angleton's CIA career when Montini became Pope Paul VI.

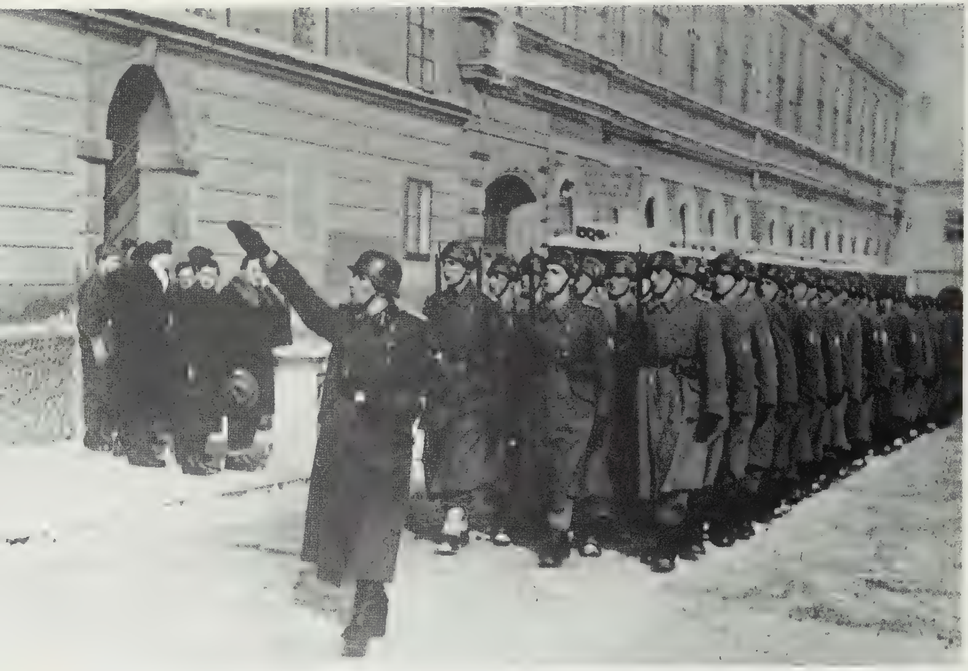
12. Croatian war criminal Ante Pavelić in his office with Ustashi officials in Zagreb during the war. Under the direction of Adolf Hitler (whose picture hangs on Pavelić's office wall) the Poglavnik's government slaughtered over half a million Serbs, Jews and Gypsies in the most barbarous manner. After the war, the US Army staged a burglary at Father Draganović's office and discovered that Pavelić was living inside the Vatican along with other wanted war criminals.



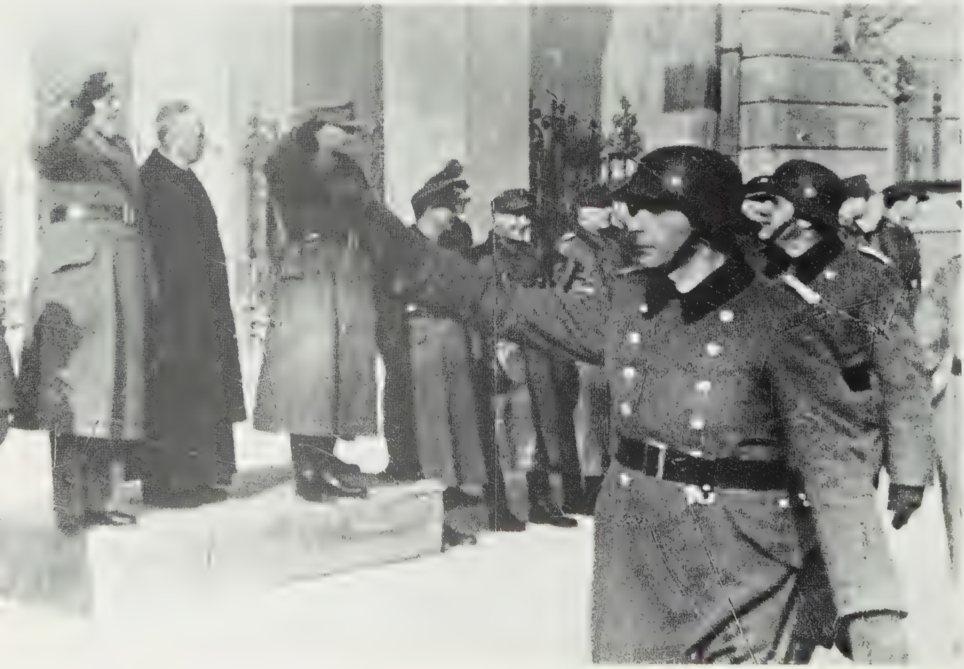
13. A wartime picture of Croatian dictator Pavelić with a group of Franciscan priests. Many Croatian clerics supported Pavelić's Fascist Ustashi movement. After his post-war sanctuary in the Vatican was discovered by the American Army, Pavelić was allowed to quietly escape to South America in order to prevent a "staggering blow" to the Roman Catholic Church.

14. One of many villas in the grounds of the Pope's Summer Residence at Castelgandolfo outside of Rome. A number of important fugitives were in hiding at Castelgandolfo, including Ante Pavelić and Ferenc Vajta. Vajta worked for the Nazis in Hungary, was later recruited by French intelligence, then by the Vatican, and finally told all their secrets to the Americans.

15. Post-war Italian President Enrico de Nicola (centre) and Prime Minister Alcide de Gasperi (right) after an audience with Pope Pius XII in mid-1946. De Gasperi worked closely with Monsignor Montini of the Vatican Secretariat of State on anti-Communist plans, and his Government was heavily implicated in the Vatican's Ratline. Soon after this photograph was taken, de Gasperi became involved in running guns for the Vatican's "freedom fighters".



16 & 17. Unfortunately, many of the Vatican's "freedom fighters" were former Nazi collaborators. Here is a picture of an SS officer leading Bishop Gregory Rožman's "anti-Communist" army down the streets of Ljubljana in 1944. On the dais, Bishop Rožman himself reviews the troops with local SS commander and the Fascist president of Slovenia. The Bishop's wartime collaboration included a "Pastoral Letter" urging his flock to join the Nazi cause to "assure our existence and better future, in the fight against [the] Jewish conspiracy".



18. After the march-past Bishop Rožman extends his warm greetings to SS General Rösener. Although both the British and American Governments concluded that Rožman should be handed over to Tito as a Nazi collaborator, they permitted his "escape" to Switzerland in 1947. In Berne, Bishop Rožman laundered Fascist treasure to fund the Križari terrorist groups behind the "Iron Curtain".

19. Wanted war criminal Srečko Rover posing in his Ustashi uniform. After the war he was provided with false identity papers by Father Draganović, and rose to be a senior officer in the Križari terrorist network which launched a series of disastrous operations in 1946–48. After being denounced as a Communist agent, Rover finally settled in Australia and organised another equally disastrous terrorist network.

20 & 21. The Communist Yugoslav government accused Father Karlo Petranović of participating in the wartime massacres of Serbs around Ogulin. After the war he became one of many priests recruited by Draganović to run the Ratline, sending thousands of fugitives out of Genoa to North and South America and Australia. Here he is with some of his "passengers" on the waterfront in Genoa.

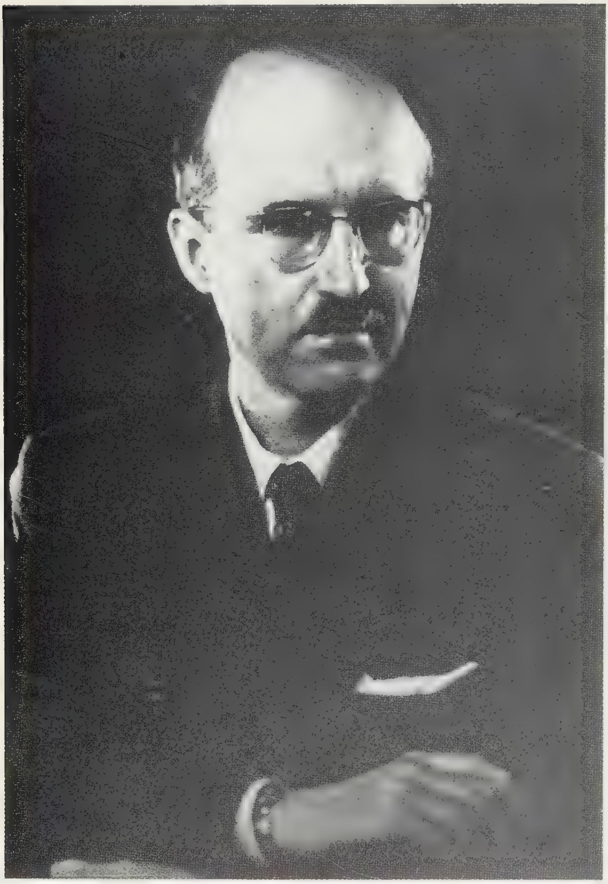
22. Bishop Ivan Bučko, the saviour of the Ukrainian SS Division 'Galicia'. Bučko worked closely with Father Draganović smuggling fugitive Nazis, and also had influential contacts with senior Vatican bureaucrats, including Pope Pius XII.

23. Ukrainian volunteers for the SS Division 'Galicia' on parade during the war. Although Archbishop Szepticky of the Uniate (Catholic) Church privately denounced the Nazis to Pope Pius XII, he blessed the SS volunteers, many of whom had previously committed war crimes while serving in auxiliary police units.



24. Ukrainian Nazi leader, Yaroslav Stetsko, whose Organisation of Ukrainian Nationalists conducted anti-Jewish pogroms following the Nazi invasion in 1941. Banned by the US State Department, Stetsko moved to Canada where he headed the British intelligence front, the Anti-Bolshevik Bloc of Nations. Stetsko's ABN was supervised by a British double agent named Kim Philby who used this Fascist-dominated organisation to crush legitimate anti-Communist resistance efforts behind the Iron Curtain.

25. Despite his cloudy past, Yaroslav Stetsko enjoyed a resurgence of popularity with the Reagan administration and was even received in the White House. Here Stetsko meets with former US Army General John Singlaub, one of the key figures named in the Iran–Contra scandal and former head of the World Anti-Communist League. WACL was formed by merging neo-Fascist and terrorist groups from many nations.

26. France's Ambassador to Italy, François Poncet (wearing a moustache and bow tie), was captured by the 'Butcher of Lyon', Klaus Barbie, and secretly collaborated against the Resistance. As the senior French official in occupied Germany, and later President of the International Red Cross, Poncet went on to play an important role in the Ratline. By the late 1940s, he had become Allen Dulles's conduit for Red Cross papers, so desperately needed by the Vatican's Nazi-smugglers.

27. Slovak Fascist leader, Jozef Kirschbaum, in his Hlinka Guard uniform during World War II. The CIA identified Kirschbaum's associate, Ferdinand Durčansky, as a class A war criminal and double agent whose intrigues with the Vatican helped bring about the Communist takeover of Czechoslovakia in 1948. Kirschbaum and Durčansky went to Canada along with other Slovak Fascists after

28. General Prince Anton Vasilevich Turkul, the greatest Communist agent of them all. In addition to penetrating the Holy See, General Turkul was a Communist double agent in German, Japanese, British, French and American intelligence. It was Turkul who splintered the anti-Bolshevik émigré groups after World War I, sent Hitler false information that crushed the Nazis on the Eastern front, helped turn the Vatican Ratlines into a vehicle for Soviet intelligence during the Cold War, and culminated his career by prematurely instigating the Hungarian revolution of 1956.

> In Rome subject succeeded in getting in contact with the Reichssicherheitshauptamt (RSHA) for whom he allegedly worked as an agent in the winter of 1943. Subject was removed from Rome in 1943, primarily at the insistence of Richard KLATT aka KAUDER, who was one of [Turkul's] leading agents in the Balkans.
> KLATT insisted that [Turkul] not be captured by the allies, fearing that then the organization would fall apart. [Turkul] was removed in an Abwehr plane. The Abwehr was helping Klatt. They believed that by establishing direct contact with [Turkul] and promising him financial support for his White Russian Organization they would keep the good will of . . . the 'Dr Lang' section [in] . . . Vienna which supplied amazingly good information to the Germans concerning top level Soviet strategy during the War, and other Turkul agents. Support of [Turkul] was the primary condition set by Lang for his service with the Abwehr.[57]

The incestuous trio of Turkul, Klatt and Lang was literally blackmailing German intelligence, by threatening to withhold its information on the Soviet Union unless Turkul's political programme was accepted. For decades, historians have puzzled over the German failure to adopt a cohesive strategy concerning the recruitment of Soviet émigrés for their Army. According to the recently declassified files, General Turkul was the principal obstacle to any unified volunteer force.

Wrecking the Vlasov Army was the key to Turkul's strategy. The Nazis were planning to use captured Soviet General Andrei Vlasov to recruit an army of Soviet volunteers from the POW camps, give them German arms and equipment, and send them against the Soviet Union. In order to infiltrate the Vlasov movement, Turkul ordered Klatt to make a counter proposition to Schellenberg of the SS.

Turkul ordered his NTS network to serve as 'political commisars' with Vlasov's units to ensure their loyalty to the Third Reich. The Germans quickly accepted, and Turkul's agents were soon in a position to denounce Soviet POW leaders.[58]

Turkul later suggested that it was Klatt who had penetrated and sabotaged the anti-Communist units. But the evidence showed that it was Turkul who was Vlasov's harshest critic.[59] Turkul's views carried great weight: in addition to Admiral Canaris, head of the Abwehr, he 'succeeded in gaining the trust of Himmler . . . and Alfred Rosenberg, who were both close to Hitler'.[60] Turkul's White Russian network was so valuable that only a handful of Third Reich officials even knew of its existence. None of them realised that Turkul's NTS had promoted its own agenda for the Soviets:

> by placing members of its organization in stratgic positions (in the Reich as well as in the occupied areas) and seeking a monopoly of effective leadership among the émigrés, the influence of the Solidarists (NTS) was disproportionate. One of the top propagandists at the Wehrmacht propaganda compound . . . was a leading NTS man. Kaminskii's Russian Nazi 'party' was guided by NTS officials. The Ostministerium's training camp for 'converted' prisoners at Wüstrau was in effect a fief of the NTS, where its ideas were propagated under the noses of the German mediocrities. In at least two-score towns and cities in the occupied areas there were Solidarist mayors, chiefs of police, or newspaper editors recruited by the proselytizers of the NTS; finally several of the top men within the Vlasov movement were likewise NTS members, although Vlasov himself refused to endorse their group.[61]

In hindsight, it is easy to see the trap that Turkul had set. Every detail of the new volunteer forces was passed to Soviet headquarters. The Vatican's dream of their Uniate missionaries marching into the Soviet Union on the heels of a Catholic army was severely dashed when the Galician SS was virtually destroyed in the Battle of Brody in 1944. To complete the débâcle, the survivors were reformed into various military units under KONR, a committee for the Liberation of the Peoples of Russia, led by General Vlasov.

The reaction of the minority groups was predictable. The Organisation of Ukrainian Nationalists under Bandera and Stetsko deeply resented being led by a Russian and had already established its own paramilitary force, the Ukrainian Insurgent Army, or UPA.[62] While the Wehrmacht was working to unite all the émigrés under Vlasov, Turkul and the SS were working in an entirely different direction.

The former Governor of Galicia and SS leader, Gustav Wächter, participated in sensitive and secret negotiations to gain the collaboration of Bandera's OUN/UPA forces. Bandera and Stetsko were quietly released from house arrest and eagerly rejoined the Nazi cause. It had been a long time since the Nazis had needed him, but now Bandera had conditions: the OUN/UPA would fight for Hitler, but not under the command of Vlasov, the renegade Soviet General who insisted on re-incorporating the Ukraine into a Great Russian Empire after the Nazi victory.[63]

Vlasov's scheme was anathema to the OUN separatists who wanted an independent Ukraine. Bandera joined with other anti-Russian nationalists to form a new bloc. Although there is little evidence to support it, OUN leaders claim that in 1944 Bandera formed the 'Anti-Bolshevik Bloc of Nations' (ABN), to unite all the non-Russian minorities working for the Third Reich.[64] It appears that Turkul's NTS may have overreached themselves with their divide and conquer strategy, and grown careless. The NTS headquarters in Warsaw was discovered to be in communication with the Soviets. In 1944 the Gestapo began a mass round-up of NTS members leaving the field open for a final German push to unite the émigrés. It was too little, too late.[65]

In view of the exigencies of the Nazi military situation, Bandera and the other anti-Vlasov separatists agreed to defer their squabbling in the interests of Nazi unity. At the urging of Wächter, Bandera agreed to have a moderate OUN spokesman, General Pavel Shandruk, conduct negotiations with the pan-Russian allies of the Third Reich. Soon General Vlasov had agreed that at least the Galician Ukraine would not be considered part of a Greater Russia after the Communists were defeated.[66]

In February 1945, as the Soviets swept across Eastern Europe, the last details of Slavic collaboration were still being ironed out in Berlin. The Nazis still refused to give any written guarantees of religious freedom, but at least no longer referred to the Slavs as 'sub-humans'.[67] Still, with the Nazi war machine in permanent retreat, the negotiations were completely futile.

In the spring of 1945 General Shandruk assumed command of the scattered Galician SS, which was simply renamed the First Ukrainian Division. At the end of the war, the unit took its place, on paper at least, as part of Vlasov's army. But instead of fighting the Soviets, the Catholic army of the Ukraine was fighting Tito's partisans in Yugoslavia before retreating into Austria.[68]

Turkul was hot on their heels. To show his good faith with the Nazis, he had assumed control of a Vlasov unit and also headed for Yugoslavia. 'A politically amorphous though distinctly tsarist group of Russian émigrés in Yugoslavia was authorized to form a Schützkorps, employed primarily against the partisans there.'[69] In an interesting bit of Stalinist duplicity, Turkul's mission was to crush Tito.[70]

Turkul's forces made contact with the Fascist commander Dimitrije Ljotić, and remnants of Draža Mihailović's Četniks, whose forces had also collaborated with the Nazis. When the war ended, Turkul established emissaries to the West through Ljotić and Mihailović who had already begun to negotiate sanctuary. Suddenly, all across Europe, the émigré armies of the Third Reich disappeared. Immediately, rumours about the Vatican's role began to spread.

Diplomacy and Deceit

The flight of the Ukrainian SS is a good example of a bad example. Many other Fascist groups, such as the Ustashi, followed in their path, imitating the Ukrainian strategies for post-war survival. The Vatican was not alone in protecting Nazi fugitives after the war. Nor was the Holy See solely behind the transformation of ex-Nazis into 'freedom fighters'. The termination of serious war crimes investigations was the result of official diplomatic decisions by several Western powers.

Intelligence front groups like the Ukrainian-dominated Anti-Bolshevik Bloc of Nations were not created in a vacuum. They were the product of a deliberate double standard and cynical secret policies. In many respects the Vatican was only a junior partner in a diplomatic shell game whose rules were largely shaped in London. It was a game that the fugitive Nazis learned quickly and well.

Even before the end of the war, word spread quickly throughout the Fascist forces of Eastern Europe: head for the British-occupied area of Austria to avoid capture by the Communists. Some of the fugitives, particularly those from the Ukraine, must have been a little apprehensive at surrendering to anyone. Many of the people in General Shandruk's Galician SS Division had previously earned a reputation for brutality during the gruesome police executions in the Ukraine. Some also allegedly participated in the bloody suppression of the Warsaw uprising, while others may have fought against the West at Monte Cassino. Some were reportedly involved in massacring French partisans.

Under Shandruk the unit had little chance to commit war crimes. To be fair, it appears that most of the real atrocities had already been committed prior to 1943, when the Ukrainian unit was still just an amalgam of auxiliary police battalions, and before it was formally absorbed into the SS.[1] Although the exact wartime role of the Galician SS is still hotly debated, one fact is certain: in the spring of 1945 the Galicians headed westwards. The First Ukrainian Division, Bishop Bučko's last great hope, surrendered in May 1945 to the British Army at Klagenfurt, Austria.[2]

The arrival of Shandruk's Division, 90 per cent of whom were Uniate Catholics, was not entirely unexpected by the British. According to the Ukrainians, the British had a special interest in them:

> . . . contacts were established with the British forces . . . On May 8th the entire unit was successful in crossing to join the British forces at Klagenfurt . . . Arms were not removed from the unit; in fact, in many cases more arms were issued and the unit was instructed to cross over to Italy. The move beginning May 28th ended up . . . at Rimini.[3]

According to their own detailed account, the Galician SS was the only Axis unit to survive the war intact, under arms and with their own officers. The British did not place the Ukrainians in a POW cage, but in Camp 374, for 'Separated Enemy Personnel' at Rimini, a distinction which, to the Ukrainians at least, denoted their special status.[4] However, one unit of the Division had been cut off, and fell into far less hospitable American hands.

On 5 July 1945 the President's Personal Representative to the Pope received a diplomatic note from the Vatican Secretariat of State:

> Several thousand Ukrainians are in Germany and fear they may be sent to Galicia. On their behalf, the Holy See has been requested to use its good offices in order that these poor refugees may soon be allowed to leave Germany and to take refuge in France, Belgium, the Netherlands, or any other country rather than being obliged to go to territories under Russian domination.[5]

The difficulty was that the 'poor refugees' were captured still wearing German uniforms. The American Army lacked a sense of humour about these prisoners. One of the Galician officers was discovered to have the distinctive SS tattoo under his armpit, listing his blood type in case he was wounded in battle. The Americans promptly made arrangements to extradite him to the Soviets. They had no intention of simply allowing an SS unit to cross over to a friendly Catholic state as the Vatican had requested, and continued their search for 'refugees' with SS tattoos.[6]

This must have been disquieting news: over 2,000 Galician SS members had once undergone SS cadre training. A large number of Shandruk's officers also bore the incriminating tattoo.[7] It was high time for the Vatican to intervene more directly on behalf of the Catholic Ukrainian army.

A few weeks later, on 11 August 1945, the Vatican Secretariat of State delivered a diplomatic note to the Americans 'on behalf of the spiritual and religious care of the displaced persons of Ruthenian Catholic Rite in Germany . . . whether the latter be within or outside concentration camps'.[8]

The Vatican specifically requested that its recently appointed Apostolic Visitor 'be authorized to visit . . . the concentration camps in Germany where there are Ruthenian Catholics'. It is not without coincidence that the man chosen for the Pope's emissary was none other than 'his excellence Monsignor Bučko'. Yet again, the Vatican had nominated a Fascist priest as its emissary to Catholic Nazi collaborators. They asked that he be given the assistance of priests 'whom he will find among the Ruthenian displaced persons'. This was apparently a reference to Uniate Chaplains like Ivan Grynioch who had served with the Galician SS.[9]

The Vatican also conveyed the opening shot in the amnesty barrage from the Oriental Congregation. Apparently, the Vatican's lawyers had been working overtime and had found a loophole to keep the Galician SS out of Soviet hands:

> . . . those Ukrainians . . . who are classified as prisoners of war . . . should not be considered as deserters from the Red Army; for their nationality in 1939 was Polish and not Russian. For the same reason their custody cannot be requested by the Soviet Authorities on the basis of the agreements of Yalta [which promised repatriation for] only those Russian citizens who departed from Soviet territory after 1927 or those individuals who were formerly members of the Red Army.[10]

The British Foreign Office understood this extremely clever argument. The Galician SS could not go back to the Soviets because they had once been Poles. On the other hand, they could not be sent to Poland because Galicia was now part of the Soviet Union. Under the Vatican's version of 'Catch 22', all Galician war criminals would simply have to be released into the benevolent hands of Bishop Bučko. But the Americans would not budge.[11] Under the Yalta agreement, these Nazis had to be returned to Soviet custody.

A week later the pressure was increased a notch when Bučko's old superior, Bishop Bohachevsky of Pittsburgh, sent a letter on 25 August to General George Marshall, Chief of Staff of the War Department. He insisted that all Ukrainians in the US zone be given asylum, Red Cross assistance and the right to organise their own 'charitable committees':

> These Ukrainians, who are classified as Russians or Poles, live in deathly fear and dread the thought of being sent to Soviet Russia or Poland. Reports from semi-official and private sources revealing tales of relentless, horrible, barbaric religious, social, and political persecutions, imprisonments, and executions of Ukrainians, especially the intellectuals, clergymen, etc., by the Soviet authorities give the Ukrainians good cause for fear and anxiety.[12]

Undoubtedly most Ukrainian refugees in Germany had good reason to fear those consequences. Stalin treated even slave labourers and POWs as Nazi collaborators. Many of those returned to him were summarily murdered and the rest shipped off to Siberia. But among the Galician SS were many who had previously served with the SS mobile killing units at places like Babi Yar, where over 100,000 Jews had been shot in just three days. These killers had real cause for fear and anxiety.[13]

The War Department dumped Bishop Bohachevsky's letter on the State Department, which sent him a cursory reply a few months later, saying simply that 'the situation of those who remain is receiving every appropriate consideration to avoiding undue hardship'.[14] Throughout the autumn of 1945 the American Army continued to round up fugitive Ukrainians and ship them off to the Soviet Union. As it turned out, they were among the last to be sent back. The Nazis were going to get a Christmas present.

On 30 November 1945 the Vatican sent a formal Diplomatic Note 'on behalf of 2,000 Ukrainian refugees residing in Stuttgart . . . these refugees maintain that their repatriation would almost certainly expose them to deportation, physical and mental torture, and even death by shooting . . . In view of the assurances recently given that Hungarian refugees would not be repatriated against their will, it is believed that there are grounds for hoping that the Ukrainians . . . will likewise not be treated differently.'[15] Yet again the Americans gave the Vatican a polite brush-off. The men in question were suspected of being Nazi collaborators.[16]

Two weeks later, the Vatican was back with another Diplomatic Note marked URGENT. Bishop Bučko had issued an appeal directly to Pius XII. The Vatican stated that, contrary to all assurances, the Americans were still transferring Ukrainian prisoners to the Soviets at Stuttgart. They quoted Bučko's appeal to both Pius XII and the Americans for a temporary stay of transfer so that, 'as Bishop Bučko writes, "They could prepare themselves for a Christian death"'. Bučko also related 'that in the Displaced Persons Camp at Hannei some refugees committed suicide rather than permit themselves to be transferred'.[17]

Bučko's propaganda campaign was effective. Five weeks later, on 23 January 1946, the State Department issued a 'new directive' that altered the rules in favour of Ukrainians. From now on only those Ukrainians who were both residents and citizens of the Soviet Union after 1939 were liable for forcible hand-over. This exempted most of the 'Polish' Ukrainians from Galicia. In addition, the State Department would only hand over those 'non-Polish' Ukrainians who were actually captured in German uniform, or against whom there was 'reasonable evidence' that they had voluntarily rendered aid and comfort to the Nazis.[18]

The Americans were not alone in feeling Catholic pressure. The Canadian government reluctantly allowed Reverend Kushnir to visit imprisoned Ukrainians in the Western-occupied zones of Germany, allegedly on a charitable mission. Soon after, the British Foreign Office was chagrined to receive a broadside from Reverend Kushnir as 'Chairman of the Board' of a political group strongly protesting the policy of forcible repatriation of Ukrainians.[19]

The Vatican had obtained a signficant compromise on the Ukrainians, but pushed its luck in intervening for members of Vlasov's army.[20] The American decision was to treat all Russians under the Ukrainian rules which guaranteed that they would be handed over. It was a mistake that the West bitterly regretted, for it cost them dearly throughout the Cold War. At least Vlasov's army was largely untainted by war crimes. That could not be said for the Galician SS, some of whom had committed spectacular atrocities.

It is one of the tragedies of the post-war era that the American and British governments rounded up tens of thousands of petty collaborators, prisoners of war and innocent political refugees and forcibly handed them over to certain death or imprisonment. For a short period, the West was an accomplice in Stalin's post-war massacres.[21] The irony is that the Vatican's protests only helped the guilty evade punishment. As a result, the Ukrainians believed themselves favoured protégés and began to apply for American visas.[22]

The shift in American policy did not go unnoticed. On 25 June 1946 the Ukrainian–American League wrote to the State Department to > unequivocally protest plans to bring to our country people who cooperated with German fascists in terrorizing the Ukrainian, Polish and Jewish populations of Western Ukraine (formerly Poland), or who were soldiers in the SS Division 'Halychyna' [Galician] which fought against the American and British armies in Italy, or who belonged to the armed bands which helped the German fascists in terrorizing and persecuting the people of our allied countries. They aided the Germans in the death camps in destroying not only Ukrainians, Poles and Jews, but citizens of Britain, France, and the United States.[23]

The State Department replied that the 'screening of war criminals, quislings and collaborators is being pressed vigorously by the allied military authorities . . . with a view to the elimination of such persons from the displaced persons centers'.[24] The American government was still under the illusion that no Nazi collaborators would escape unpunished. The British had no such illusions.

Incredible as it seems, the entire Galician SS Division had been basking in the sun for the previous two years in the British camp at Rimini. It had suddenly dawned on the British that they had to at least make a token attempt at screening them before the camp was turned over to the new Italian government in September 1947. In January Brigadier General Fitzroy Maclean and his assistant arrived at Rimini to screen for undesirables[25]

The screening was scanty. They interviewed only 200 men out of 8,272. They used camp inmates as interpreters, conducted no cross-examinations and basically asked the Ukrainians to tell them where they had been during World War II. Brigadier Maclean's 'screening team' cheerfully admitted that 'the short history of the Division was supplied entirely by the Ukrainians themselves and we had no information of any kind against which they could be checked'.[26]

The Ukrainian officers conjured up a false order of battle, claiming that their unit was the First Ukrainian Division of the Wehrmacht, which had a relatively innocent ring to it. The screening team noted: 'Some of the real villains . . . if there are any, may be sheltering behind these innocuous-sounding units, but that is a risk we have to take.'[27] The British were already months behind in their screening. 'If, however, we are to get anywhere, we must, and in my opinon safely can, assume that by and large the men are what they say they are and did what they said they did,' Maclean wrote.[28]

Brigadier Maclean had a little problem when several of the prisoners started talking about their ranks in the Galician SS. Such confessions did not cause the British screeners much anxiety. Surely, the prisoners had made an innocent mistake. 'I do not see anything suspicious in some of the men not knowing exactly what unit they were in . . . it seems however to have had some SS training.'[29] The British preferred to stick with the fictional Wehrmacht cover story even when faced with contrary evidence supplied by the prisoners themselves.

It was a little more difficult for the screeners when, despite all the hints, the prisoners persisted in saying that 'the great majority of them voluntarily enlisted in the German armed forces and fought against our allies.' Since that would have qualified them for handover to the Soviets, the screeners surmised that the prisoners really had not meant that they 'volunteered' in that sense.[30]

Fortunately, none of the prisoners was stupid enough to confess to war crimes, and so none was discovered. Despite his assistant's recommendation that it would take many months to screen each person in the camp properly, Maclean informed the Foreign Office in February that his investigation in Rimini would be completed by the middle of March.[31]

This was 'good news' to the Foreign Office, which hoped to avoid the embarrassment that would naturally follow any rigorous investigation.[32] The news that many had confessed their voluntary service to the Reich was even more embarrassing. The British hoped that those problem prisoners would simply disappear into the night, cynically noting: '. . . it is unlikely that there will be a big bag of quislings owing to the lack of guards to prevent their escape.'[33] They need not have worried.

A Soviet team had made a quick visit to the Ukrainians in the summer of 1945 and indentified a 'small fascist minority' in leadership positions. Eleven 'were in fact removed at the request of the Soviet Mission but were subsequently allowed by the British authorities to return'.[34] This is one of the rare instances where fugitive Nazis wanted to break back into a 'prison camp'. Such was British internment in Italy. Rimini was notorious among American counter-intelligence officials for the ease with which prisoners seemed to come and go at will.[35]

The Ukrainians enjoyed British custody and had no plans to leave. Brigadier Maclean, who genuinely liked these fellows,[36] asked the Foreign Office how to protect the Ukrainians from falling into Soviet hands once the Italian government took over the camp. Despite all the self-serving explanations, the Ukrainians had been captured in German uniforms and had already admitted that they volunteered to fight for the Nazis. 'In the circumstances, the only possible solution appears to be to remove them from Italy before the ratification of the Treaty to a British controlled area where they could be further investigated should this be necessary,' wrote Maclean.[37]

The Foreign Office was divided over this suggestion. A small majority favoured bringing the entire Galician SS Division to Britain until the matter could be resolved.[38] Some of the bureaucrats dissented vigorously, claiming that the scheme was a 'flimsy' pretext to evade the Yalta obligations.[39] Others said that only those who fought on the British side should be helped, not those who fought for the Germans.[40] British sympathy by this time was on the side of everyone who claimed to be anti-Communist. Whatever the unsavoury truth about the Galician unit, it was decided that Ukrainians in British custody were to be brought to safety in Britain.[41]

However, there were still large numbers of Ukrainian collaborators in American hands. The attempt to portray the Galician SS as 'freedom fighters' became international in scope. In February 1947 Reverend Kushnir's Ukrainian Canadian Committee launched another broadside at the US Secretary of State, claiming that 'to deliver these boys into the hands of the Soviets is tantamount to condemning them to death without trial. We appeal to you and your government for intervention and justice.'[42]

In May Cardinal Spellman of New York became the object of supplication. A petition, signed on behalf of 5,000 Ukrainians living in Salzburg in the US zone of Austria, was promptly delivered by the Cardinal to the National Catholic Welfare Conference, an organisation with no small political clout, which passed it on to the State Department.[43]

The petition marked a significant change in propaganda tactics by the émigré Ukrainians. For the first time, they took the offensive to claim that the Soviets were falsely accusing many Ukrainians of war crimes because they supported Bandera's anti-Communist underground, which was still engaged in a guerrilla war behind the Iron Curtain:

> By the press communicates [sic] of the agencies 'associated Press' and 'Dana-Reuter' from May 12, 1947, we were informed, that . . . USSR, Poland, and Czechoslovakia signed a treaty against the partisan group the so-called Ukrainian Insurgent Army [UPA] . . . we find almost daily more and more news in the press about the heavy battles on the borders of the mentioned countries with heavy armour, artillery, air-force and parachutists . . . All this is happening in the second anniversary of ceasing all military actions in Europe . . . the official press of the mentioned countries finds only one expression of these units; 'bandits.' We know, your Eminence, that in the lines of these so-called 'bandits' have been many priests . . . we know that the . . . bloody facts of persecution of the Greek-Catholic Church on the West Ukrainian territory, are well known to you, your Eminence. All the world knows, that our seven bishops were thrown into prisons, where they either died or are tormented in the dreadfullest conditions.[44]

By the summer of 1947, the British government had completed their first efforts to protect the Ukrainian 'freedom fighters'. The move did not escape the attention of the world press:

> 'Galician Division' in Britain . . . A dispatch from Rome comments on the statement made by Mr Hector McNeil, British Minister of State, about Hitler's so-called 'Galician Division,' 8,000 members of which have been brought to Britain from Italy. Mr McNeil claims that a Soviet Commission took part in the screening of these 8,000 men from the Western Ukraine and that no war criminals have been discovered among them.
> This statement has occasioned considerable surprise in Rome press circles, since the 'Galician Division' was notorious for its cruelty and belonged to an SS formation. No Soviet representatives took part in any check-up of these 8,000 men, as the British military authorities invariably replied with a refusal when approached by Soviet representatives on this subject. Mr McNeil's statement is clearly intended to mislead public opinion.[45]

The Foreign Office received a more gentle criticism from Felix Wirth of the Foreign Press Association in Britain, who apparently recognised that very little screening had been done in the rush to evacuate the Ukrainians:

> It would be . . . interesting to determine by careful investigation if any of these people could be classed as war criminals . . . Little is known, on the whole, of the Ukrainians' terrible role as Germany's faithful and active henchmen in the slaughter of the Jews in Lwow and other towns in that part of the world, as well as in the murder factories throughout Eastern Europe. The notorious Ukrainian SS Division 'Galizien' and other Ukrainian formations bear full responsibility for a good deal of the monstrous outrages perpetrated there.
> Whatever may be our quarrel with the Russians, surely the conscience of civilization could not permit to classify those people as innocent political refugees unless we establish that they are definitely not guilty of crimes which cry to Heaven unretributed.[46]

Had McNeil misled the British parliament? Was there no effective screening? Forty years later, in November 1988, a British All-Party Parliamentary Committee determined that the Galician SS had not received even the minimal screening required for normal immigration to Britain, let alone the rigorous scrutiny promised in 1947.[47] At that time, official assurances were given that further exhaustive screening would be undertaken and that the Ukrainians had only been brought to Britain 'to make it more difficult for persons with dubious wartime records to escape'.[48]

William Wilkinson of the Foreign Office insisted that 'it is unlikely that any war criminals will be found'.[49] Perhaps he knew that no one was really looking. In his many memoranda Wilkinson insisted that the Ukrainians had already been screened by Brigadier Maclean at Rimini.[50] Unfortunately, both Maclean and Wilkinson were relying on the prisoners' own information. The 'never in the SS' cover story was soon rebutted by the Ukrainians themselves.

By 1947 there were so many Ukrainians in Britain that they started holding conventions. In February 1948 the fourth convention of the Ukrainian Union was held at Westminster Cathedral. In addition to Cardinal Griffin, Father Josephat Jean was present as the representative of the Uniate Catholics. According to the convention reports, the 'Union anticipates a large increase of membership in the near future when the men of the SS "Galizien" who have hitherto been prisoners of war become free workmen'.[51]

This not only destroyed the cover story that they had only been part of the Wehrmacht; the Ukrainians also let the cat out of the bag about the Foreign Office plan to release the prisoners quietly and give them civilian status. The ensuing outcry in the press should have compelled an honest investigation. Instead, Wilkinson wrote a chatty note to 'Dear Garelon', the head of the Ukrainian Union and signed it 'Willie'. He chided his friend for publicising the embarrassing truth:

> I am sure that you will agree with me that it is most undesirable that public expression should be given to statements likely to give the impression that SS men are being allowed to settle down in the United Kingdom, as the question of the future disposal of these people is still under consideration. I should be grateful if this subject could be treated with discretion.[52]

Instead of keeping his mouth shut, Garelon sent Willie a memorandum containing an even more startling admission: every man had to 'sign an "application form" declaring that he "voluntarily applied to serve"' in the Galician Division.[53] This not only contradicted Maclean's pronouncement that they were draftees, but Garelon's confession also meant that they could not legally be considered refugees.[54]

Having thus disqualified his own people for Displaced Person status, Garelon argued that their voluntary service to the Reich was not important.[55] After all, it was not the first time the British had bent the rules:

> The Jugoslavs who constituted a similar unit of about 12,000 were moved to the British Zone at the same time when the Ukrainians were moved to the UK a year ago. They were all released in the British Zone as DPs. [emphasis in original][56]

It appears that 'Dear Garelon' was embarrassing the Foreign Office. Evidently, the Ukrainians knew too much about British protection of other ex-Fascists and could create an even greater public scandal. However, the Foreign Office declined Garelon's invitation to become publicly 'associated with tributes to the Ukrainian Insurrectionary Army'.[57] Surreptitiously, they accelerated plans to resettle the Ukrainian SS elsewhere.

In May 1948 Wilkinson asked the British Cabinet to repudiate the Yalta Agreement concerning forcible repatriation of Soviets, which 'would also have the merit of bringing our policy regarding Soviet nationals into line with our policy regarding Yugoslavs and others'.[58] The Cold War was heating up, and any enemy of Britain's enemy was now a friend. Laudable as it may have been to refuse to hand over people for summary execution, the British government made no attempt to deal with the nagging problem of suspected war criminals on their own territory. Even after the Soviet Ambassador supplied a list of 124 officers of the Galician SS wanted for war crimes, Wilkinson wrote 'I do not think that a full-blooded screening is called for at this time'.[59] Instead, he suggested that the Foreign Office rely on the already unsatisfactory Maclean screening.[60]

Unfortunately, the Home Office was not so easily deceived. They had checked with US intelligence in Germany. The Americans had already arrested one man when they discovered his SS tattoo. Worse, American censors provided copies of his correspondence with his Galician SS comrades in Britain.[61] The Home Office was not amused:

> It would obviously be embarrassing to them if they civilianised these 124 officers and afterwards discovered that they were either war criminals in the most serious sense or had unpleasant SS records.[62]

To the Foreign Office's dismay, the Home Office was 'proposing to return all these men willy-nilly to Germany'.[63] That suggestion was promptly postponed, pending discussions with the Canadian government to absorb them as immigrants,[64] despite the British Home Office's suspicion that 'some of these men really might be war criminals'.[65] Apparently, it was one thing to dump SS men on Canada, quite another to give them British citizenship.

Only a privileged few in the Foreign Office realised that the Galician SS was already on the British side. A good part of the Ukrainian Nazi puppet government had already been recruited by the Secret Intelligence Service.[66] It was not such an outrageous idea. The leader of the Ukrainian nationalists, Stepan Bandera, had worked for the SIS before the war. In 1945, after the Nazis were defeated, the prodigal Bandera was taken back into the fold.

He was not alone. Less than a year afterwards, General Pavel Shandruk, the last commander of the Galician SS, was listed as one of the top leaders of Prometheus, a pre-war British operation which had been taken over by the Nazis and then resurrected by SIS.[67] The British wanted more than just a Ukrainian resistance force; they wanted to merge all the 'freedom fighters' into a massive Anti-Bolshevik Bloc of Nations. At first, the ABN was simply a merger of the friendly Fascists of OUN and their northern neighbours, the Byelorussian (White Russian) Nazis.[68]

They were a motley crew. Jaroslav Stetsko became the President, Mikolai Abramtchik was Vice President and Stanislav Stankievich was Secretary.[69] Stetsko had pledged his undying loyalty to the Führer in the middle of the OUN massacre of Jews at Lvov.[70] Abramtchik had been the Nazi Minister of Intelligence in the puppet government of Byelorussia.[71] Stankievich was the kind of war criminal who made Stetsko look good; a description of his heinous atrocities had been read into the Congressional Record of the United States.[72]

Shortly afterwards, his name resurfaced when the Soviet Delegate rose in the UN and accused America of hiding Stankievich, Bandera and other 'quislings and traitors' in the Allied zones of West Germany.[73] The State Department denied the charges, but the US Army Counter Intelligence Corps began their own investigation in Germany. Stankievich was arrested, but quickly released after he told the Americans what was going on. British intelligence had cleverly located ABN headquarters in the American zone, along with Bandera and other top Nazis denounced in the UN.

The CIC was furious at the British scheme. SIS had previously offered Bandera's services to the Americans, but the offer was refused.[74] It was one thing to help the British in secrecy, another to be publicly blamed for their recruitment of notorious war criminals. Instead of keeping their Nazi agents in their own zone, they had cynically dumped them in Munich, setting up the Americans as scapegoats in case of adverse publicity. In self-defence, and as a prelude to exposing the truth, the Americans downgraded the Bandera case from Top Secret to Confidential.[75]

The War Department asked the State Department for permission to issue a press release saying that the American Army was not protecting war criminals and would make every effort to arrest Bandera, if he was found in their zone of Germany.[76] The proposal was quickly squelched by Jack D. Neal, Chief of the State Department's Division of Foreign Activity Correlation, which handled intelligence liaison with the British. Neal thought it 'inadvisable to issue any press release on the subject', since it 'implied a willingness to arrest' Bandera if they ever found him.[77] Later, another State Department spy chief admitted the real reason why the British protection of Ukrainian Nazis was swept under the rug. The Americans had been trying to cut their own deal behind Britain's back. Since 1946 the Ukrainian Nazi leadership had been > chronically unable to cooperate wholeheartedly with American intelligence representatives in Germany, primarily because the price set by Stephan Bandera for complete cooperation involved types of political recognition and commitments to his group which no American in Germany was in a position to make . . . It first came to the attention of the American authorities when the Russians demanded the extradition of Bandera and many other anti-Soviet Ukrainian nationalists as war criminals. Luckily the attempt to locate these anti-Soviet Ukrainians was sabotaged by a few far-sighted Americans who warned the persons concerned to go into hiding.[78]

The report concluded that, although the Ukrainians were not working for the Americans, 'alienating such a group could . . . have no particular advantage to the United States'. Consequently, the State Department admitted that 'no serious attempt has ever been made by American officials in Germany to disband [them]'.[79] The Americans quietly released their Galician SS prisoners and watched them happily track across the border to the British zone or quietly merge into the refugee population in their own zone. Across Germany the Ukrainian SS began drawing rations as 'victims of Nazi oppression'.[80]

The UN accusations were quickly forgotten. But Simon Wiesenthal could not forget the man who organised the Galician Nazis, SS Brigadeführer Dr Otto Gustav Wächter:

> I saw him early in 1942, in Lwow ghetto. He was personally in charge on August 15, 1942, when four thousand elderly people in the ghetto were rounded up and sent to the railway station. My mother was among them.[81]

Apparently Wiesenthal was ignorant of the connection between the Vatican and British intelligence; he thought that

> Wächter escaped after the war with the help of ODESSA and was given refuge in a religious college in Rome by Slovak priests who didn't know his identity . . . In 1949, Wächter became very sick and wasn't expected to live long. He told the people in Rome who he was . . . and asked to see a priest. He was given the sacraments by Bishop Hudal.[82]

In an interview, Wiesenthal recounted the rest of the story. The West German prosecutors called Hudal as a witness in a criminal case involving the Galician SS. Under oath, Hudal confessed that Wächter was the same man who had been living in the Vatican disguised as 'Father Otto Reinhardt'. Hudal was obviously embarrassed, but said that he did not make the Holy See's policy.[83]

However, Wiesenthal wrote in his memoirs that 'an Austrian aristocrat who occasionally helped me asked Bishop Hudal to release Wächter's files. The Bishop refused.'[84] The archives of the Galician SS are presumably still in Vatican custody. What Wiesenthal never knew was that the Ukrainians had much more powerful protectors than Bishop Hudal. The Pope himself had a hand in the sanctuary negotiations for the Ukrainian SS. Just as the war was ending

> General Pavlo Shandruk, the leader of a Ukrainian liberation committee that had been founded under Nazi auspices, contacted Archbishop Ivan Buchko, a high ranking prelate in Rome specializing in Ukrainian matters for the Holy See . . . Shandruk hoped that Archbishop Buchko might reach the Pope himself with the general's plea for mercy on behalf of his men.
> 'Archbishop Ivan [Buchko] answered my letter very soon informing me that he had already visited the Division,' Shandruk recalled later. 'In a special audience (at night) the Archbishop had pleaded with His Holiness Pope Pius XII to intercede . . . as a result of the intercession by His Holiness, the soldiers of the Division were reclassified merely as confinees and Bolshevik agents were prohibited to visit . . . By the Spring of 1946 Shandruk, backed by Archbishop Buchko and the Ukrainian Relief Committee of Great Britain, had arranged with the British government to extend 'free settler' emigration status to the Ukrainian Waffen SS veterans at Rimini and to assist them in resettling in Canada, Australia, and other Commonwealth Countries.[85]

It would be misleading to state that the Pope was to blame for pressuring the British government. The truth is that Britain had its own agents of influence inside the Vatican, pressuring Pius XII to support its programme for the Ukrainians. In a declassified document, American intelligence listed the prominent leaders of Intermarium. As previously recounted, the Ukrainian delegate was none other than Bishop Bučko. The saviour of the Galician SS was an agent of the British SIS.[86]

Nor was Bučko the only prelate to serve two masters. Intermarium was replete with priests, monks and brothers from a wide range of orders including the Jesuits, Benedictines and Franciscans. They ran the printing press for false identity cards, coordinated the network of convents and monasteries that served as safe houses, laundered money and, perhaps most importantly, organised a very effective propaganda campaign that worked hand in glove with British interests. From the Križari to the OUN, from the Baltic to the Black Sea, Catholic clerics like Draganović and Bučko administered an espionage network that was vital to British intelligence. It was also something of a problem for British diplomacy.

The Foreign Office had more than a few embarrassing moments protecting the vital Vatican connection from exposure. On the one hand, His Majesty's Government had made very noble (later very inconvenient) public pronouncements concerning Britain's obligations to hunt for Nazi war criminals. On the other hand, the Vatican had the largest intelligence service in Eastern Europe, which could substantially assist the creation of a British sphere of influence, or at least revive ties to scores of nationalist organisations which fled to the Vatican after the Nazis' defeat. Noble ideals soon gave way to recruiting Eastern European Nazis.

The Ukrainian Nazis were the last large group to be smuggled directly through British territory. With the help of Bishop Bučko, Shandruk made arrangements to evacuate the Galician SS to Canada and Australia. Shandruk repaid the British by taking over the leadership of Prometheus. The group had been renamed 'the Prometheus League of the Atlantic Charter' to give it a more democratic flair. But it was still the same front group, run by SIS chief Sir Stewart Menzies, which had defected to the SS before returning to the British. By 1946, the Prometheus propaganda arm was almost fully geared up to battle the Communists.[87]

It was, however, a bit risky for Britain to undertake any more large-scale Nazi-smuggling, at least directly. Not only was Parliament concerned about the true nature of the Galician SS, but US intelligence was starting to realise that Prometheus was a thinly disguised British attempt to rearm Ukrainian Nazis under the cover of General Anders's Polish Army in Italy.[88]

Besides, the cover was a bit overworked. Anders's forces had taken in the fugitive Byelorussian SS Division Belarus as well as the Ukrainians and things were becoming crowded in their camps. The Vatican had been generous, but there was insufficient room in their convents and monasteries for all the new recruits. With the imminent withdrawal of the Allies from Italy, something had to be done with the remaining Nazis before R Day, 1947, when the Italians might have to extradite them as war criminals.

The reality of R Day, when the Italians resumed control of their own territory, had certainly stiffened the resolve of several faint-hearted British diplomats. Even Pavelić's Ustashi felt the benefit of the Ukrainian backwash. As late as May 1947 the Foreign Office was still reprimanding the Vatican about protecting the Ustashi:

> I should be glad if you would point out to the [Vatican] Secretariat of State that those persons who actively worked for the Pavelić Ustashi Government were giving their support and approval to a regime which flouted humanitarian principles, and which condoned atrocities unsurpassed in any period of human history.[89]

By November the Foreign Office had turned completely around. Instead of criticising the Vatican, they discreetly asked them to help smuggle the Ustashi out of Italy:

> His Majesty's Government have asked the Vatican to assist in getting the Greys to South America, although they are certainly wanted by the Yugoslav government.[90]

Despite the code word, there is no doubt that the fugitives were wanted Nazis. 'Grey' was a term used by the Western Allies to denote known Nazi collaborators. The term 'Black' indicated that they were war criminals, whose extradition had been requested. 'Whites' were victims of Nazi oppression – Jews, former slave labourers, inmates of concentration camps etc. 'Whites' need not be smuggled: the International Refugee Organisation provided them with papers and funds for legal resettlement. Only 'Blacks' and 'Greys' needed Vatican help to get out of the country. For them, immigration was illegal.

In order to help the Vatican, the British changed all the rules so that some 4,000 'Blacks' were redesignated as 'Greys', much to the fury of Brigadier Maclean, who had served in Yugoslavia during the war. As much as he liked the Ukrainians, he had a fanatical hatred for the Croatian Ustashi. Maclean was very thorough in screening Yugoslav Nazis. He had no need to rely on phony histories supplied by the prisoners. He knew – first-hand – what Pavelić's followers had done.

As head of the Screening Mission, Maclean's stubbornness could wreck the scheme for getting the Nazis out of Italy. Worse, he was beginning to realise that his own British superiors were leaking his top secret screening reports to Father Draganović, who tipped off the Ustashi before they could be arrested. The good Brigadier was beginning to suspect too much. The solution was simple: circumvent Maclean with a higher authority. There were always a few friendly Americans willing to lend a hand.

In June 1947 the US and British Governments issued the top secret document known as FAN 757. They agreed that all Nazi screening would henceforth be done by a Joint Review Committee. After all Italy was an Allied problem, and who could object to Americans participating in screening? It sounded so innocent.

The reality, as shown by State Department cables, was a cynical charade to disguise the Vatican's smuggling of the so-called 'Grey' Nazis to Argentina before they could be screened. By mid-1947, those Americans involved were sending their top secret messages back and forth through military channels to avoid detection of the British–Vatican deal. On 7 June 1947 the US Political Adviser in Leghorn, Italy, informed the State Department that:

> I have discussed FAN 757 . . . with my British colleague . . .
> Understand that . . . screeners will notify Vatican names and particulars of unacceptables as they appear. It seems possible that this arrangement may result in out shipment to Argentina of many individuals [who may screen Black or Grey]. To avoid possible misunderstanding and confusion I believe it should be clearly stated whether unacceptables must all be screened . . . or only those Argentines refuse [to] accept . . . Latter alternative would greatly reduce work . . . and would solve before it began problem . . . of how to dispose of Greys.[91]

This 'work saving' suggestion exposed the reality of the Allied solution for Nazi emigration: those too notorious to be categorised as legal emigrants (Whites) would be dumped on the Vatican. But the US State Department, however much they wanted to help the British, would not stomach sending category 'Black' war criminals through the Vatican Ratline:

> Such action should be confined to Whites and Greys only and Greys preferably before they have been formally labelled as such in order [to] facilitate their departure.[92]

The complete FAN 757 correspondence (half located in London, the rest in Washington) discloses the diplomatic complicity behind the Vatican Ratlines. The screening was a complete farce. The Nazis were deliberately rushed to the Vatican before they could 'be formally labelled as such'. Although the Vatican was sometimes ignorant of the passengers' true backgrounds as war criminals, the files show that Holy See officials were conspiring to help the West smuggle known Nazi collaborators.

From Rome, the last Nazis began the long journey to freedom.

They were gone from Italy by R Day. An extremely embarrassing situation had been averted. The pool of anti-Communist 'freedom fighters' had been increased. The diplomats of London, Washington and the Vatican had done their jobs too well. They were all to blame for the coming disasters of the Cold War.

By R Day, British intelligence was well under way with the merger of all the ex-Nazi front groups. Intermarium, Prometheus, the Abramtchik Faction, and Bandera's OUN were formed into the SIS-sponsored Anti-Bolshevik Bloc of Nations.[93] Their members spread around the world and settled in friendly Western nations. The West would never really know for sure which were legitimate Nazis and which were double agents. By 1947, a few Communists had already popped up in Intermarium, as the Americans found out from Ferenc Vajta, William Gowen's Hungarian Nazi contact.[94] The Vatican did not know it, but there were a lot more double agents. The real master of the Ratlines was the Kremlin. While the Soviet GRU was working with Turkul, the KGB had been busy as well.

The Philby Connection

One of the first Soviet agents to penetrate British intelligence was a Catholic priest. Between 1932 and 1937 the top NKVD 'illegal' in England was Father Theodore Maly. He was indeed a brilliant agent. It was Father Maly who recruited Anthony Blunt and the rest of the Cambridge ring:

> One of the most remarkable non-Russian Comintern agents who ever served as undercover Soviet Intelligence officers, Maly was a newly ordained Hungarian Priest, who became a regimental chaplain with the Austro-Hungarian army when World War I broke out. Captured by the Tsar's army on the Carpathian front, he was horrified by the starvation and disease in the prisoner of war camps.
> 'I lost my faith in God, and when the revolution broke out, I joined the Bolsheviks,' Maly once told a friend, explaining how service with the Cheka and Red Army during the brutal civil war against the Whites had hardened him.[1]

When Father Maly came to London in 1932, the Kremlin was already aware of tentative British–German negotiations for an alliance against Communism. Two cipher clerks in the British Foreign Office had been on the Soviet payroll since 1929, reporting to Father Maly.[2] The leaked cables told Moscow that there was indeed high level support for an Anglo-German initiative against Stalin. It is not surprising that penetration of Fascist circles in Britain became a high priority for the Kremlin.

Many of Father Maly's best recruits were young men from upper class backgrounds who pretended to hold Fascist sympathies to hide their true Communist loyalties. The most famous KGB agent was Harold Adrian Russell Philby. As with all of Father Maly's agents, 'Kim' Philby's upper class British background was impeccable. His father had been briefly imprisoned as an ardent Nazi supporter. Kim pretended to share his father's sympathies. He joined pro-German organisations and was awarded a Fascist decoration by Franco for his services as a war correspondent in Spain. Many of his fellow agents had similar Fascist credentials which, judging by the rate at which they were hired, was certainly no impediment to a career with British intelligence.

But British Fascism was not the only secret to Soviet success in espionage, nor was the KGB their only agency active in Britain. Long before Father Maly arrived in London, the GRU had planted members of Turkul's network in London:

> One was the ubiquitous Anatoli Baykolov. This supposedly White Russian journalist was an associate of Sabline, the Tsarist chargé d'affaires who had gone over to the Soviets in the twenties.[3]

Both Communist agents in London had a mutual friend, Guy Liddell, an enterprising young officer working in Special Branch, the police unit responsible for domestic security. No one knows how or why Liddell was recruited by Turkul's GRU network but there are several theories:

> While it is impossible to do anything more than speculate on what personal frustrations and subtle external political forces might have led Guy Liddell to cast his lot in with the Soviets, certain obvious possibilities such as his artistic temperament, his long-term connections with Baykolov and the penetrated Russian émigré community in London – as well as the scars of his marriage – can be considered factors . . . Then, too, other sources told me about Liddell's premarital love affair in the early twenties with a London University student (believed to still be alive), whose Marxism and links to the Communist party were well known to her contemporaries. This lead has so far proved impossible to corroborate, but if true, it could explain how one of the ranking officers in Special Branch might have become an early victim of a Soviet 'honeytrap'.[4]

There is some circumstantial evidence to place the date of Liddell's recruitment to the 1920s. At that time, every Soviet Embassy was assigned a 'Soviet Kolonii' (SK) Officer to monitor the loyalty of the local 'Soviet Colony'. The principal function of the SK Officer was to ensure that no Soviet Diplomat defected. The Embassy in London never had an SK officer. There may be a simple explanation: Guy Liddell was performing that function for them. He was in charge of anti-Soviet operations for Special Branch. Any information on potential Soviet defectors was passed to him. In 1931 Liddell joined MI5 and became head of the entire anti-Soviet section.[5]

As the British author John Costello notes, the Liddell–Baykolov connection could explain why MI5 failed on nearly two dozen occasions to take effective action against Soviet operations.[6] Certainly by 1933, there was ample warning that Baykolov was a Communist:

> In 1933 a Ukrainian named Korostorets warned émigré leaders in Paris that Baykolov was really working for the Soviets and a warning to that effect appeared in the October 22 edition of Zovrozhdenie. His activities interviewing recent Russian escapees, supposedly for a study of the Soviet judicial system, appear to have been tied up with his mission for the OGPU [Soviet Intelligence Service]. He was an associate of Sabline, the former Tsarist chargé d'affaires in London, who was later found to have been an undercover OGPU agent monitoring the White Russian exiles in Britain. He had links to Skoblin, the OGPU operative in Paris, who was involved in the 1932 kidnapping of General Miller, the Paris-based chairman of the Russian Military Union [ROWS] ... Baykolov was a longtime MI5 and Foreign Office source of Soviet intelligence; his contact was Guy Liddell.[7]

Baykolov was regarded as totally trustworthy because he and his GRU accomplice in the German Embassy, Putlitz, had helped protect one of the most embarrassing secrets of the British government:

> Moscow did not hesitate to activate the Baykolov back channel when it believed Moscow's interests could be served.
> This appears to have been the case on January 30, 1936, the day King George V died. There was a widespread concern about the pro-German sympathies of the new King, Edward VIII ... It was feared that Edward's coronation would accelerate a rapprochement between London and Berlin. There is evidence that the Soviets activated the Baykolov connection to pass word of this danger ... The Soviets were getting their information from inside the German embassy via their mole Putlitz.[8]

The information was astounding: Wallis Simpson was a Nazi agent. Simpson was also Edward's mistress. Through her royal lover, she was in a position to pass on Cabinet minutes and top secret information. If Putlitz and Baykolov were correct, there was a Nazi spy in the King's bedroom. Liddell had MI5 place a wiretap on the telephone lines of the Ambassador's residence in London to see if Simpson was working for the Germans. The wiretap was a major shock to the British government. As we shall see, Mrs Simpson was the least of their problems.

Transcripts of the British wiretaps have never been publicly released. However, in the US National Archives we discovered a top secret American interrogation file of Joachim von Ribbentrop, who was Hitler's Ambassador to London before becoming German Foreign Minister. It was Ribbentrop's phone that was tapped. Shortly before he was hanged at Nuremberg, Ribbentrop confirmed that he almost concluded an alliance in the 1930s with the help of two British leaders who were secret Nazi sympathisers. One was a former Prime Minister, the other was the future King:

> It was perhaps hard to believe in the light of events, that the Führer's fondest dream had been of an Anglo-German alliance in the service of which he had been prepared to maintain a force of twelve divisions for the defence of any part of the British Empire. Such were the Führer's sentiments that he was the more deeply hurt when Britain seemed to mistrust his motives and to obstruct his plans . . . but his efforts to win sympathy among distinguished people, including Mr Ramsay MacDonald and King Edward VIII for National Socialist conceptions had not been altogether unsuccessful.[9]

The recently disclosed papers of the Duke of Coburg confirm Ribbentrop's confession. Soon after his father's death, Edward Windsor, the Prince of Wales, had told the Nazis that an alliance between Germany and Britain was an 'urgent necessity'. Based on assurances from Windsor that he would prevent British intervention, Hitler seized the Rhineland from the French. Edward had promised Hitler that Britain would never interfere with his plans 're Jews or re anything else'.[10]

The Foreign Office was alarmed over the King's 'increasing and disturbing intervention in foreign affairs'. A search was under way for 'ways and means of compelling him to abdicate'. The King's mistress, the pro-Nazi American Wallis Simpson, was used as the excuse.[11] No mention was made of the Nazi wiretaps. For many years the public has believed that Windsor abdicated the throne to marry the woman he loved.[12]

There is ample evidence that Windsor was merely a pompous dilettante who was used as a pawn by Mrs Simpson. But FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover was convinced that Windsor was himself a dangerous Nazi agent. He wanted the former King imprisoned, not just interned in the Bahamas.[13] The British thought the suggestion absurd, but made every effort to monitor the former King to determine whether in fact

> Edward was in correspondence on political matters with Hitler . . . Menzies made extraordinary efforts to intercept the letters but was largely unsuccessful, and it was not until immediately after World War II that they > were found. Then they gave the Churchill government and its successor a severe shock when evidence was received that laid open Edward to charges of having committed treason.[14]

There is direct evidence from another source that after he abdicated, Windsor betrayed his country while it was at war with the Nazis:

> By 1940 . . . Windsor had become a member of the British Military Mission with the French Army Command . . . according to German Foreign Office Records, Windsor actually disclosed to [a Nazi] emissary the details of a secret meeting of the Allied War Council. Windsor revealed that the Council had discussed in detail the situation that would arise if Germany invaded Belgium . . . The entire message was of such importance to the German government that it was shown to Hitler in person.[15]

British intelligence realised that the Windsor secret was a bombshell. If Edward were put on trial, then a small but significant part of the British Establishment would have to be put in the dock with him. In the 1930s Fascism (or corporatism as it was called in polite circles) was a popular philosophy among more right-wing members of the British upper class. Some were in the pro-Fascist Cliveden set; others were prominent businessmen connected to Windsor's schemes, including Lord McGowan of Imperial Chemicals Industries and Montagu Norman of the Bank of England, who were laundering money to Hitler through Swiss banks in the mistaken belief that a Nazi victory was inevitable.[16] Lord Rothermere of the London Daily Mail 'gave a total of $5 million in cash to assist in Hitler's rise to power'.[17]

After Hitler started to lose the war, Windsor's contacts tried to hide their Nazi connections in Canaris's Black Orchestra. In fact, Lord Halifax and others in Windsor's group had been trying to negotiate peace with Hitler behind Churchill's back.[18] When the extent of Windsor's treason was confirmed by MI5, Churchill and Robert Vansittart, who handled sensitive matters for the Foreign Office, scrambled frantically to hide the scandal.

The Soviets, who had already penetrated the real Black Orchestra through Turkul, decided to help protect the secret, if for no other reason than insurance in case their agents were ever discovered. A wise precaution as it happened, since the Windsor scandal was later used to blackmail the British to protect Turkul and other double agents.[19]

The British did not realise until the 1960s that the original guardians of the Royal secret were all connected to Turkul. It was later discovered that Baykolov, who passed on the original tip about Mrs Simpson, had worked for Turkul in Paris. It is no coincidence that Baykolov's MI5 contact, Guy Liddell (who later vouched for Turkul's bona fides to the OSS), used another Turkul contact from Paris, Dickie Ellis, to translate the Ribbentrop wiretaps.[20]

The more they kept silent about upper class Fascists, the safer the Communist moles became. Respected by the British establishment as the trusted guardians of Royalty's greatest scandal, the GRU agents were quickly promoted. Baykolov became an adviser to Churchill and Vansittart on Soviet affairs. Liddell became head of MI5's counter-espionage section. His associate, Roger Hollis (also a suspected GRU agent), took over the MI5 section monitoring Fascists in Britain.[21]

By the end of World War II, Windsor's 'protectors' occupied so many key positions in MI5 that the GRU had to borrow KGB agents to help monitor Britain's Fascist minority.[22] Although the KGB did not know who was helping them, Father Maly's 'Apostles' discovered that not only could they pass security clearances for sensitive government posts, but they even became the guardians of the Windsor scandal:

> It was extremely odd that the head of counter espionage in England at that time, Guy Liddell – who preferred homosexual company though it was claimed that he himself was not a homosexual – paid little if any attention to the politics of the Apostles.[23]

Liddell not only ignored them, he hired them. The notoriously homosexual Guy Burgess took over from Baykolov as Putlitz's MI5 handler from whom he learned a great deal, 'especially concerning the Duke and Duchess of Windsor's association with Ribbentrop'.[24] Liddell subsequently helped Burgess to leave MI5 and join SIS.[25] Burgess's one-time lover and fellow Apostle, Anthony Blunt, was recruited by MI5 to retrieve copies of the embarrassing Windsor correspondence with the Nazis. Blunt then received an appointment at the Palace from the grateful Royal Family.[26]

Kim Philby, who may have met Mrs Simpson at German Embassy parties given by the Anglo-German Friendship Society, was a most unlikely candidate for Soviet espionage. At Cambridge, Philby was identified as a Marxist and a homosexual. Before the

GRU intervened, he could not find three referees to sponsor him for a minor Foreign Office post. Yet suddenly he found that there was 'nothing recorded against' him when he applied for the British Secret Service.[27]

There is no direct evidence that Philby's early SIS duties brought him into direct contact with the Vatican, although he was well positioned to observe them. As head of the Spanish desk (later expanded to include Italy) he may have been privy to the Black Orchestra's British–Vatican negotiations. Before the war was over, Philby was no longer a peripheral observer, but a principal player with the Vatican. In 1944 he was promoted to head the new anti-Soviet section of SIS.

Behind his unassuming stutter and false Nazi sympathies, Philby was working for the Soviets when he headed Britain's anti-Soviet programme.[28] The new position provided ample opportunity for sabotage. On 13 November 1944, shortly after Philby's promotion, 'a German officer named Karl Marcus, alias Carlsen, arrived in France . . . "he had been sent to get in touch with the British, particularly Lord Vansittart, and that he would disclose his mission only to a British Officer" . . . Marcus described himself as the secretary to and emissary of Kurt Jahnke.'[29]

Marcus's message was simple: Jahnke wanted to re-open the Black Orchestra peace negotiations through the Vatican. After Canaris's arrest for the 20 July plot, Jahnke had become the leader of the German opposition. According to Marcus, Jahnke had found a new recruit: SS intelligence leader Walter Schellenberg, who had helped save Turkul and Klatt from the Gestapo. Instead of smashing the Vatican's Black Orchestra, Schellenberg had joined up to save his neck. Once again the Vatican was sending peace messages from the Germans.[30] All of the Ultra intercepts of Nazi–Vatican negotiations for this period remain highly classified.

Stalin was kept apprised of the Anglo-German negotiations 'by an agent somewhere in the Allied high command – his informant may well have been Philby making his first appearance as a Soviet spy on the grand scale'.[31] On 3 April 1945 Stalin sent the British 'his ugliest message of the war', accusing them of making a deal with the Nazis behind his back:

> . . . do not have doubts that the negotiations have taken place and that they have ended in an agreement . . . As a result of this at the present > moment the Germans on the western front in fact have ceased the war against England . . . and continue the war with Russia.[32]

The battle statistics for the following week suggest that Stalin was prophetic. There were more than 40,000 German casualties on the Eastern front versus 2,500 in the West. Even more suspicious, over a quarter of a million German soldiers were suddenly reported 'missing' in the West.[33]

Stalin suspected that the British would use the 'missing' Nazis against him. Churchill later admitted that he had given orders 'to Lord Montgomery directing him to be careful in collecting the German arms, to stack them so that they could easily be issued again to the German soldiers'. Montgomery agreed that he had obeyed the order. It was true that 'England had prepared for war with Russia using the defeated German army as an ally even before the war was over'.[34]

If Philby helped Stalin expose the Black Orchestra deal, it was not his only coup that year. In September he became the first KGB officer to learn that they had a secret benefactor. A GRU defector in Canada named Gouzenko told the British that there was a GRU spy code named ELLI inside 'five of MI'. Soon after, another Soviet defector, Volkov, gave an even more explicit identification: 'I know, for instance, that one of these agents is fulfilling the duties of a head of section of the British Counterintelligence Directorate.'[35] On 18 and 19 September Philby cabled this news to KGB headquarters in Moscow under his code name 'Stanley'.[36]

At first Moscow refused to believe Philby's cable. No one in KGB headquarters had ever heard of 'ELLI' nor did they know of such a high level agent. Moscow's 1945 reply to Philby was decoded many years later by Peter Wright of British intelligence:

> It read: 'Consent has been obtained from the Chiefs to consult with the neighbors about Stanley's material about their affairs in Canada. Stanley's data is correct.'
> . . . Philby by the time this message was sent, had been a top-class KGB agent and head of Counterespionage in MI6 for the best part of ten years, yet it appeared as if they doubted his intelligence. Why did it need checking? What was it about Stanley's data that had thrown the KGB into such confusion?
> Only one explanation could account for all these oddities. The KGB must have been ignorant of the spy in 'five of MI' controlled by the GRU. Thus, when Philby relayed to them the news of this spy, and the threat made to him by Gouzenko, the KGB had to obtain permission from the 'Chiefs', the > Politburo to consult with the 'neighbors', the GRU to ask if they did indeed have such an asset in London. Having received assurances from the GRU that they did have such a spy, the KGB realized that the heat was likely to come on in London, so they sent back the message confirming Stanley's data, and followed it up with urgent orders to increase security.[37]

Whether ELLI was Hollis (head of Section F) or Liddell (head of Section B) is still hotly debated. But there is no doubt that after September 1945, Lavrenty Beria, head of the KGB, was told the Politbureau's greatest secret: through the Turkul network, the GRU had slowly but thoroughly taken over MI5 while the KGB was struggling to place a few agents inside MI6.[38] From that day, Beria insisted that all top Soviet agents be co-ordinated to help each other. From 1945 until the mid-1950s, Soviet intelligence ran the most effective spy operation in history: no one else before or since has ever come close.

While American and British intelligence were hopelessly divided and restructured after World War II, Soviet intelligence executed a plan of smooth integration to protect and promote all their agents in the West. For example, when MI6 discovered German documents proving that Turkul's friend Ellis was a Nazi agent, Philby ordered that the investigation be closed. No top KGB agent would have risked the inevitable exposure, except under orders from Moscow. If Ellis had been exposed in 1945, it would have jeopardised Turkul, who was far more valuable than Philby. Because of Philby's cover-up, Turkul and Ellis were safe for several more years.

Apart from being a suspected GRU agent, Ellis later confessed that he was a Nazi double agent during the war. Despite his admitted treason, Ellis was not tried because of what he knew: after all, if he were a Nazi so was Edward VIII. Rather, Ellis was recruited by SIS's Colin Gubbins to purge British intelligence files, presumably of any other embarrassing evidence. As we shall see, there was quite a bit to be put into the shredder. Ellis claimed that it was Menzies who ordered him to keep up Turkul's Nazi contacts in the first place.[39]

Returning to London in 1945, Philby must have been pleased with himself. It had been a very good year. In Stockholm he had personally trained yet another Baltic agent to use British intelligence codes.[40] Another anti-Communist 'freedom fighter' was already on his way across the Black Sea. Philby passed the new agent's codes and identity to the Soviets in order to prepare a proper reception. Upon his arrival, he was placed under discreet surveillance, and not disturbed until he had recruited all the local anti-Communist dissidents. As soon as Philby's Judas goat had unwittingly identified all his contacts, the entire network was arrested.

More than forty years later, when the Latvian Nazi agent, Robert Osis, was released from the Gulag, he identified Philby as the man who recruited him and then betrayed his entire network to the Communists.[41] But there was an even darker side to Philby's Nazi recruiting. He was helping the KGB take over the Vatican's networks.

Even before World War II, Soviet intelligence had planted Communist double agents among each of the Eastern European Fascist groups. Having riddled the Fascist opposition with informers, after the war the Soviets were only too glad to help the Vatican smuggle the Nazis to every Western nation gullible enough to take them in.[42] As one British intelligence officer later lamented, there was no better disguise than posing as a fugitive war criminal. 'It was the perfect cover.'[43] Soon after La Vista's report, the Americans warned the Vatican that Communist agents were using the Ratlines, but no one believed such reports. The Vatican never knew what hit them.

By the time he left London in 1946, Philby had merged the hopelessly riddled Nazi networks like Intermarium and Prometheus into the Anti-Bolshevik Bloc of Nations. The Vatican was unaware that the Soviets, not the British, controlled ABN from its inception and had bent the Ratlines into a complete circle.[44] The KGB must have been amused that the Vatican was smuggling Soviet agents to Western countries.

In 1946 Philby was sent to Turkey where, as chief of station for anti-Soviet operations, he would have a bird's-eye view of British, Vatican and American operations in the Balkans and Central Europe.[45] More importantly, Philby launched his own Vatican operation. Shortly before he left London, arrangements were made to surface another of Intermarium's fugitive Nazis. Ferdinand Durčansky had been the Foreign Minister of the Slovak Nazi puppet government, and was tried in absentia as a war criminal by the democratic government of Czechoslovakia. After disappearing at the end of the war, he resurfaced in Rome. According to the Czech trial records:

> Dr Ferdinand Durčansky was in Rome in October 1946, and in a certain coffee house met the English woman . . . This English woman disclosed that there is some club of Central European Nations the aim of which is to restore those states which existed under German rule in Central Europe. Croat Ustashi, Poles of the Anders brand, Hungarians, Serb Chetniks are members of this club, together with the accused Dr Durčansky, whose main aim is to restore the totalitarian Slovak Republic.
> Durčansky had also a conversation with Anders on this subject, who had allegedly given his consent to this plan . . . Durčansky has interesting information concerning present conditions in Slovakia. He asserts that only approximately 10% are Communists, and that all of those are Lutherans. According to him the Catholics and their priests, and 80% of the Bishops would be in favor of a restoration of Slovak State independence. Even the Vatican allegedly sympathizes with his plans. Asked by the English woman from where his money would come, Durčansky said that he had many friends in the world.[46]

On 6 June 1947 the New York Times reported that Durčansky was in Italy 'where he broadcasts daily to Slovakia and is in constant contact with the underground'.[47] On 24 June the Czechoslovak government announced that leaflets were being distributed claiming that a new government would soon seize power in Slovakia with Durčansky as premier.[48] Most of the world dismissed this as émigré hyperbole. After all, Durčansky was listed by the UN as a Category A war criminal. Who would possibly support an ex-Nazi to overthrow the only non-Communist government in Eastern Europe?

According to his CIA file, Durčansky proceeded with his plot. Further inquiries disclosed his source of funding:

> Durčansky in no way denies that the Slovak populist emigration is supported by the Vatican, and that a part of the financial means is received by them from some church dignitaries, especially in Belgium and Argentina.[49]

Since the CIA also described Durčansky as one of Intermarium's leaders, it is likely that the Vatican was again laundering British intelligence money to Durčansky's Slovak Liberation Movement. Before Durčansky's plot, the Communists were a significant minority but lacked important posts in the government; his plot changed all of that.

In September 1947 a commission headed by General Ferjenčik announced that they had uncovered a 'massive conspiracy' to overthrow the government. The Durčansky ring had been thoroughly infiltrated, and numerous documents were produced linking scores of Slovak politicians to Durčansky's ring. The minority Communists demanded that parliament be purged. They then gained several key ministries and soon spread the anti-Fascist purge into every corner of the government. Within a few months, they seized control of the entire country from the fragmented Democratic opposition. The Communist counter coup occurred so quickly that the British Consul wondered if Durčansky had staged the whole thing:

> [Durčansky's] subversive organisation . . . appears undoubtedly to exist, though it does have a curious aspect. The evidence collected is so complete and well-documented that it is difficult to believe in the genuineness of the movement, and Dr Frastachy believes that the participants were inveigled into it by Agents Provocateurs . . . The whole thing, I was told, smacked of elaborate stage management: but it seems to have been effective, whether or not that was its purpose, in giving a handle to the instigation of the purge.[50]

At the time, no one realised Durčansky's connection to Intermarium and Philby. Under Philby's direction, Intermarium had not overthrown a single Communist regime, but it had destroyed a freely elected government. After the débâcle, a cover story went out to move suspicion from British intelligence:

> The Czechoslovak Telegraph Agency quotes the Slovak Commissioner of Interior as stating that Durčansky had escaped from a prison in Rome, disguised as a nun. He is reported trying to get in touch with French Foreign Minister Bidault, whom he has known since the days when they were students together.[51]

It was a plausible story because Durčansky had worked for French intelligence before Britain took over Intermarium. In fact, Durčansky had not fled to France but had gone down the Vatican Ratline to Argentina. As head of the Balkan section of SIS, Philby probably got credit for shielding his superiors from blame for the Czech disaster. Both he and Durčansky were subsequently promoted, Philby becoming the SIS liaison to CIA, while Durčansky became Intermarium President.[52]

With Philby running field operations in Central Europe from 1947 to 1949, it was hardly surprising that the Czech government was overthrown, the Križari smashed in Yugoslavia, the Romanian infiltration suppressed, and the abortive Albanian invasion betrayed. Every British initiative was leaked to the Communists well in advance. In 1948 the British reluctantly concluded that they lacked sufficient finances to combat the Communists' growing success in Greece and the Balkans. They asked President Truman to take over SIS's anti-Communist groups.[53]

Menzies's biographer candidly admits that many of the SIS nets passed on to the Americans were Nazi collaborators. The rationale was that these extremist organisations > existed as a major political irritant that, at critical times throughout the period from 1925 until the mid-1950's, nourished Soviet insecurity. During the period immediately before World War II, the [SIS] cells inside Russia – they were known by such code names as the Prometheus Network, the Inter-Marium Programme, the Abramtchik faction, and the Russian Army of Liberation ... were taken over by the German military intelligence service of Admiral Wilhelm Canaris ... After World War II, when Canaris's men were all in jail, Menzies reacquired interest in these organisations until, at last, he passed them to the American intelligence services. Such complex tangles were not uncommon ... although they had not yet become the infinity of complication ... where, as the good wizard said of the bad ones in J. R. R. Tolkien's epic, The Lord of the Rings, 'It is difficult with these evil folk to know when they are in league, and when they are cheating one another.'[54]

The real 'Lord of the Rings' was not Menzies but Lavrenty Beria. KGB headquarters must have congratulated themselves when in 1949, Menzies announced that Philby had been promoted to Senior United Kingdom Liaison Officer to America and Canada. Philby's mission was to transfer Britain's Nazi 'freedom fighters' to the Americans.[55] This was an important opportunity for the KGB as most American intelligence services had been reluctant to employ Nazis, although they occasionally bent the rules for rocket scientists.

However, Philby was about to realise his first significant failure. The newly formed CIA wanted no part of Durčansky, Intermarium or the ABN. They supported the moderate Czech Democrats, many of whom had fled to America after the Communist takeover. Durčansky was anathema to them, and Philby had to find another sanctuary for his Slovak Nazis.

Some of the most embarrassing Canadian secrets are revealed in Durčansky's massive CIA file. Before its release in 1987, the CIA blanked out all references which might embarrass a foreign government, as required by the US Freedom of Information Act. However, the CIA declassified the fact that Durčansky headed Intermarium,[56] not knowing that a few months later a British author would reveal that it was run by British intelligence.

Anthony Cave Brown, in his recent book on Sir Stewart Menzies,[57] describes Intermarium as one of many 'long and witty' British intelligence operations. As we have seen from Philby's penetration, the joke was really on SIS. Cave Brown correctly identifies Intermarium as having worked for the British, then the Nazis, then the British again, and finally the Americans.

What Cave Brown does not mention is that in 1949 the wealthy Americans at first refused Philby's offer to take over Intermarium. In fact, the CIA tried to screen out all known Nazis before they entered the country. Some were easy to spot. The CIA noted that in 1946 Durčansky had been listed by the UN as a Category A war criminal, and that in 1947 he was 'condemned to death by the Slovakian National Council after trial in absentia'.[58] This was before the Communist takeover was completed.

On 20 September 1950 the CIA sent a nasty report on Durčansky to the US immigration authorities.[59] After they closed their door, Philby had no alternative but to dump Durčansky and his Slovak Nazis elsewhere. On 15 December Durčansky left Argentina via London for Canada. The British blushingly admitted that Durčansky was a wanted war criminal, but apologised to the Canadians, claiming that Durčansky's UK visa was an 'administrative error'.[60]

Despite this confession, the Canadians made no move to arrest or expel Durčansky. It is no coincidence that Philby travelled back and forth from Washington to Ottowa to help Canadian intelligence 'vet the Nazis' who were settling there.[61] Where his Nazi agents were concerned, Philby ensured that 'administrative errors' occurred with clockwork regularity. Durčansky travelled freely in and out of Canada, despite the fact that the government was fully aware of his war crimes.[62]

In 1951 Durčansky sent a letter to the White House listing his address as 97 Crawford Street, Ontario.[63] Although he spent most of his later years working for ABN in London and Germany, he was still giving occasional anti-Semitic speeches in Canada well into the 1970s.[64] He had a friendly audience, as thousands of Fascists settled in Canada.[65]

Among other Nazi collaborators identified by CIA in Canada is Durčansky's close wartime companion, Jozef Kirschbaum.[66] Both are listed in a report received by the CIA as senior Fascists 'guilty of the gruesome calvary of the Slovak Jews'.[67] In 1952 Kirschbaum tried to obtain a US visa, but was quickly exposed in the media. A photo of him in Fascist uniform was shown on TV, and he quickly scuttled back to safety in Canada.[68] He is still on the State Department's banned list.[69]

Durčansky met the same reception in 1959. The New York Times accused him of being a Nazi. Durčansky denied that he was a Fascist, and blurted out that his 1950 American visa application 'was rejected on the grounds that he was "a Communist"'.[70] America was not alone in suspecting that Durčansky was a Communist spy, as the CIA noted:

> During his tenure of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (1939–1941), Durčansky allegedly attempted – prior to the German–Soviet conflict – to establish certain contacts with Soviet politics through the Soviet Legation in Budapest . . . Hitler is said to have summoned Tiso to Germany and ordered Durčansky's removal from office . . . The Germans are said to have made further representations as a result of which Durčansky left Slovakia and eventually went to Italy.[71]

What the CIA did not know in 1950 was the extent of Durčansky's 'support from the Vatican', or its involvement with the Canadian government. The Vatican can hardly shirk responsibility for the emigration of Nazis to Canada. They had unsuccessfully requested on several occasions that Durčansky's associate, the Fascist Slovak Ambassador to the Vatican, Karol Sidor, be allowed to settle in America. Sidor had become an embarrassment in Rome, so Pius XII personally asked the Canadian Privy Council to shelter him.[72]

Ironically, the Deschenes Commission which investigated Nazis in Canada, concluded that America was most responsible for dumping Nazis there.[73] In fairness, the Canadian investigators were not even permitted by their own lawyer to request Durčansky's CIA file. Moreover, all references to British intelligence were purged from the Deschenes Commission's 1986 report. Not one word of the embarrassing Philby connection was published. The lawyer involved was recently appointed Canada's Ambassador to the UN.[74]

Canada continues to pay the price for its indifference. The CIA files are filled with examples of Communist propaganda discrediting the West as a haven for war criminals like Durčansky and Stetsko. For the next two decades, the Communists held ABN up to the world as an organization of war criminals, whose leaders were frequent visitors to Canada.

In January 1990 some of the American intelligence files on the ABN were declassified at the authors' request. From the moment Stetsko became ABN head in 1949, US officials were told to ignore his persistent approaches. He was not to have a single piece of paper that he could use to claim US support.[75] By 1953, all the 'moderate and democratic member groups' had quit ABN.[76] In 1955 a US Senator was confidentially told that:

> Many of the leaders of the A.B.N. were closely associated either with the Nazi government or with the totalitarian regimes of their respective states. Because of their records many have been unable to obtain an immigration or visitor's visa into the United States or to other countries. There is no question of their anti-Communist sentiments but 'neither was there a question of the anti-Communist sentiments of Hitler'. I permitted [the senator's aide] to read brief biographic sketches on Ferenc Farkas, Grigore Manoilescu, Dimitr Waltscheff, Yaroslav Stetsko, Radoslav Ostrovski, and Ferdinand Durčansky. The sketches listed the war-time posts of the A.B.N. leaders, a record which itself is indicative of the political complexion of the A.B.N.[77]

In 1958 the US Veterans of Foreign Wars were warned to have nothing to do with the ABN:

> Mr. Stetsko's . . . organization is based on the Führer principle . . . and has a long record of murder, terror and coercion perpetrated in the DP camps in Germany against those Ukrainians who do not share their views.[78]

The Veterans were told to deal with the CIA front group, the 'American Committee for Liberation'. Philby had utterly failed to convince the Americans to take over ABN, and had to settle for second best by dumping his networks in Canada.

For Philby, the worst was yet to come. By 1951, US intelligence had broken portions of the Soviet diplomatic code. Several Communist agents were in danger of exposure, and Guy Burgess and Donald Maclean fled to the Soviet Union. Philby was unofficially expelled from Washington in disgrace, and the CIA never trusted him or his agents again. They set out to remove any of Philby's Nazis who had any contact with US intelligence.[79]

American intelligence naively believed that it had defeated the KGB's best agent. They had refused to swallow Philby's Nazi bait and had even detected several Communist agents among his 'freedom fighters' before they could emigrate to America.[80]

What the CIA did not realise for years was that the Vatican's Nazis had a new home just across America's northern border. Of course, they had received a great deal of assistance on the way to Canada from the KGB networks in Britain:

> Agents of the 'Cambridge network' were . . . remarkably well placed at the start of the Cold War to ensure that the MI5 and MI6 vetting slips carried the magic words 'no traces against' when it came to the penetration of the ABN by Moscow. This ensured that a slew of Soviet agents, including . . . the Czech Intermarium chief Ferdinand Durčansky, the Ukrainian Stefan Bandera and the Byelorussian leader Mikolai Abramtchik, were either directly involved or had staff members who ended up running and recruiting other agents for covert operations against the Soviet Union.[81]

Before he left Washington in 1951, Philby had merged all of the Vatican's Nazi groups – Intermarium, Prometheus, the International of Liberty and several others – into one giant Soviet sewer. The CIC files even listed Jaroslav Stetsko as a suspected Communist agent. Of course, it was probably a false lead; the real Communists were harder to find.

Back in Moscow, the Politbureau was not in the least dismayed when the KGB's operation collapsed. It really did not matter that the Americans had shunned ABN. Behind the KGB's back, the Politbureau had supervised a GRU counter-operation that had succeeded where Philby had failed. The Americans were enthusiastically funding Turkul's 'resistance movement'. They had dodged the KGB's Nazis only to fall into the GRU's trap.

At the end of World War II, the remnants of the Vlasov army under Turkul's control established liaison with the anti-Tito forces in Yugoslavia.[82] Turkul knew that the Fascist anti-Communist forces were 'secretly supported' by British intelligence, and so he attached his staff to theirs.[83] He joined the various Fascist factions in their escape to Austria. On 3 May 1945 Turkul's intelligence chief, Max Klatt, was released from a Nazi prison and headed to Salzburg to link up with Turkul.[84] It was time to recycle the phony MAX network to the even more gullible Allies.

In rapid succession, Turkul and Klatt offered their 'anti-Communist' network to British intelligence, the US Office of Strategic Services, and General Patton's intelligence staff.[85] Captured Germans had already reported on the incredible MAX network. The British Army's counter-intelligence staff was working on a report about the miraculous Abwehr spy team of the Hungarian Jew and the 'notorious professional spy General aka Prince Turkul normally resident in Rome'.[86] But some British officers were rather sceptical about Turkul's 'extensive and infallible intelligence service which delivered information with equal speed from Leningrad, Kuibischev, Nororossik on the Western desert, [which] was suspiciously free from the administrative hitches to which most spy systems are liable'.[87]

Fortunately for Turkul, Klatt was not captured by the author of that report. On 24 May 1945 he was arrested in Austria by two US CIC men who turned him over to the OSS. He had fallen into friendly hands indeed. 'By November of 1945, Klatt had concluded an agreement with OSS in Salzburg to work against the Communists.'[88] At the same time, Turkul had established the 'Russian National Central Committee' in Salzburg and, of course, was appointed chairman.[89] The Committee screened refugees for the OSS, looking for Communist double agents. Once again, the Communist fox was guarding the émigré chicken coop.

Turkul's success in contacting the OSS was no suprise. His aide, Father George Romanov, had long standing relations with the OSS in Switzerland. In fact, the Turkul network's 'first contact with the allies' was with Paul Blum, Allen Dulles's assistant in the Berne OSS office. Dulles was hoping to become head of OSS, but instead, was transferred to the backwaters of occupied Germany.[90]

Having been passed over for promotion, the disgruntled Dulles probably saw the Turkul net as his route to stardom. He had undoubtedly heard the Turkul legend from the American born Jahnke, who had fled to Switzerland to escape the SS. While Marcus was conveying the Jahnke–Schellenberg terms to London, the Black Orchestra was also negotiating with the Americans. The Vatican was asked to open peace talks with Dulles, and conveyed a message through Dom Emanuele Caronti, Abbot General of the Benedictines:

> In the sixth year of war, Germany finds herself alone in the fight against Bolshevist Russia. In the interests of saving mankind, Germany now looks > to the highest ecclesiastical authority to intervene with the Anglo-Americans and guarantee absolute secrecy to any negotiations with the Vatican.[91]

Dulles was no stranger to Vatican secret negotiations, as he had subsequently used Church contacts to negotiate the surrender of German forces in Italy.[92] Unfortunately, Stalin had found out about these talks and put pressure on President Truman to call them off. That did not stop Dulles, who went ahead anyway, much to the President's anger. As it turned out, Dulles's German contacts had been stalling him, and only concluded the agreement when they learned of Hitler's suicide. An investigation showed that Dulles had been thoroughly taken in, and had made embarrassing promises to protect major war criminals, but received nothing in return.[93]

Dulles returned to Washington as an outsider, but through his old contacts, kept his hand in intelligence work. If Dulles thought that Turkul's network would restore his tarnished prestige, he was in for a rude shock. By June 1946, Turkul's propaganda antics against the Soviet Union had attracted the attention of the CIC, which learned that he was living in a villa near Parsch DP camp:

> An interview with Mr Malkievich, fnu, director of the UNRRA team at Camp Parsch, Salzburg, disclosed that Subject and his associates have been actively engaged in disrupting morale and contributing to unrest and apprehension in the camp . . . [they] circulated wild rumors among the camp's inhabitants and have, on frequent occasions, slandered UNRRA and its efforts to run the DP camp on peaceful democratic lines. On one occasion, the Turkul group stated its dissatisfaction with [the UNRRA leaders], claiming that the former was a Jew and the latter was a Communist.[94]

The CIC concluded, however, that despite Turkul's claim to be a 'Vlasov Army Commander', he was 'a vain, not-too-clever opportunist seeking always to be at the head of an organization of power or influence':

> There is no evidence as yet to hand to indicate that Subject is anything other than an old-time anti-Bolshevik constantly dreaming of leading again the fight against the Soviets with any available means.[95]

Apparently, Dulles took Turkul rather more seriously than the CIC. The next document in the CIC file has been completely censored by the CIA, perhaps to protect the reputation of a man who became CIA Director in 1953.[96] However, the other Turkul files contain ample references to the developing scandal.

In January 1946 a joint British–American intelligence unit, (SCI/A) attempted to recruit one of Turkul's aides in Munich. These élite Allied 'Special Counter Intelligence' units were the only ones entrusted with code breaking secrets such as ULTRA. As we shall see, many of the SCI teams were extremely sympathetic to Menzies's and Dulles's anti-Soviet schemes. In mid-1946, the SCI team sent an unnamed source (probably Turkul) to Germany to recruit yet another anti-Communist operative, his old GRU sponsor, Claudius Voss.[97]

Not suprisingly, the Communist moles in British intelligence gave Voss a clean bill of health, revealing to the Americans 'in the utmost discretion', that Voss had been a British agent since 1923 when he was 'one of the leading men of the Inner Line' counter-intelligence service in Paris. In 1929 Voss had 'in effect become chief' of ROWS for the Balkans. For the next ten years, he and Turkul had collaborated on a 'project unknown', which Voss later admitted was the creation of the NTS.[98]

No mention was made of Turkul's wartime service for the Nazis, but British intelligence volunteered 'that since the end of the war both Voss and [Klatt's deputy, Ira Longin] have been building intelligence nets for source, allegedly for the western allies'.[99] This was a coy reference to Dulles's recruitment of Turkul. Indeed, the files explicitly state that Voss's agents were working for British intelligence and a 'Colonel Dulles' in Washington.[100]

Armed with such impressive credentials, the SCI team should have quickly recruited Voss. There was only one minor obstacle: they discovered that he was a longstanding Communist agent.[101] The proof against Voss was never revealed, but he was suddenly placed under arrest.[102] In a desperate attempt to save himself, Voss tried to prove his anti-Communist bona fides by providing chapter and verse on the MAX reports and his longstanding association with Klatt, Longin and Turkul.[103] This only alarmed the SCI even more. If Voss was a Communist agent, maybe they all were; if so, Dulles's post-war work with Turkul's organisation had been hopelessly compromised.

It was a potential catastrophe. Klatt and Turkul also worked for the same Colonel Lewis Perry who was co-ordinating the spectacularly unsuccessful Križari incursions into Yugoslavia.[104] Turkul's villa in Glasenbach was conveniently close to both the Križari bases and the starting point of Father Draganović's Ratline. Indeed, Turkul's intelligence reports were sent directly to the American officer co-ordinating the Ratline, Major Milano.[105] Apparently, Milano was relying on Turkul's information to determine which defectors were valuable enough to send down the Ratline. The code name for this programme was 'The Crown Project'.[106] As we shall see, this operation bears a striking similarity to another American programme involving Father Draganović.

Klatt was arrested in Salzburg in 1946 and held at a special Allied interrogation centre for preliminary questioning before being sent to London. He claimed that he had never collaborated with Voss, but this only aroused suspicion that he was lying. Since Klatt 'was unquestionably the brains of the Turkul operation, it would have made sense for him to deny any association with a known Soviet agent like Voss'. The more he talked, the more he contradicted the facts that Voss and others had already confirmed. It was beginning to look very bad. Orders were received from Washington to terminate the 'Crown Project' and bring Turkul in for interrogation.[107]

However, Turkul had skipped town: on 17 July 1946 he requested a Military Entry Permit and crossed the border into Bavaria just ahead of his pursuers. His reason for entry to Germany was listed as 'DP business'. Indeed it was, as Turkul was trying to become a Displaced Person himself.[108] Shortly after he arrived in Uffing, Bavaria, he wrote to a friend in South America, asking for some Chilean visas.[109] Unfortunately, Turkul's letter was intercepted. Even then, there were still those who spoke in his defence:

> It is pointed out however that Subject's action to escape Europe, coupled with his absence of any overt activity, indicates that a Soviet penetration is not likely. It is to be mentioned, however, that Subject in Salzburg has allowed himself to be 'used' by known or suspected Soviet agents due to his own stupidity, blind vanity, or his non-evaluation of personalities around him.[110]

The CIC arrested Turkul on 16 September 1946, and although he tried everything to talk his way out of it, the combined interrogation team of Mr Ryle of the CIC, and Mr Johnson of British intelligence wore him down. With Klatt's and Voss's interrogations behind them, they caught Turkul in lie after lie.[111]

In order to deny that Klatt got his information from the Soviets, Turkul claimed that the MAX reports were invented so that he could build his own White Russian organisation under the noses of the Germans.[112] However, he had to retract when confronted with proof that the Germans had corroborated the MAX reports down to the smallest detail.[113] Turkul also denied that he was anti-Tito, until told that his links to Fascist Yugoslavs had already been exposed.[114]

Still, Turkul did not break down completely but kept up a stubborn resistance. He did admit that he had penetrated numerous Nazi-controlled émigré organisations, and that his anti-Vlasov activities might have sabotaged German attempts to raise anti-Communist forces.[115] But he refused to admit that he deliberately wrecked the Axis recruitment effort, because that would have been a tacit admission that he was really a Soviet agent. Turkul fudged and said that he would never betray the White Russians, of whom he was the most trusted leader.[116]

Turkul's followers in the DP camps were outraged that their beloved leader had been imprisoned, and a chorus of protests erupted across Bavaria. The Americans had to do something quickly to quieten things down. Lieutenant Colonel Richard Stevens described Turkul as a Communist 'double agent in whom the British and [US] had consecutive interests'. Despite this, Stevens approved the creation of a cover story for Turkul's arrest to 'help prevent antipathy for the US' among the refugee population.[117]

On 8 November 1946 the Americans agreed to disseminate the story that Turkul was not being extradited in order to reassure the refugees.[118] The protest movement collapsed, confident that their beloved leader was off on some secret mission. Turkul did not know it, but his arrest had a serious impact on other American intelligence operations as well.

For example, Turkul's arrest was impeding Project 113, the recruitment of Nazi scientists, and Operation Rusty, the recruitment of Nazi intelligence experts.[119] Operation Tobacco, the cover name for using ex-Nazis to smoke out untrustworthy refugees, was also in jeopardy.[120]

After the protests ended, things only got worse for Turkul. Voss's testimony had led the investigators to Klatt's deputy, Ira

Longin, who was arrested and sent to London for further interrogation. Slowly but surely, the investigators were tearing Turkul's network to pieces. In order to save himself, he denounced Klatt. He was fitted up with a tape recorder by the Americans and confronted Klatt in the prison courtyard. The transcript shows that Klatt caught on quickly, indicating that if Turkul denounced him as Soviet spy, he understood.[121] It was a sad ending for the courageous Jew who had single-handedly sabotaged Hitler's armies on the Eastern front. The wages of spies are often paid in the coin of betrayal.

The Americans were not altogether taken in, and continued to wonder if Turkul were really the head of a gigantic Communist network.[122] The investigation widened. No cover story in the world can stand up to protracted and detailed scrutiny. By the end of November, it was time for Turkul to play his trump card: the GRU agents inside British intelligence provided phoney background clearances for Turkul and the rest of his network. Suddenly, the US investigator, Mr Ryle, discovered that his British counterpart, Mr Johnson, was solidly on Turkul's side. In December the two investigators travelled to Geneva, where Paul Blum introduced his best source on Turkul: Father George Romanov.[123]

Ryle pressed Father Romanov on the means by which the Turkul network acquired its information for the Nazis, recalling the German who suspected that the MAX reports came from Turkul in Rome. Romanov was aghast, insisting that Turkul chose to spend the war in 'splendid isolation in Rome . . . a model of inertia', while Klatt did all the work. Turkul was a 'quantité negligible' he claimed, and no one paid the slightest attention to him because 'the White Russian émigrés in Rome counted for nothing'. Johnson concurred: the British view was that 'Rome was of no importance'.[124]

Ryle was completely taken in: he was unaware of the British–Vatican peace negotiations, or Turkul's connection to the Black Orchestra, or his dinners with Mussolini. Johnson may have been a victim of deception by his superiors in British intelligence, although he and Romanov were surprisingly knowledgeable about Yugoslav Fascists. Father George described Ljotić as the 'most honest and true enemy of the Soviets' he ever met.[125]

Perhaps to whet Ryle's appetite, he revealed that Turkul was the head of an organisation in Belgrade that supported the return of King Zog to the Albanian throne.[126] Ryle's ears must have perked up at this. At that very moment British and US intelligence were conspiring with the Fascist Balli Kombëtar party to overthrow the Communists and restore King Zog. No one knew that Turkul was helping out. His name is absent from the histories of the abortive Albanian coup. If Turkul did indeed have a hand in it, it is not surprising that it was so disastrous.

Both Johnson and Romanov tried to convince Ryle that Klatt, not Turkul, was the Soviet agent. Romanov stated that he had warned Turkul towards the end of the war that Klatt was a Communist.[127] Ryle was led to believe that Turkul was a great anti-Communist leader, beloved by the Church. Even Father George offered to travel to the US to meet privately with senior officials.[128] After all, there was 'no better cover than a priest's frock'.[129] It was all very amusing until one recalls that the Turkul net was working for the GRU.

Ryle was stubborn and insisted on checking Romanov's information.[130] He also asked the successor to the OSS to check on Turkul's known associates. They asked the British for help, as one author discovered documents in the US Archives showing > the extent to which OSS and its successor organization(s) relied heavily on MI5 to weed out these Communists . . . For example No. KEL 3064, dated April 28, 1947, contains assessments requested by the OSS station in Austria for ten contacts of General Anton Turkul, a White Russian who had fought with the Germans, although it was thought his intelligence chief Klatt was a double agent for the Russians. Turkul was arrested in Salzburg [in 1945], then released and employed as the White Russian representative in the American zone of Austria. On the strength of the 1947 MI5 report . . . the Americans concluded . . . 'Investigation did not reveal any information that SUBJECT has been doubling as a Soviet Agent.'[131]

After this, even Ryle began to wonder if he was barking up the wrong tree. However, Schellenberg's interrogation in London revealed that several Nazi agencies, including the Gestapo and part of the SS, were convinced that Turkul's network was a Communist front. Yet not one of Turkul's agents was ever identified by MI5. After the negative MI5 report, Johnson insisted Turkul be exonerated. All Ryle could do was file his dissent. Under increasing British pressure, Turkul was freed, and promptly wrote a nasty letter to CIC demanding that his papers be returned.[132]

How did he convince British intelligence to defend him? The answer may never be known for sure, but the Black Orchestra was apparently alive and well in London. Turkul was not the only one to have his past sanitised by British intelligence. Many SS men posed as members of the Vatican's Black Orchestra at the end of the war, and Marcus was no exception. Marcus claimed that he had been arrested for the anti-Hitler plot, but was saved by his old friend, Dr Hoffman, who vouched for him and arranged his release.[133]

In fact, Marcus was nowhere near the Hitler plot, he was in Byelorussia co-ordinating SS networks of Soviet collaborators.[134] He had served as Schellenberg's co-ordinator of V-Men, and knew the identity of every SS confidential agent ('Vertrauensmann') in Eastern Europe.[135]

Marcus was quickly hired by Vansittart's propaganda section. His real mission was to recruit SS fugitives for Philby's anti-Communist section of SIS. In order to increase his effectiveness, Marcus was appointed mayor of a small town in the British zone of Germany. He was therefore able to provide new identity cards and assistance to his old SS friends. Word spread quickly that the British were hiring anti-Communist experts. He quickly hired his old friend, Hoffman, and gave him a letter falsely certifying that he was active in the resistance.[136] By now, the Black Orchestra had many more members than it had while Hitler was alive.

Hoffman had contact with the Nazi Romanian Iron Guard during the war.[137] French intelligence had placed a priest in the British zone to co-ordinate Iron Guard recruitment.[138] It is possible that Marcus sent Hoffman out to find more Romanian Fascists, although the British had recruited quite a few already.[139]

But Hoffman came back with an even bigger catch: he had found Klaus Barbie. Marcus knew Barbie well, but despite his record of atrocities in France, he quickly recruited him. Barbie became something of an operational genius in supplying false papers and equipment to the growing roster of Britain's ex-Nazi agents.[140] Barbie's notebook contained the names of some of the Third Reich's leading strategists on the Eastern front.[141]

British intelligence did Barbie a major favour. During this time, all the American reports about Barbie's brutal war crimes disappeared. The authors have discovered that the Allied lists were sanitised while Barbie was in British employ:

> While I was special agent in charge of the Delta Base CIC in Marseille 1944–45, the Lyons France office was one of our satellite offices which I visited with Major Clarence Read, our Commanding Officer. While there we not only heard of the 'Butcher of Lyons' Klaus Barbie but saw several folders in our files with his name. These were transmitted to our office and to G-2 Marseille. Surely they were sent to SHAEF [Supreme Allied Headquarters in Paris]. What happened after that I will never know.[142]

There is clear evidence that the now missing Barbie war crimes dossiers were widely circulated by the Americans. His name is listed in the 11 October 1944 US Navy Who's Who of agents and suspects under the following entry:

> BARBIE(R), Obersturmfuhrer von
> German: born c. 1909: Sipo & SD Lyons in 1943 . . . later report of January 1944 said that he had returned to Lyons and was head of Abt IV [Gestapo]: height 5′6″ (167 cm.): stout, grey eyes, rosy complexion: described as combining brutality with effusiveness.[143]

It should be noted that British intelligence had direct access to these files at this time. Long before Barbie arrived in the US zone, his wanted status was mysteriously downgraded to security suspect. Soon afterwards, things went seriously wrong for the Marcus network. In autumn 1946 Hoffman quit after Marcus accused him of trifling with his wife.[144] Hoffman promptly teamed up with SIS's rivals in British Military Intelligence and gained his revenge by exposing the giant network of ex-SS agents working for a 'fascist Foreign Office Expert'.[145] It is unclear whether this refers to Vansittart or Philby.

In any event, the British Army took Hoffman's claims seriously, and arrested Barbie. Despite the fact that his 'escape' was apparently arranged by SIS, Barbie later said that he lost faith in the British and their many promises. When Hoffman begged him to come back, Barbie turned him down flat.[146] He had a better idea.

Like Turkul, Barbie headed down the long road to Munich in the American zone. He did not know it, but it would take him to Dulles's private spy network. It was no accident that many Turkul supporters were living in the quiet little towns around Munich: Dulles had arranged for his 'freedom fighters' to be tucked away in this discreet corner of Bavaria.

In 1946 Dulles's men in Germany simply changed their OSS uniforms, and became the War Department's Strategic Services Unit (SSU). Dulles's chameleons went under various names:

sometimes they were the SSU, sometimes the War Department Detachment (WDD); often they used the innocuous sounding 'Document Disposal Unit' (DDU) for cover.[147]

In effect, there were two CIAs in Germany, one liberal (Department of Army Detachment), one conservative (DDU). The first took orders from the President. DDU took its from Dulles, who had joined Thomas Dewey's Campaign Staff, expecting Dewey to be the next President.[148]

Dulles's DDU men were the OSS 'Political Intelligence' experts. This ultra-conservative (and very secret) corps wore Army uniforms although the State Department (where Dulles still had considerable influence) actually paid them. They were waiting for Truman to be swept from office by a conservative, who would unleash their émigré armies on Stalin.[149]

In the meantime, while DAD (the CIA's predecessor) hunted Nazis like Bandera, Dulles's clique recruited them and kept them in cold storage pending the 1948 election. Dulles's men had a secret ally: Region IV of the CIC in Munich had been quietly helping the DDU recruit ex-Nazis. There were plenty to choose from: Prince Turkul's followers; Bishop Bučko's Ukrainians; General Gehlen's men; and Father Draganović's Intermarium network.[150]

Hiding them all was a risky business as the Munich CIC was technically committing mutiny by protecting Nazis who were wanted by CIC Headquarters in Frankfurt. Barbie's arrival in Region IV complicated an already precarious situation. Barbie did not know it, but he was about to ignite a scandal between the CIC and the DDU that would send him on his way to Rome. It was not a problem for Dulles. He had good connections at the Vatican.

Barbie and the American Ratlines

There was what Moscow calls a 'useful idiot' in the CIA, not a witting Communist agent, but a person who helps his enemy without realising it. His name was James Jesus Angleton. While he was nominally a member of the 'liberal' wing of the CIA, he was a secret supporter of Allen Dulles's arch-conservative DDU faction in the State Department. As we shall see, Angleton played a central role in supporting the DDU's chameleons, and was Dulles's most brilliant protégé.

Angleton was an Anglophile, having spent his early war years in London. After Dulles and the Vatican arranged the German surrender in Italy, he joined the British–American Special Counter Intelligence unit (SCI-Z) that descended on Rome. This unit soon recruited Nazis like SS intelligence chief Walter Rauff, who had worked with Dulles on the surrender negotiations. Rauff was quickly released by SCI-Z over the CIC's protest that he was a major war criminal. Rauff then went off to work for the Vatican Ratlines.[1]

Although he was not a Catholic, Angleton had a close relationship with Vatican intelligence. He warned the Vatican that one of its code clerks had been suborned by the Soviets.[2] Many such acts of kindness followed, endearing Angleton to Pius XII's closest adviser, Giovanni Montini, in the Vatican Secretariat of State.

Angleton's friendship could not have come at a better time for the Vatican. In July 1946, just as Turkul was arrested in Germany, Pius XII was confronted with a Communist propaganda campaign to secularise Italy, destroy the Vatican's privileges and seize political power. The Communists were on his doorstep, and his nightmares of the 1919 Munich uprising were coming back through the ballot box.

The Pope abandoned any pretence of neutrality and ordered a covert programme of political intervention.[3] The Americans soon learned of the secret plan, probably from Montini himself. From the spring of 1945, Angleton > had been cultivating his source directly within the Vatican – later identified as Giovanni Battista Montini, then a Bishop and under-secretary of state at the Vatican and later Pope Paul VI. This contact may have developed further as a by-product of the negotiations then underway between Allen Dulles in Berne and the German high command in Northern Italy to arrange for a separate surrender, for Angleton's source appears to have been privy to all that the German Ambassador to the Vatican, Ernst von Weizsäcker, was reporting about Pope Pius XII.[4]

Almost all references to the Vatican's wartime role have been censored in both the ULTRA and OSS files. After the war, Angleton kept his Vatican source a secret even from the local CIA office.[5] Angleton always denied the rumours that he had recruited Montini. However, we discovered new evidence that this future Pope was a source for American intelligence.

Montini's recently declassified CIC file contains two reports of his private discussions with Pius XII. On 30 July 1946 the Pope told Montini of his growing alarm > because of the information collected by the Vatican regarding the execution of the Soviet plan in Italy by Italian Communists.

>
> The plan is to render difficult the relationship between Italians and Anglo-Americans to the total advantage of the Soviet Union . . . a part of this plan is the provocation of incidents between Italians and Anglo-Americans in Italy to render more bitter the relations between Italy and the Western Allies, in order to oblige England and the United States to take severe measures.
>
> The Pope has given instructions that Italian Catholics react to this Soviet Plan through their organizations.[6]

The following evening, Montini had another private discussion with Pius XII, who elaborated plans for a secret counter offensive to preserve the Lateran pacts:

> the Pope gave instructions to . . . Montini, acting Secretary of State, to send directives to the Italian Catholic Action . . . to the Demo-Christian Party and all the Italian parishes . . . in order that millions of signatures of Italian men and women may be collected . . .
>
> This action on the part of the Pontifice derives from reliable information obtained by the Holy See on a vast program of propaganda promoted by the leftist parties for the revision of these pacts in regard to matrimony, religious education and the sovereignty of the Pontifice . . .

> The Communists directed by the Soviet Union are the most active in spreading such propaganda.[7]

Since only Montini was present when Pius XII discussed his plans, only he could have delivered these reports to the Americans. The speed with which they were delivered indicates the meetings' importance. Even before the Pope decided to give covert support to the Italian Christian Democrats in July 1946, Angleton was already helping the Vatican's anti-Communist politicians:

> Angleton's first major postwar assignment in Italy was to help make certain that when elections were held the Communists did not come into power . . . A coalition of parties . . . governed until there could be free elections in June of 1946. The preceding June Ferruccio Parri, the resistance leader brought back from Switzerland through Allen Dulles's mediation, had been designated prime minister, but had been forced to resign . . . and Alcide de Gasperi, whom Angleton knew well, had succeeded him.
> Angleton and others are said to have fed substantial sums of money into the June Referendum; he emphatically denies this. The vote . . . demonstrated the strength of de Gasperi's Christian Democrats.[8]

De Gasperi was not only Christian Democrat head and Angleton's close friend. As discussed in Chapter One, he was also Montini's accomplice in the Vatican's political initiatives. His government ran guns to the Križari, and de Gasperi had personally protected fugitive Fascist, Ferenc Vajta.

Before Angleton left for Washington in 1947, the Vatican was promised continuing American financial support in the critical 1948 elections. Despite the CIA's objections, the cash continued to flow with help from Angleton's friends in the State Department's Special Projects Division, where Dulles still had considerable influence.[9] For the rest of his career with US intelligence, Angleton kept the Vatican as his exclusive client. As the Vatican and de Gasperi appreciated, the Americans were willing to back their anti-Communism with cold, hard cash.

But there was a price for Angleton's largesse. It was no coincidence that the Americans asked for a share of the Ratlines in mid-1947. The Vatican probably did not need much convincing to switch horses, in view of Vajta's comments that they were disgusted with the tepid strategies of the French and British.[10]

According to Vajta, the Vatican was extremely displeased with British intelligence's handling of Intermarium.[11] 'However in the sad years of 1945 and 1946, it was the only organization of international character . . . for combatting the Russians.'[12] The Vatican was equally disappointed with the French, but did not blame de Gaulle. He was betrayed by his own general staff which:

> wished to continue collaboration with the British and did not believe in the efficiency of collaboration with the Vatican.
> After the fall of the General, the socialists sabotaged [his] policy, but finally, they were forced to admit that de Gaulle had been right and, toward the month of May 1946, they took up the idea with the General. But by this time, it was not only the officers of the General Staff, but the Parisian Free Masons who wished to fight with the British . . . Their game was too childish and the Vatican retired from the circle of French interest.[13]

In autumn 1947 Vajta fled to Madrid with William Gowen's help. Once there, as already discussed, he lobbied the Spanish government to establish a new Continental Union with Vatican and American support. Unfortunately, no one had cleared these plans, and Vajta was arrested after he entered America. President Truman demanded an investigation of who was smuggling Nazis to America.[14] Truman was no Charles de Gaulle, and Dulles's plans to send his Nazis to America had to be shelved until Dulles's candidate could replace Truman in the 1948 election. Vajta must have been confident of Dewey's victory, for he filed a series of appeals to stall his deportation.

In the meantime, Dulles had a problem. Turkul's agents were piling up in the Austrian refugee camps and the Army, although sympathetic, was getting nervous because the Nazis' 'continued residence in Austria constituted a security threat at well as a source of possible embarrassment . . . since the Soviet command had become aware of their presence in the US zone of Austria and in some cases had requested the return of these persons to Soviet custody'.[15]

But how could Dulles get the Nazis out? After R Day, 1947, Allied control of Italy ceased and the terms of FAN 757 expired. The British had enough problems with the Galician Division and after the Vajta scandal, Dulles could hardly ask his State Department friends to help. He needed some method to put his Nazi 'freedom fighters' into temporary cold storage. He needed the Vatican's Ratlines.

After Angleton's munificent support in 1947, how could the Vatican refuse? There is clear evidence that a deal was made.

Several years later, an American agent, Paul Lyon, wrote a 'History of the Italian Rat Line' for Major Milano:

> 1. ORIGINS
> a. During the summer of 1947 the undersigned received instructions from G-2 [army intelligence], USFA . . . to establish a means of disposition for visitors who had been in the custody of the 430th CIC . . .
> b. The undersigned, therefore, proceeded to Rome where, through a mutual acquaintance, he conferred with a former Slovakian diplomat [Kirschbaum, Sidor and Durčansky were all in Rome at that time] who in turn was able to recruit the services of a Croatian Roman Catholic Priest, Father Draganovich . . . [who] . . . had by this time developed several clandestine evacuation channels to the various South American countries for various types of European refugees.[16]

Lyon observed that if anything went wrong, the Vatican could take the blame:

> Draganovich is known and recorded as a Fascist, war criminal, etc . . . and his contacts with South American diplomats of a similar class are not generally approved by US State Department officials, plus the fact that in the light of security, it is better that we may be able to state, if forced, that the turning over of a DP to a [National Catholic] Welfare Organization falls in line with our democratic way of thinking and that we are not engaged in illegal disposition of war criminals, defectees and the like.[17]

Unfortunately, Father Draganović wanted something in return. If he smuggled the Americans' Nazis, they would have to help him smuggle his. A subsequent memo revealed the terms of this distinctly immoral partnership:

> Through the Vatican connections of Father Draganović, Croat, DP Resettlement Chief of the Vatican Circle, a tentative agreement was reached to assist in this operation. The agreement consists of simply mutual assistance, i.e. these agents assist persons of interest to Father Draganović to leave Germany and, in turn, Father Draganović will assist these agents in obtaining the necessary visas to Argentina, South America, for persons of interest to this Command . . .
>
> It may be stated that some of the persons of interest to Father Draganović may be of interest to the Denazification policy of the Allies; however, the persons assisted by Father Draganović are also of interest to our Russian ally. Therefore this operation cannot receive any official approval and must be handled with minimum amount of delay and with a minimum amount of general knowledge.[18]

It was probably Dulles or Angleton who resurrected the old OSS term for an escape and evasion network:

> Early in 1944 Welles . . . was a member of an OSS team being dropped from Brindisi by parachute into Croatia . . . [The OSS] played the Yugoslav circuit for six months . . . brought in supplies to the partisans . . . and helped man the rat line (or escape line) that got perhaps forty American Air Force men, shot down in Austria or northern Yugoslavia, back behind Allied lines in Italy.[19]

As previously explained, a ratline is the rope ladder reaching to the top of the mast, the last place of safety when the ship is going down. Thus Ratline became a generic intelligence term for an evacuation network. But the Pentagon was hardly likely to spend the large sums of money demanded by Father Draganović ($1,000 minimum per passenger) merely to establish a standby rescue network in the event of World War III.

Colonel Lewis Perry, who was the Americans' secret liaison to Pavelić's Križari, came up with a good cover story. The Vatican was helping relocate Soviet defectors of interest to US intelligence. If they remained in Austria, they would be a headache because of Soviet surveillance and kidnapping teams. The best solution was to have the Vatican put them on a boat and send them over the hill to South America. Colonel Perry transformed Major Milano's Operation Ratline into Operation Headache/Boathill and had it quickly approved at the highest Pentagon levels. Here is an example from the Top Secret Allied Forces Headquarters Message Center of 13 December 1949:

> 13 travelers awaiting shipment follow (real names, aliases and shipping names listed . . .)
> Subsequent to debriefing subjects turned over to organization of Croatian Catholic Priest Father Draganović, K, Vatican DP Resettlement Chief, through contact Bosiliewicz, Vladimir in Salzburg Austria. [International Red Cross] passports carried by subjects procured by Bosiliewicz in Geneva Switzerland unassisted by CIC. Subjects departed separately from Salzburg, Austria current by train for Naples, Genoa and Rome. Subjects now in vicinity of Rome awaiting shipment to Paraguay, Argentina, Bolivia or Venezuela, depending on country from which visa can be procured. Effective control by CIC over subject ceases when subjects depart Austrian territory.[20]

'Bosiliewicz' was in fact Vladimir Bosiljević, a key member of Father Draganović's network. It was no coincidence that he could procure IRC passworks, as he had been working on the Ratline in Salzburg since May 1945. US intelligence established that Bosiljević had been appointed to the position of Secretary General of the Croatian Red Cross by no less a person than Father Vilim Cecelja, Draganović's Austrian representative. Colonel Perry had probably met Bosiljević during the spectacularly unsuccessful Križari operations, since the Croatian was also a senior Križari officer, working closely with Srečko Rover on maintaining radio contact with the terrorist groups in Yugoslavia.[21]

This was another reason why it was important to keep the CIC from knowing too much about the Ratlines' real purpose. Colonel Perry was probably one of Dulles's DDU chameleons, but he had to rely on the CIC for legmen. Even Major Milano was not told the source of the Red Cross passports, nor was he informed of the actual war crimes backgrounds of Perry's recruits. Many years later the bewildered CIC agents who manned the Austrian–Vatican Ratlines said that as far as they knew, only one Nazi had gone out through that route; they thought the rest were legitimate Soviet defectors.

They were telling the truth as far as they knew it. By the time the 430th CIC took over in 1947, most of the well known Nazis had already been sent down the Ratline; the remainder were little known collaborators who easily convinced the gullible Austrian CIC that they were really 'anti-Communist refugees'.

Most of the Austrian CIC agents were new recruits, fresh out of Fort Holabird. They had no bitter memories of World War II to cloud their perceptions of the Slavic refugees, who seemed like rather nice people. The Austrian CIC had the kind of dim but daring thinkers that Dulles wanted. Their mission was simple: the Nazis were defeated and the Communists were the new enemy.

The 430th CIC quickly got the message. In 1947 virtually all Nazi-hunting in their area came to a complete stop. CIC agents in Rome, Trieste and Salzburg started recruiting Nazis for their anti-Communist expertise. William Gowen's reports on Ante Pavelić reflect the winds of change that swept through sections of the CIC in 1947. The reports suddenly changed focus. While their counterparts in Germany were still keeping lists of wanted war criminals and devoting at least some resources to locating them, the 430th CIC was making lists of which Nazis worked for which foreign intelligence service as a guide for eventual recruitment by Dulles's DDU.[22]

There was, however, one CIC unit in Germany, which was considerably less co-operative with Dulles's plans. The 970th

Detachment had a nucleus of professional intelligence agents who had stayed on after the war. Both the anti-Nazi and anti-Communist desks in Germany were staffed by CIC veterans who hated war criminals, and suspected that the DDU's recruits were hopelessly penetrated by the Soviets.[23]

The CIC and CIA agents in Germany swapped stories about the DDU's latest idiocy. The 970th CIC was hard to fool: they maintained a massive Central Registry that all too frequently exposed the true backgrounds of the DDU's 'freedom fighters'. To put it bluntly, they were giving Allen Dulles fits.

One of the 970th CIC's most brilliant anti-Communist experts absolutely forbade hiring Nazis to spy on the Soviets. He later played a key role in closing down Klaus Barbie's network. President Truman had ordered the 970th Detachment to hunt Nazis and they obeyed him with quiet professionalism.[24] Despite the opprobrium that has recently been heaped on them, the 970th CIC was one of the few intelligence services that did a competent, dedicated job of Nazi-hunting.

The 430th CIC in Austria was another matter. For example, both Detachments were ordered to submit reports on Stanislaw Stankievich. The 970th correctly identified Stankievich as a former official of the Nazi puppet government in Byelorussia. The 430th reported that he was a prominent anti-Communist émigré. The State Department picked the Austrian CIC's version.[25]

Although Stankievich had confessed that he was a senior Nazi, he was released through State Department intercession.[26] The 970th were told to keep their hands off Nazis who worked for the British or French, but lived in the US zone.[27] The CIC reluctantly complied, but kept embarrassing lists of these 'freedom fighters' indexed by their previous war crimes and atrocities, to prevent them obtaining US visas.[28] As long as these existed, the 970th had closed off the US zone as an emigration route.

By and large, Austria was a much safer transit point for Dulles's growing army of agents. The 430th knew the true names of the passengers using the Ratline, but not their war crimes background. The 970th had the latter information, but was unaware that the 430th was running the Ratline. The two CIC units had virtually no contact, and Dulles wanted it that way. If they could be kept apart, the Ratlines would function smoothly.

Whether by design or coincidence, the Pentagon solved the problem. As part of the massive reorganisation of the Defense Department between 1947 and 1949, Germany and Austria were placed under separate command headquarters. The military meddlers' most significant accomplishment seems to have been their bewildering array of acronyms. The bottom line for Dulles was that the two CIC Detachments were permanently divided under different commands.

After the reorganisation, the 430th in Austria was not really part of the CIC any more; it effectively ceased to exist. All intelligence units in Austria, Italy and Trieste were detached from their own agencies and placed under the direct command of US military intelligence headquarters in Salzburg, where Colonel Perry could keep an eye on the 430th. Their records were purged every three years for unexplained security reasons, and only a few reels of microfilm survive.[29]

As far as Major Milano knew, the 430th was supporting a legitimate anti-Communist programme that had been approved by higher headquarters. Perry knew better, but kept his mouth shut. Part of the Ratlines deal was to assist Draganović's Nazis to leave Germany and enter Austria. Perry had to contact the Nazis and get them across the border without the 970th learning about it. The Ratlines needed someone in Germany who was immune from arrest. Dulles had the perfect answer: he recruited Turkul's old boss, General Gehlen.[30]

Gehlen was a consummate con artist. He had built his reputation under the Nazis by claiming credit for the Abwehr's MAX reports. After the war, he used the same scam on the gullible Americans. In 1946, after a year of negotiations with Dulles and senior Pentagon commanders in Washington, Gehlen was flown to a secret base in Munich to establish a new US espionage network. Unfortunately, just as he arrived, Voss and Klatt were identified as Soviet agents and even Turkul was under suspicion. Where could Gehlen get the secrets he had promised the Americans?

Ignoring his instructions not to hire any tainted agents, Gehlen recruited Dr Franz Six and Emil Augsburg to head his anti-Communist desk. Both were infamous war criminals, but had encyclopaedic knowledge of Nazi intelligence operations in Eastern Europe. To stall for time, they interviewed German prisoners returning from the Soviet Union. It was not enough. The Americans pressed Gehlen to produce results by July 1947 or his funds would be cut. The truth was that Gehlen's only forte was rewriting other people's work and claiming the credit for himself. He did not have the faintest idea how to penetrate the 'Iron Curtain' on his own.[31]

The secret of Gehlen's success was timing. Just as the US connection to the Vatican Ratline was established in mid-1947, Turkul was cleared by the British and released in the US zone of Germany. He resumed leadership of the 'new' NTS,[32] which had penetrated every level of Soviet émigrés in Germany, and offered Gehlen

> a literally inexhaustible source of information. However impenetrable the Iron Curtain might seem, into the houses, the camps and the association offices of these émigrés ran the secret channels of communication; Red Army deserters found refuge with friends; Russians received letters from relatives in the Soviet Union; exiled politicians were in radio communication with the Ukraine.[33]

Virtually all the émigré organisations publicly identified as Gehlen fronts, including the NTS, and many other exotic groups like the Saint Andrew's Flag, were secretly controlled by Turkul. A comparison, for example, of the list of Gehlen front groups cited in E. H. Cookridge's biography of Gehlen with the recently declassified US intelligence files, shows the extent of Turkul's secret dominance of Operation Rusty and the Gehlen Organisation.[34]

Turkul located his headquarters in Munich, near Gehlen's own offices in the comparative safety of Region IV. Of course, Turkul's recruits did not stay in Germany, but he had connections in Salzburg. Here the 430th worked with, not against, him to evacuate Nazis under the nose of the 970th.[35] It was just the kind of connection Father Draganović needed.

Turkul was the link between Germany and the Austrian Ratlines. His network's reports were sent directly to Major Milano in Austria, who was working closely with Colonel Perry on Operation Headache/Boathill.[36] If anything went wrong, Perry could vouch for Turkul.[37] If the Americans wanted 'freedom fighters', Turkul knew just the men. His NTS reached into every émigré organisation in Europe.

First he took NTS away from the British and delivered it to Gehlen; then he took control of Gehlen's contacts with other émigré groups. According to Turkul's recently declassified files, he moved very quickly when he was released. 'For a short time Turkul was a member of General Peter von Glasenap's Russian Monarchist Organization, the League of Saint Andrew's Flag.'[38] Glasenap had been working for Gehlen, but was quickly dropped after Turkul took over the Saint Andrew's Flag. Neither Gehlen nor Glasenap resented Turkul as long as he got the job done.

Glasenap stayed 'in direct contact with Turkul' and passed information to Region IV's agents.[39] Perry vouched for Turkul as 'a close friend of General Glasenap . . . who has excellent contacts with a US intelligence agency in Germany'.[40] There was one little problem: wherever Turkul took over, security went to pieces:

> One of [Gehlen's] investigators came to the conclusion that in a certain émigré organization known as 'NTS, people working directly for the Soviet Union are recklessly given cover and support.' In another émigré society, the 'league of Andreas Flag', an informer detected an ex-Lieutenant Colonel Solomin of the Soviet Secret Police who 'when in his cups, would tell stories of his prowess in shooting Russian colonels and generals for attempted desertion to the Germans.' Vigilant though they were, Gehlen's men could never be sure whether they were dealing with figments of the imagination of some harum-scarum intelligence-peddler, or with doctored material fed to them by the Russians.[41]

Gehlen had fallen for the same game that Turkul had played on him during the war. Although his own people suspected that 90 per cent of the information they passed to the Americans was false, Gehlen had no other sources and continued to use NTS:

> Initially he had no alternative but to try the old methods once more. He therefore turned to the more reliable among the anti-Communist émigrés in the hope that they might assist him to penetrate the Soviet Union . . . In particular, with Gehlen's help, the Nationalist 'NTS' despatched parachutists as far away as Moscow; most of them, however, were discovered and arrested by the Soviet counter-espionage authorities.[42]

No one suspected that it was Turkul who leaked information to the GRU. It was always someone else, like Klatt or Voss, who was blamed. To plug the leaks, Gehlen hired Turkul's own Security Chief Tenzerov, whose real name was Puzanov. He seemed to be a reliable watchdog because he had himself been betrayed by some NTS leaders at war's end. But Tenzerov, who had been a leading Nazi propagandist for the Vlasov Army, still had good contacts with Turkul. He supported Gehlen's attempts to unite the Vlasov groups under the command of his old friend, Turkul.

It appears that Dulles's clique knew very little about Soviet infiltration of the NTS in 1947, and believed that it was just another Fascist organisation working for the British. Perry should have paid more attention to the note in Turkul's file: the Gestapo had arrested several NTS leaders in 1944 when they discovered a radio connection between their Warsaw headquarters and the Soviets.[43] Perhaps Perry overlooked things in the rush to find a secure way to get Draganović's friends out of Germany. Besides, Turkul had already been cleared by the British.

Gehlen was less picky about his agents' backgrounds. Soon there was a trickle, and then a flood of ex-Nazis moving south into Region IV. Why work for the British when the Americans were allowing the Germans to build their own espionage agency? Klaus Barbie was certainly impressed and in January 1947, went to work for Gehlen along with several of his SS friends who had worked on Ukrainian affairs. Unfortunately, Gehlen was no more adept at protecting war criminals than the British.

A few months after Barbie arrived, the CIA 'liberals' discovered that Gehlen had broken his promise and was hiring SS war criminals. They yanked Dr Six away from Gehlen and put him on trial at Nuremberg. Six was convicted of running an SS mobile killing unit, but was subsequently pardoned after Vatican intercession.[44]

But a small faction within US intelligence thought the CIA's morality misplaced. Dulles later said of his use of Gehlen's people: 'There are few Archbishops in Intelligence, and besides, one need not invite them to one's club.' Before the CIA could discover the other Nazis in Gehlen's club, Dulles's DDU smuggled Augsburg, Tenzerov, Barbie and others to a safehouse, and then resettled them in Augsburg, Bavaria, where the SS recruiting continued on the sly.[45]

Region IV was run by a series of temporary commanders like Aaron Banks, a former OSS agent (who later became 'Godfather to the Green Berets'), and Elliot Golden (who worked on 'special operations' for the Air Force). Their CIC employees were supposed to be hunting Nazis, but under their noses, Region IV became a haven for Dulles's recruits.

The fugitives were disguised as sub-agents for the innocuous

Abwehr Captain Peterson. In this corner of Bavaria, the DDU built a network of war criminals. It was several years before CIC Headquarters in Frankfurt discovered the DDU's double game in Region IV, but by then it was much too late to expose anyone. They were too deeply involved. Barbie, Augsburg and Tenzerov were working for Gehlen and had close contacts with Turkul's growing network.[46]

When the Barbie affair finally emerged into the glare of publicity thirty-five years later, the Americans launched an official inquiry. Although the US Justice Department's report on the Barbie affair discreetly censored most references to Barbie's previous work for British intelligence, enough references have been declassified to show the true reason for his recruitment by Gehlen. In addition to identifying SS officers working for the British,[47] Barbie had information on their Ukrainian operations.[48] In fact, he lured an entire faction of Ukrainian Fascists away from the British ABN and brought them over to Gehlen and Dulles.

Barbie submitted written reports on two men who played key roles in the Cold War. The reports no longer exist, but we know from Barbie's payment list that his subjects were Mykola Lebed and Ivan Grynioch. Both were subsequently recruited by DDU and moved to Bavaria. Barbie was small fry compared with them.

Grynioch, as previously discussed, was a Ukrainian Catholic priest who had joined Nazi intelligence before the war. He was chaplain to Bandera's Nachtigall Battalion when the Germans invaded the Ukraine, and remained in favour even after Stetsko and Bandera were unceremoniously dumped by the Nazis. Father Grynioch was Lebed's deputy.[49]

Like Bandera, Lebed had been convicted of political assassination in pre-war Poland, and was subsequently hired by the Abwehr. He was given special training at the Gestapo's security academy and became head of Bandera's security service, the SB. According to his intelligence file, Lebed consolidated OUN power by murdering the leaders of several rival Ukrainian nationalist groups during the war. Lebed successfully played the German factions against each other, and ended the war as Bandera's right-hand man and an SS favourite. Even pro-Ukrainian historians admit that Lebed's record was bloody indeed.[50]

In 1945 Lebed fled to Rome where he had high level contacts in the Vatican.[51] He called himself the Foreign Minister of the OUN, and downplayed his murderous past. Bishop Bučko was the Ukrainian contact for Intermarium at this time, and an avid OUN supporter. Unlike Bandera, who worked only for Philby and the British, Lebed was attracted by an offer to work with Turkul and his wealthy American friends.[52]

It was not the first offer. In autumn 1944 the Vlasovites offered to work with the OUN, but Bandera's attitude prevented this.[53] As we shall see, Turkul's connections to Region IV and the DDU allowed him to bring about a merger. It is ironic that the Soviets' strategy to divide and conquer the OUN finally succeeded with Barbie's help.

By the end of 1947, Region IV's commander was in the hot seat. CIC Headquarters had discovered the Nazi network and ordered Barbie's arrest. But DDU's operation was saved by an astounding stroke of luck. Judging from the dates of his reports it was probably Barbie who first alerted the Americans about Lebed's change of heart. Lebed was afraid that his Italian government and Vatican contacts would be unable to protect him after R day. Barbie's network offered him sanctuary in Augsburg.

In November 1947 Region IV asked permission to smuggle Lebed from Rome. Camile Hadju, Barbie's case handler, personally drafted the plan which was submitted up the chain of command.[54] The proposal to hire a known Ukrainian war criminal must have raised a few eyebrows at higher levels, but the chance to interview Lebed was too tempting. There were intriguing references to his 'connections with de Gaulle and French Intelligence'. Here was an opportunity to get to the bottom of Intermarium, not to mention the inside story on Bandera's work for the British.[55]

Captain Hale, who had co-ordinated CIC's hunt for Bandera, arranged for Lebed to be airlifted to Region IV. Barbie, who apparently provided the original contacts to Grynioch and Lebed, was not turned over to the French as a war criminal. Instead, he returned to work after a few months with instructions not to tell the British what had transpired.[56]

Only a few people at CIC Headquarters in Germany knew what had happened. Decisions about Region IV's Nazis were made at a much higher level. The Vatican was helping the DDU steal the OUN away from the British. According to William Gowen:

> Early in April [1948] Monsignor Bučko, the only surviving Ukrainian Roman Catholic Bishop on the European Continent, left Rome for Salzburg Austria . . . and other cities in Western Europe. Bučko is sometimes described as the 'spiritual leader' of the Ukrainian resistance. He is the key man in Vatican affairs and to him go a proportion of the Ukrainian-American and Ukrainian-Canadian donations to the Ukrainian nationalist cause.[57]

According to Gowen, Bučko was impatient with Bandera's refusal to co-operate with other Ukrainian factions. His source claimed that 'Bandera is an overrated extremist. In the latter respect this agent was informed by Casimir Papée, Polish London Government Ambassador to the Vatican, that today Bandera's Army is largely dispersed and lacking all types of necessary equipment.'[58]

Like Bučko, Papée was a leading Intermarium member. The Vatican was laundering funds, but not to Bandera. Bučko later met with the Bavarian Culture Minister to discuss Vatican funding for the Ukrainian Red Cross, the Ukrainian Free University and other 'cultural groups'.[59] One of the most prominent 'cultural' leaders in Germany was Father Grynioch. Bučko's tour apparently had an energising effect on the anti-Bandera faction. The switch from British intelligence to Dulles was under way.

Lebed and Grynioch went to a secret showdown with Bandera in Munich in August 1948. They told him they were setting up their own Ukrainian organisation in Augsburg, the UHWR.[60] Bandera was furious:

> . . . attacks were made against one Iwan Hrinioch (sic) and one Mikola Lebed, who were accused of being opportunists . . . [and splitting] the UHWR and OUN-R in order to weaken the position of Stephen Bandera.
> In a rebuttal, Mikola Lebed, confirmed and reiterated statements made by Dr Hrinioch, to the effect that the UHWR . . . hoped, some day, to set up a free democratic government which is divorced from all dictatorial pressure.[61]

As a parting shot, Grynioch and Lebed 'stated that the latest events in the OUN indicated a trend toward Fascism, and in a demonstration, quit the session'.[62] Since they had been active Nazis themselves during the war, this quip was for the benefit of the gullible Americans. Bandera fired them and warned his organisation to avoid contact with the new Ukrainian centre in Augsburg.[63] All the Vatican's prodigal sons were coming home to Germany. There was just one problem: Dulles's friend Dewey lost the 1948 election, Truman was re-elected and Dulles's agents were out on a long, long limb.

Barbie's reports on Lebed and Grynioch could not have come at a better time. In March 1948 orders had been given to Region IV to break up the Barbie net, as he was of no further use. However, after the August split in the OUN, Barbie's position temporarily improved. The dissolution of Region IV's net was halted, but CIC Headquarters brooked no further delays when they discovered in November that Barbie and his friends were really running underground SS networks for Gehlen. Instead of working for the CIC, Region IV's net was working for Gehlen.[64]

Payments to Gehlen's fugitives in Augsburg had been handled by the DDU under cover of the War Department Detachment (WDD).[65] This was too much, as most senior agents at CIC Headquarters believed that Gehlen's operation was heavily penetrated by Soviet double agents. Their estimate was correct, as shown by the Felfe trial in the 1960s. Heinz Felfe was Gehlen's right-hand man, and had access to NATO's secrets, which he gave to Moscow.[66]

But in early 1949 Gehlen still had many protectors. In May a meeting was held at European Command Headquarters where Captain Vidal of CIC was told the facts of life, up to a point. Barbie would stay on the payroll, but Vidal was not told why. One reason was that Barbie's knowledge could compromise the DDU's Ukrainian operations. If Barbie was fired, he might talk about an even bigger scandal. DDU agents in Germany had learned that Tenzerov was on the Soviets' list of most wanted traitors and war criminals. The demand for his arrest had arrived only a few days earlier, on 13 May. Curiously, the Soviets did not mention Tenzerov's work for NTS, although they mentioned everything else:

> PUZANOV, Nikolai Vasilievich, also known as TENZEROV Yevgeni Vasilievich . . . a former officer in the Soviet Army. Collaborated with the enemy. After having been taken prisoner in 1942, he attended a school of the German 'Eastern Ministry' for training propagandists to be sent to the USSR. From the beginning of 1943 he worked as senior instructor and leader of studies in the Russian section of the propagandists school. Was editor of the anti-Soviet magazine 'Our Days'. In November 1944, he was brought into the German-sponsored Committee for the Liberation of Russian Nationalities [KONR]. From December of that year, he was Chief of the Security Branch of KONR. In February 1945, he was the authorized > representative of KONR at Berlin. Has received German awards and the title of Lieutenant Colonel in [Vlasov's Army]. Is residing in the US Zone of occupation in Germany.[67]

Tenzerov was in the US zone all right; he was on Gehlen's payroll. Dulles's DDU had made a big mistake in putting Tenzerov in the same network with Augsburg and Barbie. If Barbie went down, he could take both the Gehlen and Turkul organisations with him. The State Department had to protect another war criminal. As with Pavelić, the orders were 'Hands Off'. The CIC was ordered to babysit Barbie for the State Department.[68]

Captain Vidal made hand-written notations in Barbie's file: his status was officially changed from a CIC asset ('Administratively dropped'), but his relations with Region IV were continued until CIC was 'notified by the State Department'. In short, Barbie was fired by CIC on paper, but was not told. Vidal was disgruntled, but orders were orders.[69] In occupied Germany, the State Department called the shots.

Other members of the Barbie net were taken off CIC's books. Augsburg was apparently more trustworthy than Barbie. He was allowed to quit CIC and go to work for a 'positive US intelligence agency', identified in Heinz Höhne's book as the Gehlen organisation. Barbie's other colleagues, like Kurt Merck, were regarded by CIC as 'not effective', but a top secret shroud was thrown over the Merck case, 'due to his connection with another American intelligence agency'. Once again the DDU had protected its own. Everyone went back to work for Gehlen, except Barbie.[70]

The DDU had good reason for keeping Barbie at arm's length. Most of the DDU officers were under cover as full or part-time State Department officers. They knew what CIC did not: the Barbie case was about to explode. Shortly after Vidal agreed to babysit Barbie for the State Department, he learned that Barbie was a major war criminal, wanted by the French Government.[71]

Vidal, no friend of DDU's Nazis, promptly arranged for French Military Intelligence to interview Barbie as a defence witness for René Hardy.[72] The Deuxième Bureau was content to take a written statement, but the rival Sûreté was livid. Barbie must be turned over for trial for his own war crimes. Vidal had no objection, and made the arrangements. Once again, the State Department had to tell Vidal the facts of life.[73]

They were better informed than CIC: the French conservatives really did not want Barbie back, because he could expose several prominent French politicians as Gestapo informers and create a scandal that might give the Communists a greater share of power. The Sûreté, which was heavily penetrated by Moscow,[74] wanted Barbie as a pawn to discredit François Poncet, the French High Commissioner for Germany. It was an ugly story. France's highest ranking official in occupied Germany had been an informant for Klaus Barbie and the Gestapo.[75]

By July 1949, Vidal knew that whatever Poncet had told Barbie during the war had caused the State Department to believe that France would never officially request Barbie's extradition. Indeed, Poncet ensured that the French paperwork never crossed his own desk to reach McCloy, his American counterpart.[76]

The DDU agents in Germany were quite amused at Poncet's game, until the French got wise and submitted the paperwork directly to Washington, bypassing Poncet and their operatives around McCloy. State Department channels buzzed with secret messages about Barbie's 'highly embarrassing' potential.[77]

That was an understatement. Barbie knew about the Tenzerov–Turkul–Gehlen connection and the relocation of Grynioch and Lebed. Worse, Poncet's wartime indiscretions to the Gestapo could hand the French Communists a major propaganda victory.

In May 1950 Vidal received instructions from Colonel Eckmann, the CIC 'special squad' liaison to DDU. Barbie was not to be turned over to the French, contrary to the State Department's public statements. There was more to the Barbie connection than CIC knew: 'there are ramifications at higher headquarters of which this region has no knowledge.'[78]

Indeed there were. CIC never knew it, but François Poncet was the secret source of the Vatican's Red Cross passports. According to a source in a Western intelligence service, whose information was confirmed by another Western agency, Poncet was de Gaulle's connection to Intermarium.[79] Before the war, he was the French Ambassador to the Third Reich and then to Italy. After war broke out, he was interned by Mussolini until he was kidnapped by Barbie and taken to France. Poncet confirmed this in his diaries.[80]

As early as 1946, US intelligence in Austria knew that the 'International Red Cross were issuing temporary identity documents under assumed names . . . to persons operating under the protection of the Vatican', including war criminals,[81] and that Red Cross couriers were being used to evade Allied mail censorship. Before his death in 1989, Father Cecelja confirmed that he had access to blank Red Cross papers, which he gave to fugitives in Austria en route to Draganović. Poncet was the source.

In pursuit of Intermarium, de Gaulle permitted Poncet to wear two hats. He was both French High Commissioner for Germany (which controlled the distribution of HICOG travel documents), and French representative to the International Red Cross (which distributed the passports that Father Draganović so desperately needed). Poncet became Vice President of the Red Cross International Committee, and later President.[82] The CIC later discovered that Poncet was meeting Dr Joseph Müller in a Munich safehouse, but did not realise that Müller had been the Black Orchestra's emissary to the Vatican.[83]

The State Department stumbled on the Red Cross connection because of La Vista's report on Vatican Nazi smuggling. His report was quickly removed from normal channels and passed to the super secret Special Projects Division in Washington (DDU's predecessor) where it was quietly shelved. The Red Cross was discreetly advised to tighten security before anyone else found out.[84]

When the Barbie case exploded, Dulles himself came to Poncet's rescue. They were old friends from the diplomatic service. In return for keeping Barbie out of harm's way, Poncet promised Dulles a share of the Red Cross passports. Their deal was reluctantly but absolutely confirmed by several sources in Western intelligence.[85] As we shall see, Poncet's recruitment was the culmination of DDU's plan to take over the Vatican's Ratlines from the British and the French.

Keeping Barbie out of harm's way was no easy matter. As late as June 1950, the State Department hoped the French would not press the case. They publicly told the French they could not find Barbie in the US zone. Simultaneously, they told the Army not to look.[86] Orders were orders, so the Army never officially asked CIC if they knew Barbie's whereabouts.

But the problem would not go away. The British suddenly chimed in with an arrest warrant for Barbie. The affidavit was signed by Hoffman, Barbie's old comrade-in-arms. Worse, the French extradition request would soon be officially delivered to the American High Commissioner. The DDU feared that the case would blow up in their faces, and decided to make scapegoats of the CIC.[87]

To his utter shock, Vidal received an official State Department order to report whether CIC objected to Barbie's extradition. Vidal scrawled across the memo 'a foul one!' Indeed it was. Apparently, DDU was hoping that Barbie's side job with CIC was so sensitive that Vidal would conceal him, and let them off the hook for hiding him.[88]

But Barbie's actual work for CIC was so inconsequential that they had nothing to fear. The popular view, that the CIC protected him because he infiltrated the German Communists is a fraud. CIC Headquarters had already covertly photocopied the entire Communist party registry. Barbie's trivial bits of information were superfluous. The only operation he could expose was the dirty tricks shop of DDU.[89]

Vidal ensured the scapegoat plan backfired. Both CIC and CIA cheerfully informed the High Commissioner they had no objections to handing Barbie over for trial. In October 1950 DDU struck back with a last ditch effort to force CIC to take the blame for the Barbie fiasco. Cunningham of DDU (who was under cover as local HICOG representative) complained to McCloy's intelligence chief that CIC was refusing to look for Barbie, and that the Army should be forced to investigate his whereabouts.[90]

This bit of whining was ineffectual, as the CIC would not be bluffed. Vidal had previously agreed to turn Barbie over to the French and would have done so had it not been for DDU's counter order in May 1950. What happened next is difficult to document. The following fourteen files have been removed from the State Department's archives, but it appears that the High Commissioner's Office issued Barbie with Allied Control Board travel documents, and sent him down the Vatican Ratline.[91]

Draganović promptly shipped him off to South America under the name of Klaus Altmann. In Bolivia, Barbie was received by Draganović's local representative, Father Rocque Romac, another Fascist Croatian priest and wanted war criminal, whose real identity was Father Stjepan Osvaldi-Toth.[92] Vidal's obstinacy really did not matter in the end: the DDU arranged for Major Milano to staff the Ratlines, and CIC got the blame after all.

However, a close examination of the badly copied Barbie documents reveals that the State Department co-ordinated his passage down the Ratline.[93]

Indeed, almost all of the early passengers on the American Ratlines were handled by the State Department's Office of Policy Co-ordination (OPC) through their contact man in Rome:

> In fact, many of Draganović's phoney exit papers were arranged through Robert Bishop, an American ex-OSS agent who was then in charge of the eligibility office of the International Refugee Organization (IRO) in Rome, according to CIC records. Bishop was one of the . . . OPC's most important assets in that city. He had worked . . . on a variety of clandestine projects in Istanbul, Bucharest and Rome since at least 1944.[94]

Bishop, not surprisingly, had also been a member of Angleton's operation.[95] Unfortunately, he had a nervous breakdown due to alcoholism and started to babble stories about underground armies and covert financing of the Italian elections, claiming that he was 'the saviour of Italy'.[96] Like Barbie, he knew too much and was quietly removed before he could further embarrass the Vatican and his superiors.

In 1950, just as the Barbie case was threatening to explode, Dulles stepped out of the woodwork to take over briefly from Frank Wisner as head of OPC. Within a few months, Wisner was back in command when Dulles became Deputy Director of CIA. Bringing Dulles in to smooth relations between OPC and CIA was one of Truman's biggest mistakes, for he brought the Ratlines with him. Shortly after Barbie reached Bolivia, and Dulles joined CIA, the pretence was dropped. Perry's office told the Austrian CIC that their services were no longer required:

> In closing, 430th stated that they are not 'budgeted' beyond 30 June 1951, and implied that they may have to cease this [Ratline] operation after that date. They further stated that a directive received through G2, USFA, indicated that some time in the undetermined future CIA will assume all responsibility for evacuations. Although it is not certain, it appears to 430th that end of the budget and assumption of control by CIA roughly coincide.[97]

To this day, the Justice Department, the CIC and the CIA do not know how the State Department pulled off the Barbie affair, or what was really at stake. It was Dulles's very survival. While the CIA was booting out ABN's Nazis and Philby was sending them to Canada, DDU had brought them back in with phony (and very illegal) visas issued in Germany.[98] Although smuggling Nazis was a felony, the State Department brought Mykola Lebed to America in October 1949, using a false name and background.[99]

Barbie knew too much about Lebed, and Lebed knew too much about Turkul. By the time Barbie went down the Ratline in March 1951,[100] the Augsburg connection had passed the point of no return. Shortly after the OUN split, the 'Ukrainian Vlasov Committee' (Bučko's Galician SS) agreed to work with Turkul.[101] Barbie's Ukrainian contacts had solidified Turkul's base as the rising émigré force. With his ties to Lebed, Gehlen and Dulles, Turkul campaigned to 'unify' all the émigré groups. It was the same infiltration and co-option strategy he had used to split the Third Reich's émigrés.[102]

Turkul had an uncanny knack; he belonged to every faction simultaneously and through his interlocking membership on their executives, advanced his position as the eminence grise of the émigré anti-Communist movement. Turkul charmed his way through the alphabet soup of émigré groups and swallowed them one after another.

By March 1948, Turkul was a leading member of Saint Andrew's Flag, AZODNR, and the paramilitary youth wing of the Vlasov Army. In December 1948, as soon as he had formed a coalition of these groups, Turkul tried to dissolve them and form a new organisation, the KOW, or 'Committee of United Vlasovites'. Eighteen months later, KOW sponsored a conference with other Vlasov organisations, which formed the 'combat union for the liberation of the Peoples of Russia', with its own military centre called SWOD.[103]

To increase his influence, Turkul went international. In September 1950 he tried to merge with the US Kerensky Committee and the Russian monarchists in Paris, but Turkul's organisation was rejected for being too far on the totalitarian right. Turkul then downplayed his Nazi past, and joined the Supreme Council of Russian Exiles.[104] Finally, he proposed that all groups merge into the 'Russian Committee of Liberation'.

There was one ethnic group excluded from Turkul's new committee, as US censors discovered when they opened his mail: 'Our movement will never agree to have Jews on the Russian Committee of Liberation . . . Jews are responsible for 50 million people shot.'[105]

Turkul's shifting alliances were meant to confuse. He downplayed his Nazi affiliations to please the Americans, yet at the same time he joined the British-sponsored ABN. His contradictory loyalties did not trouble Colonel Perry. He vouched for Turkul as an ABN leader and close friend of General Glasenap, who had 'excellent contacts with a US Intelligence Agency in Germany'. As of 14 September 1950, Perry knew of no derogatory information on Turkul.[106] Even Region IV's renegades knew better, listing him as a 'Notorious double agent . . . heading NTS'.[107]

Turkul's post-war network included his old Ukrainian friend Kowalewsky and Vuković of the Serbian movement.[108] NTS leaders were a diverse group: Russian priest Alexiew Kisiliew, who ran a 'Russian School' in Munich along with Father Grabbe and Engineer Marmulkow; Baranowsky ran 'a considerable net for the Americans'; Victor Bajdalakow was NTS Chief, and his assistant, Boldyreff was the liaison in Washington.[109] Boris Ovseenko ran the Australian wing out of the Fairbane Hostel in Canberra, where many Ukrainian Nazis were housed after migrating under the DP scheme.[110]

Major Milano's agreement with the State Department in Germany, which barred NTS members from entry or exit from the US zone, was abandoned.[111] But NTS was still on CIC's banned list in Germany. They rejected Turkul's visa application in 1951, as it 'was felt that his previous intelligence activities could be a security risk to the country', and because he 'was considered [as] having totalitarian rightist leanings'.[112]

Turkul's liaison in Washington, Boldyreff, made things worse when he launched a propaganda offensive. This caused former SS leader, Werner Ohletz, to approach the Americans to warn them against Boldyreff:

> BOLDYREFF portrays the ideologies of the NTS and emphasizes its fight against Nazism and Bolshevism. To this I say the following: As long as it seemed that Germany would win the war, the NTS was very eager to co-operate with the German authories and Intelligence Service. But when it became clear that the Allies would probably be victorious, the NTS began to work for both sides and thus became even more dangerous to the German cause . . .
> [Ohletz] states that it is dangerous to co-operate with the NTS and that German Intelligence determined from experience long ago that it was more successful to collaborate with a Democratic Anti-Great Russian Organization and to back their political aims.[113]

As the officer in charge of the SS section which took over military intelligence from Canaris, Ohletz had long and bitter experience with Soviet émigré organisations. He described Vlasov's plan to 'liquidate a few million' in order to take over Russia, and added that 'a similar reply was also received from the White Russian General Turkul'.[114] Ohletz warned that 'the German Counter Intelligence Service found that all Émigré Organizations were infiltrated by the NKVD with such effectiveness that it was impossible to discover the connecting lines from top ranking people to the common follower'.[115]

Ohletz insisted that it was 'futile to attempt a co-ordination of Russian Émigré Groups toward a single political direction'.[116] Army intelligence agreed:

> As source emphasized in his conclusions, Émigré Groups have been infiltrated by Russian intelligence Agencies to the extent that the degree of penetration is not always discernible. It is significant that neither OHLETZ or SCHELLENBERG, who were charged with the obtaining of positive intelligence in the RSHA, failed to discern the extent and ease with which the Turkul organization penetrated the German Intelligence Service and the Vlasov movement. [emphasis in original]
>
> For the purposes of illustrating the danger of employing émigré organizations as intelligence collection agencies, Turkul's organization has been selected as a vehicle to illustrate the following:
>
> a. Penetration of émigré organizations by Russian agents;
> b. The elusiveness of the Soviet Intelligence deception measures;
> c. The unreliability and irresponsibility of these oganizations for intelligence purposes;
> d. The unsuspiciousness and failure of the German intelligence service to realize that this organization was working for the Soviets.[117]

It is ironic that Army intelligence selected NTS as an example of Soviet penetration, while ignoring Turkul himself. Still, the report was scathing. NTS was denounced for inciting premature rebellion with its propaganda. It was also believed that NTS had no partisans of its own behind the 'Iron Curtain', and was simply trying to wreck the fragile unity of pro-US groups.[118] Indeed, the CIC had also pegged Turkul's agents as saboteurs, citing their intrigues in the Saint Andrew's Flag.[119] The Soviets consistently helped their agents by denouncing them as war criminals.[120]

Dulles and Gehlen fell for the trap. Anyone condemned by the Soviets was all right in their book. They ignored the Army's warnings and expanded support for NTS. Without CIA knowing, Dulles's clique poured millions of dollars into Turkul's networks. Dulles's determination to hide his Nazis from the 'liberals' fooled the CIA; they thought their money was going to democratic groups. As Philby himself recalls:

> The American attack on the alliance between Bandera and SIS gathered strength in 1950, and much of my time in the United States was spent in transmitting acrimonious exchanges between Washington and London on the rival merits of obscure émigré factions. The CIA proferred three objections to Bandera as an ally. His extreme nationalism, with its fascist overtones, was a handicap which would prejudice Western dealings with other groups inside the Soviet Union; for example, the Great Russians. He was alleged to have his roots in the old emigration and to lack all contact with the new 'more realistic' emigration which the Americans were busy cultivating. Finally, he was accused flatly of being anti-American. The British plea that Bandera was being used solely for the purpose of gathering intelligence, and that such a use could have no political significance, was brushed aside by the Americans, who argued that, whatever the nature of the connection, its very existence must inflate Bandera's prestige in the Ukraine. They professed fears that any reinforcement of Bandera's following must risk splitting the 'resistance movement' in the Ukraine with whom they were themselves working.[121]

Philby must have giggled when the Americans complained that SIS support for Bandera undermined their work with moderate Ukrainian and Russian émigrés. While the CIA chased Bandera's Nazis, Dulles brought the Turkul and Lebed network into the CIA through Gehlen's back door. Angleton made sure that the CIA kept their hands off Dulles's empire, regaling Philby with tales of Gehlen's prowess. Philby recalled that Angleton knew that French intelligence was hopelessly penetrated by Soviet double agents, however:

> Angleton had fewer fears about Germany. That country concerned him chiefly as a base of operations against the Soviet bloc and the socialist states of Eastern Europe. The CIA lost no time in taking over the anti-Soviet section of the German Abwehr, under von Gehlen . . . Angleton [defended] with chapter and verse, the past record and current activities of the von Gehlen organization.[122]

The former Abwehr section hired by Angleton turned out to be Turkul's phoney MAX network. If Angleton knew that the Army believed NTS was riddled, he certainly kept it to himself. There are curious holes in the CIA files which suggest that Angleton 'compartmentalised' any information that might embarrass Dulles, Gehlen or Turkul. For example, when Lebed's Nazi past was uncovered by the Immigration Service, CIA's head agreed to sponsor him for permanent citizenship under the special provisions of the 100 Persons Act (which allowed 100 US agents to surreptitiously enter the country each year).

Yet, the CIA's own analysts could not even find Lebed's first name when they compiled files on Nazi Ukrainian agents.[123] In the late 1970s, CIA reported to Congress that no 'war criminals, assassins, or persons of that type' had ever been brought in under the 100 Persons Act.

The popular view is that CIA deliberately lied. The truth is more tragic. The DDU became a pseudo-CIA inside CIA that hid information instead of centralising it. The CIA does not realise to this day that a trio of 'useful idiots' – Dulles, Wisner and Angleton – sabotaged their filing system to protect the State Department's Nazis. Much derogatory information was never passed by Angleton to the responsible CIA analysts.[124] Former British intelligence officer, Peter Wright, claimed that Angleton even hid files from the President.[125]

After Eisenhower became President in January 1953, Dulles's agency-within-the-Agency received official sanction. Dulles became CIA head, Wisner was placed in charge of covert operations, and Angleton kept the Vatican files to himself.[126] Even then the old DDU hands kept the rest of the CIA in the dark. All information on NTS was diverted to Wisner's Program Branch, where it was secure from the 'liberals'.[127]

Dulles told his staff that gloves were off. Lebed's SB assassinated suspected Soviet agents,[128] and Angleton and Wisner launched Operation Red Sox/Red Cap, the code name for the overthrow of Communist regimes behind the 'Iron Curtain'.[129] They were funding Turkul: his recently declassified CIC file contains several references to front groups 'financed by AMCOMLIB', the American Committee for the Liberation of the Peoples of Russia.[130] This committee, better known today as Radio Liberty, has been publicly acknowledged as one of Dulles's funding conduits.[131]

The CIA and Radio Liberty were ignorant of Ukrainian assassins or Nazi smuggling. They needed access to the Immigration Service's top secret files on the OUN and the State Department's security investigation of Stanislav Stankievich; neither is in the CIA's filing index.[132] To put it bluntly, the DDU clique was laundering CIA money to finance an array of corrupt activities, including the GRU's creature, the NTS.

In February 1956 Turkul tried to leave Europe before the final curtain came down, and again applied for a US visa under the laxer rules of the 1953 Refugee Relief Act. The Kremlin should erect a statue to Senator Joseph McCarthy: his hysterical anti-Communism forced Congress to change the laws to permit entry of Nazis who had only fought against the Soviets. Turkul's wife and sister-in-law were already in America. Relying on British intelligence advice, the CIC again concluded in August 1956 that 'investigation did not reveal any information that SUBJECT had been doubling as a Soviet Agent'.[133]

Three months later, at the height of the bloody Hungarian rebellion, the NTS incited false hopes of Western assistance, enabling the Soviets to smash the revolt and discredit Dulles's 'freedom fighters' for ever:

> In the wake of the failed rebellion there was considerable controversy over whether or not the United States had misled street fighters in Budapest into believing that US military aid would be delivered to the rebels. Many anti-Communist Hungarian refugees bitterly charged that such promises – supposedly broadcast over Radio Free Europe – had resulted in considerable unnecessary bloodshed when rebels held out to the last man in the false hope that international help was on the way . . .
> In fact, however, misleading claims that American military aid was on the way had been broadcast by radio, though not by Radio Free Europe. According to a special investigation by the parliamentary Council of Europe, the Russian nationalist NTS organization was responsible for beaming ill-considered pledges into Hungary at the height of the rebellion. The NTS, as it turns out, sporadically operated a clandestine radio station named Radio Free Moscow, aimed at Soviet troops in East Germany, and they decided to send its signal into Hungary at the height of the fighting. As with other NTS projects of the period, Radio Free Moscow was staffed primarily by former Nazi collaborators – for it is they who made up most of the NTS leadership during the 1950s – and was almost entirely financed by the CIA.[134]

In one master stroke, Turkul had broken the anti-Soviet resistance. Subsequent investigations showed that it was Angleton's and Wisner's Red Sox/Red Cap NTS agents who had broadcast the misleading propaganda to the Hungarians. The remaining operations were scrapped. Operation Red Sox/Red Cap was the culmination of General Turkul's work for the Soviet Union. He died peacefully in 1959.[135]

Both the CIA and Gehlen belatedly agreed that Turkul was himself a Soviet agent.[136] In order to absolve themselves, Dulles and Angleton blamed the mole ridden British Intelligence Service for this 'slew of Soviet agents, including the White Russian general Anton Turkul'.[137] In hindsight, even Sir William Stephenson agreed that Turkul 'was in fact a Soviet agent sending chickenfeed to the Nazis to maintain his credibility', while he was really loyal to Moscow.[138] There was enough embarrassment to go around. By mutual Western agreement, an eery shroud of silence descended over the Turkul scandal; it lasted for over three decades.

It was exactly what the Kremlin wanted. Because of the deliberate Soviet silence, the West was lulled to sleep. No one re-investigated Turkul's 'unimportant' years in Rome. No one re-examined his role in the Ratline run by Perry and Milano. No one remembered the mail intercepts showing that Turkul was co-ordinating the 'Yugoslav emigration' networks. No one suspected a Soviet connection inside the Vatican.[139]

Even when Father Draganović retired behind the 'Iron Curtain', no one suspected that the Vatican Ratlines had been run by Moscow from the beginning. There is not one word in Turkul's US intelligence files of his connection to the Vatican's Black Orchestra. The Americans did not even open a file on the Schwarze Kapelle until seven years after World War II.

In 1952 the US European Command requested information about 'the Schwarze Kapelle' from its three major intelligence organisations: the CIA's 'Department of Army Detachment' (DAD); the State Department's 'Document Disposal Unit' (DDU); and the Headquarters of the 66th CIC Detachment (previously the 970th). They searched their files and found nothing. However, in Berlin, Region I of the CIC had a 'usually reliable source', who described the Soviet operation to control the Black Orchestra. The origins of Soviet penetration were laid out in one short paragraph:

> . . . the Schwarze Kapelle was formerly comprised of high ranking Wehrmacht officers and had at one time been directed by Admiral Canaris. [Source] stated that the Schwarze Kapelle had been activated between the years 1930 and 1934, at which time the Rote Kapelle, an organization comprised mainly of MVD [Soviet Military Intelligence] members and sympathizers, was active as a resistance organization. Initially the two organizations were co-ordinated to form a united front, however, the Schwarze Kapelle activities subsided to the extent that those > individuals who remained active looked to the Rote Kapelle for guidance.[140]

Somehow one man had discovered the Soviets' best kept secret: their Red Orchestra controlled the Vatican's Black Orchestra. The US agent had no idea what his source was talking about. He closed the file and put it away. The Vatican never realised that it had fallen into a Soviet trap when it joined the Black Orchestra in 1939. The Ratlines were run from the Kremlin.

Conclusions

We do not claim that this history of the Vatican Ratlines is complete, nor that it is totally free from error. Analysing the declassified files is akin to pasting the leaves back on a tree after a violent storm has passed. It is hard enough to trace the branches of Cold War diplomacy, let alone its secret intelligence roots. The passing decades have scattered many pages, covered over a great deal, and much remains hidden in the vaults. Even the declassified files may have deceived us; disinformation may have blurred our vision of how these documents originally fitted into the tangled web.

But our purpose was not to chart a single tree but to map the wreckage of the forest. Where disaster cut a swath across the nations, the débris of previously classified files from every corner of the world reveals the track of the secret storm. The trail of wrecked operations and covert destruction leads inexorably back to Rome. The hurricane's centre was in the Vatican.

However, Pius XII and his closest advisers were surrounded by a whirlwind of forces: the Soviets had penetrated the Nazi nationalists; the French, British and Americans had recruited the Nazis for their anti-Communist crusade. Some may feel that the Vatican should be exonerated because it was deceived on all sides. The truth is that the Vatican knew exactly what it was doing at critical points, and adopted policies which led to its own disgrace.

However, while the focus of this book is the Vatican, we would be remiss if we failed to mention the involvement of other nations. It would take many volumes to fully outline the evidence against them. Moreover, in the course of researching this book, we have come across many additional issues that are too complex for current resolution. Before turning to the Vatican itself, we set forth our suggestions on how the pieces may fit together, so that future historians may eventually solve the puzzle. The reader is cautioned that, unlike the preceding chapters, this is simply the authors' opinion of the possible international scope of the Ratlines.

The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics

The Soviet Union's infiltration of the Ratlines was a stunning technical achievement in espionage. The twin virus of the GRU and KGB encircled the Vatican and infiltrated every pore of the Nazi networks. The Soviets ascertained the weak spot in the Western defensive system: a sad tendency on the part of our intelligence services to affiliate with extreme right-wing movements. Stalin's agents not only used the ultra-right as a camouflage, they manipulated these extremist groups to polarise and defeat the Western response to Communism. Instead of democracy, there was Durčansky; instead of truth, there was Turkul; instead of freedom there were Fascist spokesmen for the anti-Communist cause; instead of ending Stalin's tyranny, totalitarian agents were infiltrated among our own populations.

We wished to conduct one final interview to complete the history of the Ratlines. One of our researchers travelled to Moscow and requested permission to film an interview with Kim Philby. Philby reviewed the list of questions we had prepared, and agreed to participate. We suspected that it was the first time that anyone had asked him about his part in Nazi-smuggling operations run by the Vatican and the Western nations. Senior Soviet officials assured us that in the new era of glasnost, it was time for all the old scandals of the Stalin era to be exposed. However, after repeated delays, the Philby interview was postponed.

Our contact explained with some embrarrassment that our request was being reviewed at a higher level. Shortly afterwards, news of the Ligachev–Gorbachev struggle in the Politbureau was leaked to the press. Perhaps coincidentally, we were told that Philby had changed his mind and, as a free Soviet citizen could not be compelled to do the interview. It was suggested that perhaps things would change in a few months. Shortly afterwards, Philby's death was announced.

Apparently, there are limits to glasnost. From the declassified Western files, there can be no doubt that Soviet intelligence encouraged and assisted the emigration of Nazis. Nor is there any doubt that Philby himself helped build the smuggling network as a Trojan horse for Communist penetration of Western intelligence.

Perhaps there are older, deeper scandals. There have been rumours, never verified, that some of the top Nazi war criminals were Soviet double agents. Schellenberg, for example, insisted that Müller, the head of the Gestapo, was working for Moscow.[1] If he is right, that would explain why it took so long for Müller's Gestapo to detect the Western half of the Red Orchestra, and why Turkul's net continued to survive.

Even the admission that Turkul's MAX network was working for Soviet military intelligence could be a major source of embarrassment. The issue for future historians may not be why the Soviet Army did so well in World War II, but why they did so poorly. The more interesting explanation for modern Soviet silence is that some aspects of the Ratlines are still being run from the Kremlin.

Austria

The declassified US files confirm that the post-war Austrian government supported the Vatican's plans for the revival of Intermarium. According to one source, the Austrian liaison was Kurt Waldheim.[2] If true, this would explain a great many things. Waldheim says that he was not involved with war crimes in the bloody Kozara massacre of 1942, that he was many miles away, working for the German Quartermaster in western Yugoslavia. Collecting food is hardly a capital offence, but it does show that Waldheim may have had an opportunity to meet Father Draganović, who was in charge of forced requisitioning for the Ustashi in western Bosnia at the time of the Kozara offensive.[3] Waldheim certainly made an impression on Ante Pavelić, who awarded him a silver medal with oak leaf clusters for his services in the same region at the same time.

As was later acknowledged by Waldheim's former superior, Allied intelligence should have disqualified him from any position with the Austrian Foreign Service.[4] In 1945 it was Allen Dulles's son-in-law who provided the Austrian government with a wildly erroneous background check that ignored Waldheim's true military record.[5]

Whether by blunder or design, Waldheim was cleared to join the Austrian diplomatic corps at the time his governemnt repeatedly turned a blind eye toward the Ustashi's terrorist network on their soil, even letting them openly recruit in the DP camps. Draganović himself later became an Austrian citizen before he returned to Yugoslavia.

The Communist countries have been unusually silent about Waldheim's past, providing the necessary votes to elect him UN Secretary General against the Western-backed candidate. The West German press has critically examined Waldheim's UN record, and now questions who he was really working for. It should be noted, however, that the Yugoslav rumours about Waldheim's secret Nazi dossier have never been verified. Indeed, the Yugoslav Communists have engaged in what is apparently a calculated campaign of disinformation on the Waldheim affair, perhaps because of Tito's close post-war relations with the Austrian President.

When the allegations against Waldheim were made in 1986, a respected American journalist with impeccable Yugoslav contacts made a series of startling claims about Communist attempts to blackmail the Austrian in the late 1940s. Based on interviews with former Yugoslav secret police and government officials, it was alleged that the Waldheim war crimes dossier was manufactured and used to threaten him when he was secretary to the Austrian Foreign Minister. This was before the Tito–Stalin split, and it was claimed that the blackmail operation was eventually taken over by the Soviets, and that 'Waldheim was recruited' by them.[6]

The story was vehemently denied by both Waldheim and Belgrade, and some of the journalist's Communist sources retracted important details. But according to US intelligence files, someone in the Austrian Foreign Ministry was in fact assisting the Vatican's intelligence operations after the war. That person's identity will only be known if an independent examination of the classified files is made by the Austrian government.

Italy

The evidence is overwhelming that the covert policy of the Italian government was to subvert foreign governments and create the political entity known as Intermarium. This policy was pursued with the help of the Vatican, Britain and America. There is a consistent pattern of evidence that Italian security, police and intelligence officials played a prominent part in the false identity chain for the fugitive Nazi war criminals. Indeed, the Ratlines could not have functioned without Prime Minister Alcide de Gasperi's official sanction and support, as in the case of gun running to the Križari.

While the extent of Soviet penetration of Italy is not clear, it appears that Mussolini's intelligence service was co-opted by the Turkul network, and that a significant number of agents of the Fascist intelligence service remained in their posts after World War II. The P2 scandal, involving an extreme right wing intelligence group that supported neo-Fascist terrorism in an attempted coup, follows the pattern of Soviet agent provocateur successes in other Western countries which harboured Fascist cliques.

France

It is certain that François Poncet and Henri Lebrun worked for Barbie as informants, but what did they tell him? An American CIC officer confirmed that the US Government mentioned something called TECHNICA when they asked him why Barbie was protected for so long. It is difficult to know exactly what TECHNICA involved, but the few references in declassified literature suggest that it was a rogue French operation controlled by British intelligence, without de Gaulle's knowledge. It eliminated post-war Communist rivals in the resistance by betraying their identities to the Nazis. If true, the TECHNICA connection could explain why the anti-Communist French Military was so reluctant to have Barbie back.

Whatever Poncet's mysterious involvement with Barbie, the Black Orchestra, or TECHNICA, the role of the French government in the post-war revival of Intermarium is clearly demonstrated by several independent sources. Charles de Gaulle was the man who led the Nazis on the road to the Vatican and freedom. French politician Paul Reynaud was the Vatican's front man in France, and the French General Staff were up to their epaulettes in smuggling war criminals.

United States of America

The spectre of the Vatican Ratlines continues to haunt American politicians. In anticipation of certain victory by his candidate in the impending November 1948 American elections, Allen Dulles told his friend, Frank Wisner, to go ahead with smuggling the Ratlines' recruits. Much of the false paperwork was already in the visa pipeline when word came of Truman's stunning re-election. Dulles must have been crushed. It would be four more years before he would become head of the CIA. Wisner must have been terrified; he had transformed the Vatican Ratlines into an illegal immigration pipeline, codenamed Operation Bloodstone.

In 1949 Intermarium's first Nazi agents finished their long journey and arrived in America. They were welcomed by 'Carmel Offie, the OPC officer working under State Department cover who was responsible for the care and feeding of a number of Bloodstone émigrés'.[7] Offie had been promoted as Wisner's assistant for 'émigré affairs' and managed to find some of the Nazis jobs as broadcasters for Radio Liberty and the Voice of America.

Offie knew how the game was played. He had previously helped the Vatican get travel passes for their 'religious missions' (Hudal and Draganović) to the prison camps, and later served as Political Adviser in Germany. There was only one little problem: Carmel Offie was accused of being a Communist spy.

To this day, Offie's friends continue to deny that he was a Soviet mole. 'How could the Soviets blackmail him? Everyone in Washington knew he was a homosexual!'[8] Both Philby and Offie were widely regarded as victims of McCarthyism who were hounded out of public service. Like Philby, Offie received a sinecure position doing intelligence work on the side.[9]

What no one realised at the time was that Offie had succeeded where Philby had failed: he had transplanted the Vatican Virus to America where it would flourish undetected within US intelligence for the next several decades. While the CIA was booting out the Nazi Anti-Bolshevik Bloc of Nations, Offie was bringing them in the back door through DDU. The case of Carmel Offie deserves a long second look. It was another scandal that Dulles swept under the rug.

When Allen Dulles finally became head of the CIA in 1953, he and Wisner were too embarrassed or too stupid to realise what the Soviets had done. According to one former intelligence officer 'the final sting' was that a number of these infiltrated networks were taken on by Wisner, and later incorporated into the CIA.[10] According to one estimate, some 10,000 Nazi war criminals entered the United States after World War II.[11] Dulles could not risk investigating Communist infiltration among the Nazis without exposing his own involvement with illegal immigration.

In 1959 the NATO intelligence services reviewed their anti-Soviet failures and concluded that support for the émigrés should be abandoned, as these 'exile organizations were hopelessly riddled with Communist spies'.[12] Ironically, NATO's West German intelligence liaison was Hans Felfe, the top Communist mole in the Gehlen Organisation.

Soviet penetration of the Nazi networks were not only a threat to Allen Dulles's reputation, their exposure would have ruined the political career of Richard Nixon, the Republican candidate for President in 1959. Nixon authorised Dulles's covert projects during Eisenhower's illnesses in 1956 and 1957.[13] After Nixon was defeated and Dulles was fired by President Kennedy, a large number of OPC files were ordered 'routinely destroyed'. Wisner had already committed suicide; Dulles betrayed his country by taking the Vatican secret with him. The CIA discovered too late that Dulles's political cover-up had cost them a decade:

> But it was not until after Philby defected to Moscow [1963] and the Blunt investigations revealed the true extent of the 'Cambridge network' that James Angleton ordered a major reassessment of the CIA's European underground networks. This involved reviewing thousands of previous checks for agents and sources who had earlier been cleared by MI5 and MI6.[14]

Putting Angleton in charge of the investigation was like putting the fox in charge of the hen house. Angleton knew full well what had gone wrong. He was the CIA's principal expert on World War II Nazi intelligence, as well as its Vatican liaison. As Chief of CIA Counter Intelligence, Angleton was in a perfect position to see that politically embarrassing dossiers never made it out of his office.

Of course, there were always a few insiders who knew the dirty little Nazi secret. During the subsequent Nixon administration, the US States Department secretly informed the Australian government that they were ignoring Ustashi fugitives in America because they were useful in turning out the ethnic vote 'in several federal, state and municipal elections'.[15]

The only thing Nixon's State Department did about the Nazis was to quietly warn a few American politicians not to attend any Croation functions on 10 April, as that is the occasion when the Ustashi celebrate the day Hitler set up Pavelić's puppet government. Apparently the warning did not reach Governor Ronald Reagan. He proclaimed 10 April as 'Croatian Independence Day' in California and later, as President, had his picture taken in the White house with prominent ex-Fascists and war criminals of the ABN. Despite the previous condemnation by the State Department and CIA, Jaroslav Stetsko was treated as an honoured guest by Reagan and the leaders of several other Western nations.

It is difficult to believe that George Bush knows absolutely nothing about the Croatian terrorists, since they hijacked an American airliner while he was head of the CIA. Yet President Bush made the same 'mistakes' as Reagan: his campaign staff published a calendar celebrating 10 April as 'Croatian Independence Day' and permitted known Fascists to work on his 'ethnic outreach' programme during the 1988 election campaign. Perhaps Bush heeded the cynical advice of the Nixon administration that the Eastern European Nazis can deliver the ethnic vote.

Many politicians, including Ronald Reagan, have embarrassing ties to the Ratlines. In the US Archives is a newsreel of Reagan in 1950, innocently raising money for one of Dulles's front groups that laundered money to Fascist 'freedom fighters'. Reagan's intelligence chief, William Casey, headed another front group, the International Rescue Committee, that helped the fugitives with their immigration problems. Perhaps Oliver North did not invent the money laundering system for Contragate; he may have simply copied the one that Casey and Reagan had previously worked on.

It seems certain that the Ratlines are alive and well in America. The Nazis from Intermarium and ABN have found a new home: the World Anti-Communist League, formerly headed by retired US General John Singlaub. This is the same organisation suspected by the US Congress of complicity in running guns for Contragate. Some of WACL's leaders were the same Nazis recruited by Kim Philby. The heads of the Western intelligence services may be afraid to open the Cold War files documenting their own leaders' involvement with Nazis for fear that they will hear Stalin laughing from his grave.

Germany

There is substantial evidence in US intelligence files that a portion of the Red Orchestra survived World War II. Soviet intelligence had a special section in Hitler's Germany: the 'BB Apparat', which focused on German technical and scientific advances in warfare. The BB Apparat was kept separate from the run-of-the-mill Communist informants in Germany, and if American intelligence's suspicions are correct, is still at work among the German military industrial complex. Such penetration would explain Stalin's fascination with Hitler's secret weapons development.[16]

Among the dubious achievements of Nazi science was the invention of Sarin, Tabun and Soman. These nerve gases, later called the G-series by NATO, were so effective that the same formulae are still in use today by both the Soviets and the West. According to British records, a man named Mengele was in their custody in 1945 for interrogation concerning chemical weapons, but whether this is a reference to Joseph Mengele or his brother, Karl, is not known. It should be noted that by agreement with the Americans, all German experts on bacteriological and chemical warfare were handed over to British custody.[17]

There is some circumstantial evidence that the British made a deal with Mengele for his nerve gas records. Joseph Mengele suddenly left his hiding place, and despite the fact that he was a wanted war criminal, crossed into the Soviet zone to bring back a trunkful of records that he had buried just before the end of the war. Soon afterwards, Mengele's brother, father and co-researcher at the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute were all released from custody and allowed to resume their civilian employment without regard to their Nazi pasts.[18]

Mengele himself proceeded to Italy for emigration to Argentina. According to Ivo Omrčanin, Draganović's assistant on the Ratlines, they processed 'thousands' of German scientists and technicians who wished to emigrate to South America. When the Americans realised the extent of Stalin's nerve gas production, they hired a few German experts of their own. Even the head of I. G. Farben was brought to America to work on the death gas plants, along with several of the more knowledgeable designers. When their task was finished, they were all allowed to return to West Germany and go back into business.[19]

During the 1970s, US codebreakers found dramatic evidence that West German companies were selling the Sarin secret to several Arab nations in the Middle East. Fifty years after Kristallnacht, Hitler's final solution may be coming to Israel.[20]

According to John McIntyre, an American intelligence agent who worked briefly on the Gehlen end of the Ratlines before he quit in disgust, the Third Reich's most ingenious weapon was the prussic acid gas gun for assassins.[22] Soviet intelligence obtained a copy of the device and issued it to its own assassins in order to make it look like a Gehlen hit. Two of Turkul's rivals, Stephan Bandera and an NTS leader were killed with these devices. Perhaps to protect the surviving members of the BB Apparat, Soviet intelligence has always attributed the proliferation of illegal weapons to the Americans and the Israelis. No one has ever examined the role of West German intelligence as a merchant of death for GRU clients such as Libya and Iraq. The greatest scandal may involve the German bankers, as discussed below.

Even more alarming are reports that West Germany is behind the secret proliferation of nuclear weapons. According to a former Argentine diplomat, a secret nuclear protocol was attached to a West German–Argentine Trade Treaty during the 1960s. The rationale was that West Germany was afraid that some day the Americans would pull out of NATO or withdraw their nuclear shield. Because of Soviet antipathy to German possession of the atomic bomb, it was decided to develop the nuclear weapons secretly by utilising the large émigré communities of German scientists in Argentina and South Africa.[21]

Great Britain

The lion's share of the blame for the Ratlines undoubtedly belongs to the government of Great Britain. In 1990 Lord Shawcross led the fight in the House of Lords to stop belated prosecutions of war criminals. Among the unsatisfactory reasons given was that British soldiers had been assassinated in Palestine after the war, which caused a change in attitude towards the Jews.[23] Despite the ineffective protests of Lord Shawcross, it was under his post-war leadership that British prosecution of Nazi war criminals utterly collapsed, as described in Tom Bower's work, The Pledge Betrayed.[24]

We believe there was another reason. In 1948 the British government had already secretly cabled the Commonwealth countries to stop all investigations of Nazi war criminals.[25] Even before the prosecutions collapsed, the evidence is overwhelming that British intelligence was recruiting Nazi war criminals for several covert projects including Intermarium, Prometheus and NTS. British intelligence sheltered Pavelić, smuggled the Ustashi gold and arranged the mass escapes from Rimini and other camps. His Majesty's Government asked the Vatican for assistance to resettle 'Grey' Nazis, and asked America to help sabotage the screening process. British intelligence maintained contact with their Nazi protégés in Canada and Australia under the guise of ABN. Finally, British intelligence vouched for the Communist-riddled Nazi networks and peddled them around the world as 'freedom fighters'.[26]

The American cover-up was not unique. The British also have methods of dealing with their embarrassing scandals caused by Philby, Ellis and Turkul. As a result of Philby's intervention in 1945, British intelligence did not discover until the mid-1960s that 'Dickie' Ellis was a Nazi agent with ties to General Turkul's Soviet net. Only a handful of people in British intelligence were told Ellis's secret, and they decided that it was so shocking that neither the FBI nor the CIA should know: the White Russian General who was Ellis's 'Nazi' contact had turned NTS into the most deadly weapon of Soviet espionage. British intelligence had sold a Communist net to the gullible Americans. It was better to lie and claim that Ellis was not prosecuted in order to protect the Windsor scandal. That sorry excuse has been used to death. In fact, it was SIS's Colin Gubbins (the Prometheus liaison) who put Ellis to work on the document shredder after Ellis had confessed to treason. It was SIS's reputation, not Windsor's, that was being salvaged.

For the last half century, Britain has been the only Western nation to refuse any access to its intelligence archives. There is good reason. Time after time, American records were withhheld from the authors on the grounds that it would embarrass a foreign government. When the authors asked who was withholding Nazi documents, we were provided with a copy of a letter from the British Embassy in Washington. The British government is sitting on the last secret of the Cold War, and is desperately pressuring its allies to keep the lid on.

The authors' documentary series on Nazis living 'down under' has been credited by the Australian government as the impetus for re-opening war crimes cases. When one of the authors requested CIA permission to inform Australia of certain classified details of Nazi-smuggling to that country, the letter came back with so many deletions that it looked like Swiss cheese. When the authors offered to provide declassified information on the role of British intelligence in protecting these Nazis for the last forty years, the Australian investigator reacted as if he had been bitten by a snake.

The Australian, British and Canadian war crimes investigators limit their inquiries to identifying Nazis living in their particular jurisdiction. No one investigates who helped the Nazis emigrate in the first place. In 1985 one of the authors testified before the US Congress about British sponsorship of Nazi emigration. The US General Accounting Office issued a report confirming our charges that American intelligence agencies had protected Nazis who had previously been employed by another Allied nation, but deleted all references to Britain. The only thing the British did well was the cover-up.

But we live in an age of documents, there are no more secrets, only deferred disclosures. Piece by piece, the archivists in Washington, Rome, Ottawa, London and Canberra have declassified seemingly innocuous documents, and the Ratlines' outlines have emerged. Behind the Nazis were the Vatican, behind the Vatican were the British, behind the British were the Communists.

'Forget about the Communists,' one of the old spies told us. He explained that we should ignore all the ideologies as a smokescreen and follow the one common denominator that made sense. 'Trace the money,' he said. And so we did. As the last layer of the onion peeled away, we found out who was at the centre of the Ratlines.

The Bankers

During World War II, the Swedish corporation SKF controlled 80 per cent of all the ball bearing production in Europe, and held the patents for most of the world:

> . . . the power behind their production and distribution as SKF Chairman was Sven Winquist, a dashing playboy friend of Goering and the Duke and Duchess of Windsor. He was a prominent partner in Jacob Wallenberg's Stockholm Enskilda, the largest private bank in Sweden – a correspondent of Hitler's Reichsbank.[27]

While Raoul Wallenberg was heroically rescuing Hungary's Jews, his relative, Jacob, was the most important Nazi banker in history. Sixty per cent of SKF's world-wide production went to Germany.[28] By 1943, the Americans had had enough. But when the US Ambassador to Stockholm demanded an embargo, the Swedish Foreign Minister coolly threatened to publish the full correspondence which would show that 'trade between Sweden and Germany was on a contract basis known to the allied governments and based on prior agreements with them'.

British Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Kingsley Wood, described pre-war Western deals with Nazi bankers: 'This country has various rights and interests . . . under our international trust agreements between the various governments. It would not be in our interest to sever connection.'[29] The British Minister of Economic Warfare, Lord Selbourne, begged the Americans not to put SKF on the embargo blacklist, and instead outbid the Nazis for Wallenberg's ball bearings.[30]

According to Anthony Cave Brown, Wallenberg had high British connections indeed. He was working both sides of the fence as a go-between for the Black Orchestra. Apparently, British intelligence used Jacob Wallenberg for shuttle diplomacy with the Nazis at the same time that Raoul Wallenberg was aiding the Jews. The Soviets captured Raoul and tortured him for several weeks before they realised they had the wrong Wallenberg. They killed him to cover up their British connection. Of course, Jacob Wallenberg had an American intelligence connection as well. SKF's American lawyer was Allen Dulles. In fact, the Dulles brothers had represented most of the Nazi banks prior to the outbreak of the war.

Allen Dulles was also connected to the Swiss Bank of International Settlements (BIS) through a German correspondent bank headed by Kurt von Schroeder. Somehow the bankers learned of the secret American plan to invade North Africa in 1942, for immediately the > German bankers, along with their French correspondents, transferred 9 billion gold francs via the BIS to Algiers. Anticipating German defeat, they were seeking a killing in dollar exchange. The collaborationists boosted their holdings from $350 to $525 million almost overnight . . . Another collaborator in the scheme was one of the Vatican's espionage group who leaked the secret to others in Hitler's high command.[31]

Apparently the Holy See was not above making a profit out of its intelligence operations. Still the spectacle of Nazi, French, British, Japanese and Vatican bankers all swapping information to make a profit on the currency exchange is one that would have chilled the blood of the soldiers on whose lives they were betting.

From the bankers' point of view, the Vatican's peace negotiations with Germany were a convenient cover for continuing business as usual with the Nazis. At the same time, bankers like Wallenberg had protected themselves just in case the Allies won or the bumbling Black Orchestra ever succeeded in assassinating Hitler. The Vatican's role in the Black Orchestra takes on a whole new light.

State Department records for South America confirm that the Ustashi Minister for Finance and the French Under Secretary of State of the Vichy Government, went to Argentina via the Vatican Ratline.[32] According to Paul Manning, there were rumours of others. He cites the FBI's copy of a surveillance file forwarded by the Central de Intelligencia of Argentina's Ministry of the Interior:

> . . . in 1948, Martin Bormann received the bulk of the treasure that had made up the financial reserve of the Deutsche Bank . . . Like other fugitives, he entered Argentina in 1948, coming from Genoa on a second-class ticket, with forged Vatican documentation.[33]

The 'Bormann connection' may be nothing more than a clever hoax to discredit the underlying charges that stolen Nazi money was laundered to South America and injected back into West Germany for the 'great economic miracle' of 1948 to 1951. Most of these financial allegations have been dismissed out of hand, perhaps prematurely.

In 1945 the US Treasury Department accused Allen Dulles of laundering funds from the Nazi bank of Hungary into Switzerland. Similar charges were made against Dulles's agent, Hans Bernd Gisevius, who had worked for Dulles as an OSS agent while serving at the Reichsbank.[34] The State Department quickly took over the Treasury Department's money laundering allegations, and the Dulles–Gisevius investigation was quietly dropped.[35]

Gisevius may have had some involvement with the Ratlines. He was a senior member of the Black Orchestra during World War II and was considered to be 'Allen Dulles's pipeline to Admiral

Canaris'.[36] After the war, Gisevius personally briefed the Australian government on American efforts to resettle the surplus population of Europe in other countries, citing the support of the 'Committee for a Free Europe', later acknowledged as a clandestine front for Dulles's Cold War programmes. This was also the organisation which served as the American end of the Vatican Ratlines.[37]

The most important front group was an entity called the World Commerce Corporation established after World War II to rebuild German–South American trade networks.[38] The directors of this corporation were Sir William Stephenson, formerly of British intelligence and General William Donovan, formerly of the OSS. One of the attorneys for World Commerce was Allen Dulles, whose assistant, Frank Wisner, was the State Department's deputy for currency and economic reform in the American zone of West Germany. Many of the staff members for the economic reconstruction of occupied Germany came from the same international financial firms which had invested heavily in the pre-war German economy.

According to sworn testimony before the US Senate by a representative of the German banking industry, an organisation did exist in 1950 which was 'formed by Lord Shawcross of England and Mr Hermann Abs of Germany to bring about a Magna Carta for the protection of foreign investments of World War II'.[39] This is the same Lord Shawcross who led the recent campaign in the British House of Lords to prevent the re-opening of war crimes investigations in Britain. Despite allegations by Manning, it is difficult to believe that Shawcross would have lent his good name to Abs's organisation if he had known its real purpose. In a 1966 hearing before the Select Committee on Standards and Conduct of the US Senate, Abs was identified as the common denominator of a group seeking return of vested enemy properties of World War II.[40]

When the United States entered the war in 1941, all of the branches of American banks in France under German control were closed, except two which had ties to Abs: Morgan et Cie and Chase of New York:

> both received this special treatment through the intercession of Dr Hermann Josef Abs of Deutsche Bank, financial adviser to the German > government. According to US Treasury agent reports, the favorable treatment was due to . . . an 'old school tie', an unspoken understanding among international bankers that wars may come and may go but the flux of wealth goes on forever.[41]

According to Nuremberg records, Abs's Deutsche Bank was the principal conduit for laundering Nazi money into Argentina during the war under the supervision of Martin Bormann.[42] The American war crimes investigation of Abs, former head of the Deutsche Bank, was quietly dropped and Abs was appointed economic adviser for the British zone of Germany.[43] It should also be noted that Abs became a financial adviser to the Vatican.[44]

According to Penny Lernoux, the financial collapse of Vatican-supported banks during the 1970s involved the same group of people connected to Dulles's and Angleton's network of money launderers.[45] Prior to World War II, Angleton's father had financial interests in Milan, and may have met both Montini and a Sicilian banker named Michele Sindona at this earlier time.

According to Lernoux, Sindona 'wangled an introduction to the powerful Giovanni Montini in Milan, who would later become Pope Paul VI'. Montini introduced Sindona to the leader of the Christian Democrats. Sindona served the younger Angleton for many years as a CIA 'funnel for supporting funds' to friendly Italian politicians.[46] In 1969 Sindona became the financial adviser to the Vatican while Montini was the Pope. Sindona and his cohort, Roberto Calvi, created a financial scandal that cost the Vatican Bank hundreds of millions of dollars.[47]

The laundering of Nazi war profits after World War II may be the most embarrassing secret of all. There is a pattern of Western silence on this topic which cannot be ignored. We believe such reticence stems from a desire to prevent their own citizens from learning the embarrassing truth, and not from any consideration of national security interests.

The Holy See

And so we turn now to the Vatican's scorecard. When we use the word 'Vatican', we mean only that tiny cabal of priests and diplomats who actively participated in the Ratlines. In the preceding chapters, we have endeavoured to set forth the facts in a straightforward manner. Now we wish to state our own opinions and conclusions. Our charges are sometimes harsh; we reiterate that they involve only those unworthy and unrepresentative bureaucrats who ran Vatican policy.

It is our opinion that Pius XII and Giovanni Montini (later Pope Paul VI) were not always swept up by forces beyond their control. In many cases, they were the architects of their own folly, or active accomplices to others' crimes. Sooner or later, the head of every state stands before the bar of history, and the Pontiff is no exception. When the Pope assumed the temporal powers of his third crown, he was held to temporal standards of accountability. There is one difference: the only tribunal is public opinion.

We do not claim that the evidence is sufficient to convict, only enough to warrant a belief among reasonable people that crimes were committed. We leave it to the reader, and history, to judge if there is cause for indictment and further inquiry, or whether it is time to put false accusations to rest . . .

COUNT ONE: Crimes Against Peace. We find no evidence that the Vatican encouraged Nazi Germany in any war of aggression. Contrary to popular belief, the evidence is fairly clear that the Holy See repeatedly attempted to resist Hitler's predatory policies. By means of the Church's intelligence services advance warning was given of Nazi plans to invade Belgium and Holland.

Far from being pro-Hitler, Pius XII personally assisted the German opposition in secret attempts to overthrow his regime. Although unsuccessful, the Black Orchestra risked their lives to end Nazism. Some will say that the Vatican's secret anti-Hitler negotiations are the finest hour of the Catholic Church. We submit it is also evidence of the Vatican's double standard.

In its Concordat with Mussolini, the Holy See undertook to stand above politics, to be a purely moral force, only intervening if requested by all parties to resolve a dispute. The Black Orchestra was hardly a case of international mediation; it was covert assistance to an attempted coup. Hitler's opponents received substantial assistance from the Vatican; does that not justify the Ratlines' support for Stalin's opposition? If the Vatican endorses covert diplomatic assistance to overthrow dictators, where does it draw the line? If combatting Hitler justifies breaking the rules, what about Quaddafi, Suharto or Saddam Hussein?

At the very least, the Black Orchestra precedent exposes the Holy See to charges of selective moral involvement. The Vatican cannot privately support some causes while publicly ignoring others. The present Pope actively and successfully supported Poland's anti-Communists, but yet he remains silent about East Timor, although Indonesian occupation there has brought about another Holocaust. If the Vatican wishes to exert moral authority, it must be unequivocal and truly neutral. Only in that way can it remain above temporal affairs. The world has need of diplomats whose agenda is peace on earth and goodwill to all humanity. There are enough plotters.

The Vatican's defenders believe that it has been unjustly attacked for supporting Hitler's policies. Yet, in order to preserve confidence in its trustworthiness as a secret intermediary in time of war, the Vatican has remained silent about its role in the Black Orchestra. We do not believe that such silence is warranted, or such trust deserved.

According to Anthony Cave Brown, the Allies had so little hope in the Black Orchestra that they sacrificed it to deceive Hitler. In spring 1942 Nicholas Kallay became Prime Minister of Hungary. After Stalingrad, 'Kallay began to lobby the West for a separate peace through the Department of Extraordinary Affairs at the Vatican'. The Allies sent a known Soviet agent as their negotiator. Word of the Hungarian peace initiative was quickly leaked to Hitler. 'There was every reason to suppose the British had deliberately tipped Kallay's hand, and their revelations had the desired effect in provoking the Führer's wrath.'[48]

Similarly, 'there were indications from the Vatican that Romania could expect favorable terms' if it switched from the Axis to the Allies. But when the Romanian emissary met British negotiators in Cairo, 'both his whereabouts and his mission were revealed on Allied Newscasts'. Exposing the Vatican's peace efforts was part of an Allied deception programme co-ordinated with Moscow.[49] This had the desired effect: Hitler stripped his three best divisions from France and sent them to the Balkans to stop the Black Orchestra's uprisings. Shortly afterwards, Allied troops landed in Normandy.[50]

For the last half of the war, the Allies used the Vatican's Black Orchestra to mislead Hitler about D-Day. Pius XII wanted to be a major player on the international chessboard, but he was just a pawn. Pius XII's first mistake was to get involved with the Black Orchestra; his second was to rely on the West, because the Soviets had outwitted them at every turn. The Vatican is not guilty of supporting Hitler, but guilty of hypocrisy, incompetence and stupidity in risking the lives of his opponents.

Naivety is the cardinal sin of diplomacy, and of that the Vatican was unquestionably guilty. The unintended result was the betrayal and execution of most Black Orchestra members, whom the Allies had judged, like the Jews, to be expendable to the war effort. In hindsight, the Vatican accomplished nothing.

COUNT TWO: Obstruction of Justice. What the Pope did after the war was worse than nothing. Instead of smuggling homeless Jews to Argentina, the Ratlines smuggled Eichmann, Pavelić and Stangl, among many others. Instead of denouncing Bishop Hudal, the Vatican replaced him with a less conspicuous, but far more efficient and effective operative in the form of Father Draganović. Instead of international justice, there was Intermarium and a host of émigré Nazi fronts. The world has paid a heavy price for that decision.

What the Vatican did after World War II was a crime. The evidence is unequivocal: the Holy See aided the flight of fugitives from international justice. The Ratlines were intentionally created to aid and abet the escape of wanted Nazi war criminals. Hudal was known for his Nazi affinities long before 1945, yet retained his influential position long after he was publicly exposed. His successor, Father Draganović, was assisted by several religious orders which printed false identity cards, procured Red Cross passports under false pretences, and provided transport under false names. These were not acts of Christian charity. The clandestine Nazi-smuggling immorally misused the Church's legitimate charitable organisations.

We find no defence of ignorance: Pius XII was fully aware of Ante Pavelić's crimes. Nor was he the only case. The Ratlines operated with reckless disregard for the fugitives' crimes against humanity. If the Pope wanted to know their real names, he had only to ask Father Draganović. The burglary of his office revealed that he kept lists of the fugitives' true and false identities. The Pope's diplomatic messages reveal a pattern of protection and intercession for war criminals. There was virtually unanimous agreement among the surviving witnesses, both clerical and intelligence officials, that the Vatican knew they were sheltering Nazis.

We find no defence of unauthorised conduct: the Ratlines were an official extension of covert Vatican diplomacy. Both the US and British files confirm that the Vatican was asked to smuggle Nazi collaborators, so-called 'Greys', and co-operated in this programme. There was virtually unanimous agreement among the surviving witnesses that Draganović operated with the highest official sanction. One key witness testified that Montini asked Draganović to smuggle fugitives. The intelligence files of several nations confirm that the Vatican's top leaders authorised and directed the smuggling of fugitive war criminals.

We find no defence of coercion, rescue, or necessity. The West were Stalin's accomplices when they handed back tens of thousands of people who had fled Communist tyranny. Many were not Nazis, but innocent victims of the war, although many were murderers deserving little sympathy. There was no acceptable system of justice behind the 'Iron Curtain', and those forcibly returned were slaughtered or imprisoned without trial. The Allied leaders were guilty of criminal naivety in 1945.

But the forced repatriations came to a halt almost immediately, when the Allied leaders realised their mistake. Thereafter only a few Communist extradition requests were agreed. The Ratlines continued to smuggle war criminals well into the 1950s, years after the threat of repatriation had disappeared. But what of Eichmann, Stangl and Rauff, among many others? What of the many German and Austrian Nazis who were of no interest to the Soviets and their allies? What excuse can be made for them? Was the Vatican afraid of democratic justice? The Western tribunals were shamefully lenient; only a handful were punished.[51]

Fear of Communist persecution was not the criterion for those who utilised the Ratlines. In every case we examined, the Vatican's fugitives were previously in Western not Soviet custody. The Vatican sheltered Nazis who had been condemned by the democratic governments of Hungary and Czechoslovakia. Barbie was fleeing from French justice, not Stalin's. The mitigating factors which led the Vatican to shelter Stalin's victims in 1945 had long expired by 1951. The Ratlines did not exist to rescue the innocent, only the guilty. The innocent had no need of false identities. We find overwhelming reason to indict the Vatican for obstruction of Justice.

COUNT THREE: Receiving Stolen Goods. Agents of the Vatican were knowingly receiving passports which were stolen or fraudulently obtained from the Red Cross. The available evidence only implicates François Poncet and later, Allen Dulles, in the actual theft. But Draganović knew he was trafficking in stolen goods. Indeed, he was forging identity cards as part of the same fraudulent scheme.

We have found no direct evidence that the Vatican profited from the property stolen from the Nazis' victims. However, circumstantial evidence raises troubling questions of a peripheral involvement in Allied intelligence money laundering. Certainly, the Ratlines were subsidised by Western intelligence, as documented in the Barbie case. However, that does not explain where the Vatican got the rest of the money. The evidence shows that Bishop Rožman laundered money on the black market in Switzerland, and that some or all of those funds were the Ustashi's plundered treasure, smuggled out of Yugoslavia by the Church and British intelligence. Draganović admitted that he took some of this money to the Vatican.

The weight of the evidence is that the Ratlines' laundered money originated with gold bullion from Pavelić's war booty. It was not, as suggested by one intelligence file, the property of the Croatian Catholic Church. Pavelić's treasure was in the form of gold bars and Western currency, not jewelled vestments or chalices. Moreover, even after the gold was safely out of Communist territory, Draganović remained accountable to Ustashi officials. We find sufficient evidence to accuse the Vatican of receiving stolen property, and overwhelming evidence that they trafficked in stolen or fraudulently obtained documents.

COUNT FOUR: Abuse of Diplomatic Privileges. The evidence shows a clear pattern of violation of diplomatic norms by the Vatican. Fugitive war criminals were escorted in vehicles with diplomatic plates, protecting them from arrest. Senior Vatican diplomats intervened with the Allies to obtain official travel documents for Bishop Hudal, Father Draganović, Bishop Bučko and others, enabling them to organise the Ratlines under cover of official religious duties. Vatican facilities with official extra-territoriality or de facto immunity were used to house transient war criminals. False representations by Hudal, Draganović, Bučko and others were conveyed by Vatican diplomatic channels to obtain the release of Nazi murderers and collaborators.

We find no defence of ignorance for the reasons stated previously. The Ratlines could not have existed without the Vatican's diplomatic protection. Vatican diplomats knowingly shipped Nazi nationalists to other countries in violation of their immigration laws. Indeed, that was the very purpose of the Ratlines. By turning a blind eye towards the Nazis' crimes, covert Vatican diplomacy helped create the disasters of the Cold War. They interceded on behalf of Slovak Fascists before, during and after the Durčansky plot which led directly to the Communist takeover of Czechoslovakia.

Apart from a few successes in local Italian politics, Vatican diplomacy played a significant role in discrediting the legitimate anti-Communist movements of Central and Eastern Europe. Intermarium was an act of war, and the human losses caused by the Vatican in the Cold War were far greater than the Canaris group's in World War II. By repeating the Black Orchestra mistake, they unwittingly helped the Communists maintain control.

The Vatican was not innocent by reason of mistake, they knew what they were doing. Pius XII and Montini were experienced diplomats, and they pursued strategic and diplomatic initiatives that were intended to subvert hostile states. Their goals were armed revolution, not diplomacy. Intermarium was meant to foment insurrection. The Vatican advanced its own geo-political interests, like the other major players. It is no defence to say that the Communists were more clever at espionage than the Vatican. Pius XII played Machiavelli, and Stalin beat him at his own game.

In conclusion, we believe that the evidence clears the Vatican of actively assisting Hitler, but indicts it for aiding war criminals, dealing in stolen property, and violating the norms of international diplomacy.

We recognise that this book will re-open old wounds and place the Vatican's response to the Holocaust in a new perspective. How, it will be asked, could the Vatican do so much to help the Nazis in the Cold War and so little to help the victims? Why did Pius XII switch in 1945 from his policy of silence towards the Jews to advocacy for the Nazis? Where were the Ratlines for those who wished to escape from Auschwitz? Why would the Vatican give false passports to the Nazis when its officials rarely gave false baptismal certificates to the Jews? Are the Ratlines evidence of hypocrisy, or worse, anti-Semitic double standards? We recognise that our evidence of Vatican misconduct in the Cold War raises new and harder questions about its conduct during the Holocaust.

We do not have all the answers, but believe these issues must be addressed, for on their resolution may well depend the future direction of Vatican activism. And so we turn to the ugliest accusation of all: that the Vatican was guilty of crimes against humanity.

We find no evidence to support the charge that the Vatican supported the Holocaust or encouraged the destruction of any racial, political or religious group. It is true that it showed selective morality, placing a lesser importance on some atrocities. Pius XII himself demonstrated this when he remained silent about the slaughter of the Spartacists in 1919, while loudly condemning their crimes. The evidence shows that the Vatican attempted to rescue as many Jews as possible with quiet diplomacy. In countries like Italy, where the Pope had some influence, he used it well. Even in Berlin, Vatican diplomacy was the conduit for bribes to save lives. The Israeli government publicly credits them for secretly negotiating payments that ransomed thousands of Jews from Nazi custody.[52] Churchill and Roosevelt made speeches in public, but in private, their policy was to abandon the Jews to their fate. The Pope did the opposite; without making speeches, the Catholic Church probably saved more Jews than all the Allied governments combined. We believe it was nowhere near enough.

Perhaps the Pontiff is held to a double standard (or a higher one). No matter what he may have done in secret, there are those who still condemn Pius XII for not speaking out in public. In truth, there is little that can be said in his defence. It does not matter that Britain and America wanted the Holy See to remain silent when the last Jews of Hungary were about to be deported. The Pope has higher obligations than diplomacy; the Vatican is not Switzerland.

Nor does it matter that the Pope sent a private telegram pleading for the lives of Hungarian Jews instead of making a radio appeal. By his public silence, he was perceived to be neutral in favour of the Germans. Raoul Wallenberg was neutral, and a diplomat, but that did not stop him. He handed out false citizenship papers to every Jew he could. He was never touched by the Nazis. Cardinal Roncalli, later John XXIII, handed out false baptismal certificates. He was not harmed.

Before his death, Pius XI had already published one Encyclical condemning Nazi teachings. The Church did not suffer; in fact, its status was enhanced. At death's door, he had prepared another denunciation of the Nazis' anti-Christian doctrines. His successor, Pius XII, quietly buried it. Therein, we submit, lies his guilt: from the moment he assumed St Peter's mantle he chose diplomacy over truth, his temporal powers over his moral duty.

Conclusions: A Reappraisal

In light of the intense publicity and interest in the fate of the Third Reich's missing and vastly immense fortune, we have decided to add this new chapter to this reprinted edition of the book.

At the time this book was first published in Britain in 1991 under the title Ratlines, we had traced the flight of the Third Reich's stolen treasure – especially the gold plundered from the millions of victims – from the retreating Fascist armies through a number of senior officials of the Catholic Church to the Vatican itself and then to the Nazi diaspora, particularly in Argentina.

At that time, we relied on a number of declassified US intelligence documents, and on files smuggled out from behind the Iron Curtain just before the collapse of Communism. The evidence presented in this book led us to many new contacts in the intelligence community, and as a result we followed a number of leads that we had previously ignored or at least neglected because of our strict focus on just one aspect of the Vatican's role in moving Hitler's fortune around the world.

In consequence, we have revised our conclusions set out in Chapter Twelve. In particular, we now make a quite different appraisal of our Third Count against the Holy See: Receiving Stolen Goods, as set out on page 284. Where in 1991 we found 'no direct evidence that the Vatican profited from the property stolen from the Nazis' victims', in 1997 we find that on the balance of probabilities, and taking into account the additional evidence that has since emerged, there was no other reason than profit for this enterprise.

Indeed, we now conclude that it is more likely than not that the Ratlines were established as much for the Vatican's economic benefit as they were to pursue its war against Communism by saving the Fascist armies of the defeated Third Reich.

To justify this conclusion we now examine the complex financial dealings between Hitler's Germany and Western financiers and lawyers, and the crucial role played by the Vatican's own bank in stitching these deals together. All done, as we show, to advance the Holy See's own shares portfolio and reap a handsome dividend.

The most recent account of the post-1945 trail of Nazi gold goes like this: after fifty years of indifference and official cover-up, the truth about the Third Reich's looted gold and stolen treasure became mainstream news in 1996 because of a US Congressional inquiry. Jewish communities all across the globe applauded the belated action, and hundreds of Holocaust survivors came forward to claim money from decades-old accounts that Swiss bankers had fraudulently appropriated after World War II.

This version – which diverts attention to the world of Swiss banking – is the story that many vested interests would like recorded as the final word on the Nazis' stolen fortunes. There is one vested interest in particular that would like this to be the last word: the Vatican.

The bankers of Zürich, on the other hand, know that the bulk of the stolen Nazi money was laundered from Switzerland through the one bank that can never be audited. The trail of Nazi money leads to the one financial institution with total diplomatic immunity: the Vatican Bank. Here in the eternal city of Rome, the last secret of World War II lies buried inside the Vatican's vaults under the careful protection of the Swiss Guards.

The Nazi looting of the wealth of nations was one of the most documented crimes in history. National treasuries were seized, artworks stolen; tens of billions of dollars' worth of gems and currency vanished forever. But half a century later, we are only beginning to ask the crucial question: Where did all that money go?

In recent times Switzerland has been singled out as the secret accomplice to the monetary crimes of the Third Reich. As a wit remarked in The New Republic, the Germans liked the Swiss not because they were good neighbors, but because they were good fences. Particularly poignant are the assertions that the 'gnomes' of Zürich have been compounding interest for themselves from the unclosed accounts of those who vanished in the Holocaust.

Such chicanery is on a par with the Swiss companies which denied life insurance payments to Jewish heirs, first, because they could not produce death certificates attesting to their parents' demise in the Holocaust, or in the alternative, because the premiums had not been paid after the policyholders were incarcerated at Auschwitz.
